las rancacked and burnt Debrezin a great Towne of the Vayuods. But not long after, the Vay-uod Solymans Vaſſall, and aided by him with foure thouſand Turks and three thouſand Mol-dauians, did much harme vpon the frontiers of that part of Hungary which belonged vnto the Emperour; and firſt tooke Hadad, and afterwards beſieged Vngar. In requitall whereof, Maximilian the Emperour ſent Lazarus Suendi a valiant Captaine; who with an Army of F eight thouſand beſieged the ſtrong Caſtle of Tokay, which he tooke the fiſt of February, in the yeare 1565; and after that tooke the rich Towne of Erden. In the meane time Solyman, 1565 who had in himſelfe fully purpoſed to be reuenged of all theſe injuries (as well appeared by that he did the yeare following) to ſtay the Emperour from proceeding further, vntill ſuch

time as he were at better leiſure to be reuenged, (for as then he was making great preparation for Malta) ſent Marcus Lilineſius a renegat Tranſyluanian of Cibinum, his embaſſador to Maximilian, to put him in remembrance of the league made with his father, and to wiſh him to haue regard how he further proceeded to the breach thereof. Whereupon the Emperour becauſe he would not ſeeme vnwilling to hearken to peace, commanded his lieutenants and captains no more to inuade Tranſyluania or that part of Hungary which the Turks held. Howbeit that whileſt this Embaſſadour was thus intreating of peace at Vienna, the Baſſa of Temeſware in the borders of Tranſyluania, made diuers incurſions into the borders of Hungary, and with ſix thouſand ſouldiers beſieged the ſtrong caſtle of Iula, and the Turks in great number came dayly into Tranſyluania. At which time alſo Suendi Generall of Maximilian his Forces vpon the frontiers, by meſſengers ſent for that purpoſe, wiſhed him not to giue any credit to the Turks Embaſſadour, who meaning nothing but warre, vnder the colour of peace ſought nothing elſe, but to take him vpon the ſudden vnprouided. Neither ceaſed theſe troubles thus, but dayly grew from euill to worſe: for in Iune the Tranſyluanians beſieged Erden, before taken by the Imperials, and after two moneths ſiege had it yeelded vnto them. In the meane time Chernouich the Emperours Embaſſadour to Solyman, returned from Conſtantinople; aſſuring him that the great Turke for all his faire ſhowes of peace, meant indeed nothing but warres, for which he was (as he ſaid) making great preparation both by ſea and land. Whereupon the Emperor began to raiſe new forces: which thing diuers Noblemen both of Germany and other places hearing of, came vnto him with their followers: and amongſt other Romerus one of the Knights of Malta, and diuers other of his brethren, with fiue companies of ſouldiers well appointed, ſent thither by George Hochenheime grand Prior of that Order in Germany, and then confirmed one of the Princes of the Empire. At the ſame time alſo, the Turks being buſie vpon the borders of Styria, and the places thereabouts, were many times cut off by Charles the Archduke: who taking them at an aduantage, ſlew at one time three thouſand of them. Yet for all, the Turkes Embaſſadour was ſtill at Vienna treating for peace, and ſo cunningly handled the matter, that whereas Eccius Salma a valiant Captaine, had corrupted the chiefe Iudge with certaine others of Alba-Regalis, to haue betraied the City vnto him; for performance whereof they had deliuered their wiues and children as hoſtages, and he was now vpon his way from Rab, which is but eight miles off, in an aſſured hope to haue ſurpriſed the City; he was ſuddenly by Letters in poſt from the Emperour, called backe againe, for corrupting the hope conceiued of peace: and ſo was that notoble deſignement vnfortunately diſappointed: of which practiſe the Turks hauing knowledge, afterwards moſt cruelly executed forty of the conſpiratours, impailing ſome of them vpon ſharpe ſtakes, and hanging others vpon yron hookes by the jawes vntill they were dead. Shortly after the Turks tooke Neoſtat, which was not long after recouered againe by the Emperour.

At the ſame time one of the Turks ſpies was taken at Zigeth, who but thirteen daies before was ſent from Conſtantinople of purpoſe to view the ſtrength and ſcituation of that place: he being brought before Charles the Archduke, and examined, ſaid, That Solyman would aſſuredly the next Spring come in perſon himſelfe into Hungary, to beſiege the ſtrong caſtles of Zigeth and Iula. At which time alſo County Serinus tooke certaine other of the Turks Spies, by whom he was certainely aduertiſed of Solymans comming the next yeare; and amongſt others, Scapher Vayda the Baſſa of Buda his chiefe Counſellor. Beſides this, the country-men contributors both to the Imperials and the Turks, were now ſtreightly commanded by the Turks, to pay no more contribution mony vnto the Imperials: whereupon it was eaſily gathered, that all that talke of peace was as Suendi had oftentimes written, nothing els but to delay the time, and to put them in ſecurity. Beſide that, the Turks made incurſions daily into one place or other of the Emperors territories, ſhewing their antient hate, and ſowing by thoſe light skirmiſhes, as it were the ſeed of a greater war againſt the next Spring: which the Emperor now out of doubt of (being alſo warned thereof by many Letters from his friends) put ſtrong garriſons into the frontier towns, eſpecially into Rab and Zigeth. But knowing that to be but a poore helpe againſt ſo puiſſant an enemy, he reſolued as his father and vncle had done before, to reſt vpon the ſtrength of the Empire, and againſt the next yeare to call a generall

A aſſembly of the Princes of the empire at Auguſta, for the better withſtanding of the common Enemy. The wars thus beginning again in Hungary, Solyman at the ſame time in reuenge of the manifold harms don to his ſubiects by the Knights of Malta (whoſe hand he found euer againſt him in all his dealings with the other Chriſtian Princes) made great preparation by ſea and land, purpoſing, as ſeemed by the maner therof, to haue raſed the memoriall of thoſe worthy men from off the earth. Whervnto, beſide the naturall hatred which he bare againſt all Chriſtians in general, and them aboue the reſt in particular, he was much incited by Caſſanes, Barbaruſſa's ſon, King of Algiers, and Dragut gouernor of Tripolis, by whoſe perſuaſion he cauſed a ſtrong fleet to be rigged vp, commanding the lieutenants and gouernors of his ports and hauens al alongſt the ſea-coaſt, to put to their helping hands, and to be ready againſt the B next Spring. And not long after, vnderſtanding partly of his own certaine knowledge, and partly by the relation of others, in what good forwardnes things were, hee calling together a great aſſembly of his chief princes and men of Warre, deliuered vnto them his mind as followeth:

Solyman prepares to inuade Malta.

What thing I haue theſe forty years always wiſhed, which was to haue ſo much leiſure from other wars, as to pluck out of their neſts and vtterly to root out thoſe croſſed pyrats, which vaunt themſelues to be the Bulwark of Chriſtendom: that ſame me-thinks I haue by the fauor of God, and Mahomet his Prophet, at this time obtained. For we haue ſo repreſſed the attempts of the Perſians, that they canot let vs. And in Hungary, from whence certain dreadfull motions were reported, we our ſelues wil ſhortly do thoſe things C which ſhall inforce our enemies to hide their heads in the heart of Germany, and to ſue to vs for peace. You your ſelues daily hear the pittifull complaints of our ſubiects and merchants, whom theſe Maltaſes, I ſay not ſoldiers, but pyrats, if they but look into thoſe ſeas, ſpoil and make prize of: whoſe iniuries to reuenge, all lawes both of God and man do require. Neither can any thing happen vnto me more pleaſing or more honorable, than if I may before I die accompliſh theſe things, that is to win Malta, and to leaue all things in order in Hungary and Polonia. Except perhaps ſome man thinke it no harder matter for vs to thruſt theſe croſſed Companions from the rocks of Malta, than for our Anceſtors to haue driuen them out of Ieruſalem, and ſo quite out of Syria: and for our ſelues to haue forced them out of the ſtrong Iſland of the Rhodes. But this ſome will ſay is neerer vnto Italy, from whence aid may eaſily be ſent, and the place defended by a Fleet. Beleeue me, they will neuer aduenture to fight with vs at ſea, who remember themſelues to D haue bin there by vs ſo often ouerthrown: beſide that, ſo little a place cannot contain any great gariſon, neither if it could, could it long feed them. Wherfore vnto this expedition we haue determined with the firſt of the Spring to ſend a moſt ſtrong fleet: and euen now we haue already commanded all our ſea Captains and Aduenturers which acknowledge our command, to be there preſent with their ſhips. The King of Algiers will be there, the gariſons of Alexandria are in readines, ſo alſo is Dragut with his appointed fleet. As for our own, it is by myne own appointment rigged vp: vnto which fleet I doubt not but that all the ſtrength of the Weſt will giue place. Which thing (worthy Captains) we ſpeak truſting vpon the help of almighty God and Mahomet his great Prophet, with your known and approued valor. Now remaineth only, that euery one of you think with vs, how this war may beſt be managed, and ſo to referre your deuices vnto vs. Which that you may the better do, Lo, I here deliuer vnto you the ſcituation of the whole Iſland, E and project of all their fortifications, which we haue receiued of moſt expert and skilfull men.

Solymans oration to his captains for inuading of Malta.

Solymans purpoſe thus made known, and the matter wel conſidered; after that they which beſt knew the ſtrong places & maners of the Maltezes, had declared their opinions what they thought moſt expedient; it was decreed, That they ſhould with al ſpeed ſet forward. Wherfore victual and other things neceſſary for ſuch an expedition being with wonderfull celerity prepared, they expected but wind.

Of theſe things Io. Valetta a Frenchman, Grand Maſter of Malta, and one of the Knights of the Order, being both by Letters and Meſſengers aduertiſed (for he had alwaies ſet there his F intelligencers at Conſtantinople, who warily noted the purpoſes and actions of Solyman) was not afraid; but knowing that of God depended the victory, and that men were to watch, labor, and foreſee: he aſſembled a Councel of his Knights, and in few words ſpake vnto them in this ſort:

What Solyman prepareth (moſt noble and valiant Knights) and what a great War he prouideth againſt vs, you with me of late right well vnderſtand. Wherfore it is needles for me to vſe any long ſpeech with you concerning that matter. The Enemy is known, his inſatiable ambition is known, his ſtrength is known, and his mortall hate againſt vs and the Chriſtian Name is ſufficiently known. Wherfore let vs all as one firſt reconcile our ſelues to God, and then prouide all ſuch things as ſhall be needfull for the War. In brief, noble Knights, to reconcile our ſelues vnto God, and to appeaſe his diſpleaſure, two things are of vs to be performed: wherof the one conſiſts in amendment of life, with a holy conuerſation; the other in a religious worſhipping of him, with a firm and conſtant truſt in his help, with Prayer, which is called godlineſſe. By theſe means our Anceſtors obtained many victories againſt the Infidels in the Eaſt. Neither is it to be doubted, but that if we ſhall in theſe things ioyn together, we ſhall alſo fruſtrate all the force and fury of this proud Tyrant. But foraſmuch as God vſually helps them which labor and take pains, and not the negligent and ſloathfull, we muſt of neceſſity ioyn vnto them thoſe helps, which both our profeſſion and the courſe of war requireth: which partly conſiſteth in our ſelues, and partly in the other Chriſtian Princes. For victuall, armor, mony, and other ſuch things as in wars are requiſit, we will ſo prouide, that no man ſhall iuſtly complain that we ſpared either coſt or pains. I will poure out all my ſtore, neither will I for deſire of life refuſe any danger. As for the Chriſtian princes, I canot perſuade my ſelfe that they will lie ſtill in ſo fit an opportunity, and in ſo great danger, not of our eſtate only, but much more of their own. Verily I wil not ſpare to exhort euery one of them both by letters and meſſengers, which in part we haue already don: and I doubt not but we ſhall haue aid enough from the Pope, the Emperor, and the king of Spain (ſuch is their Chriſtian Zeal) and they I hope ſhall moue the reſt. As for you, the Princes and very light of this ſacred Order, and the reſt of our brethren, moſt valiant Knights, I am well aſſured you wil ſo fight for the moſt holy Chriſtian religion, for your liues and goods, and for the glory of the Latine name, againſt a moſt cruell Tyrant, the rooter out of all true Religion, of all ciuility and good learning, the plague of the world, hated of God and man; as that he ſhall feel the ſting of the Croſſe, which hee ſo much contemneth, euen in the city of Conſtantinople, yea in his houſes of pleaſure. For we ſhall not haue now to do with him in the Iſland of the Rhodes, far from the help of our friends, (from Aſia, from Europ, from Egypt incloſed with our enemies both by ſea and land) but in the eies of Italy and Spain, in places ſtrongly fortified, from whence the Enemy may eaſily be circumuented. Which that it may ſo fal out, let vs not ceaſe to pray vnto almighty God, and to craue his ready help.

When the Grand Maſter had thus ſaid, all that were there preſent promiſed with one aſſent, rather to loſe their liues, than in any part to fail the Common Cauſe, or to fall into the power of Solyman. After that, publique prayer and ſupplication was made in euery Church thorow the Iſland; and three Colonels choſen out of all the Knights: one an Italian, ſyrnamed Imperator, another Byrneus a French man, and Quatrius a Spaniard the third, all aduiſed men and moſt expert ſouldiers, which ſhould with all diligence prouide all things neceſſarie and conuenient for the War. By whoſe appointment the ſuburbs and trees which might any way be hurtfull to the fortified places, were ouerthrown; the fortifications were thoroughly viewed, the Garriſons ſtrengthned, and all manner of prouiſion moſt plentifully diſtributed: and Letters from the Grand Maſter ſent vnto the Great Biſhop and ſundry other Chriſtian Princes, requeſting their aid againſt the Common Enemy. Meſſengers were alſo diſmiſſed into diuers places, to certifie both the Knights of the Order and others, of the Turks great preparation.

Solymans fleet departeth from Conſtantinople.

Solymans Fleet departing from Conſtantinople the two and twentieth day of March in the year 1565, kept a direct courſe toward Peloponeſus, and ſo came to Methon; where Muſtapha Baſſa one of the Turks greateſt Captains, a man of ſeuenty fiue years old, and General of the land forces, muſtred the army, wherein were numbred ſeuen thouſand horſemen of them which are of the Turks called Spachi: out of the leſſer Aſia, conducted by the Gouernour of that country, and two Lieutenants of Cilicia, fiue hundred: and out of the Iſland of Lesbos, now called Metylene four hundred: he had of the Ianizaries four thouſand fiue hundred, led by two Colonels appointed by Solyman, for that the chief Captain of the Ianizaries (which they call the Aga) neuer departeth from the city but when the Sultan goeth himſelf. Beſides theſe was a certain kind of men amongſt the Turks, who liue of the reuenues of the Church; of them there was in the Army thirteene thouſand, who had all at Conſtantinople vowed

A their liues for their ſuperſtition. Out of Thracia and Peloponeſus were come two Colonels, and one Lieutenant,with twelue hundred horſmen,and 3500 Voluntiers out of diuers Countries.
There alſo Pial Baſſa, Solymans Admirall, took view of the fleet, wherin were found an hundred and thirty gallies,two and twenty ſhips for burthen,ſome greater,ſome leſſe;beſides one that was caſt away neer vnto Methone,where was loſt 6000 barrels of pouder, 1300 great ſhot,and 400 Spahi. Beſides theſe,there were ten gallies from the Rhodes, commaunded by Halyport a man of 70 years;two gallies from Mitylene, and 17 galliots and other ſmall pyrats ſhips. With this ſtrong fleet the Turks departing from Methone the 13 of May, arriued at Malta the 18 of the ſame month,and put into a hauen in the North-Eaſt part of the Iſle, called by the inhabitants Marzaſiroc: but perceiuing themſelues not to be there in ſafety, they remoued to another port called Major.

The deſcription of Malta.

B The Iſland of Malta lying betwixt Africa and Sicilia, might be doubted whether it were to be accounted in Africk or Europ, but that the antient coſmographers and the Moors language, which the Maltæſes haue alwaies vſed, claime it for Africke: it is in length from the North-Eaſt to the South-Weſt 20 miles; and in the broadeſt place 12. It regards Africk Southward, ouer againſt Leptis parva; and Sicilia toward the North, but more towards Pachinum than Lilybeum; and is in circuit threeſcore miles. It ſeemeth to take the name Melita of Mel or hony,wherof it yeeldeth plenty. The trees there bear fruit twice a year,& they haue oftententimes twice harueſt, eſpecially of Barly and Cotton wool; yet is the Iſland in ſome places ſtony,grauelly,and bare of wood. Neuertheles it beareth figs,apples, Almonds, Grapes,and other fruit trees planted by the induſtry of man,Date trees alſo, but not fruitful: C it beareth thiſtles of ſuch bignes that the inhabitants vſe them for wood. Freſh water is there wonderful ſcarce, and ſuch wels as they haue are filled with rain in Winter, for in Summer they are either clean dry,or els the water becomes brachy. The Inhabitants are ſo burnt with the Sun,that they differ little in colour from the Ethyopians: they are of a wholſom constitution of body,ſpare of dyet,induſtrous,rather painful than warlike,dying more for age than of ſicknes. Their buildings,except it be in the city (which is in the midſt of the Iſland) and ſuburbs,are long and low like vnto the Moors,couered with turf or reed. It is commonly ſuppoſed that Saint Paul was by ſhipwrack caſt vpon this Iſland: but it is with greater reaſon to be thought that it was the other Melyta in the Adriatick,betwixt Corcyra and Illyria, and D better agreeth with that which Luke writeth of the Apoſtles trouble and ſhipwracke in the Adriatique, out of which ſea it is not to be gathered by the Text that Paul and the reſt were driuen. But again to our purpoſe; That ſide of Malta which reſpecteth Sicilia hath in it many good harbors and commodious hauens fit for ſhipping; where beſides the port Marzaſiroc toward the Eaſt,where the Turks fleet firſt landed,and the port of S. Thomas,with another called Scala not far off,it hath two other notable hauens,the one called Major,the other Marza Moxet; diuided the one from the other by a narrow piece of ground, which with a ridge runneth in length from the South to the North almoſt in maner of an Iſland, hauing the hauen Major on the Eaſt, and Marza Moxet on the Weſt. Vpon the head of this high ridge ſtandeth the caſtle of S. Elmo,of great ſtrength both by nature and art. As a man entreth into E the hauen Major, on the left hand are four promontories pointing far into the hauen on that ſide,almoſt in maner of Iſlands,making ſo many Bayes. Vpon the firſt ſtandeth the Gallows, wherof alſo it taketh name: vpon the point of the ſecond, on a rough and high rock ſtandeth a moſt ſtrong caſtle,called the caſtle of S. Angelo, wherto adjoineth the town, ſeparated from the caſtle only with a wall and a ditch,and is placed in a hollownes cut out of the main rock; ſtrengthned alſo with the ſea and the induſtry of man, and is of ſome called the Burg; of others the New City. In this Caſtle reſideth the grand Maſter,and the ſouldiers in the Burg.
Vpon the [illegible]d promontory ſtandeth another ſtrong caſtle, which they call alſo the Burg of S. Michael. The fourth promontory is not inhabited; from whence the ſea runneth alongſt the winding banks almoſt into the midſt of the Iſland, vnto a place called Aqua Marſia. Again, F after the port Marza Moxet, Weſtward is the port of S. George: and after that another called Bennorrat: then followeth the port of S. Paul, no leſſe than the port Marzaſiroc. After which comes the port called Salinarum Sinus: but on that ſide of the Iſland toward Africke is only one port called Milliaria. Neer to the Iſland of Malta lie certain other little Iſlands, as Gauloſa, now Goza, two other called Cuminia, and another called Piper, all ſubject to the G Maltæſes.

Thus much I haue thought good to ſet down concerning the Turks fleet; and for the deſcription of thoſe places wherin this great action was performed, the brute wherof then filled the World. Now ſhal it not be amiſſe in like maner to declare vpon what ſtrength, next vnto God, Valetta the Grand Maſter ſtood againſt ſo mighty and puiſſant an enemy. Firſt, there was in the Iſland 1300 Mercinaries, ſome Spaniards, ſome French, ſome Florentines, and the reſt of Naples: there were alſo 1000 ſea men of the Knights, and 500 in the Town of S. An- gelo, and of the country people which were fled into the ſtrong places fiue thouſand, men not altogether vnskilfull of the wars. There were alſo fiue hundred Knights of the Orders, beſides Prieſts and Squires; for of theſe three ſorts of men are they which are called Brethren of the Order. This was the number of them which defended the caſtles and towns of S. Elmo, S. An- H gelo and S. Michael; whereunto they were proportionably diuided, and in the city it ſelf, which is called Melita, being in the middle of the Iſland, was 200 ſouldiers and as many Citiſens, with three hundred of the Country people all horſmen, commanded by Io. Vagno a valiant Captain. Beſides this, euery place was furniſhed with plenty of victual; armor, weapons, artillery, and whatſoeuer els was needfull for the induring of a long ſiege, and a war that ſhould want many things: and that which paſſed all the reſt, minds armed with inuincible courage againſt whatſoeuer ſhould chance, which oftentimes maketh of the vanquiſhed victors. All theſe things being in readines and orderly diſpoſed, as ſoon as they vnderſtood that ſeuen and twenty of the Turks gallies had put into the hauen Marzaſiroc, and were there landing their I men; Gyon Admiral for the Order, a valiant and couragious Knight, marched thither with 500 harquebuſiers, to haue skirmiſhed with them. But as ſoon as the Turks perceiued them comming, they retyred again to their gallies. On the other part where the other fleet lay, two hundred of the Turks going on ſhore, met by chance with Riuerius a Frenchman, and eight Knights more, who hauing his horſe killed vnder him, and one of his Companions ſlaine, fell with the reſt into the hands of the enemy. Whilſt theſe things were in doing, a certain Chri-ſtian mariner fled out from the Turks to the City Melita, who diſcouered the enemies purpoſes, telling them, That the Turks by the appointment of Muſtapha had determined to haue landed the greateſt part of their forces, preſently to haue beſieged ſome ſtrong place; had not Pial Baſſa the Admiral exclaimed againſt it, doubting to be left too weak at ſea, ſaying plain- K ly, That he would attempt nothing before the comming of Dragut, who was euery houre expected. For Solyman had expreſly commanded that they ſhould do nothing without his ad-uice; ſo great an opinion had he of his policy and valor. But whether this his report were true or otherwiſe, the Turks for all that returning with their fleet to Marzaſiroc, landed twenty thouſand ſoldiers and fiue field pieces, and ſo intrenched themſelues. This don, Pial Baſſa with ſeuen hundred went to view the caſtle of S. Michael; but for fear of the great ſhot, durſt not come nigh it: neuertheles they of the town ſallying out, couragiouſly skirmiſhed with the Turks; in which conflict Curſelinus, ſyrnamed Parda, accompanied but with one Spaniard, ſo furiouſly aſſailed the enemy, that he took from him one enſigne, and ſlew one of the Sanzacks a great commander, with diuers others. When Pial was come again to the Camp, L the General began to conſult with the other Captains, whether it were better to lay ſiege to the Caſtle of S. Elmo, or to the town of S. Michael. In concluſion it was agreed vpon, That they ſhould with all their forces beſiege the caſtle of S. Elmo. And going vp the hil to view the caſtle, they were incountred by the garriſon ſouldiers, in which fight ſome few were loſt on both ſides. Thus by degrees things growing hoter and hoter, the grand Maſter thought it good to certifie Garzias of Toledo viceroy of Sicily, how things ſtood, that he might the ſooner rig vp his fleet to come to their reſcue. Wherfore he commanded one gally [illegible] put out of the hauen by night, and to paſſe ouer into Sicily, with Salvagus one of the Knights ſent thither on meſſage. In the mean time the Turks caſt vp a mount to haue battered the Caſtle of S. Elmo, and beaten the gallies in the hauen Major, and ſo to haue opened a way for their fleet M to haue entred: but they were not able long to keep that mount; for they had ſcarſly well ended the work, but that it was forthwith by the continual thundring ſhot out of the caſtle beaten down again, which thing greatly abated the Turks courage. About that time, Ochial came Dragut comes to aid the Turks.

The Turkes aſſault S. Elmo.

A to the fleet with ſix ſhips, drawn out of them which were left for the defence of Alexandria, and in them 900 ſoldiers. The Turks beaten from their firſt mount, caſt vp another on a higher ground, whereon they placed three great pieces of Ordnance, wherewith they annoied not only the hauen wherin the fleet of Malta rid, but the caſtle of S. Angelo alſo, the Great maſters ſeat, and with a rolling trench drew neerer and neerer vnto the Caſtle of S. Elmo: which although they had at firſt in vaine attempted, hindred by them which were in the Caſtle, yet at laſt with much labour and trauell they brought it to perfection: for the Turks in that kind of worke, ſtill performed by their multitude, are accounted to excell others. Wherfore in ſhort time they planted their great ordnance in ſuch ſort, as that they might batter both the caſtles of S. Elmo and S. Michael. There was in the Turks camp a gentleman of Spaine, but then a B ſlaue vnto a Turke, who vnderſtanding the enemies purpoſe for the beſieging of the caſtle of S. Elmo, by a Chriſtian fugitiue aduertiſed the Great maſter thereof; whereupon he forthwith ſent Cerda and Miranda with two companies of Spaniards into the Caſtle, who were afterwards a great ſtrength vnto the Caſtle, and hinderance vnto the enemy. At length came Dragut Gouernor of Leptis, long looked for of the Turks, with 13 gallies, and in them 1600 ſouldiers: after whom followed ten galliots from Bona, and in them two companies. In the mean time Saluagus the worthy Knight (ſent before into Sicilia) came to Meſſana, and hauing certified the Viceroy of the State of Malta, was by him commanded to return to Malta in a Galliot, conducted by two gallies of the Great maſters; which hauing brought him neer vnto the Iſland, returned again into Sicilia: but he with his galliot (not without moſt manifeſt C danger) in the third watch of the night brake into the towne through the middeſt of the enemies fleet, with the loſſe of but one of his followers. Where hauing deliuered vnto the great maſter what he had in charge from the Viceroy, he was the ſame night ſent back again by the Great maſter into Sicilia, to certifie the Viceroy, That he had need of more aid, requeſting him with all ſpeed to ſend him ſome ſupply, whereby he might the better hold out againſt the force of ſo great an enemy. Saluagus diſcouraged neither with the labour nor the danger, preſently committed himſelfe againe to ſea, and in ſhort time arriued in the port of Siracuſa, where finding the two gallies we before ſpake of, he ſent them to Malta, as he had in charge, with 400 ſoldiers, among whom were diuers Knights of the Order, and certain ſkilfull cano-niers: willing them to ſhun the Weſt part of the Iſland, wheras they muſt needs come into the D enemies ſight, and to paſſe by the Eaſt end therof, which was farther about, but ſafer, & turning Southward, to land in the port Miliare, and from thence by the low places of the Iſland to conuey the ſoldiers by night to the city Melita, which was but four miles off; from whence they might eaſily paſſe to the caſtle S. Michael. This order taken, he went to Meſſana, and there declared to the Viceroy the danger of the war, with the ſmal number of the defendants: requeſting of him a thouſand footmen, which with thoſe already ſent, he thought would ſuffice to hold out the ſiege til he with his whole fleet might come to relieue them. But whilſt theſe things were ſlowly prouided (which with much difficultie and delay could hardly be brought to paſſe, the Chriſtian Princes as it were ſleeping in ſo great a danger) the Turks vp-on the ſudden the third of Iune aſſaulted the caſtle S. Elmo, in hope with ſhort ſcaling ladders E to get ouer that part of the rampiers which was neereſt vnto the bulwark of the Caſtle. But the defendants in the ditch (which before had no flankers to ſcour the ſame) had of earth and fagots made a large flanker, from whence the caſtle alſo helping them, valiantly reſiſted the enemy, and filled the ditches with the dead bodies of the Turks. Who for all that, truſting to their multitude (wherewith rather than with true valour, they obtain ſo many victories) thruſt ſtil on, vntill they had by obſtinat force (although long firſt) gained the flanker: wher-by they commanded all that part of the ditch toward the port Marza Moxet. In which place they with wonderfull celerity ſo fortified themſelues, that they could not be hurt by the defendants. Wherin they were much holpen by their own great ordnance planted on the other ſide the hauen Marza; for with it they draue the defendants from the place, beat downe the F corner of the rampier, and battered the front of the bulwark, whoſe hight and greatnes troubled the enemy, but was not ſo commodious for the defendants, for that it was made without any flankers. But night comming on, fiue thouſand of the nine thouſand Turkes which gaue the aſſault, tarried there wherfore the Chriſtians conſtrained to forſake the place, retyred into the Caſtle. The Turks in the mean time couered with the darknes of the night, with ſacks filled with tow and earth, filled vp the ditch which was vnder the bulwark, but neither of any great wideneſſe or depth; which don, they gaue a freſh aſſault, wherin 800 of them were ſlain, part Ianizaries and part Spachi; and beſides them, many wounded, of whom the moſt part remained half dead in the ditch, where they periſhed and could not be relieued. Of the Chriſtians were loſt 45; amongſt whom were fiue Knights of the Order, Guardampes an Auergnois, Maſim a Colonel of Narbona, Contilie a Spaniard, Somaia a Florentine, and Neinec a German. G The ſame night the Great Maſter thinking, as reaſon was, that they in the Caſtle Saint Elmo might want help, ſent two hundred of his Knights and as many other ſoldiers into the Caſtle; who if they had bin more, together with the four hundred which were before in the Caſtle, might haply haue driuen the Turks both from the rampiers and the flanker, and alſo kept the place longer. But foraſmuch as the Great Maſter wanted ſoldiers, and had therfore ſent Salvagus into Sicily for new ſupplies (as we haue before ſaid) he in the mean time contagiouſly H expected their comming, refuſing no labor or pain; yet bewailing ſomtimes with himſelf the vnfortunatnes of the Chriſtian Princes, by whoſe negligence ſo fit an occaſion for the ouerthrow of the barbarous enemy was let ſlip. But aboue all things, hee maruelled exceedingly that no help yet came, eſpecially thoſe two gallies, which (as we haue ſaid) were in all haſte ſent by Salvagus. But they by the Maſters default kept not the appointed courſe: For firſt, wheras they ſhould haue ſhunned the VVeſt part of the Iſle, and haue turned toward the Eaſt, they ſhaped their courſe VVeſtward to the Iſland of Gaulos; the Maſter vainly affirming, That he ſaw certain of the Turks Galliots lying before port Meleria. VVhich was afterward well known not to haue bin ſo: for the truth was, that he for fear (whereby notable deſignes I are many times fruſtrated) durſt not go forward. VVherby it came to paſſe that the great maſter was diſappointed of ſo neceſſary a ſupply: which thing much grieued both the Viceroy & others, but eſpecially Salvagus. For he ſaw it would come to paſſe, that if the Turks ſhould take the Caſtle of S. Elmo (the moſt aſſured bulwark and defence of the Iſland of Malta) the other places muſt of neceſſity be brought into extream danger; all the way to relieue them being therby ſhut vp. And that it might be taken, ſeemed not to him impoſſible, the enemy hauing already taken one fort, and laying hard ſiege almoſt on euery ſide of that little pile. The due conſideration of theſe and ſuch like things grieued the minds of skilful men, eſpecially ſeeing ſuch ſlack preparation in a caſe requiring ſuch preſent relief. Yet in the meane time ſoldiers were taken vp at Rome by the commandment of Pius quartus then Biſhop, to be K ſent to Malta. And by his example to ſtir vp other princes, he gaue 100 pounds of gold to Cambianus Legat for the Order, and commaunded gunpouder and other neceſſaries for that War to be taken out of his caſtle S. Angelo; that ſo he might ſeem to be wanting in nothing that was in him to performe. Ouer theſe ſoldiers, in number 600, he appointed Pompeius Calumna General; and commanded Camillus Medices his Legat to accompany him. With theſe went many voluntary men, of purpoſe to lay down their liues for the eterniſing of their names in ſo religious a war; and that with ſuch an ardent deſire, as that euery little delay ſeemed a year vnto them. VVherfore comming to Naples, they there found Iohn Andreas Auria with eleuen ſhips, the Prince of Populonia with nine, Lanicius with three, and three others ſet forth by other priuat gentlemen. In theſe ſhips were imbarqued all thoſe footmen which L came from Rome, and ſo tranſported to Meſſana, where the Kings fleet was prouiding. But whileſt the Chriſtians make ſlow preparation, conſidering the greatneſſe of the danger, the Turks not ignorant therof, reſolued to proue their vtmoſt, before the ſtrength of the Chriſtians were ready or drawn together. For the caſtle of S. Elmo once taken, they aſſured themſelues with more eaſe to cary the reſt; for that therby they ſhould firſt haue the hauen Marza Moxet in their power, wherin their fleet might ſafely ride as long as they pleaſed; and the riſing ridge betwixt the two hauens was commodious for them, both to batter the Towne of S. Michael, and to keep the hauen Major, ſo that none could without their leaue paſſe in or out therat. VVherfore vpon theſe and other ſuch like conſiderations they began again to batter the Caſtle of S. Elmo, as it had bin with thunder. VVhich furious battery they continued M by the ſpace of four daies together without intermiſſion. The night following, they ſuddenly with great force gaue an aſſault, and with their ſcaling ladders had almoſt gained the top of the wall. VVhen the Chriſtians deſirous of nothing more than to come to handy blowes, draue them down again with ſuch violence, that neuer after they durſt ſet ladder to the Wall

The Turks repulſed.

A vntil the very laſt conflict. Whilſt things were thus hot at the caſtle S. Elmo, Draguts ſoldiers vpon a brauery, as if they had bin the only men went to a place called Marſia Scala, which is betwixt the gallows & S. Thomas rode, as if they would haue don more than the reſt: which the Chriſtians beholding out of the town of S. Angelo, to repreſs their inſolencie ſallied out vpon them, and ſo welcommed them, that they were glad after they had receiued great loſſe, forthwith to retyre to the place from whence they came. Of the Chriſtians were ſlain Bonnemius a Frenchman one of the Knights, and ſeuen others.

The ſame time Monſerratus was by the Great Maſter ſent into the caſtle of S. Elmo, to command there as Gouernor in ſtead of Brolia: for that he with watching and pains taking in defence therof was fallen ſick. The ſame Brolia had many times before written to the great maſter, B That the caſtle was ſo wel fortified and furniſhed of al things needful, as that he thought it impoſſible to be won by the enemy; and had with cheerful ſpeech and braue behauiour ſo incouraged the Knights & other the defendants, that they fought againſt their enemies with more than mens ſtrength, and greater courage than is to be beleeued. Neither were the Turks for that diſcouraged, although they were with great loſſe ſtill repulſed; but for certain dayes battered the caſtle with greater fury than before, and immediatly gaue an aſſault. For they had made a bridge ouer the ditch, of maſts & ſail-yards, of ſuch a bredth, that ten men might go theron in rank, and had placed about the ditch 4000 harquebuſiers, and brought all their fleet to S. Georges ſhore, not far from the caſtle. And when they had by the ſpace of 18 days ſore ſhaken it, & torn the wals with 13000 great ſhot, and were now in hope euen preſently to C win the caſtle, ſee, Heragamus a Biſcane one of the Knights, and Medranus a Spaniſh captain, with certain other valiant men, ranne to the bridge, and to the great admiration of the beholders, oppoſed themſelues againſt the multitude of the miſcreants. The fight hand to hand was on both ſides fierce and terrible; when now one of the Turks had aduanced a Turkiſh enſigne vpon the bulwark, which whilſt Medranus layeth hand vpon, and the Turk on the other ſide ſtrugleth to clear himſelf from him, in ſtriuing together they fel down both dead, ſhot thorow with one bullet by one of the Turks. At which time the 400 which we ſaid were but a little before ſent thither by the Grand Maſter, ſtood in good ſtead; for ſeeing all brought to ſo great a danger, ſome of them (whilſt other-ſome fought with the enemy) thruſt barrells of gunpouder vnder the bridge, ſome caſt down wild-fire, ſtones, and whatſoeuer els came vnto D hand, vpon the enemy; and others farther off with their harquebuſes ſore gauled the Turks; ſo in ſhort time the bridge was burnt and blown vp, which in the fall therof ouerwelmed 800 Turks: the reſt as they might retyred, few whole, but moſt part wounded. In this conflict the Chriſtians pluckt down two enſignes, the one Muſtapha's, the other Draguts, which the Turks had ſet vp vpon the very battlements of the walls. On the other part toward the South-weſt a band of the Turks had got to the top of the higheſt rampier: which ſo ſoon as they in the caſtle of S. Angelo perceiued, thinking to haue beaten them off with a great ſhot, ſlew by chance ſeuen of the defendants vpon the ſame rampier, as they were going to and fro. But to recompence that error, at the next ſhot they rent in ſunder four of the Turks Captains, with twelue other of their moſt forward ſoldiers. Whilſt they were here fighting, other Turks in E the mean time had caſt vp a trench on that ſide of the caſtle toward S. Angelo; out of which they were quickly driuen, with fire, ſtones, and other like things thrown down vpon them by the defendants. The Turks valiantly on euery ſide retyred into the Camp, when they had in this aſſault loſt two thouſand of their beſt ſoldiers, and of the Chriſtians ſlain almoſt a hundred, and wounded as many. The ſame day Valetta the great Maſter perceiuing the port Marza Moxet not to be very ſtreitly kept by the Turks, commanded a light Brigandine to be carried out of the hauen ouer land to the place called Marſia Scala, that from thence hee might ſend into Sicilia. For he, as reaſon was, conſidering in what danger the caſtle S. Elmo ſtood, by letters certified the Viceroy and the Biſhop of Rome therof, and of ſuch things as were there don, requeſting their ſpeedy relief. The copy of the letters ſent to the Viceroy, I haue F here ſet down: as for thoſe which were ſent to the great Biſhop, becauſe they were almoſt of the ſame purport, I haue purpoſely omitted.

The Turks retyre.

TO GARZIAS of Toledo, Vice-Roy of Sicilia, and Lord Admirall of the Fleet, Greeting.

The great Maſters letters to the Viceroy of Malta.

SInce the time that I ſent Salvagus, I haue ſent vnto you two Letters, which I cauſed to be ſent by Melita into Gaulos; which I pray God be come vnto your hands. After that, when as neither letters nor meſſengers came vnto vs from you, I commanded a man with inſtructions to haſt to Meſſana, who when he had certain nights attempted to go out, and was at laſt got out, he was ſcarſly gon two miles, but hee ſaw the Turks with might and main making after him; whom to eſcape, he was glad to run his pinnace on ground, and caſting his letters into the ſea, to forſake his boat, and by flight to ſaue himſelf. Now the Turks hauing remoued their fleet out of the port Vulturnus, I conſidering how much it concerneth to certifie you of thoſe things which are here don, commanded a Brigandine to be carried to Martia Scala: for ſeeing the Turks fleet is gon to another part of the Iſland, I hope my Letters will without let in ſhort time come vnto you. And the things I would haue you to know are theſe: The fifteenth of this moneth all the Enemies fleet a little before night paſſed by this port (the comming on of the night hindered vs, that wee could not well perceiue the weakeneſſe therof) whilſt the gallies almoſt vnarmed were with much difficulty towed forth: want of water cauſed them chiefly to depart out of the port Vulturnus, and peraduenture fear of your fleet. For as I haue heard, they haue intelligence that 150 ſail lye at road in the port of Meſſana: for which cauſe alſo they haue not put themſelues into the port of S. Paul, but haue placed their fleet aboue the port Marza Moxet, yet a good part of their gallies lie at the port S. George, ſo to be neerer to their land forces: yet is not their neernes ſuch, but that if your fleet come vpon the ſudden, they will with the ſame fear retyre to their fleet that they would if they were farther off. No man is now to bee ſeen at Vulturnus, for they haue left their firſt camp at S. Katharines and Saint Iohns, hauing burnt all the country villages, and now lie with their fleet as I haue ſaid; and with their army at the caſtle S. Elmo, which God hath as yet kept, and as I hope will. Which thing is euen for this to be hoped for, which was but yeſterday don; when as our moſt valiant ſoldiers by the help of God, for the ſpace of four houres couragiouſly indured a moſt terrible aſſault. The Turks hauing alſo made a bridge Weſtward toward the Port Marza Moxet, we haue four times repulſed them to their great loſſe, yet not without ſome loſſe alſo on our part; amongſt whom Medranus a worthy captain was to my great grief ſlain. With this victory our men are ſo incouraged, that I am in hope the caſtle may be defended vntill your comming, eſpecially the Enemies battery not ſo furiouſly now as before maintained. If I were relieued with certain companies of freſh ſoldiers, or at leaſt with thoſe our two gallies, I would neuer think that this Caſtle could be taken from vs: in defence wherof, whilſt we euery hour look for help, we haue ſpent both our men, and whatſoeuer warlike prouiſion we had els. We are reſolued, although it coſt vs all our liues, to go thither, relying vpon you, who as we hope, for your deuotion and noble courage, wil not be vnmindfull of our health and welfare: But knowing the danger wherinto we muſt needs fall, if you ſhall defer to aid vs, will ſend vs out of hand ſome bands of men, eſpecially when they may ſo eaſily be ſent. For now that the Turkes are departed from the Eaſt part of the Iſland, our ſoldiers may be landed at the black rocks. Our liues lie in your hands, on whom (next vnto God) reſteth all our hope. Wherfore we beſeech you moſt inſtantly not to forſake vs, committing our ſelues and all that ours is to your compaſſion and protection. Fare you well.

For gallies ſent to relieue Malta.

Theſe letters receiued, and the diſtres of the beſieged caſtle perceiued, the Viceroy was (as he rightly ought) greatly mooued, and made ſemblance as if he had bin deſirous to haue brought forth his whole fleet againſt the Turks. But foraſmuch as the ſupply of ſhips from Genoa & Spain were not yet come, and that without them he thought it not good to aduenture the fortune of a battell, he forthwith ſent Iob. Cordona with four Gallies, wherof two were of Malta; and with Cordona joined one Robles Camp-maſter, with a ſelect company of Spaniards, with whom went alſo about fourſcore Knights of Malta, who ſtayed at Meſſana, awaiting ſome fit occaſion to paſſe ouer. Amongſt whom were theſe chief men of the Order, Pariſot the Great Maſters Nephew, Vincentius Caraffa, Boninſcana, and Maldonatus, both Spaniards, Centius of Aquitania, and ſome others. Who although letted by tempeſt and other occaſions,

A caſions,they came too late to Malta, as ſhall be hereafter declared, yet ſerued they in great ſtead;and had they come in time before the caſtle S.Elmo was loſt, haply it might haue been ſtil kept.

The Turks making no more account of ſo great a ſlaughter of their men, than of ſo many ſheep,deſperatly renued the fight, as men reſolued to indure all extremities. And firſt they moſt horribly thundred day and night with their great ordnance vpon the Caſtle: afterwards they aſſaulted the breaches with ſuch a multitude and force, that if true valour and hope of immortality had not excluded al fear out of the hearts of the defendants,the terror of the aſſault had inforced them either to haue fled or yeelded. Dreadful was the fight,and had they not bin obſtinatly ſet down on both ſides,the one to win the caſtle,and the other to defend it, B that day had ended the quarrel. Fiue hours indured that moſt terrible aſſault; at length the Turks repulſed by the valor of the Chriſtians, retyred: yet did they not for all that paſſe the night following in quiet,but with their great ordnance did ſo beat the defendants, that they had much ado to keep the Turks from ſcaling the walls: Which that they ſhould not then dare to attempt,was with exceeding indeauour prouided for by the Chriſtians; of whom in this aſſault was loſt 200,and of the Turks a great number. And Dragut himſelf,whileſt hee there performed the duty both of a General and moſt valiant ſoldier, got a blow on the head with a ſtone,wherof he in two daies after died. His dead body was afterwards caried to Tripolis, and there honorably buried.

A terrible aſſault.

Dragut ſlain

The Commanders of the Turks Army ſtil more and more inraged with this valour of the C Chriſtians and ſlaughter of their men,gathering all their fleet together, commanded them to compas about the Caſtle, of purpoſe to giue thereunto their laſt aſſault with all their forces both by ſea and land;and to ſend new ſupplies of freſh ſoldiers one after another, vntill they had taken the caſtle. Wherfore they with great induſtry prepared bridges,ladders,engins,armor, weapons,ſhot,and whatſoeuer thing els was needful for the aſſault. Which Valetta perceiuing out of his caſtle S. Angelo,and fearing(as meet was)leſt they in the caſtle ſhould not be able longer to endure ſo great a fury,called together in counſel his knights,two daies before the Turks gaue their laſt aſſault; and told them,That they all as well as hee,ſaw in what danger they which defended the caſtle of S.Elmo were:and that he doubted not,but that euery one of them, vpon a godly zeal and compaſſion, was no leſſe mooued with the ſlaughter and D danger of their fellows and other their Chriſtian ſouldiers, than with their own:wherfore,he requeſted them to declare what they thought beſt to be don for their ſafety; yet ſo,as that haſtily they ſhould not determin any thing that agreed not with the antient valor and honor of their ſacred military profeſſion. Which motion once made,and their opinions in brief deliuered, a Decree was made, That foraſmuch as the Caſtle could not longer be holden,regard ſhould be had for the ſafegard of them that were therin:for which purpoſe it was agreed, that 12 pinnaces ſhould be ſent to fetch them away. But before,three knights were choſen, who ſhould in haſt the night following go thither,to tel them what was in the councel agreed vpon, & carefully to conſider in what ſtate the caſtle was; which if the defendants thought was to be abandoned,they ſhould poiſon the water and cloy the great ordnance,that it might not E afterward ſtand the Turks in any ſtead. The three knights ſent thither was Medina a Spaniard, Rocca a Frenchman,and Conſtantinus Caſtriot an Italian:who not without danger of death (being oftentimes ſhot at by the Turks) got into the Caſtle, and declared vnto them that were there in garriſon,how carefull the Great Maſter and the reſt were of them. And they on their ſide firſt gaue thanks to the grand Maſter and the reſt for the regard they had of them:and afterward concerning the caſtle ſaid, That if they conſidered the ſtreitnes of the place,the ſmal number of the defendants,and multitude of the enemy,they ſhould wel perceiue the danger they were in,if the Turks ſhould often with ſuch obſtinacy renue the aſſault: yet foraſmuch as they had euer hitherto felt the help of God ſo preſent, who had ſtil mercifully defended them againſt the rage of the enemy, & wanted nothing needful for the defence of the place; F the keeping wherof they had requeſted of the grand Maſter as an honor, although they knew right wel,it could not without moſt maniſeſt danger of their liues be holden:yet would they for all that keep it to the laſt man; for that perhaps the like honorable occaſion for them to ſhew themſelues in ſhould neuer again be offred:wherfore they had(they ſaid)reſolued there to ſpend their liues for Gods glory and the Chriſtian Religion. The courſe of this life (they ſaid)

ſaid) was but ſhort, but that honor and fame was for euer: and whereas death is to all men prefined, it were to be wiſhed, that the life which is to nature due, ſhould rather ſeem to be by vs franckly giuen to God and our countrey, than reſerued as natures debt: which if it ſhould ſo happen, they would ſo vſe the matter, as that the barbarous enemy ſhould haue neither pleaſure nor ioy, which ſhould not coſt him much bloud euen of his beſt ſouldiers. This they willed the knights to tell the Great Maſter, and to requeſt him not to be too careful of them, but to promiſe to himſelfe thoſe things of them which beſt beſeemed reſolute men, eſpecially of them who had vowed themſelues to that ſacred war. This anſwer of greater reſolution than fortune, receiued; the three Knights, when they had diligently viewed the caſtle, returned to the Grand maſter: who calling to counſel his knights, and hauing heard the anſwer of the beſieged, would needs heare alſo what opinion the three knights themſelues were of concerning the keeping of the caſtle: of whom Caſtriot was of opinion, That the place was ſtil to be defended, and that if he were there to command, he would vndertake to perform it; and there rather to loſe his life than to forſake it, after he had once taken vpon him the charge therof. But Rocca the French knight was far of another mind, and ſaid plainly, that the place could not poſſibly be holden againſt ſo ſtrong an enemy; and that if Iulius Caſar himſelfe were aliue, and ſaw to what ſtreight the place was brought (eſpecially all the rampiers being either beaten down or ſore ſhaken, and ſuch a power of obſtinat enemies lying round about it) he would neuer ſuffer ſo many valiant ſouldiers to be loſt, but quit the place, and reſerue his men to further ſeruice: for why, it was the part of valiant men to performe ſo much as was of men to be performed; but to ſtriue to do more, was no manhood at all: wherfore he thought it beſt to do that which men vſe with members mortified, whoſe recouery is deſperat; in which caſe we doubt not to make a ſeparation, ſo to ſaue the reſt of the body with life. The Spaniſh Knight in moſt part agreeing with Caſtriot, ſaid, That he thought it not good, that the place ſhould ſo eaſily be forſaken; firſt, for that the ditches and bulwarks were yet defencible; and then becauſe he ſaw ſo great a conſent among the defendants, and ſuch a cheerfulneſſe to withſtand the enemy, which thing (as he ſaid) preſaged victory.

Theſe opinions of the Knights throughly in counſell debated, and euery particular well weighed, it ſeemed good to the greater part, that they which were in the caſtle, ſhould for certain daies yet hold it out; eſpecially becauſe it was not the maner of the knights of the Order eaſily to abandon their ſtrong holds, but rather to keep them to the laſt, that euen therein the barbarous enemy might perceiue with whom he had to do, and ſo ſee his pride abated. For if they ſhould haue forſaken the place, they might haue been thought to haue done it for feare: whereby the enemies inſolency might haue bin increaſed, and the honourable Order of thoſe ſacred Knights diſgraced.

But the Turks intentiue to that they had before determined, the 23 day of Iune aſſembling all their forces both by ſea and land round about the caſtle, in the dead time of the night on euery ſide ſet vp ſcaling ladders, made bridges, wrought mines, and with 32 great pieces of artillery battered the reſt of the wals yet ſtanding, and preſently gaue a moſt terrible aſſault. The defendans on the other ſide beat downe ſome, repulſed other, ſlew many, euer more carefull how to wound the enemy, than to ſaue themſelues: and where he preſſed faſteſt on, there to ſhew their greateſt valour. Great were the outcries made on both ſides, mixt with exhortation, mirth, and mourning; the face of the whole fight was diuers, vncertain, cruell, and dreadfull: and now it was the third houre of the day, when ſtill the victory ſtood doubtfull; and had not the fury of the great Ordnance been ſo terrible, that it now had beaten down all the wals vnto the very rocke whereon the caſtle ſtood, the defendants might for ſome longer time haue endured the enemies force. But the very rock bared both of wals & defendants, and more than foure hundred ſlain, a man could now ſcarcely ſhew himſelfe, but he was preſently ſtruck in pieces. Monſerratus Gouernour of the caſtle, and Garas of Euboea, men of equall valour, integritie, and honour, were both ſlaine with one ſhot; for a ſhort and tranſitory life made partakers of immortality together. Yet the reſt which ſtood in defence of the caſtle, nothing terrified with ſo great a loſſe and ſlaughter of their fellowes, but augmented rather as it were with new courage from aboue, fought with greater force than before, ouerthrew the Turks enſignes now ſet vp in the caſtle, ſlew the enſigne-bearers, captains, and colonels; now reſpecting nothing more, but honourably to lay downe their liues for their religion and the obtai-

A ning of immortal fame. By this time the ſun was mounted to the middle of heauen,great was the heat,and men exceeding weary;the murthering ſhot neuer ceaſed,and ſuch was the multitude of the enemy, that he ſent in freſh men in ſtead of them that were wearied or wounded. On the other ſide,the ſmall number of the Chriſtians,and thoſe weakned with labour,watching,thirſt and wounds,did what men might; yet at length were ouercome by a greater force, and ſo the caſtle by the Turks won,but with ſuch ſlaughter of their men,that it was a wonder ſo many ſhould be ſlain by ſo few. The defendants were all ſlain euery man in valiant fight.

Here may I not in ſilence paſſe ouer the inhuman and more than bribarous cruelty of the Turks,againſt the dead bodies of the ſlain Knights; that therby may appear,that cruelty neuer wanteth wheron to ſhew it ſelf merciles, yea euen after death. The Turks after they had B taken the caſtle,finding certain of the knights yet breathing, & but halfe dead, firſt cut their hearts out of their breſts,and then their heads from their bodies:after that, they hanged them vp by the heels in their red cloaks with white croſſes(which maner of attyre they after an antient cuſtom vſe in time of war,as they do black in time of peace) in the ſight of the Caſtles S.Angelo and S.Michael. And yet Muſtapha the Turks General not ſo contented,commanded them afterwards to be faſt bound together,and ſo caſt into the ſea,whoſe dead bodies were in few daies after by the ſurge of the ſea caſt vp in the hauen Major, and known by their friends, were by the commandement of the ſorrowfull great Maſter honorably buried. With which barbarous cruelty of the enemy he was ſo mooued,that he commanded no Turk ſhould from that time be taken priſoner,but to be preſently ſlain. And therupon all that were before taken C were forthwith put to the ſword,and their heads thrown ouer the wals on that ſide toward the enemy. From the beginning of the ſiege to the taking of the caſtle,of the Chriſtians were ſlain 1300,among whom were 130 of the knights of the Order, all worthy to be regiſtred in the book of euerlaſting Fame.

The caſtle of S.Elmo thus loſt,Valetta although his mind(as he had good cauſe)was exceedingly grieued inwardly;yet made ſemblant otherwiſe,becauſe he would not daunt his ſouldiers minds: telling them,That nothing was hapned vnprouided for or vnforeſeen. This was (as he ſaid) the will of God,and the chance of war,that ſomtimes one, ſomtimes another ſhould be ouercome: and that cowardiſe,not ſuch valor as was in them that were gon,gaue occaſion to liuing friends to lament: Yet that the Enemy was not for that to be feared, who had alſo receiued ſuch a loſſe, as hee might thereby D rather ſeem conquered,than a victorious Conquerour: whereas the loſſe of his Knights was recompenced with honor and immortality,things of themſelues ſufficient to inflame all Noble mindes to behaue themſelues valiantly. As for himſelf (he ſaid) that truſting not in his own ſtrength, but in the help of Almighty God,he had not yet caſt off the hope of victory ouer the reliques of the diſcomfited enemy: & that he well hoped they were all of the ſame mind,wherin he moſt earneſtly requeſted them to perſiſt to the end. When he had thus ſaid,he being a man armed againſt all fortunes,withdrew himſelfe a little aſide; where caſting many things in his troubled mind, he determined to ſend letters to Petrus Meſquina gouernor of the city of Melita,to certifie him and the Knights of the order that were at Meſſana,and the Viceroy,of the loſſe of S.Elmo. The copy whereof, becauſe in them euidently appeareth the Chriſtian mind of him the Great Maſter, I haue thought good here E to ſet down as followeth:

Whilſt theſe Knights are ſetting forward, in the mean time chanced the miſerable misfortune of the Caſtle S.Elmo: which although it brought vnto vs that grief you may eaſily imagin, yet for all that, as if it had hapned by ſome ſecret appointment of God,haue taken it in ſuch part, that he as a moſt mercifull father purpoſeth therby to warn vs,but not vtterly to deſtroy vs. Neither do I thinke it lawfull to doubt of his mercy and power. Yet for all that, I may neuertheles complain, That we are of them forſaken, of whom it leaſt beſeemed. So that in the ſpace of ſeuen and thirty daies,wherin our moſt valiant ſouldiers endured all the force of the enemy (which truly was don rather by the power of God than of man) wee were holpen of our own (which owe ſo much vnto vs) not ſo much as with the leaſt help, which they oftentimes F might haue ſent vnto vs. But I liſt to aſcribe it, whatſoeuer it is, to God, of whom alone as wee haue hitherto receiued ſo many good things, ſo reſt we in hope herafter to receiue alſo. For, for any thing that I can ſee, we muſt not now truſt to mans help; foraſmuch as wee could by no Letters, no diligence, no prayers, no admonitions, and to be briefe, by no commaunds mooue them, who of all other ought moſt to haue obeyed it. The ſhortnes of the time ſuffreth vs not to write to the Viceroy of theſe things, it ſhall G be your part to certifie both him and other our friends therof, who if they had obeyed our command, or aided vs with neuer ſo ſmall a ſupply of ſoldiers, haply we had not loſt the caſtle of S. Elmo, in defence wherof we haue ſpent the beſt part of our ſoldiers. Wherfore except the Viceroy make haſt to deliuer vs from this ſiege, I fear that he canot in time come; but eſpecially if we bee here beſieged before the comming of thoſe our ſmall helps which we as in a dream haue promiſed vnto our ſelues, and which we now ſcarſe hope will be in time preſent. For all that, we do not diſtruſt of Gods loue and prouidence, by whoſe diuine inſpiration the rare courage of the Viceroy being ſhortly ſtirred vp, will haſten hither to relieue vs. For all our welfare conſiſts in celerity. Our enemies hauing drawn all their fleet into the hauen Marza Moxet, are buſied in clenſing the caſtle and repairing the breaches, that they may afterward vſe them the better againſt vs. Wherfore vpon ſight of theſe our letters, ſend vnto vs the captains Catherin, Belcacar, Belmeſt, H and Zoricius, with their companies, that we may vſe their valiant and faithful ſeruice. God of his mercy ſend vs aid from ſome place, and keep you. Fare you well.

From our Caſtle S. Angelo the 24 of Iune, 1565.

Meſquita hauing receiued theſe letters, commanded a Galliot forthwith to be launched, & therin imbarqued Maſius Codonellus one of the Knights, to whom he deliuered both the letters of the grand Maſter, and others of his own almoſt of the ſame purport, directed to the knights of the Order which lay at Meſſana, requeſting him with all ſpeed poſſible to paſſe ouer with them into Sicilia. I Muſtapha Baſſa ſends meſſengers vnto the Great Maſter.

In the mean time Muſtapha the Turks General ſent a meſſenger to Valetta, and with him an old Spaniſh captain, with promiſe of liberty if he would go with his meſſenger to the Town, to talk with Valetta concerning the yeelding vp thereof, and to try if he would by any meanes come to agreement. Who comming to the town, the Turk ſtill waiting at the gate, the Chriſtian was let in and brought to the Great Maſter, to whom he declared what he had in charge from the Baſſa. But ſo ſoon as Valetta heard of the name of compoſition and yeelding, he was ſo filled with indignation, that had he not bin a Chriſtian, he would preſently haue commanded him to haue bin hanged. Wherfore he gaue him choice either to tarry ſtil in the town, if he thought ſo good, or els forthwith to return and tel his Companion, that if he got him not quickly packing, he would ſend him farther off with a great ſhot. K With this ſhort anſwer the Turk ſuddenly returned into the camp. Wherupon Muſtapha fel into ſuch a rage, that openly he proteſted, neuer from that to forbear any kind of cruelty againſt the Chriſtians. There was then with Muſtapha one Philip, one of the noble Grecian family of Laſcaris, who of a boy taken priſoner by the Chriſtians in Patras a city of Achaia, & by them honeſtly & curteouſly vſed, was euer after wel affected toward the Chriſtians. He priuy to certain of Muſtapha's deſignes, by a certain diuine motion thought hee ſhould not a little profit the Chriſtians by reuolting vnto them: wherfore he reſolued to fly to the Caſtle S. Michael. Which thing when he had often attempted, at length the firſt of Iuly he caſt himſelf into the ſea (for by land he could no way eſcape) & ſwam to the caſtle, not without danger of his life; for diſcouered by the Turks, he was many times ſhot at both with their arrows and ſmall ſhot. L Hee, brought to the Great Maſter, reuealed vnto him many of the enemies ſecrets, and alſo aduiſed him what was to be don at the point of S. Michaels, to fruſtrat the enemies purpoſe for aſſailing that place; with many other things, which were vnto the defendants no ſmall help; and afterward as often as need was, during the ſiege, fought valiantly againſt the Turks.

Whilſt theſe things were doing, Codonellus (ſent as we haue before ſaid into Sicily) came in ſafety to Meſſana, where he found the Chriſtian fleet not yet ready to relieue the diſtreſſed Maltæſes; for the Spaniſh ſhips were not yet come, and Iohn Andreas Auria with eight and twenty ſhips was ready to return to take in four thouſand footmen, which were taken vp in Etruria by Capinus Vitellius. Which backwardnes the Knights of the Order conſidering, and what danger was in delay, after they had wel debated the matter amongſt themſelues, they re- M ſolued by the power of God, by all means poſſible to help their brethren. And for this expedition choſe two moſt fit Generals of their own fellows (the Commanders of Meſſana and Baroli) who forthwith went to Garzias the Viceroy, declaring to him what things the ſacred

A Knights of their Order had done,not for the King of Spaine only, but for the Chriſtian commonweale, and alſo what great charge they had been at the yeare before in the Pinonian expedition,wherein they had neither ſpared ſhips,victual,nor munition, neither their own liues, to profit the King and the Chriſtian commonweale. Beſides this,they beſought him well to conſider,that the loſſe of Malta concerned not the ſacred Knights only,but all Italy, and eſpe-cially Sicilia,for the neerneſſe of ſo troubleſome and puiſſant an Enemy. For theſe and other like reaſons,which the ſhortneſſe of the time ſuffered them not to rehearſe, they requeſted of him 4000 footmen, with whom all the Knights of the Order which were there, and many other noble and voluntary men would make all poſſible ſpeed to relieue the beſieged, which they had before in vaine attempted; with which ſtrength they were in good hope, if not to re-B pulſe the enemy, or to recouer that was already loſt, yet at leaſt to ſtop & ſtay his further proceeding,vntill ſuch time as he hauing rigged vp and brought forth all his fleet,might ſet vpon the Turks, and (as was to be hoped) vanquiſh and diſperſe them. But whilſt the Viceroy hauing heard their requeſt, conſidereth what anſwer to make, a meſſenger came vnto him from Spaine,but with what command from the King(although men gueſſed diuerſly)could not be knowne. But vpon his comming, the Viceroy gaue the knights this cold anſwer, That he could not grant what they requeſted, for that in ſo doing he ſhould disfurniſh his fleet, and not be able afterwards to relieue them as he deſired: but if it pleaſed them to tranſport the Knights with part of the Biſhops ſoldiers into the Iſland, they might ſo do with their own two gallies they had already, whereunto he would alſo ioyne another of his owne. The Knights when C they could obtaine no more,accepted of that which was offered.

The Knights of Malta craue aid of the Viceroy.

The cold anſwer of the Viceroy to the Knights.

Whilſt theſe gallies were ſetting forward, thoſe foure gallies whereof we haue before ſpoken, wherein were imbarked 80 Knights and 600 other ſoldiers, hauing at ſea ſuffered many troubles by the ſpace of twenty daies,could not as yet arriue at Malta: and becauſe the Viceroy had commanded that they ſhould not land, except they firſt knew whether the Caſtle S. Elmo were ſtill holden by the Chriſtians, they ſent out a frigot to land, promiſing that day and the next to tarry in the ſea for her returne. In the meane time a great tempeſt ſuddenly ariſing,it fell out,that the frigot could not at the appointed time returne: wherefore the gal-lies which expected her comming, fearing leſt ſhe had been either by tempeſt loſt, or by the enemy intercepted,retired vnto Pozalo a port vpon the coaſt of Sicilia,neereſt to Malta,there D to expect ſome good newes: where as ſoone as they had put in, they vnderſtood that S. Elmo was yet defended: whereupon they put to ſea againe, with purpoſe to haue arriued at Malta.
But when they were within two leagues of the place where they thought to haue landed,they ſaw a fire there,which cauſed them to miſtruſt that the place was poſſeſſed of the enemy, and that he lay thereabout to intercept them: wherefore they returned againe to Pozalo; where now vnderſtanding of the French knight come from Malta, that that fire was made by his commandement, as a ſigne that they might without feare come forward; they with all ſpeed made again for the ſame place, and at the length the 29 day of Iune about midnight landed at the Blackerockes on the South ſide of the Iſland toward Affricke, and vnſeene of any, got in haſte to the city Malta,where they were ioyfully receiued, and there ſtaid to expect what the E Great Maſter ſhould command. In the mean time it fortuned,a great foggy miſt (which ſel-dome times there chanceth) to ariſe ſo thicke,that a man could hardly ſee for it:at which time a boy of about twelue yeares old looking by chance out of a window in the caſtle of Melita, ſuddenly,as one afraid cried out, that he ſaw a Turke going from the city to the caſtle of Saint Michael. Which thing ſome of the Knights hearing, ran preſently out that way, and found a Greeke of the city Melita, who brought backe and examined (for that without the Gouernors paſſe it was not lawfull for any man to go out of the city) confeſſed, That his purpoſe was to haue aduertiſed the Turks of the comming of thoſe ſouldiers, that ſo they might haue intercepted them as they ſhould haue come from Melita to the Grand maſter: for which treaſon he was,as he had well deſerued,cut in foure pieces. Three daies after,this new ſupply F come from Sicilia,in the firſt watch of the night came all in ſafety from Melita to the Grand Maſter,except two or three boies, who ouercharged with armor and other baggage, were not able to keepe way with the reſt. It is not to be told, how much the beſieged reioyced at the comming of theſe their friends; and eſpecially Valetta, who ſeeing the floure of his Knights and other ſouldiers, as it were by diuine prouidence come vnto him; with teares trickling downe his cheekes, and his eies caſt vp to heauen, ſaid : G

The prayer of Valetta.

I thanke thee, ô heauenly Father, which heareſt my praiers, and forſaketh not this thy little Flocke, beſet round with moſt rauening Wolues : theſe are the workes of thine euerlaſting goodneſſe, mercy and prouidence.

Theſe new come ſouldiers requeſted of the Great Maſter, as a reward of their paines, That they might be put in garriſon into the Towne S. Michael, a place now moſt laid vnto by the Turks : which thing (he commending their forwardneſſe) eaſily granted; yet for all that remoued not his old garriſon. Theſe freſh and couragious ſoldiers deſirous of nothing more than to fight with the enemy, the next day ſallied out, and hauing ſlain 200 of the Turks, and wounded as many more, without loſſe of a man returned, euery mans ſword imbrued in the bloud of his enemy. Which thing Muſtapha the Turks Generall hearing, knew it was they which lately H came into the towne; and thereupon fell in rage with his captains, as that they had by their negligence entred. But the ſuſpition grew moſt vpon them which were appointed for the keeping of the vttermoſt part of the Iſland : which was the more increaſed, for that three galliots of Algiers had withdrawne themſelues away; ſo that he neither truſted them nor the renegat Chriſtians, who as occaſion ſerued fled daily from him. For which cauſe he gaue out proclamation, That none of them ſhould lie by night out of the gallies, and that ſuch as did otherwiſe, ſhould therefore be burnt, or impailed vpon ſharpe ſtakes : and changing his warders, appointed Salec with his galliots, whom he thought to be more faithfull, for the keeping of the Iſland. And that neither they nor the Chriſtians ſhould be able to attempt any thing, he chained together diuers gallies in the entrance of the hauen Marza Moxet, & cauſed the reſt of the I fleet to ride neerer together than before. But becauſe exceeding many were at that time ſicke in the Turks camp, of the flix and other diſeaſes; three places were aſſigned for them; one for the wounded men neere vnto Aqua Martia, garded with 2000 Turks; another in the poups of their ſhips and gallies for the Turks voluntaries; and the third amongſt the bulwarkes, where the inforced Chriſtians were cured. At the ſame time, Muſtapha appointed Ochiall Baſſa Gouernor of Tripolis, in ſtead of Dragut before ſlaine : who going thither with fiue gallies, and hauing ſet all things in order there, returned againe vnto the campe. With him the Baſſa had ſent two ſhips loaded with corne to Tripolis, there to make bread, whereof they began to feele ſome want in the campe. He alſo ſent Zaloch one of his Colonels to Solyman, to certifie him of the winning of the caſtle S. Elmo, and to deliuer vnto him the deſcription of the Iſland of Malta K as they found it at their arriuall; and further to declare vnto him, That he found the Maltæſes ſtronger and better prouided, than was at his ſetting forth ſuppoſed: wherefore if it were his pleaſure longer to continue the ſiege, he ſhould ſend a new ſupply of men, victuall, and other warlike prouiſion; which if he did, he would then be in hope to take the other ſtrong places of the Iſland alſo, though not ſo ſoone as was at the firſt ſuppoſed : and that in the meane time whileſt he expected anſwer, he would not faile to do what he poſſibly might. And becauſe he would not ſeeme to haue written an vntruth, he began his battery in foureteene places with 70 great pieces of artillery, amongſt which was three moſt huge baſilisks : for from the Gallows promontory to Aqua Martia, and from thence to the caſtle S. Elmo, wherein he had placed 300 Ianizaries, the Turks had incloſed all that compaſſe with ſundry bulwarks, trenches, L and mounts, from whence they with their thundring ſhot day and night inceſſantly battered the townes and caſtles of S. Michael and S. Angelo, ouerthrew the walls, beat down the bulwarks, and brake down the houſes in ſuch terrible manner, that ſcarce any could be ſafe therein : which of all others moſt troubled the fearfull women and children. But the Turks in their trenches reſted in far more ſafety : yet ſo, as they durſt not ſtray far out of the campe, but truſting vpon their multitude, and not that many times without their loſſe, being cut off by the horſemen of the garriſon of Malta, who were euer ready at their heeles.

Ochiall Baſſa made gouernor of Tripolis.

A terrible battery.

When the loſſe of the caſtle S. Elmo was knowne at Rome, the city was filled with mourning and heauines: ſome were ſorry for the diſhonour, other ſome feared leſt the calamities of the Maltæſes ſhould redound vnto themſelues. There was alſo amongſt others, a certain enuious M and foule mouth'd kinde of men, altogether ignorant and vnacquainted with martiall affaires, who ſhamed not to lay the blame of the loſſe of S. Elmo vpon the Grand Maſter: whom both his owne valour, with the worthy teſtimony of ſo many famous and valiant men as were there preſent with him, as alſo this hiſtory gathered out of the true light of things then done,

A ſhall both for the time preſent and for all poſterity ſufficiently acquite of ſo falſe a ſlander.
But he will eaſily blemiſh another mans name, that ſpareth not his owne: neither can Ignorance rightly judge of the counſels of the skilfull; or cowardiſe, of valiant deeds.

But to returne againe to our purpoſe: we ſaid before, that three gallies were made ready at Meſſana; in ſetting forth whereof, they which had the charge vſed ſuch diligence, that the ſeuenth of Iuly they departed out of harbour. In them (beſides the Knights of the Order) was imbarked 600 Spaniards, and 300 of the Great Biſhops ſouldiers, conducted by Pompeius Columba: the mariners were part hired, part ſlaues, to whom liberty was promiſed, if they would luſtily do their endeuour to get into the hauen, and to be accounted of as the reſt of the ſouldiers were. And becauſe they would relieue the beſieged not with men only, but with victu-B all alſo, they put into the ſame gallies fiue hundred buſhels of wheat, beſide gunpouder, ſaltpeeter, and lead for ſhot. And although it was thought a moſt hard matter, by the hauen it ſelfe to enter into the Iſland, the Turks poſſeſſing it and all the places therabouts, neuerthe-leſſe there was in the Knights ſuch an earneſt deſire to relieue their Brethren, that they pro-miſed both to themſelues and others, al things eaſie and ſafe. But when they began to approch the Iſland, they ſent a ſcout before, to vnderſtand by ſignes from the caſtle S. Angelo, whether they were to proceed forward or not: who comming ſo far that they might diſcouer the ſigne, perceiued thereby that they ſhould retire. Which things the Turks perceiuing alſo, preſently with the ſmoake of their great ordnance and other things, they ſo obſcured the aire as with a thicke cloud, in ſuch ſort as that thoſe ſignes were no more to be diſcerned: but all in vaine: C for why, our men had already diſeried them: ſo thoſe three gallies returned againe into Sici-lia. For, Valetta that good Prince thought it not meet to bring ſo many of the ſacred Knights, ſo many noble gentlemen and valiant ſoldiers, into a moſt manifeſt danger: for he ſaw certaine of the Turks gallies to lie by night in the mouth of the hauen Marza Moxet, at a place called the Little ſands, to impeach the going in or out of the hauen Major. About the ſame time, they which lay in garriſon in the city Melita, hearing of the notable ſally made by the ſouldiers lately come, and taking heart thereupon, at ſuch time as the Turks were fetching in a certaine booty of cattell, the horſemen purſued them, and hauing ſlaine diuers of them, recouered the prey; and yet not ſo contented, chaſed them euen to their campe. But the other Turks ſeeing their fellowes flying in ſuch haſte towards them, raiſed an alarum, ran to their Generals tent, D and for that time ceaſed their battery.

The gallies vpon a ſigne giuen returne backe.

The Great Maſter probably conjecturing, that the Turks would in ſhort time aſſault both the towne and caſtle of S. Michael, thought good by his preſence to encourage and ſtrengthen the garriſon, and therefore was about to haue gone thither by a bridge made of boats from the one point of the land to the other, betweene S. Michaels and S. Angelo: but quickly vnderſtanding the certainty thereof, returned againe into his caſtle. Some there be that think, For him to haue ſo done, had been a venturous part, and full of danger, and therefore to haue been diſ-commended: for that great things are performed, not ſo much by ſtrength of body as of mind, by politique counſell and direction, wherwith a Generall (although abſent) may yet with his forces be alwaies preſent, but the Generall once loſt (which may eaſily happen if he will pre-E ſent his perſon to the danger) we ſee moſt commonly all fall together with him, no otherwiſe than doth all parts of the body when the ſoule departeth. But other ſome are of contrary opinion, That the Generals preſence, eſpecially in great dangers, is both praiſe-worthy and moſt neceſſary; for that he, as the ſoule, cannot prouide for or rule the body, except it be preſent, yea placed therin: and that Valetta in ſo doing, had followed the examples of the greateſt kings & moſt famous Generals, as of Alexander the Great, Iulius Caſar, Themiſtocles, Marius, and others:
whoſe words vnto their ſouldiers were theſe, I my ſelfe will be your conductor in the field, in the battell partaker of the danger with you, you ſhall be in all things as my ſelfe. Beſides that, who knoweth not, that as in other things, ſo moſt of all in martiall affaires, all things are better, more orderly, and more eaſily done when the Maſter is preſent; neither was the learned Poet his meaning F any thing els, when in the wars betwixt the Latines and the Rutilians, he ſaith, Vrget præſentia Turni? whereupon they concluded, That the Great Maſter in going had done both valiantly, wiſely, and according to his duty. But this we leaue for martiall men to determine.

At the ſame time the king of Algiers came to aid the Turks with 7 gallies and ten galliots, and in them 2200 ſouldiers: who ſorry that he was not there at the beginning, and deſirous to do ſome notable act, and withall to make proofe of the valor of his ſoldiers, requeſted the G great Baſſa to beſtow vpon him the firſt place in the beſieging the caſtle S. Michael: which he not only granted, but joyned to his forces 2000 of his own beſt ſoldiers. Theſe things obtained, he commanded ninety ſmall veſſels by deuiſes to be carried ouer land out of the port Marza Moxet to Aqua Martia, for that he purpoſed on that ſide to beſiege the caſtle by water. But Valetta perceiuing the enemies purpoſe, both by ſeeing that was done, and alſo aduertiſed thereof before by a Chriſtian fugitiue; preſently called vnto him two faithfull and skilfull ſhipmaſters of Malta, and imparting the matter vnto them, demanded what they thought beſt to be done to keep the Turks from landing, as it ſeemed they purpoſed at the walls foot. They quickly perceiuing the matter, anſwered, That in their opinion, if a chaine were made of maſts and ſaile-yards as ſpars joined together with yron rings, and ſo drawn all alongſt from the corner H of the caſtle S. Angelo, to that place where the enemy thought to land, their purpoſe might be ſo defeated. This deuiſe ſo pleaſed the Great maſter, that the night following ſuch a chain was made, and faſt mored in the appointed place. The Turks ſo ſoon as it was day perceiuing this bar, ſtood as men doubtfull, not knowing how by any means to land their men, as they had before purpoſed. Whileſt they ſtood ſo abaſhed, a Chriſtian fugitiue a moſt deſperat villaine (in which kind of men fooliſh hardineſſe is accounted a vertue, and deſperation, conſtancy) came to the King, and promiſed him to breake the chaine, and ſo with a hatchet in his hand caſt himſelfe into the ſea; after whom followed two or three more to help him: who ſwimming to the chaine, got vp vpon it, and began to hew apace with their hatchets. Which the Chriſtians beholding, ſuddenly fiue or ſix of the Maltæſes ſwam thither with their drawn I ſwords in their hands, and hauing ſlaine two of them, cauſed the other to fly: after which time none of the Turks was ſo hardy as to attempt the ſame. The barbarous king for all that gaue not ouer his purpoſe ſo, but with wonderfull diligence prepared for the ſiege, which the fifteenth day of Iuly began both by ſea and land. But the defendants turning their great ordnance vpon that place from whence the galliots came, with the fury thereof (in the ſpace of three houres, which the aſſault endured) ſlew two thouſand Turks, and ſunke twelue of the Galliots: the reſt comming as far as the chaine, when they could get no further, nor land their men, turned their prows vpon the corner of the caſtle, but were glad at laſt to retire and leaue that they came for vndone. The aſſault at land alſo endured fiue houres, wherein many of the Turks were ſlaine: and of the defendants 200, amongſt whom was Fredericus the Viceroy of K Sicilia his ſon, ſtrucke in ſunder with a great ſhot, Gordius a Frenchman, Franciſcus Sanoghera and his nephew Iohn, Spaniards, all Knights of the Order: Medina was alſo wounded, whereof he afterward died. But Valetta conſidering into what danger the ſtate of Malta was like to fall, if he ſhould be conſtrained to fight many ſuch fights, where his ſoldiers wearied day & night without reſt, were ſtill to encounter with freſh men, and heard nothing of any aid or new ſupply; the 17 day of Iuly he ſent a meſſenger into Sicilia, who ſwam from the caſtle to the fartheſt part of the bay to Aqua Martia, and from thence eſcaped vnknown thorow the midſt of the enemies, vnto the city of Melita, and ſo in a little frigot came to Meſſana. By him the Great maſter ſent letters to the Viceroy, requeſting him to ſend him his owne two gallies with thoſe Knights which were at Meſſana, and ſuch other ſouldiers as might in them be L tranſported: willing them, that as ſoon as they came to the Iſland, they ſhould houer off aloof before the hauen, ready vpon a ſigne giuen to thruſt in. The ſame time that this meſſenger arriued at Meſſana, came thither alſo the fleet from Spaine, wherein were many of the Knights of the Order from diuers nations. The Viceroy deſirous to ſend theſe two gallies to Valetta, ſent letters before vnto him in ſecret characters by two frigots, wherin he certified him that he would ſend the gallies, requiring to haue from him ſome ſigne whereby they might at their comming know whether they ſhould enter or retire: which frigots taking diuers courſes, one of them laded with medicines, as was afterwards knowne, was intercepted by the enemy: the other although ſhe came in ſafety to Melita, yet for as much as all the paſſages betwixt the caſtle of S. Michael and the city Melita, were certaine daies before by the diligence of the enemy M ſhut vp, and three which had vſed to paſſe too and fro, intercepted and moſt cruelly executed; and beſides that, the hauen ſtreightly kept; the the Knights of Meſſana could haue no further direction from the Great Maſter, for the ſafe ſending of the two Gallies: yet neuertheleſſe becauſe he had requeſted them, and they themſelues were of the ſame opinion (as he

A hard ſhift to carry newes.

A he had before written) that where all is in queſtion, the aduenture of a little part is leſſe to be feared; they thought it good to aduenture them, yet with this regard, not to expoſe all thoſe knights to ſo great a danger, but of them all to ſend only forty, with a conuenient number of other ſouldiers, and with them Salazer a Spaniſh captaine was ſent by the Viceroy to be landed in the Iſland Gaulos, who ſhould afterwards from thence in a boat (for that purpoſe towed along by the gallies) paſſe ouer into the Iſland of Malta as a Spie, to take view both of the city and enemies campe.

In the meane time the Turks mindfull of the loſſe receiued in the aſſault of the caſtle S. Michael, and deſirous of reuenge, did ſo violently batter the caſtle with their great ordnance, that what the defendants repaired by night, that they ſtill beat downe againe by day: and in time B of battery made a bridge, which the 20 day of Iuly before the Sun riſing they laied ouer the ditch, that they might as if it had bin vpon euen ground, come to fight hand to hand with the Chriſtians. Which ſeen, and quickly perceiuing what danger it might bring, by and by Pariſot the Great maſters nephew, and Agleria, both Knights, with certaine mercinary ſoldiers ſallied out to haue burnt the bridge, but were ſo receiued of the Turks, that they were almoſt all ſlain together with Pariſot and Agleria, and yet the exploit vnperformed. The Turks without ceaſing continued their furious battery vntill the eight and twentieth of Iuly, which day in the afternoone they in diuers places aſſaulted the caſtle, thrice they with freſh and new ſupplies relieued their repulſed and wearied ſouldiers, and ſo fiercely maintained the aſſault, that they made no doubt but that day to win the Caſtle. But the defendants with no leſſe reſolution C withſtood them, repulſing them with their weapons, with ſhot, fire, and force, and at length inforced them with no ſmall loſſe of their men to retire from the wals. This victory ſo incouraged the beſieged, that now they made ſmall reckoning of the enemy: but foraſmuch as our men alwaies ſpared their great ordnance but in time of fight, and ſallied not out as they were wont, the Turks thought that the garriſon was but weake, and that ſhot and pouder grew ſcarce in the Caſtle. Yet deceiued in both, for that it was rather of purpoſe, than for want, ſo commanded by the Great Maſter, who hearing nothing of the comming of any aid, and ſeeing the enemy to giue daily more fierce aſſaults, would not vainly ſpend his moſt neceſſary helps. The Turks perceiuing what little good they had done with their often aſſaults, determined now to proue what might be done by vndermining the caſtle: and had almoſt brought one of their D mines to perfection before it was of the Chriſtians diſcouered: and to the intent they ſhould the leſſe marke it, they cauſed two gallies to come as neere as they could to the wals, & to batter that place, in hope that whileſt our men gazed vpon that was done openly, they ſhould the leſſe regard what they were working in ſecret, that ſo they might in the mean time more eaſily get into the caſtle. But the beſieged carefull of all that was to be cared for, perceiuing their purpoſe, with a countermine defeated their mine, & by the couragiouſneſſe of certain of their ſoldiers, but eſpecially of one Ancient, draue out the enemy, who hauing caſt certaine pots of wild-fire before him into the mine, and following preſently after with a piece of fire-worke in his hand, forced him out. For which good ſeruice he was by the Great Maſter rewarded with a chaine of gold of fiue pound weight. And becauſe of vertue ſpringeth vertue, which ſtill E reſteth vpon difficulties, the next day, which was the firſt of Auguſt, the bridge which we ſaid the enemy had made ouer the ditch, was by a ſally made by the defendants burnt downe with fire and gunpouder caſt vpon it: which was in good time done, for the next day, the Sun now declining, the Turks again aſſailing that part of the caſtle where Carolus Rufus had the charge, were by our men valiantly repulſed. This aſſault endured 3 houres, in which time 300 of the Turks were there ſlain: and of the knights, Rufus himſelfe and Bareſus, with certaine mercinary ſoldiers. At this time the Chriſtians were by the enemy ſo ſhut in with the multitude of great ordnance, that they could not ſo much as looke into the ditch or ſhew themſelues, much leſſe ſally out, but they were preſently ſet off. Yet did they not for all that make ſpare of their liues when occaſion was giuen them to performe any notable exploit: as appeared by Calderonius a F Spaniard, who ſeeing ſome viewing that part of the wall which the enemy had moſt battered and ſhaken at the caſtle bulwarke, doubted not to ſally out, but was preſently taken with a bullet and ſlaine: which miſchance when it might ſeeme of right to haue terrified the reſt from attempting the like, did indeed the more inſence them; ſo that when they ſaw the enemy exceeding buſie in filling the ditch, they, reſolutely ſet downe to offer themſelues to moſt aſſured death, rather than to fall into the hands of the mercileſſe enemy, agreed to ſally out by night, and to meet with his deſignes. Whereupon an hundred, part Knights, part other ſouldiers, ſallying forth, cauſed the enemy to forſake the ditch and betake themſelues to flight, of whom they ſlew about foureſcore, and loſt of their owne, ten men: amongſt whom were Ioannes and Manicrinus two Knights, whoſe heads the Turks the next day ſet vpon two ſpears vpon their trenches, that they might be ſeene by the Chriſtians.

The ſame day, they of the city of Melita at night made at one inſtant a number of fires, and as it were in triumph diſcharged great vollies of ſmall ſhot, with many other tokens of joy: which as well the beſieged as the Turks thought verily to haue beene done vpon diſcouery of the Chriſtian fleet, or els the landing of ſuch forces as were come to remoue the ſiege: wheras indeed it was neither, but done only to ſhew their cheerefulneſſe, and to keep the Turks in ſuſpence with the nouelty of the matter: who for all that were not ſlacke in their buſineſſe, but with earth filled vp the ditch at the caſtle bulwarke; wherby it came to paſſe that they could not be hurt by the flankers made in that place to ſcoure the ditch, but might thereby, as vpon plaine ground, without ſtay paſſe vnto the wall, now opened and ouerthrowne with their continuall battery, and with two great pieces (which they had planted vpon a high mount which they had newly caſt vp on the right hand the bulwarke Sauoire) they began to play vpon the caſtle, and at the firſt ſhot, ſhot into the loupe where Franciſcus Caſtilia commanded. Ioannes Bernardus Bodinctius a Spaniſh knight was there ſlaine with a ſmal ſhot. The ſame day Franciſcus Aquilates a Spaniard, one of the garriſon ſoldiers, perſuaded by feare and hope (in dangers two euill counſellors) fled out of the town S. Michael to the enemy, perſuading the Turks Colonels to giue a freſh aſſault, aſſuring them that they ſhould without doubt win the towne, becauſe there was but 400 ſoldiers left aliue in it, and they (as he ſaid) almoſt ſpent with labour and wounds, all the reſt being dead. Which the Turks hearing, and ſeeing faire breaches both in the wals of the new city and of the caſtle S. Michael, wide enough for carts to go through, they determined with all their forces to aſſault both places at once, and to proue if there were yet ſo much ſtrength left in thoſe holds as again to repulſe them: ſo the 7 day of Auguſt at one inſtant they aſſaulted the new city at the caſtle bulwark, & the caſtle S. Michael at the breach, with ſuch a multitude, that all the earth ſeemed to be couered with men round about. The thundring of the great ordnance, the noiſe of the ſmall ſhot, with the clattering of armour, and noiſe of trumpets, drums, and other warlike inſtruments, with the cry of men on both ſides was ſo confuſed and great, as if heauen and earth ſhould haue been confounded together. Which when the Knights in the city Melita heard, and ſaw the heauens obſcured with ſmoake, fearing that the Turks (as at the caſtle S. Elmo) would neuer giue ouer the aſſault vntill they had won both the towne and the caſtle, preſently all the garriſon horſemen iſſued out of the city, and to auert the Turks from the aſſault, ſet vpon thoſe Turks which lay at Aqua Martia: who all ſurpriſed with a ſudden feare, fled, the Chriſtian horſemen hardly purſuing them with bloudy execution, and they in their flight pittifully crying out vpon their fellowes for helpe. Whereby it came to paſſe, that they which were aſſailing the city and caſtle, to reſcue their diſcomfited fellowes, were glad to giue ouer the aſſault: ſo with great ſlaughter foiled on both ſides by the Chriſtians, they returned to their trenches, when they had loſt about fifteene hundred at the aſſault, beſide them which were ſlaine in the chaſe by the horſemen of Melita. Of the defendants of both places were ſlaine aboue an hundred, and almoſt as many wounded. This fight endured about fiue houres. Valetta deliuered of ſo great a danger, that day and certaine others cauſed publike praiers to be made, and went himſelfe with the multitude of the citiſens to the Church, to giue thanks to Almighty God for that victory.

The Turks at one time aſſault the new city and the caſtle S. Michael.

The garriſon ſoldiers of Melita ſallying out cauſe the Turks to giue ouer the aſſault at Saint Michael.

Whilſt theſe things were in doing, Garzias the Viceroy was aduertiſed from Calabria, that certaine ſhips laded with men, victuall, and other prouiſion neceſſary for the wars, were comming from Conſtantinople to Malta: wherefore he forthwith ſent Altamira and Gildandrada two noblemen, with fiue gallies to meet them: who being come within thirty miles of Malta, met with no ſuch ſhips, but only one frigot and a galliot; the frigot they took, but the galliot eſcaped to the enemies fleet at Malta.

Muſtapha the Turks General now thinking no man ſo ſtrong which might not with continuall labour and watching be wearied and ouercome, reſolued not to giue vnto the beſieged any time of reſt, but commanded his ſouldiers againe to aſſault the breach at the Caſtle of Saint

Michael,

A Michael; where they were by the valour of the defendants, with no ſmall ſlaughter quickly repulſed: neither did the Baſſa giue ſo many aſſaults, for the hope he had to win thoſe places, but rather to perform the duty of a valiant Generall, and to ſatisfie Solymans pleaſure, who had expreſſely commanded, either to win that Iſland, or there all to loſe their liues. He alſo ſent a galliot in haſte with letters to Solyman, wherein he ſhewed him the ſtate of the fleet, with what difficulties the army was diſtreſſed, what ſmall hope there was of winning the places beſieged; how well the Chriſtians were prouided, with many other ſuch things.

Muſtapha ſendeth a meſſenger to Solyman.

In the meane time thoſe two gallies of Malta (which we haue before ſpoken of) departing from Meſſana, came to Syracuſa, where they ſtaied a day. The next day after, in going out of the hauen, they met with one of Malta in a ſmall boat comming from Pozalo ſore wounded: B he being demanded how he was ſo hurt; told them, That landing by night with his boat and one companion, he was requeſted by two Sicilians which dwelt there, to reſt there that night; which they doing, about midnight fiue Turks brake into the houſe vpon them, killed his companion, carried away the Sicilians, and he wounded as he was, hardly eſcaped by the benefit of the night: moreouer, he ſaid, That the Sicilians had told the Turks, that two gallies were come into that port, with ſouldiers and other warlike prouiſion bound for Malta. Whereby the knights perceiued, that their comming would be diſcouered vnto the enemy, and that it was a moſt dangerous thing, or rather impoſſible to get into the hauen of Malta, as they had before purpoſed: neuertheleſſe, to conduct Salazar with his little boat, they kept on their courſe. But as they were ſailing, they deſcried two gallies and one galliot going before them, who ſeeing C the gallies comming after them, made with all ſpeed to Malta: and were no doubt thoſe gallies, from whence thoſe fiue Turks came, which had done thoſe things which the wounded Malteſe reported. For all that, theſe gallies kept on their courſe as far as Pozalo, from whence they certified the Viceroy by letters of all that had hapned: and not daring to put to ſea, the South wind blowing with a ſtiffe gale againſt them, they returned backe againe to Syracuſa, expecting their farther direction from the Viceroy. For which cauſe, they forthwith ſent one of the Knights to him to Meſſana; by whom they receiued anſwere, that they ſhould goe no farther, but to ſtay for the comming of the whole fleet, ready in ſhort time to paſſe ouer to Malta. But Salazar brought by the gallies to Pozalo, reſolued with his little boat to go on: and although the day he departed thence, the aire was troubled with great wind, thunder and rain, D yet the daies following prouing more calme, he in ſhort time arriued in the Iſland of Malta, and came in ſafety to the city Melita; and there diſguiſed himſelfe in Turkiſh apparell, and taking with him one companion who could ſpeake the Turkiſh language, by night got into the enemies camp: where diligently marking all things, they perceiued that there was in al the Turks army of land ſoldiers ſcarce 14000, and of them many wounded and ſicke, and that the reſt was but an vnſeruiceable and feeble multitude, for that the courſe of warres had (as commonly it doth) conſumed their beſt ſouldiers. When they had thus viewed the camp, they returned again to the city; from whence Salazar with one Petrus Paccius a Spaniard, a venturous and valiant man, went to a certaine place neere vnto the watch tower of Maleca: which when they had curiouſly viewed, Paccius was there left, that obſeruing the ſignes from the Iſland of E Gaulos and the city of Melita, he might giue knowledge of all things to the Viceroy at his approch, as he was by Salazar inſtructed. As for Salazar himſelfe, he in his little boat (which at his comming into the Iſle he had there left) happily returned to Meſſana, and there declared vnto the Viceroy all that he had ſeene: conſtantly affirming amongſt other things, That the Turks fleet was but weake, lame, and diſfurniſhed both of men and munition, far vnable to encounter with 10000 Chriſtians. About which time alſo, one of the two frigots which were before ſent to Malta, returned with another Spaniard, and a fugitiue from the Turks campe: and foure gallies before gone from Meſſana, were alſo come in with foureteene Turks taken about the Iſland of Malta, who all confirmed the ſame that was by Salazar reported: Which was, That the Turks army was with often aſſaults wonderfully weakened, both in F number and ſtrength; ſo that they could not with ſtripes be enforced to the aſſault, for which the Baſſa had with his owne hands ſlaine diuers of them: and that which more encreaſed their feare, they ſaw none of their men wounded, but that they died thereof: Beſides that, they ſaw the Chriſtians with inuincible courage to defend their ſtrong places, and not to ſpend one ſhot in vaine: Wherefore they were ſorry, and repented that they had euer tooke in hand that expedition; they deteſted ſuch a war, ſhrinking as much as they could from the aſſault, and as G they might ſteale quite away, which many of them did, ſpecially ſuch as had before abjured the Chriſtian Faith. For which cauſe diligent watch and ward was kept, and commandement giuen by the great Baſſa, that they ſhould reſolue with themſelues either to win the towne, or there all to lay vp their bones, for that the great Sultan Solyman had ſo commanded, whom to gaineſay, was in it ſelfe death. Theſe and ſuch other like perſuaſions, cauſed the Viceroy ſomwhat the ſooner to thinke the bringing forth of the fleet: of his beſieged in the mean time did what men might for defence of the place and themſelues. There was in the caſtle one Franciſcus Ganara captain of the vauntgard, a noble and valiant gentleman, of a great conceit, he about ten foot from the towne wall, which the enemy had with their great ordnance beaten downe, cauſed a curtain to be drawn 50 foot long, & fiue foot thicke, with flankers at both ends; which H in two nights was brought to perfection, and was afterwards a great help to the beſieged. The enemy in the mean time began a mine vnder the corner of the towne ditch, where Boningſegna a Spaniard and a moſt valiant Knight had the charge: which the beſieged perceiuing, by a countermine defeated the ſame. It hapned in the mean time, that as a fugitiue was ſwimming to the towne he was taken by the enemy, which much grieued the beſieged, deſirous to haue vnderſtood ſomething of the ſtate of the enemies camp, and of their purpoſes. Now when the former mine had taken ſo euill ſucceſſe, part of the Turks aſſailed the caſtle S. Michael, & part with gunpouder thought to haue blowne vp the caſtle bulwarke: but by the carefulneſſe and courage of the defendants, all their attempts were diſappointed; for many of the Turks were in both places ſlaine, and certaine bags of pouder taken from them in the mine. With theſe and I other ſuch difficulties, Muſtapha and Piall the Turks Generals diſappointed of their hope, conſulted with the other great captains of the army, Whether they ſhould their ſtill continue that deſperat ſiege, or depart? Where moſt were cleere of opinion, That it were beſt betime to depart. Yet for all that, the old Baſſa ſaid, He would there ſtay, vntill the galliot which he had before ſent to Conſtantinople, were returned with anſwer from Solyman, and in the mean time both by force and policy to ſeeke after victory: which thing he oftner did, than ſtood with the broken eſtate of his army, or of the beſieged; neither reſting himſelfe, nor ſuffering others to take reſt: for one while he battered the wals, another while he wrought mines or els made bridges, ſomtime he caſt vp mounts, and then again filled the ditches; and euer and anon gaue one aſſault or another. In all which doing he vſed ſuch induſtry, that whatſoeuer he tooke in K hand, was in ſhort time brought to ſuch perfection as might haue carried a ſtronger place, had not the valour of the defendants far exceeded all his ſtrong and politicke deuiſes.

The Turkes mines defeated by the Chriſtians.

Robles gouernor of the Caſtle of S. Michael, ſlaine.

It fortuned, that as Robles the Camp-maſter, and Gouernour of the caſtle S. Michael, was by night viewing the ruins of the wall, he was ſtrucke in the head with a ſmall ſhot, and ſlain, leauing behind him to his fellowes, the great deſire of himſelfe: for why, he was a man for many his good parts (wherewith he had many times ſtood the defendants in great ſtead) worthily beloued. In whoſe ſtead the Great maſter ſent one of the Colonels that was with himſelfe, a moſt expert and reſolute captaine, to take charge of S. Michaels caſtle; who by his valiant care and prouidence ſo well diſcharged the charge committed vnto him, that as often as the Turks attempted the place, ſo often they were with loſſe repulſed. L

The two gallies with the galliots, deſcried by the gallies of Malta (as we haue before ſaid) told Piall Baſſa the Admirall, that the Chriſtian fleet was ready to come forth: wherefore he fearing the ſudden comming therof, cauſed ſeuenty gallies to be in readineſſe: beſides which, forty others lay in the hauen Marza Moxet vnſeruiceable, as wanting both men & other equipage; for that was ſpent in making bridges, mines, & other ſuch things neceſſary for the ſiege: as for the men, they were part with ſickeneſſe, and part with often aſſaults conſumed. Wherefore Piall for certaine daies kept himſelfe by day in the port Major neere the ſhore, and by night put forth to ſea, expecting the comming of the fleet. But after long looking, when he ſaw no man appeare, he againe landed his ſouldiers: and becauſe at land the Baſſa began to want pouder, of euery thirty barrels of pouder in euery gally, he tooke out twenty, and of ſome M twenty fiue, or according to that proportion. After which time, the Turks began with greater fury than at any time before, to batter the wals of both townes, eſpecially with thoſe great pieces which they call Baſiliskes, whoſe ſhot of two hundred pound weight was ſeuen hands about; whereby the wals of the caſtle of S. Michael were beaten flat. And at the ſame time, The Turkes at once aſſault the townes S. Angelo and S. Michael, and are at both places repulſed.

A the Baſſa at the caſtle S. Angelo, had with continuall battery ſo ſhaken the caſtle bulwarke, that it was almoſt fallen quite downe. Theſe breaches thus made, when the Turks ſaw both townes bared of wals and other defendants, and laid ſo open, that nothing ſeemed now to let them to look vpon their enemies, they made no longer ſtay, but the 18 day of Auguſt (the Sun being now at the higheſt) with all their power fiercely aſſaulted both the towns. Thrice they were repulſed, and ſtill came on afreſh; yet at length beaten downe on euery ſide with greater ſlaughter, they were glad ſhamefully to giue ouer the aſſault, and againe to retire to their trenches. In this moſt cruell fight (which endured fiue houres) the inuincible courage of the Great Maſter notably appeared, who armed with a pike in his hand, and dreadfull to behold, was ſtill valiantly fighting in the face of the breach; whoſe preſence encouraged not the ſouldiers B only, but euen boies and women to fight: for ſo it is, that men are more moued with example, than with words. Yet of the great number of the Turks, part ſtood ſtill in the towne ditch, and to ſaue themſelues from the ſhot of the caſtle bulwarke, had with wonderfull celerity caſt vp a defence of earth, fagots, and other like matter, which they did of purpoſe to approch and to vndermine the walls, and had therefore incloſed the ſpace of fifteen elnes: which when the beſieged perceiued, they bent certaine pieces of artillery vpon it, and ſlew many of them, and with fire conſumed what was left. The next day the aſſault was at the ſame places by the enemy renewed, who by reaſon of his number of ſouldiers might eaſily ſend freſh men in ſtead of them which were wounded or weary: and firſt, after their wonted manner they battered both the townes all that day vntill night; afterwards the Moone ariſing, about midnight C with a horrible cry they began a moſt terrible aſſault, which at the firſt much troubled the Chriſtians, who yet ſtill mindfull of their wonted valor, did ſo much with their weapons and fire-workes, that the enemy euill intreated, was glad after three houres fight to retire to his trenches. The ſame day a mine was by the defendants perceiued, at the caſtle bulwarke, wherein a hundred Turks there found, were almoſt all ſlaine, and the mine deſtroied. Yet for all this did not the enemy reſt at all, but the next day ſeuen times aſſaulted the ſame breaches, vſing now not weapons only, but fire-workes alſo; wherewith Beſninſega had his face ſo burnt, that he loſt one of his eies. At the ſame time alſo, the Turks at a place called the Spurre, laboured mightily to haue gotten into the caſtle: where Centius a knight of an inuincible courage, got vp vpon the rampier, and with a pike couragiouſly thruſt them down that were climing vp, and D thruſting thorow one diſcouraged the reſt; but was himſelf wounded in the arme with a ſmall ſhot: yet when he had a little withdrawn himſelfe to haue his wound bound vp, he came again to the rampier, and neuer departed from the fight, vntill he had (as a valiant conqueror) preſerued the place. So the Turks with great ſlaughter on euery ſide repulſed, left the victory to the Chriſtians, of whom were ſlaine almoſt an hundred, and moſt of them (as at other times) with ſhot: amongſt whom were theſe moſt valiant Knights; at the caſtle Angelo, Fragus; at the caſtle of S. Michael, Scipio Piatus, Ioh. Baptiſta Soderinus, Paulus Bomportus, Marius Fagianus, Ruffinus, and certaine others, men worthy of longer life. The Turks had alſo at the ſame time wrought a mine at the caſtle S. Michael, which was at once both diſcouered and deſtroied.

Another aſſault.

With theſe ſo many & ſo great aſſaults, certain of the knights (and thoſe not of the meaneſt E ſort) fearing leſt that which was ſo often attempted by the enemy, ſhould at length be effected; told the Great Maſter, That they thought it conuenient and neceſſary, to remoue all the records, al the pictures and reliques of the Saints, and other their religious things into the caſtle S. Angelo, there to be kept as in a place of more ſtrength and aſſurance. The Great Maſter, although he well knew that they which thus ſaid, ſpake it of a good mind, was for all that with that ſpeech exceedingly moued: wherefore he ſhortly anſwered them, That ſo to do were nothing els but to appale and diſcourage the minds, not of the Maltæſes only, who had hitherto valiantly behaued themſelues, & don more than any man could haue hoped for; but alſo of the mercinary ſouldiers, if they ſhould perceiue it: wherefore he was reſolued, either together to keep all, or loſe all: and becauſe none ſhould from henceforth repoſe any hope in the ſtrength F of the caſtle S. Angelo, he ſaid he would bring all the garriſon out of the caſtle into the towne, that there they might together with others withſtand the enemy; & that he would leaue in the caſtle none but gunners, who ſhould as need required ſhoot at the enemy: an anſwer truly well beſeeming a man of his place, and to be to all poſterity commended: for how can the ſoldier hope, which ſeeth his captain deſpaire? or adventure, where the chieftain ſeemes to be ſtrucke with feare? Whileſt the Grand Maſter with this anſwer doth both aſhame them and alſo encourage their quailing minds; the Turks (that this day as the other three before ſhould not paſſe without aſſault) with the dawning of the day aſſailed the very ſame places with the greateſt fury poſſible, eſpecially at the ruines of the caſtle: where San Romanus an Auergnois, which had the charge of that place, loſt this ſhort and tranſitory life, winning thereby immortall fame: and at S. Michaels, Adurnius one of the knights, and Fagio with certain others, were grieuouſly wounded: for the enemy ſuddenly retiring from the aſſault, preſently ſo thundred into the breaches with their great and ſmall ſhot, that all the Iſland ſeemed to tremble, the heauens to burne, and the aire to be darkned with ſmoke. In the mean time Valetta thorowly wearied with the mornings fight, had withdrawne himſelfe a little to breath himſelfe: when ſuddenly a Spaniſh prieſt, with his hands caſt vp to heauen came running to him, roaring and crying out, That all was loſt and forlorne, and that three or foure enſignes of the enemies were by the caſtle breach broken into the towne. Which the Great Maſter hearing, ſuddenly clapt his helmet vpon his head, and with a pike in his hand, ſaid vnto them that were about him, Loe fellow ſoldiers, the houre is come wherein you may ſhew your ſelues the moſt valiant Champions of the Chriſtian religion, if it be ſo, that you now alſo retaine the ſame valour which you haue in other battels ſhewed. There is no cauſe wherefore you ſhould doubt of this laſt, for the enemy is the ſame; and the ſame God which hath hitherto preſerued vs, will not now forſake vs: Wherefore follow me, valiant hearts. This ſaid, he haſted to the place where moſt danger was, and with him all the ſouldiers, all the citiſens men & women, old and yong, yea, the very children, all againſt the common enemy. There was fought a moſt dreadfull and dangerous battell: ſome kept the enemy from entring, ſome ſet vpon thoſe that were already entred, whom they wounded, chaſed, and ſlew, although they notably reſiſted. Within, without, all was couered with weapons, darts, dead bodies, and bloud. The Great maſter was carefull of all, and in euery place preſent, commending, exhorting, directing, as occaſion required, performing at once all the duties of a moſt valiant ſoldier and worthy Generall. At length the Turks with the ſetting of the Sun retired, and ſo the aſſault ceaſed. Thus was the Great Maſter the vndoubted victor, but not without much bloud of his people, conſidering his ſmall number: for in this fight he loſt aboue 200 men, whereas of the enemies, beſide them which were entred, whereof not one eſcaped, were ſlaine aboue 2000. Theſe are thoſe foure terrible aſſaults, preſently giuen one after another vnto the beſieged.

Garzias the Viceroy in the mean time tarried for nothing els to tranſport his army to Malta, but for the comming of Io. Cardona, who with twelue gallies was gone to Panormo, to conduct thence foure ſhips laded with prouiſion: but when he ſaw him ſtay long, he ſent to him in poſt, That if he could not with ſuch ſpeed as was required tow forth thoſe ſhips, he ſhould ſpend no longer time, but take out the prouiſion into his gallies, and with ſpeed to come away. So the Viceroy with a fleet of 72 gallies the twentieth day of Auguſt ſet forward from Meſſana to Syracuſa, wherein he carried ten thouſand ſelect ſoldiers, amongſt whom were aboue two hundred Knights of the Order of S. Iohn, and aboue forty of the Order of S. Stephen, which is an Order of Knights inſtituted by Coſmos Medices, Duke of Florence, to the imitation of the Knights of Malta, in the yeare 1561, and haue their reſidence at Coſmopolis, a new built city in the Iſland of Elba in the Tuſcane ſea, ouer againſt Piombino. Beſides theſe Knights, in this fleet were diuers noble and valiant gentlemen of Italy, Sicily, and other countries. The fleet being arriued at Syracuſa, the Viceroy ſent Auria with one gally and a boat to Malta, to land a man, to know of Paccias (left, as we haue beforeſaid, for a watch in the Iſland of Maleca) what newes, or what he had ſeene. By whom it was vnderſtood, That no ſhip was ſeen at ſea, but one galliot, which the one and twentieth day of Auguſt in the morning made towards Gaulos, and the ſame day towards night as he was informed by the watchmen of Maleca, ſixteene gallies came to water at Saline, but what became of them afterwards, by reaſon of the comming on of the night could not be deſcried.

In this while the beſieged had notably repaired the breach at the caſtle bulwarke, and had in ſundry places aptly placed certain great pieces to flanker the ditches, & to beat the mount caſt vp by the enemy at the bulwarke of Boninſegna, that they might from thence annoy all the plain of the caſtle with their ſmal ſhot. But the Turks hauing determined with all their forces at once to aſſault both the townes as before, brought an engine made of ſpars and boords, able to couer thirty men, vnder the breach at S. Michaels; whereby it came to paſſe, that none of the defen-

A defendants could without danger ſhew themſelues in the breach: which when they could by no means endure, they ſuddenly ſallied out, and putting them to flight which were there coue-red, ſet fire on the engine and burnt it. In like manner, they which beſieged the new city, were repulſed at the caſtle breach, & another like engine burnt. The next night certain of the watch of the caſtle iſſued out, and hauing deſtroied the Turks engines prepared for the aſſailing of that place, and ſlaine them that were ſet for the keeping thereof, returned in ſafety into the ca-ſtle. But when the enemies both that day and others following reſted not, but repairing their mines, mounts, and engines, laboured in both places to haue beaten the Chriſtians from the wals; all their endeuour and labour was by the induſtry and valor of the defendants made fruſtrate. The beſieged had at the caſtle breach made a mine, & laid in it eight barrels of pouder, B that if the enemy ſhould againe aſſault that place, he might there be blowne vp: but whilſt the Turks were for like purpoſe working a mine in the ſame place, they chanced vpon the mine before made, which they ſpoiled, and carried away all the pouder. Thus whileſt they labour both on the one ſide and the other, Muſtapha the Generall, a moſt expert and famous commander, conſidering that Summer now ſo far ſpent, he was not to vſe longer delay; and withal, that reſolute perſeuerance oftentimes in war findeth out a way to victory; determined with all his power once againe to aſſault the caſtle S. Michael. Wherefore diſplaying the ſtately ſtanderd of the Turkiſh Emperor, vpon the point whereof was faſtened a globe of Gold, he commanded his ſouldiers to enter the breach; who now like deſperat men attempted to haue performed his command, and were by the Chriſtians valiantly encountred: ſo that in the breach was C made a moſt terrible & doubtful fight. But when the Turks had now bin twice rejected & beaten downe, Muſtapha perceiuing his ſoldiers as men halfe diſcouraged, but faintly to maintain the aſſault, came himſelf to the places, praying and exhorting them not to be diſcouraged, but that day to confirme their former labors and victories; and not to ſuffer their vanquiſhed enemies to triumph ouer them: he told them that the enemy had now no defence left wherewith to couer himſelfe, that all was beaten down flat, and that there remained only a few weary and maimed bodies, which were not able long to indure the edge of their ſwords; that with ſuch reſolution they had before won the caſtle S. Elmo: laſt of all, he by promiſing to ſome mony, to ſome honor and preferment, threatning ſome, and requeſting others, incouraged ſome one way, ſome another, euery one according to his quality and diſpoſition: who moued either with D their Generals preſence, promiſes, or threats, gaue a freſh and fierce aſſault. The fight was on both ſides terrible, yet at length the Turks were againe inforced to retire: for the defendants had caſt vp a rampier, wheron they had fitly placed two field pieces, wherwith they ſore troubled the enemy, and at the firſt ſhot ſtruck in ſunder one of thoſe woodden engines, which the enemy had made ſtronger than the reſt, couered with raw hides to keep it from burning, and rent in pieces forty ſouldiers which were vnder it: and the ſame night they which were in the other towne and the caſtle bulwarke, ſallying couragiouſly out, deſtroied all the enemies defences, and draue them from a mount which they had made vpon the fortifications of the Chriſtians: whereby they perceiued plainly, what ſmall courage the Turks had to fight, for vpon that mount they were almoſt 300, wheras of our men were but 25, with which ſmall num-E ber for all that, they had no mind to deale. The defendants had for like purpoſe as before, made another mine at the caſtle bulwarke, but perceiuing that it was in danger to be found by the enemy in repairing his fortifications without, they ſuddenly put fire vnto it, by force whereof threeſcore Turks which were within the danger of the place, were blowne vp and ſlaine.

A mine of the Chriſtiãs found by the Turks.

The Turks deſperatly aſſault the Towne of S. Michael.

The Turks enforced to retire.

Garzias the Viceroy, in the mean while that theſe things were in doing, departing with his fleet from Syracuſa, with a proſperous wind kept on his courſe toward Pachynum, where they deſcried a tall ſhip at ſea, driuen thither (as was afterward knowne) by tempeſt: ſhee out of the Iſland Mening was carrying a great ſupply of ſhot and pouder vnto the Turks campe at Malta; but now ouertaken by the Chriſtian fleet, eaſily yeelded, and was by the Viceroy ſent by other mariners to Syracuſa. And now the Chriſtian fleet carried with a faire gale towards F Malta, ſuddenly aroſe ſuch a tempeſt from the Eaſt, that they were driuen to the Iſland Ægu-ſa, two hundred and twenty miles Weſt of Malta, from whence the firſt of September letters were brought from the Viceroy to the Great Maſter, certifying him, That he would in ſhort time come with his fleet and relieue him. The ſame day alſo a Chriſtian fled out of the Turks gallies, wherein he was captiue, to the city S. Angelo; who reported, That in the Turks camp were

were few men able to fight,moſt of the army being with wounds,famine,ſickeneſſe, and other G miſeries brought to extreame weakeneſſe: and beſides that,that infinit numbers of them died daily: yet for all that he ſaid moreouer, that they were determined to beſiege the city of Melita, and had already for that purpoſe mounted fiue great pieces of artillery for battery; and that they had but a few daies before taken twelue,and the laſt day of all fourteene horſmen of the garriſon ſouldiers of that city. In the meane while the fleet which was driuen (as we ſaid) to Æguſa,the rage of the ſea being now well appeaſed, came to Drepanum, and from thence toward Gaulos, as was before intended: where by the way the two gallies of Malta light vpon two galliots, and tooke them.

The Chriſtian fleet commeth to Gaulos.

The fifth day of September the Chriſtian fleet came to Gaulos,where the Viceroy perceiuing not the appointed ſignes from Malta, whereby he might ſafely land, returned forthwith H backe againe to Pozalo,whither Auria immediatly following him,told him, That he had ſeen the ſignes,and aſſured him of ſafe landing in the Iſland of Malta: wherewith the Viceroy encouraged,the next day towards night returned againe to Gaulos.

The ſame day a Chriſtian captiue fled from the Turks to S. Angelo,and told the Great maſter, That he was come to bring him good newes,how that the Turks had determined to proue their laſt fortune in aſſaulting the caſtle S. Michael, which they would do the next day: where if the ſucceſſe were anſwerable to their deſire,they would then tarry;but if not,then forthwith to be gone: and that Muſtapha the more to encourage his ſouldiers, had promiſed fiue talents of gold to the enſigne bearers, that ſhould firſt aduance their enſignes vpon the wals, and farther to promote them to greater places of honour; as for the reſt, he would reward euery one I of them according to their deſerts,either with mony or preferment. Valetta thinking all theſe things to be by Gods appointment diſcouered vnto him by ſuch men,as they had from time to time bin: firſt gaue thanks vnto Almighty God;and after that, with all diligence prepared ſuch things as he thought moſt neceſſary for the repulſing of the enemy. But the Turks all that day with their great ordnance battered the new city, and the ſhipping in the hauen, in ſuch ſort that one of the great ſhips was there ſunke.

In the morning Garzias the Viceroy with his fleet arriued at the Iſland of Malta, and there quickly and quietly landed his forces,and whileſt his gallies watered at Gaulos,went forward with the army about halfe a mile, inſtructing the Generals and Colonels, what he thought needfull to be done, commanding all proclamations and commands to be made in the name K of the King of Spaine,vntill they came to the Great maſter,and then in all things to obey him as their Soueraigne: and charged Aſcanius Cornia the Generall,in all his actions to follow the counſell of the greater part. So in few words exhorting them to play the men,he left them marching towards Melita. About noone he retired to his gallies,and ſailing Eaſtward,came with all his fleet within the ſight of the city of Melita, about 3 miles diſtant from the South ſhore. They of the city vpon ſight of the fleet, in token of joy diſcharged all the great artillery, which was anſwered from the fleet, by diſcharging all their great ordnance twice. After that, he returned as he had before determined into Sicilia,to take into his gallies the Duke of Vrbins companies,which were come to Meſſana, and certain bands of Spaniards at Syracuſa, and ſo forthwith to return to Malta,to attend the departing of the Turks fleet,being now euill L appointed,and already as good as halfe ouerthrowne.

The Turks, who(as is before ſaid) had purpoſed to proue their laſt fortune vpon the towne of S. Michael,had now certaine daies before the comming of the fleet, begun to truſſe vp their baggage:but as ſoon as they heard that the fleet was come,and the army landed,there ſuddenly aroſe a wonderfull tumultuous confuſion amongſt them:ſome cried, Arme,arme,and otherſome as faſt to be gone: and being generally all afraid,euery one according to his diſpoſition, betook himſelfe to his weapons or to his heels,the greateſt number thruſt together into their trenches as neere as they could vnto the great ordnance; and ſo burning the engines and fortifications,with all the ſpeed they could imbarked their great ordnance and baggage. Which they in the town of S. Angelo perceiuing,not expecting the commandement of the Great maſter M in ſo ſudden an opportunity, couragiouſly ſallied out to Burmola, where certaine Turks kept a huge great piece of ordnance;who now hauing no mind to fight,betooke themſelues to flight,and forſooke the piece;which they of the town preſently drew within their wals:and if the new come forces had that day charged the enemy as they diſorderly ran to their gallies,

A pily they had found an occaſion of victory, or at leaſtwiſe taken from them the greateſt part of their artillery. But it may be they followed the old military ſaying, That vnto the flying Enemy a man ſhould make a bridge of ſiluer. Beſides that, they thinking it not conuenient to depart from the prouiſion and things which they had brought for reliefe of the beſieged, (which for the roughnes of the way and want of horſes were hardly caried) would not prouoke the enemy with any skirmiſh: wherby it came to paſſe that the Turks without let imbarqued their great ordnance, their baggage, and moſt part of their army. The 11 of September, whilſt the Turks fleet was brought out of the hauen Marza Moxet, a fugitiue of Genoa came in haſt to the Great Maſter and told him, that 10000 Turks were marching toward Melita, to meet with the Chriſtians vpon the way. Which thing the Great Maſter hearing, preſently ſent a B ſufficient number of good ſoldiers to the caſtle S. Elmo, there to ſet vp one of the enſignes of the ſacred Order: who comming thither, found 24 great pieces, ſome for battery, ſome for the field, which they could not in ſo great haſt remoue thence.

The Turks forſake the ſiege.

The Turks fleet departing out of the hauen Marza Moxet to the port of S. Paul, there landed 7000 men, with Muſtapha their General, who was falſly informed, that the Chriſtians were not aboue 3000 ſtrong: and from thence incouraged with the ſmall number of the enemy (as they ſuppoſed) they marched directly toward Melita. The Chriſtians alſo marching orderly and ready to giue battel, held on their way to meet them; and at the riſing of a hil both armies meeting together they gaue a great ſhout, and withall the formoſt began the battell, where ſome few were at the firſt ſlain on both ſides. But the Chriſtians ſtil growing vpon C them both in number and ſtrength, the Turks finding themſelues ouercharged, fled, the Chriſtians purſuing and killing them til they came to their gallies; where in ſtriuing who ſhould get firſt in, about 400 of them were drowned in the ſea, beſides 1800 ſlain in the battel at land.
And had the Chriſtian ſouldiers wel known the Country, they had ſlain them euery mothers ſon. The Turks thus driuen to their gallies, lay there in the hauen all the next day, and moſt part of the night following; but a little before day, vpon the ſhooting off of a great piece, the ſigne of their departure, they all hoiſed ſail for Grecia, leauing the Iſland of Malta ſore impoueriſhed and waſted. In this ſiege the Turks loſt about four and twenty thouſand, whereof moſt part were of their beſt ſoldiers. And of the Chriſtians were ſlain about 5000, beſides two hundred and forty Knights of the Order, men of diuers Nations, but all worthy of eternal D fame; whoſe dead bodies the great Maſter cauſed to be honourably buried. The Turkes in their battery during the ſiege, ſpent as is truly accounted, threeſcore and eighteene thouſand great ſhot.

The Turks ouerthrown by the Chriſtians, depart frō Malta

If a man do wel conſider the difficulties and dangers the beſieged paſſed thorow in theſe fiue months ſiege, the manifold labors and perils they indured in ſo many and ſo terrible Aſſaults; the ſmal relief to them ſent in ſo great diſtres, with the deſperate obſtinacy of ſo puiſſant an enemy; he ſhall hardly find any place theſe many years more mightily impugned, or with greater valor and reſolution defended. The late beſieged, but now victorious prince, honorably acquited of ſo great an enemy, firſt commanded publique prayers with thanksgiuing to be made vnto the Giuer of all victory. After that, he rewarded the valiant, commended the E reſt, and gaue thanks to all: he charitably relieued the ſick and wounded, bewailed the ſpoyle of the Iſland, & carefully prouided for the repairing of the breaches and places battered; and yet in all this doing diligently inquired after the Enemies courſe and purpoſe, and was not in any thing remiſſe and ſecure, as in victory moſt men are. But becauſe ſo great harmes could not without great helps in ſhort time be repaired, and the returne of the proud Enemy not without cauſe the next year feared; he by letters to diuers great princes, and eſpecially to the grand Priors of the Order in diuers countries, requeſted help: amongſt whom George Grand Prior of Germany, and founder of the Caſtle of S. Elmo, was one of the chiefeſt. The copy of which letters, becauſe they briefly contain what wee haue before in this hiſtory at large written, I haue thought good here to ſet down, that the ſame may in ſuch order be read, as it was F by the Great Maſter himſelf reported.

The great Maſters care.

Brother Valetta, Maſter of the Hoſpitall of Ieruſalem, to the reuerend and religious our welbeloued brother in Chriſt, George of Hohenheim, called Bombaſt, Prior of our Priory in Almainie, greeting.

The letters of the great maſter to the grād prior of Almaine, concerning the manner of the Turks proceedings in the ſiege of Malta.

Although we doubt not but that by the letters and relation of many, you already vnderſtand of the comming of the Turks to inuade theſe Iſlands, or rather vtterly to ſubuert our Societie: And the happily and heauenly victory by vs obtained of it: yet if the ſame things ſhal by our letters alſo be brought vnto you, we haue thought the ſame will be vnto you a thing much more pleaſing. For ſeeing that we are certainly perſuaded, that you in this no leſſe happy than wholſome ſucceſſe will giue moſt hearty thanks to Almightie God, and that the fruit of this good ſhall moſt of all redound vnto you, for the honour which you beare to our Order, we haue willingly determined to participate this our ioy with you, and plainely and openly to proteſt, That we attribute this ſo notable and wonderfull a victorie to our Lord Chriſt Ieſus, the greateſt King of all Kings, and author of all good things. Which that you may the more worthily and willingly do, we will declare the whole matter, not at large (for that were to write an Hiſtory) but briefly and in few words. Sultan Solyman the moſt mortall enemy of the Chriſtian name, and eſpecially of our Socieiety, not contented to haue ſpoiled vs of the famous Iſland of the Rhodes, the caſtle of Tripolis, and almoſt whatſoeuer we had elſe; commanded a great and ſtrong fleet to be made ready againſt vs; which departing from Conſtantinople the one and twentieth day of March, arriued here the eighteenth day of May: Which fleet conſiſted of almoſt two hundred and fifty gallies, galliots, and other ſhips. The number of the enemy that bare armes, according to the truth, was about forty thouſand more or leſſe: Generall of the land forces, was Muſtapha Baſſa; and of the fleet, Piall Baſſa was Admirall: who hauing ſpent a few daies in landing their forces, viewing the places, pitching their tents, and ſetting things in order (as the maner of war is) they began firſt to aſſaile the caſtle of S. Elmo (ſcituat in the mouth of the hauen) with great force and a moſt furious battery. Which when they had many daies don without intermiſſion, and had opened a great part of the wall, and with all kind of weapons aſſaulted the breach: yet was it by the valour and proweſſe of our Knights, and other worthy ſouldiers, kept and defended by the ſpace of thirty fiue daies, with the great loſſe and ſlaughter of the enemy: although the caſtle it ſelfe, in the iudgement of many, ſeemed not poſſible to be but a few daies defended againſt ſo great a force. At length the foure & twentieth day of Iune, when our men could no longer endure the multitude and fury of the enemy, enuironed and ſhut vp both by ſea and land, and deſtitute of all help, the caſtle was taken by the Turks; thoſe few of our men which were left, being all ſlaine. Of which victorie they being proud, began to beſiege the caſtle and towne of S. Michael, and this new city, eſpecially at the caſtle and Portingall Bulwarke: and (as their manner is) with great diligence and greater force and number of great Artillery and warlike engines, they began in diuers places at once to batter and beat downe the wals. Which ſiege, the dreadfull army of the Turks by ſea and land, made to be moſt fearfull and terrible, with ſuch huge great Ordnance, as the like for bignes and force was in no place to be ſeene; day and night thundring out their yron and ſtone ſhot, fiue and ſeuen hands about, wherewith not the thickeſt wals, but euen the very mountains themſelues might haue bin beaten down and ouerthrowne: by fury whereof, the wals in many places were ſo battered, that a man might eaſily haue entred as on plain ground. Where, when the barbarous enemies had with wonderfull force and hideous outcries oftentimes attempted to enter, ſo often were they with great ſlaughter and diſhonor repulſed and beaten back, many of their men ſlaine or wounded. Their Generals, as well at ſea as land, after that they had in ſo many places, with all their forces in almoſt foure moneths ſiege and aſſault, with exceeding fury in vain attempted the breaches, and loſt the greateſt part of their old ſouldiers, eſpecially Winter now comming on, wherein all warres by law of nations ought to ceaſe; thought of nothing elſe but of departure, or rather of flight: which the comming of Garzias of Toledo, Viceroy of Sicilia, and Admirall of the King of Spaine his fleet, with ten thouſand ſelect ſouldiers (amongſt whom was at the leſt two hundred and fourteene of our Knights, and many other noble and valiant Gentlemen; which only with a Chriſtian zeale, voluntarily met together from diuers parts of the World to help and relieue vs) cauſed them to haſten. So haue you ſummarily and in few words, the proceedings and flight of the Turks fleet, and the victory by vs (by the power of God) thereof obtained. It ſhall be your part to conſider and coniecture, in what ſtate

A ſtate our Order and this Iſland now ſtandeth, into what poor eſtate we are brought, how many things wee want; wherein except we be relieued by the help and aid of our brethren, eſpecially ſuch as you are, as wee well hope, and aſſuredly beleeue we ſhall, our State will quickly take end. Farewell.

From Malta the ninth of October, 1565.

The great Maſter thus deliuered of ſo great a ſiege, and bountifully relieued by the Chriſtian Princes, and the great Commanders of his Order; ſpeedily repaired the breaches & places battered, and with new fortifications ſtrengthned thoſe places as he had by the late paſſed dangers perceiued to be moſt ſubiect to the enemies force.

B After the return of the Turks fleet to Conſtantinople, Solyman being exceeding angry with the gouernor of the Iſland of Chios his tributary, as wel for that he had during the late ſiege of Malta had intelligence with the great Maſter, and reuealed vnto him many of the Turkes deſignes; as alſo for detaining of two years tribute, which was 20000 ducats; and had alſo neglected to ſend his wonted preſents to the great Baſſa's, who therefore the more inſenced the Tyrant; commanded Pial Baſſa his Admiral to make ready his fleet, and by force or policy to take that fruitful & pleaſant Iſland into his own hand. Who without delay with a fleet of 80 gallies the 15 of April, An. 1566, being then Eaſter day, arriued at Chios. The chiefe men of the Iſland vpon ſight of the fleet, forthwith ſent Embaſſadors to the Baſſa with Preſents, courteouſly offering vnto him the hauen, and whatſoeuer elſe he ſhould require. Piall C with kindnes accepted their offer, and preſently poſſeſſed himſelfe of the hauen in three places: and afterwards landing, ſent for the Gouernour of the City and twelue of the chiefe Citiſens to come to him, as if he had ſome ſpeciall matter to confer with them about from the great Sultan, before his departure thence for Malta or Italy. Who hauing a little conferd together, went to him with great feare; and that not without cauſe; for as ſoone as they were come before him, he commanded them to be laid hold vpon & caſt faſt into yrons: which don, the ſouldiers forthwith took the towne hall, and without reſiſtance pulling down the townes enſigne (wherein was the picture of S. George with a red Croſſe) in ſtead thereof ſet vp one of the Turks: the like whereof was done with great reioyceing of the Turks, through the whole Iſland. After that, they rifled the Churches, and again conſecrated them after their Mahometan manner. D The Gouernour of the City, and the Senators, with their families, the Baſſa ſent in fiue ſhips to Conſtantinople: as for the vulgar people, they were at choice, either there to tarry ſtil, or depart, as beſt ſtood with their liking. And ſo the Baſſa, when he had there placed a new Gouernour, one of the Turks, with a ſtrong garriſon, and ſet vp the Mahometane ſuperſtition in that moſt fertile Iſland, departed thence for Italy: where ſailing alongſt the coaſt of Apulia, he did exceeding much harm in burning and deſtroying the country villages, and carrying away of the poore people into captiuity; and ſo returned.

At this time the kingdome of Hungary was moſt miſerably rent in pieces by the lieutenants and captains of Solyman and Maximilian the Emperour, and Iohn the Vayuod of Tranſiluania Solymans vaſſall: who grieued with the harmes done vnto him by the Emperours Cap- E taines, whereof himſelfe was the cauſe, and vainly hoping to haue obtained at Solymans hands the greateſt part of the kingdome of Hungary, as had ſomtime king Iohn; ceaſed not continually to ſolicite him to come himſelfe in perſon to make a full conqueſt of the reliques of Hungary, yet holden by the Emperour and ſome of the Hungarian Nobility: and flattering himſelfe in that vain hope, called himſelfe the king of Hungary: and increaſing his ſtrength by letters vnto the Nobility and Burgeſſes of the city of Hungary, ſummoned them, as if it had bin by the appointment of Solyman his great Patron, that they ſhould all the ninth of March meet together at Thorda, to determine with him of matters concerning their common good. Which thing as ſoon as Lazarus Suendi the Emperours lieutenant vnderſtood, he forthwith by other letters countermined thoſe of the Vayuods; perſuading the Hungarians F not to liſten to the charmes of the Vayuod and Turk, tending to their deſtruction, but rather to yeeld their obedience to Maximilian the Chriſtian emperor, whoſe purpoſe was by the ayd of the Chriſtian princes to protect & preſerue them in peace: and hereby it came to paſſe, that the remainders of this ſore ſhaken kingdom, diuided into factions, and diuerſly caried, according to their affection, ſome to one ſide, ſome to the other, began afreſh to work one anothers confuſion, which fitly ſerued the Turks to incroach more and more vpon them: Who at the G ſame time ſurpriſed the towne of Ainatſch (the captaine whereof, with certain of the garriſon ſoldiers being gon about their buſines to Agria) & put to the ſword all them that they found in the town. They thought alſo to haue taken the ſtrong town of Sigeth, but were by the valiant County Nicholaus Serenus gouernor therof, couragiouſly encountred, and after foure hours hard fight ouerthrown and put to flight. Not long after, they ranged vp and down the country, and fet in booties as far as Iula and Rab, and did the countrey people much harme. For which cauſe Maximilian the Emperor about the later end of May brake vp the aſſembly of the Empire then holden at Auguſta, and began carefully to prouide all things needfull for the war: appointing his captains for the raiſing of ſuch forces in Germany, as were but a little before granted vnto him by the Princes and States of the Empire, in their late aſſembly; but went H himſelfe to Vienna. For it was told him (as the truth was) that Solyman now in his extreme age was with a mighty army ſet forward from Conſtantinople, and marching through Bulgaria and Seruia, was come directly to Belgrade, where Iohn the Vayuod of Tranſiluania met him, and kiſſing his hand, had commended himſelf and all his ſtate vnto his protection. At which time Suendi the Emperours lieutenant laid hard ſiege to the towne of Huſth in the borders of Tranſiluania. The Baſſa of Buda at the ſame time on the other ſide, by commandment of Solyman, with 8000 Turks and 25 pieces of great Ordnance beſieging Palotta (a ſtrong towne about eight miles from Rab) had with continuall battery by the ſpace of eight dayes brought the ſame into great danger, although it was valiantly defended by George Thuriger. But hearing of the approch of George County of Helffenſtein, ſent by the Emperor with certain com- I panies of Germans to relieue the ſame, he roſe in ſuch haſt from the ſiege, that he left certain of his great Ordnance and a great part of his baggage behind him, and retyred towards Alba Regalis. The County hauing relieued the towne, cauſed the breaches to be forthwith repayred, and with a new ſupply ſtrengthned the old garriſon. Thus was a moſt lamentable war at once begun in diuers places of Hungary. After that, the County of Helffenſtein, ſtrengthned by the comming of the County Salma with certain companies from Rab, departed from Palotta, and came to Veſprinium, a city about two miles off, then holden by the Turks: which city he tooke by force the laſt of Iune; and left not a Turke aliue therein, becauſe that they a few dayes before had cruelly ſlain certain Chriſtians whom they had taken priſoners. So leauing ſtrong garriſons both in Veſprinium and Palotta, they returned to Rab. Shortly after, K the County Salma laid ſiege to Tatta a ſtrong town, otherwiſe called Dotis, betwixt Rab and Comara, which at length he took by aſſault the 28 of Iuly, and ſlew al the Turks except fifty, who flying into one of the towers of the caſtle, yeelded vpon compoſition: among whom was the late gouernor of Veſprinium, and the gouernor of this place, with the Baſſa of Buda his nigh kinſman, who were all preſently ſent priſoners to Vienna. So the County following the courſe of his victory (the terror of his former good fortune running before him into the Turks ſtrongeſt holds) was on his way to haue beſieged Geſtes a town neer Palotta; when the Turks there in garriſon, vpon the firſt ſight of his army left all and fled out at the farther ſide of the town to Strigonium. After whoſe example other of the Turks Garriſons in Witha, Tſchokiku, and Sambok, caſtles therabout, ſet fire on that they could not carry, and followed their L fellows to Strigonium alſo. The Emperor vnderſtanding of the good ſucces of his captaines, cauſed publique prayers with thankſgiuing to almighty God to be made in all the churches therabouts.

The good ſucces of the emperors captains,

County Serinus, Gouernour of the ſtrong town of Sigeth and the countrey thereabout, certainly aduertiſed of the comming of Solyman, ſent Caſparus Alapianus and Nicolas Cobach, two of his Captaines, with a thouſand footmen and 500 horſe, to lie in wait for the forerunners of the Turks Army; who drawing neer vnto the place where theſe Turkes lay, not farre from Quinque Eccleſiæ, ſuddenly in the ſhutting in of the next day ſet vpon them, when they doubted no ſuch matter, and put them in ſuch fear that they diſorderly fled, ſome one way, ſome another, and were moſt of them ſlain or wounded by the Hungarians in their flight. Haly Beg M one of the Turks great Sanzacks, and leader of that Company, ſore wounded, and ſeeking to ſaue himſelfe by flight in the mariſhes, there periſhed. His ſon and many other notable men amongſt the Turkes, were taken and carried priſoners vnto Sigeth. The ſpoyle the Hungarians there took was exceeding great; for beſides plate and coyne, whereof they

A found good ſtore, they took eight camels, fiue mules, ſixty horſes, and ſix carts laden with all maner of ſpoil, and many garments of great price; wherin the gentlemen attyred, returned to Sigeth in great brauery, with two fair red enſignes of the enemy.

Maximilian the Emperour long before aduertiſed of Solymans purpoſe for the conqueſt of the remainder of Hungary; to withſtand ſo mighty an enemy, had beſide the forces raiſed in his own dominions, procured great aid both of the ſtates of the empire and other Chriſtian Princes, which about this time met together at Rab. Firſt there repaired thither four legions of German footmen, and vpwards of 20000 horſemen, with 4000 Hungarians. The duke of Sauoy ſent thither 400 Argoletiers; and many noble gentlemen out of diuers parts of Europ reſorted thither, to ſerue the Emperour in thoſe Wars of their owne charge; eſpecially the B Knights of Malta: and out of Italy Proſper Columna and Angelus Ceſius. Out of France, Guiſe the grand Prior, Briſſack, and Lanſack; who but a little before were going to Malta, of purpoſe to haue ſerued there, if the Turks fleet had come thither again, as it was reported it would: but vnderſtanding that it came not, returned directly into Hungary, with certain Knights of the Order. Many alſo of the Princes and free Cities of Italy declared their good wil toward the Emperor in this War; ſome ſending him men, as did Coſmus Medices Duke of Florence, who ſent thither of his own charge three thouſand footmen. Some mony, as Mantua, Genoa, and Luca. Thither came alſo Alphonſus Duke of Ferrara with a gallant company of Noble Gentlemen and other his followers. Beſide which land forces, the Emperour had alſo prouided vpon the riuer of Danubius twelue Gallies, and thirty other ſhips for burthen, ſo made, as C that the men could not be hurt by the Turks arrows. Wherin were imbarqued three thouſand ſouldiers, moſt part Italians, vnder the conduct of Philippus Flachius a Germane and one of the Knights of Malta, who was afterwards receiued into the number of the Princes of the Empire.

Solyman comming to the riuer Drauus, commanded a bridge to be made ouer that great riuer, and the deep fens on the farther ſide of the riuer toward Sigeth, for the tranſporting of his army; a work of ſuch difficulty, that being thrice vnfortunatly begun, it was again giuen ouer as a thing almoſt impoſſible. Wherwith Solyman was ſo mooued, that in his rage he ſwore to hang vp the great Baſſa that had the charge of that work, if he did not with as much ſpeed as were poſſible bring it to perfection. Wherupon the work was again begun, all the boats that D were to be found in the riuer taken vp, & timber for the purpoſe brought from far for the making of that bridge. In this work were imploied not the vulgar people only, in the Countrey which was tributary to the Turks, but the gentlemen themſelues alſo were by the imperious Turk (now commanding for his life) inforced to lay their fingers to work day and night without ceaſing, vntil the bridge (which before was thought ſcarſe poſſible to haue bin made) was by the reſtleſſe induſtry and labor of ſuch a multitude of men, in the ſpace of ten daies perfected. Wherein the ſeuerity the barbarous Tyrant vſeth toward his ſubiects is worth the noting; wherby he extorteth from them more than is almoſt poſſible for men to perform: ſo that it is not to be maruelled that he hath ſo good ſucces in whatſoeuer he taketh in hand. Ouer this bridge (a mile in length) paſſed Solyman, and incamped at a place called Mohatcz, where E he ſtaied certain daies vntil his Army was all come ouer. The laſt of Iuly, ninety thouſand Turks (the vantgard of Solymans Army) came before Sigeth, and incamped within a mile of the Town. After whom ſhortly after followed an hundred thouſand more out of Solymans camp; of whom many approching the town, were ſlain with great ſhot out of the Caſtle. The reſt for all that quickly incamped themſelues as neer vnto the town as they could, and began the ſiege.

The Turks incamp before Sigeth.

The town of Sigeth is ſtrongly ſcituate in a mariſh on the North ſide of Drauus, vpon the frontiers of Dalmatia, commanding all the country round about, which of it takes name, and was at that time a ſtrong bulwark againſt the Turks, for entring farther into the countrey that way toward Styria. In this town was gouernor Nicolaus Serinus, commonly called the County, F a valiant man and a mortal enemy of the Turks, with a gariſon of 2300 good ſoldiers: who ſeeing the hugy army of the Turks, called together the Captaines of the Garriſon with the chief of the Citiſens into the Caſtle; where ſtanding in the midſt of them he ſpake to them as followeth:

You ſee (ſaid he) how we are on euery ſide beſet with the multitude of our enemies, wherin reſts their chief hope. But let not vs be therof afraid or diſcouraged, for that victory dependeth not of a confuſed multitude of heartleſſe men, but of the power of God, who hath by a few at his pleaſure oft times ouercome the mighty armies of the proud; and will not in the midſt of theſe dangers now forſake vs, if we putting our truſt and confidence in him, doe what beſeemeth valiant and couragious men. Beſides that, our iuſt cauſe, with the ſtrength of the place we hold, our own valour, and the help of our friends, who I aſſure my ſelf will not fail vs at our need, counteruaileth their confuſed multitude, forced together by their imperious commanders out of far countries, and whatſoeuer els the Tyrant hath brought with him into the field. Wherfore let vs all as becommeth valiant men, for the truth of our Religion, and the honor of our prince and country, liue and die together: knowing whatſoeuer befall, that to a life ſo loſt, beſide neuer-dying fame, belongeth a moſt aſſured hope of ioy and felicity. As for my ſelf, I am reſolued (as I hope you are alſo) that as I am a Chriſtian, and free born, ſo will I by the grace of God, in the ſame faith and freedome end end my daies. Neither ſhall the proud Turk, ſo long as I am able to hold vp this hand, haue euer power to command ouer me, or the ground wheron I ſtand.

This ſaid, he firſt took himſelf a ſolemn oath to perform what he had promiſed, & perſuaded the reſt to take the like. Which don, euery man returned to the place of his charge.

Solyman comes to the camp at Sigeth.

The defendants burne the new town.

The Turks win the old town.

The fift of Auguſt Solyman incamped within a mile of the Town, and the next day after came himſelf into the camp; at whoſe comming the great Ordnance and ſmall ſhot ſo thundred out of the Turks camp, as if heauen and earth ſhould haue gon together; the Turks after their wonted maner crying aloud, their Alla, Alla, Alla: and the Chriſtians anſwering them with the name of Ieſus. The ſeuenth of Auguſt the Turks caſt vp a great mount, and theron planted certain great pieces of ordnance. The next day following they began moſt terribly to batter the new town in three places, and with incredible labor caſt vp a mount in the midſt of the marſh, as it were in the town ditch; from whence they the next day with certain pieces of great artillery day & night battered the inner caſtle of the town without any intermiſſion, and did great harm both to the caſtle and defendants. The County perceiuing the new City to be now ſo laid open with the fury of the Turks battery, as that it was not poſſible to be defended, cauſed his ſoldiers to ſet it all on fire, and to retyre into the old. The tenth of Auguſt the Turks furiouſly battered the old town in three places, and brought their ordnance into the new town, and with timber, earth and rubbiſh made a bridge, the more commodiouſly to go ouer the mariſh. For the ſpeedier accompliſhment wherof, all the Turkes were compelled to lay to their hands, and to carry wood, fagots, earth, and ſuch like things without ceaſing. There might a man haue ſeen all the fields ful of camels, horſes, and of the Turks themſelues, like emmets, carrying wood, earth, ſtones, or one thing or other to fill vp the mariſh. So was there with wonderful labor two plain waies made thorow the deepe fen, from the town to the caſtle: where the Ianizaries, defended from the great ſhot with ſacks of Wooll and ſuch like things, did with the multitude of their ſmall ſhot ſo overwhelme the defendants, that they could not againſt thoſe places without manifeſt danger ſhew themſelues vpon the wals. So that what by their vigilant induſtry, and the fury of their great artillery, the Turks (although not without great loſſe) by force entred the old town the 19 of Auguſt, vſing in their victory ſuch celerity, that they ſlew many of the moſt valiant defendants before they could recouer the ſafegard of the caſtle. Both the towns thus loſt, and ſo many worthy men ſlain, not without cauſe brought great heauines vpon the reſt which were in the caſtle with the county. The Turks poſſeſſed of the old Town, the next day planted their battery againſt the caſtle in foure places, and with fagots, rubbiſh, and earth, made two plain ways to it, ſtil filling vp the marſh; and hauing with continual battery made it ſaultable, the 29 of Auguſt they began fiercely to aſſail the breaches: but when they had loſt many of their men, and don what they could, they were inforced with ſhame to retyre. In this aſſault, among many other of their beſt ſoldiers, was loſt one of their great Baſſa's alſo.

Solyman dieth of the bloudy flix.

Whilſt theſe things were in doing, Solyman far ſpent with years, and diſtempered with his long trauel, fel ſick of a looſnes of his belly, and the better to recouer his health, retyred himſelf (the ſiege yet continuing) to Quinque Eccleſiæ a City neer to Sigeth, where ſhortly after he died of the bloudy flix the fourth day of September, in the year of our Lord God 1566, when he had liued 76 years, and therof reigned ſix and forty. He was of ſtature tall, of feature

A ſlender, long necked, his colour pale and wan, his noſe long and hooked, of nature ambitious and bountifull, more faithfull of his word and promiſe than were for moſt part the Mahometan Kings his progenitors; wanting nothing worthy of ſo great an empire, but that wherin all happines is contained, Faith in Chriſt Ieſus. Muhamet the Vizier Baſſa (who all commaunded in Solymans abſence) fearing the inſolencie of the Ianizaries, and leſt ſome tumult ſhould ariſe in the camp, if his death ſhould be known, concealed it by all meanes; and to be ſure of them that were of all others beſt able to make certaine report thereof, cauſed his Phyſitians and Apothecaries to be ſecretly ſtrangled; and by a truſty meſſenger ſent in poſt, certified Selymus (Solymans eldeſt ſon, and his father in law, then lying at Magneſia) of the death of his father; willing him in haſt to repair to Conſtantinople, to take poſſeſſion of the Empire: and B that don, forthwith to come to the army in Hungary. But this could not be ſo ſecretly done, but that the Ianizaries began to ſuſpect the matter: which Muhamet Baſſa quickly perceiuing, cauſed the dead body of Solyman in his wonted apparel to be brought into his tent, ſitting vpright in his horſ-litter, as if he had bin ſick of the gout his wonted diſeaſe; & ſo ſhewing him to the Ianizaries, both deceiued and contented them, and ſo the ſiege went forward.

The Ianizaries hauing in the laſt aſſault loſt many of their fellowes, began now to vndermine the greateſt bulwark of the caſtle, from which the defendants with their great ordnance did moſt annoy them: wherin they vſed ſuch diligence, that the fift of September they with gunpouder and other light matter prouided for that purpoſe, had ſet all the bulwarke on a light fire; and by that means poſſeſt therof, with all their force aſſailed the bulwark next vnto C the caſtle gate, from whence they were with great ſlaughter twice repulſed by the County.
But the raging fire ſtil increaſing, he was inforced with thoſe which were yet left aliue, to retyre into the inner caſtle, wherin was but two great pieces, and 14 others of ſmall force. Thus the Turks ſtil preuailing, and taking one place after another, the 7 of September they furiouſly aſſaulted the little Caſtle, wherinto they caſt ſuch abundance of fire that in ſhort time it caught hold of the buildings, and ſet all on fire. The county thus aſſailed by the enemy without, and worſe diſtreſt with the fire within, which ſtil increaſing, left no place for him in ſafety to retyre to, went into his chamber, where putting on a rich new ſuit of apparel, came preſently out again with his ſword and target in his hand; and finding his ſoldiers with cheerful countenance & their weapons in their hands attending his comming, ſpake vnto them theſe D few his laſt words: The hard fortune of this ſinful kingdom hath together with our own ouertaken vs; but let vs, noble hearts, with patience endure whatſoeuer is to vs by God aſſigned. You know what we haue before promiſed, which hitherto God be thanked we haue accordingly performed, and now let vs with like reſolution perform this laſt. The place you ſee is not longer to be kept, the deuouring fire groweth ſo ſtill vpon vs, and we in number are but few. Wherfore let vs as becommeth valiant men break out into the vtter caſtle, there to die in the midſt of our enemies, to liue afterwards with God for euer: I will be the firſt that will go out, follow you me like men. This ſaid, with his ſword and target in his hand, without any other armor, calling thrice vpon the name of Ieſus, hee iſſued out at the Caſtle gate, with the reſt following him: where valiantly fighting with the Ianizaries vpon the bridge, and hauing ſlain ſome of them, he was firſt wounded in two places of his body with a ſmall ſhot, and E at laſt ſtrook in the head with an vnlucky ſhot, fell downe dead: the Turks for joy crying out their wonted word Alla. The reſt of the ſoldiers in flying back again into the Caſtle, were all ſlain by the Turks, except ſome few, whom ſome of the Ianizaries in regard of their valour, by putting their caps vpon their heads ſaued from the fury of the reſt. In this ſiege the Turks (as themſelues reported) loſt 7000 Ianizaries, and 28000 other ſoldiers, beſide many voluntary men not inrolled in their muſter books, and three of their great Baſſa's. Serinus his head was preſently cut off, and the next day, with the heads of the other ſlain Chriſtians, ſet vpon poles for all the army to gaze vpon. After that, it was taken down, and by Muhamet the great Baſſa ſent to Muſtapha the Baſſa of Buda his kinſman; who by two country men ſent it wrapped in a red ſcarf couered with a fair linnen cloth, to County Salma in the Emperours camp at Rab, F with this taunting letter thus directed;

The great Bulwark undermined and fired by the Ianizaries.

The little Caſtle ſet on fire.

Serinus ſlain.

Serinus head is ſent to County Salma.

Muhamet Baſſa to Eccim Salma, Greeting.

In token of my loue, behold here I ſend thee the head of a moſt reſolute and valiant Captain thy friend the remainder of his body I haue honeſtly buried as became ſuch a man. Sigeth bids thee farwel for euer.

The death of this noble and valiant Captaine was much lamented of all the Chriſtian Army, and his head with many tears by his ſon Balthaſar honorably buried among his Anceſtors in Tſchacaturna his own caſtle. Solyman at his comming with this mighty Army into Hungary, had purpoſed before his return, if he had not bin by death preuented, to haue conquered both the remainder of the kingdom of Hungary, and to haue again attempted the winning of Vienna. For the accompliſhing of which his deſignes, he at his firſt comming ſent Parthauus Baſſa with forty thouſand Turkes to helpe the Baſſa of Temeſware and the Tartars, in the behalf of the Vayuod to beſiege the ſtrong town of Gyula, ſcituat vpon the lake Zarkad, in the confines of Tranſylvania; not far from whence Suendi had but the Auguſt before ouerthrown the Tartars, called in by Solyman for the aid of the Vayuod, and ſlaine of them ten thouſand. And at the ſame time he ſent Muſtapha Baſſa of Boſna, and Carambeius with a great power to Alba-Regalis; who joining with the Baſſa of Buda, ſhould keep the Emperour Maximilian buſie, whilſt he in the mean time beſieged Sigeth, as is before declared. Parthauus Baſſa comming to Gyula, and laying hard ſiege to the town, was ſtil notably repulſed by Nicolas Keretſchen Gouernor of the town: inſomuch, that in a ſally he had certain pieces of his great Ordnance taken from him by the defendants, and the reſt cloied. But this braue Captaine, not to haue bin conſtrained by all that the Baſſa could do, was at laſt perſuaded by his kinſman George Bebicus (from whom Suendi had but a little before taken certain Caſtles, for reuolting from the Emperor to the Vayuod) for a great ſum of mony to deliuer vp the town to the Baſſa. Which he did, couenanting beſides his reward, that the ſoldiers ſhould with bag and baggage in ſafety depart. All which was frankly granted: who were not gon paſt a mile out of the town, but they were ſet vpon by the Turks, and all ſlain except ſome few which crept into the reeds growing in the mariſh faſt by, and ſo eſcaped. The Traitor himſelf expecting his reward, was caried in bonds to Conſtantinople: where afterward vpon complaint made, how hardly he had vſed certain Turks whom he had ſomtime taken priſoners, he was by the commandement of Selymus, who ſucceeded Solyman, thruſt into an hogſhead ſtuck full of nailes with the points inward; with this inſcription vpon it, Here receiue the reward of thy auarice and treaſon. Gyula thou ſoldeſt for gold: if thou be not faithfull to Maximilian thy Lord, neither wilt thou be to me. And ſo the hogſhead cloſed faſt vp, he was therin rolled vp and down vntill he miſerably died.

A traitor well rewarded.

The Emperors Camp then lying at Rab, & the Baſſa of Buda and Boſna with thirty thouſand Turks not far off at Alba-Regalis, and many hot skirmiſhes paſſing between them; it fortuned that the fift of September, the Turkes in hope to haue don ſome great piece of ſeruice vpon the Chriſtians, came forth of the camp in great number, and by chance light vpon a few forragers of the Army, of whom they ſlew ſome: the reſt flying raiſed an alarm in the Camp. Wherupon the Hungarians and Burgundians with ſome others iſſuing out, purſuing the Turks, ſlew diuers of them. In which purſuit George Thuriger deſcrying the Gouernor of Alba-Regalis, a man in great account, and very inward with Solyman whilſt hee liued, fiercely purſued him in the midſt of the flying enemies, and neuer left him til he had taken him priſoner: and at his return preſenting him to the Emperour, was for that good ſeruice knighted, and rewarded with a chain of gold. There was by chance then preſent a Spaniard, who had heard him ſay openly at Conſtantinople, That he alone with his own power was able to vanquiſh the Germane King (by which name the Turks commonly term the Emperor.) With which words when that the Spaniard hardly charged him in the preſence of the Emperor, ſtil vrging him as it were to ſay ſomething for himſelfe: the Turke ſtraitway anſwered him in theſe few words following; Such is the chance of Warre, thou ſeeſt me now a priſoner, and able to do nothing.

The gouernour of Alba Regalis taken.

All theſe troubles, with many more like in ſhort time to haue inſued, were by the death of Solyman within a while after wel appeaſed. Muhamet Baſſa after that hee had repaired the breaches, and placed a Turk Gouernour of Sigeth, with a ſtrong garriſon for defence of the place, and commanding of the Country, called back the diſperſed forces, and riſing with the Army, retyred towards Belgrade, carrying Solymans dead body all the way ſitting vp-right in his horſe-litter caried by mules, giuing it out that he was ſick of the gout. Which thing the Ianizaries eaſily beleeued, knowing that he had bin many years ſo carried: yet ſtill wiſhing his preſence, as alwaies to them fortunat, although he were able to do nothing.

FLORVIT AN°. 1566
SELYMVS SECVNDVS TVRCARVM IMPERATOR QVINTVS.

Dißimilis patri, Selymus regalia Sceptra Corripit, & dira concutit arma manu.
Fœdus cum Venetis frangit (Quid fœdera proſunt?) Armataque manu Cypria regna rapit.
Inſtrauit tumidum numeroſis claßibus Æquor: Vt Naupactiacas nobilitaret aquas.
Moldavum fœda mulctauit morte Dynaſten:
Et magni fines prorogat imperij.
Obruit Hiſpanos multos: Punica regna Deſtruit: & regnis addicit illa ſuis.
Sed nimis in venerem pronus, vinoque ſepultus, Extremum properat præcipitare diem.

RIC. KNOLLEVS.

Vnlike his father, Selymus the royal Scepter takes,
And ſhaking arms with cruel hand, exceeding ſtirs he makes,
With Venice State his league he breaks (With Turks what league can ſtand?)
And Cyprus kingdom takes from them by force of mighty hand.
He couered the ſwelling ſeas with hugy fleets to ſee; That vanquiſhed, vnto thoſe ſeas he might an honor be.
The Vayuod of Moldavia he brought to wofull end,
The borders of his kingdom great ſo that he might extend.
In Gulet he the Spaniards ouerwhelm'd with mighty power;
And therby Tunes kingdom did the ſelf ſame time deuour.
But wholly giuen to Venery, vnto exceſſe and play, He poſteth on before his time to haſt his fatall day.

THE LIFE OF SELYMUS, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, FIFT EMPEROR OF THE TVRKS.

SElymus,the only ſon of Solyman then left aliue, by letters from Mahamet Baſſa vnderſtanding of the death of his father, haſted from Cutai, a City of Galatia not far from Ancyra, toward Conſtanti-C nople ; & comming to Scutari, was from thence by Roſtanges Baſſa of the court, conducted ouer the ſtreit to Conſtantinople ; where by him and Scander Baſſa (Selymus his ſon in law,and then Solymans Vicegerent)he was conueyed into the Imperiall palace the 23 of September, An. 1566;and there poſſeſſed of his fathers ſeat,was by the Ianizaries there preſent ſaluted Emperor. He was about the age of 42 years when he began to reigne , a man of an vnconſtant and haſty diſpoſition, wholly giuen to wantonnes and exces ; ſo that he neuer went to Wars himſelf,but performed them altogether by his lieutenants, contrary to the charge of Selymus his grandfather,giuen by him to his father Solyman,wherof he was neuer vnmindful. The next D day he came abroad and ſhewed himſelf in his majeſty;and in the temple of Sophia,after the maner of the Turkiſh ſuperſtition,cauſed ſolemn prayers and ſacrifices to be made for his father:which don,he gaue to the Ianizaries a largeſſe of 100000 Sultanines, with promiſe to augment their wages. And all things being in readineſſe for his intended journy, he with a goodly retinue ſet forward from Conſtantinople the 27 of September ; and the 10 of October a little from Belgrade met the Army comming from Sigeth, gallantly marching vnder their Enſignes,with the dead body of Solyman,whom the ſoldiers generally ſuppoſed to haue bin yet liuing,but troubled with the gout,to keep his horſ-litter, as his maner was to trauell. Selimus alighting,came in his mourning attyre to the horſ-litter,looked vpon the dead body of his father,kiſſed it and wept ouer it,as did all the great Baſſa's alſo. And that the death of E Solyman might then be made known to all men,the enſignes were preſently let fal and trailed vpon the ground,a dead march ſounded,and heauy ſilence commanded to be kept thorow all the camp. Shortly after,Selymus was with great applauſe of the whole Army proclaimed emperor,his enſignes aduanced,and euery one of the great commanders of the Army in their degree admitted to kiſſe his hand. So marching forward, he returned again to Conſtantinople the 22 of Nouember:but thinking to enter his palace(commonly called the Seraglio)he was by the diſcontented Ianizaries but now come from the Wars, prohibited ſo to do;they with great inſolencie demanding of him a greater donatiue,together with the confirmation both of their antient and new priuiledges, before they would ſuffer him to enter. Againſt which their great preſumption,the Vizier Baſſa's together with the Aga oppoſing themſelues, and F ſeeking by all means to appeaſe them,were by them fouly intreated,and wel rapped about the pates with the ſtocks of their caliuers:but eſpecially the two great Baſſa's,Mahamet and Partau,as the chief authors that their lord had dealt no more liberally with them. With which ſo ſudden and vnexpected a mutiny of his beſt ſouldiers Selymus not a little troubled,and calling vnto him the Aga or captain of the Ianizaries, demanded of him the cauſe therof. Who G with tears trickling down his cheeks for grief, told him it was for mony. Which by Selymus now promiſed vnto them, together with the confirmation of their liberties, and the Aga with fair words and heauy countenance moſt earneſtly intreating them, not to blemiſh the reputation of their wonted loyalty with ſo foul a diſorder, nor to oppoſe the life of him their louing captain vnto the heauy diſpleaſure of their angry Sultan; and further aſſuring them, that hee would not fail them in the leaſt of his promiſes, but content them to the ful of their deſires; the mutiny was at length appeaſed, the inſolent Ianizaries again quieted, & Selymus into the Seraglio receiued. Howbeit Muhamet chief of the Vizier Baſſa's, for certain dayes after went not out of his palace, neither came as he was wont into the Divano, but kept himſelf cloſe, for fear of ſome greater miſchief from them. This tumult thus ouerpaſſed, and all again wel pacified, Selymus with all roial ſolemnity buried his father in a chappel which he after the man- H ner of the Mahometan kings had in his life time moſt ſtately built, with a colledge & an hoſpital. Where faſt by his ſide is to be ſeen the tomb of Roxolana his beſt beloued wife, and of certain others his murthered children: and by him hangs his ſcimiter, a token that he died in wars; an honor not otherwiſe granted to the Mahometan princes. The reuenues ariſing of the country about Sigeth, of late won from the Chriſtians, at his death were giuen to maintaine the houſes by him built of deuotion, which for the magnificence therof exceed al the reſt before built by the Mahometan Kings and Emperours, except thoſe of Mahomet the Great, and Bajazet the ſecond. It was by many thought, that Solyman was in good time by death cut off, as purpoſing that year to haue wintred in Hungary, and the year following to haue done great I matters againſt the Chriſtians both by ſea and land.

Troubles in Hungary.

This great army of the Turks thus drawn out of Hungary by the death of Solyman, in ſome part aſſuaged, but altogether appeaſed not the endleſſe troubles of that vnfortunat kingdom.
Maximilian the emperor on the one ſide, and Iohn the Vayuod of Tranſylvania with the Turks captains on the other, renting it in pieces, as if they had ſworne the deſtruction thereof. The Vayuod deſiring to recouer the ſtrong caſtle of Tocay in the frontiers of his Countrey, but lately taken from him by Suendi the Emperors lieutenant, laid hard ſiege to it, & had brought it to great extremity, although it was notably defended by Iames Raminger the Captain ther-of when ſuddenly news was brought vnto him, That the Tartars (whom he had called into his country to haue aided him againſt the Emperour, did with all hoſtility after their barbarous K maner, burn and deſtroy his Country before them, making hauock of all things, ſo that the country people were glad in defence of themſelues to take vp arms againſt them. Wherupon he forthwith left the ſiege, and went to aid his diſtreſſed ſubiects againſt the Tartars. With whom he had many a hot skirmiſh, and after much bloudſhed at laſt ouercame them, & with much ado rid himſelf of ſuch bad gueſts. Now in the mean time, Suendi ſtrengthned with new ſupplies ſent vnto him from the Emperour, had taken the caſtle of Zackmar in the borders of Tranſylvania, and with like good ſucces had the caſtle of Muncatz yeelded vnto him, and after that beſieged the town of Huſth: ſo that the Vayuod was glad to craue aid of the Turkiſh Emperor Selymus, vnder whoſe protection he was. Who preſently commanded Par-tau one of his chief Baſſa's, and then his great Lieutenant in Romania, to go with his Forces L into Tranſylvania to relieue them. But hearing that Embaſſadors were comming from Maximilian the Emperor, he called him back again, vntil he had heard the effect of that embaſſage.
At which time alſo the Baſſa of Buda inclining to peace, ſent Preſents vnto the Emperour, requeſting him to remooue certain of the Hungarian Captains from off the frontiers, leſt haply they ſhould interrupt the treaty of peace, then on both ſides purpoſed, promiſing for his part to puniſh all ſuch Turks with death, as ſhould make any further inuaſion, or raiſe any new troubles. He writ letters alſo to County Salma, That hee could not but maruell, to what end Maximilian the Emperor was about to intreat with his lord and maſter of peace, whileſt Suendi in the mean time was raging in Tranſylvania, then vnder the Turks protection; which if he proceeded ſtil to do, Selymus would therof take occaſion (as he ſaid) to turn all his forces M that way. Wherfore hee requeſted him to perſuade the Emperour to take ſome more eaſie courſe in that behalf. Promiſing alſo, That he would for his part effectually trauel with his Maſter to haue better liking of peace than of wars, wiſhing him alſo to do the like. Which

A thing as ſoone as the Emperour vnderſtood, he commanded Suendi to giue ouer the ſiege of Huſth, and to keepe himſelfe quiet vntill he might by his Embaſſadors vnderſtand what the Great Turke purpoſed, and how he was affected towards peace.

Now indeed theſe two great Princes, Maximilian and Selymus (although they notably diſſembled the matter) were both of them in heart deſirous of peace, and that for diuers great and vrgent conſiderations. Maximilian for want of mony ſaw it was not poſſible for him to ſend into the field ſuch an army the next yeare as he had the yeare before. And Selymus, beſide his other troubles, was to take order for the appeaſing of a great & dangerous rebellion in the furtheſt part of his dominions in Arabia Fœlix; where the people riſing vp in armes, and hauing ſlain the Baſſa's and Sanzacks their gouernors, were ready to haue caſt off the Turkiſh obedience : B neither was he out of feare of the Perſians, ready (as was reported) to make warre vpon him. For which cauſes he wiſhed rather for peace with the Emperour Maximilian, than wars ; and ſo much the more, for that it was impoſſible for him to ſend an army of any puiſſance into Hungary, for want of many neceſſary prouiſions for the maintenance there, in a country ſo much impoueriſhed by reaſon of his late wars, wherin no victuals were to be found for the reliefe of ſuch a multitude of men as he was to ſend, if he would do any good there. And truth it was (as the Turks themſelues afterward reported) that Maximilian with halfe the power he had in field the laſt yere, might haue eaſily recouered the greateſt part of that kingdom before loſt: but well knowing his own wants, and ignorant of theirs, he altogether enclining to peace; and by County Salma aduertiſed from the Baſſa of Buda, That if he would ſend Embaſſadors C to Conſtantinople, with the tribute wont to be there paid for Hungary, a peace vpon reaſonable conditions might be eaſily obtained; he reſolued vpon that point. And ſo certain meſſengers being ſent vp and downe to Conſtantinople to the ſame effect, it was concluded, That if the Emperor would ſend Embaſſadors to Conſtantinople with the tribute yet behind, and a large commiſſion for the treaty of peace, Selymus ſhould giue them his ſafe conduct, with liberty at their pleaſure to returne in caſe either of peace or war. Which agreed vpon and faithfully promiſed on both ſides, Selymus ſet at liberty the lord Albert de Vuis, who ſix yeres Lieger in Conſtantinople, firſt for the Emperor Ferdinand, and after for Maximilian, had now beene ſtreitly impriſoned in his owne houſe by the ſpace of 22 moneths, in ſuch ſort that neither he nor any of his houſhold could go abroad, watch and ward being kept both day & night about D his houſe, and his windowes alſo boorded vp, to the end that he ſhould not ſo much as looke out into the city or any whither elſe more than the court of his houſe only. So the Emperour Maximilian now reſolued to ſend Embaſſadors to Conſtantinople with the tribute mony and diuers other rich gifts & Preſents, as well to the Great Turke himſelf, as the Viſier Baſſa's his Counſellors : and conſidering with himſelfe, whom to be moſt fit, with wiſedome and honor to bring this ſo weighty a matter about, hauing to do with ſo barbarous, couetous, and mighty a people, made choice of the lord Anthonius Varantius of Agria (of his Counſell for the kingdome of Hungary) a Prelat of great eſtimation, who being a man of 63 yeares old, beſide his great learning, had the experience of 27 Embaſſages; wherin he alwaies ſo diſcreetly bare himſelfe, as well contented his Prince, and purchaſed vnto himſelfe the reputation of a moſt E graue & wiſe man: and about ten yeres before this Embaſſage, being ſent by the Emperor Ferdinand Embaſſador to Solyman, and now by Maximilian to Selymus at Conſtantinople, returning with good ſucceſſe, was by the Emperor created a Prince of the Empire, and Biſhop of Agria.
Vnto which ſo honorable a perſonage, hauing the charge of this ſo weighty a matter, the Emperor the more to ennoble this embaſſage, as alſo to purchaſe the greater credit to his embaſſador, joyned vnto him a moſt honorable Baron called the lord Chriſtopher Teufenbatch of Stiria, one of his Counſellors alſo for the warres : who with full inſtructions both taking their leaue of the Emperor (then holding a Parliament at Presburgh) departed, and being attended vpon with a great and honourable Retinue, ſet forward the firſt of Iuly 1567, and ſo came to Comara a ſtrong town in Hungary not paſt a league from the Turks frontiers. In which place F the Embaſſadors ſtaying vntill the ſeuenth of Iuly; in the meane time gaue knowledge of their comming vnto the Gouernour of Strigonium, demanding for their ſecurity in the enemies country, to be met and receiued by ſome of his garriſon : which granted, they tooke their barks brought from Vienna and Poſſonium, ſufficient for their greatneſſe to haue carried them downe the riuer to Belgrade, with horſe and waggon and their whole furniture : and ſo entring vpon the Turks dominion about a league or a little more from Comara, being ſo far waſted by the ſoldiers and gallies of Comara, they were met by an Aga of the Turks, with a Chiaus called Becram (ſent by the Baſſa of Buda) in certain gallies armed with Turkiſh ſoldiers. To whom the Embaſſador at his landing deliuered his mind, and afterward his perſon, giuing them to vnderſtand, that they were with all ſafety to conduct both him and all his to the Baſſa of Buda: which they anſwered they were ready to accompliſh; and courteouſly inuited by the Embaſſadours, they came aboord their barke, and there dined together. Here they that were ſent with them, leauing them in the hands of the Turks, hauing licence to depart, returned to Comara: and they that day after fiue leagues ſailing arriued at Strigonium, where they were by the Gouernor of the city denied landing: for which ſo diſhonourable a part he was afterward ſharpely rebuked by the Baſſa of Buda. Yet as they lay that night vpon the water, certain Turkiſh minſtrels, to do them honour and to get a largeſſe, with their barbarous bawling inſtruments plaied them vp many a homely fit of mirth: and diuers others with ſundry ſorts of vauting and tumbling, ſometime leaping one vpon anothers ſhoulders, and ſometime doing their trickes on the earth, all the euening ſhewed them great ſport and paſtime. From Strigonium they with fiue leagues ſailing came to Buda, leauing behind them the caſtle of Vicegrade, two leagues diſtant from Strigonium. In this city of Buda lieth the great Baſſa by whom all Hungary, with the prouinces thereto belonging (in the Turks power) is gouerned. This city, ſometime the regall ſeat of the Hungarian Kings, is ſcituate vpon a little hill on the South ſide of Danubius, hauing in the South point thereof a caſtle, much higher than the city, and of a moſt braue proſpect: in which caſtle lieth a captain with a garriſon of fiue hundred ſouldiers (as the Turks ſay) howbeit it is thought that they are not altogether ſo many: it is the loſſe of his head to ſtir out of his charge; and beſide, he hath commiſſion to deny the Baſſa himſelfe entrance, vnleſſe he come very ſlightly accompanied: ſo jealous are the Turks of that caſtle, as if the ſtate of Hungary depended thereon. Herein ſtandeth the kings palace, which taketh vp moſt part of the place, greatly beautified by Matthias, and ſhewing outwardly to haue bin a very ſtately thing: for there are in it both large halls and faire galleries, and chambers built in moſt royall manner; where amongſt other roomes, the Embaſſadors found a decaied Library full of pictures and Latine titles of bookes: all which things when they preſent themſelues to the eies of the Chriſtian beholders, offer a juſt conſideration of noble and reuerend antiquity, and withall, ſtrike into their hearts a certaine compaſſion joyned with horror, to ſee the renowned glory of ſo many great Kings all waſted and brought to nothing. The next morning the Embaſſadors went to ſpeake with the Baſſa: whoſe houſe was reaſonable faire (conſidering their guiſe and cuſtome, not much delighting in the beauty of their priuat buildings) ſcituat vpon the riuer ſide at the bottome of a hill whereon the city ſtandeth. Vnto this Baſſa the Embaſſadors preſented two great gilt cups, a clocke all curiouſly wrought in gold, and a thouſand dollars: which Preſent the Baſſa receiued in his Diuano (being a large hall) where he ſate with his counſellors, officers, and other Turks in their places and order; ſome on his right hand, and ſome on his left, all richly attired in garments of ſilke of diuers colours and faſhions, reaching downe to their anckles after their manner: their heads couered with their paſſing white and well made turbants: in which aſſembly nothing being then to be ſeene but goodly order and graue ſilence, they ſeemed to the ſtrange beholders ſo many counſellors of exceeding grauity and reputation. Round about the Hall wherein the Embaſſadours had audience, were many ſeats couered with Turky carpets; the reſt of the roome being all vacant. The Baſſa in a place more apparant than the reſt, ſitting in great majeſty: before whom was ſet two little chaires, on which (after he had ſtood vp a while and embraced the Embaſſadors) he cauſed them both to ſit downe. Whoſe ſpeech deliuered in the Italian tongue, after they had diſcharged themſelues of the Emperors letters and greetings, was to this effect, viz. That his Imperiall Majeſty (for the common benefit of their ſubjects in Hungary) requeſted him to continue in his good purpoſe and dealing for peace: and further, to giue ſafe conduct vnto them his Embaſſadours with their retinue, vntill they were come vnto the Turks court, where they were to intreat and conclude a peace, to the ending of all troubles, and the publique benefit of their ſubjects in generall. Which ſpeech with cheerefull and friendly countenance ended, many of the Embaſſadors followers were admitted to kiſſe the Baſſa's hand, accounted no ſmall fauour amongſt thoſe Barbarians. The Interpreter

A pretor of theſe things was a Iew of Padua, who declared all,that was ſpoken, in the Turkiſh language vnto the Baſſa,and in the Italian vnto the Embaſſadors. And although(if it had bin their pleaſure) they might haue told their mind each to other in the Crouatian tongue without an Interproter;yet the Baſſa ſtanding more vpon his reputation,& for ſome other reſpects beſide, would haue the matter propounded and likewiſe anſwered in the Turkiſh. In which ſort they alſo conferred continually afterward with the Baſſa's at Conſtantinople,vnles it were in ſome particular and priuat talke of ſmal importance,or els in ſome point beſide the matter; for then the Interpreter ſpake in the Crouatian or Sclauonian tongue, which is familiar to moſt of the Turks,but eſpecially to the men of war. Before this hall where the Embaſſadors were entertained by the Baſſa,in the baſe court ſtood all the Ianizaries in goodly array, and his B ſlaues with their red zarcul on their heads, and other ſouldiers with high and long plumes of feathers ſtanding vpright:all which made a beautifull ſhew,& gaue all great grace to the Baſſa's court. Theſe men ſtir not one foot in their ſtandings,and if the conſultation do laſt foure houres long,ſo long are they to continue ſtanding without mouing. The Embaſſadors hauing ſtaied two daies at Buda,were by the Baſſa diſmiſſed,ſending with them his Checai(the Steward or gouernor of his houſe) a man of great reputation, and Becram the Chiaus, the ſame that came to meet them at Comara,with a ſufficient guard & certain Ianizaries,ſent for their more ſafe trauelling,and to prouide for them from place to place,of all things neceſſary for their diet, as alſo for their horſes,at the Turks charges. And thus accompanied,they imbarqued the tenth day of the aforeſaid moneth,towed vp the Turks gallies,which holpen by the ſwiftneſſe C of the riuer,carried them downe in eight daies to Belgrade,where they arriued the eighteenth of Iuly. So hauing ſtaid at Belgrade,& there leauing their boats,and taking their coaches,they ſet forward by land the twentieth of the ſaid moneth,and with great paines trauelling thorow Raſcia,Bulgaria,and Thracia,and paſſing a part of the great mountain Scardus,and after that, the mountain Rhodope,ſo by the way of Philippopolis and Hadrianople,the two and twentieth of Auguſt gathered faſt vpon Conſtantinople:where many of the Spahies and Chiauſais of the court,with a number of the Ianizaries and other ſoldiers, for their greater honour came to meet them a great way without the city. By whom the Embaſſadors honourably mounted on horſebacke,were by them conducted to their lodging appointed for them about the midſt of the city; where the Lord Albert de Vuis the Emperours Embaſſador Leiger (not long before D inlarged) hauing long looked for their comming, now moſt joyfully receiued them. It was then Fryday the Turks Sabath, and a day of them aboue all other daies in the weeke regarded, and about ten of the clocke two houres before noone;at which time the Embaſſadors were no ſooner alighted,but that Selymus going to heare the ceremonies of his religion,in the Moſchy of his father Solyman (as his manner was ſomtime to do) paſſed along before the gate where the Embaſſadors lay, with the whole traine of his Court; and peraduenture ſomewhat more than ordinary,to ſhew the magnificence of his power and ſtate, to the end that the Embaſſadors (aboue the former opinion by them conceiued)might hold him in the reputation of a moſt puiſſant and mighty Monarch. He paſſing by, vouchſafed not once to giue them a regard, or ſo much as to caſt his eie aſide vpon them,although they were ſtrangers, and but euen E then arriued: but with a countenance as if he had knowne not ſo much as any thing of their comming,held on his way as it lay. But Muhamet the chief Viſier Baſſa,with the other Baſſa's and great Courtiers,in moſt gracious manner as they paſſed by caſt their eies vpon them; all the courteſie they could then ſhew them. Six daies after,being the eight and twentieth of Auguſt, the Embaſſadors all three went to viſit and ſalute Muhamet(or as the Turks call him Mehemet) the chiefe Viſier Baſſa,as the maner was, preſenting him from the Emperor,with foure cups of ſiluer all guilt,of moſt faire and curious workemanſhip; of which,two of them being greater than the other,were three ſpans high,the two other being not ſo high by a ſpan,but hauing in them two thouſand duckats of gold:beſide which,they gaue him alſo a clocke, being a moſt curious piece of worke,and all ouer double gilt. After which greetings and preſents deliuered, F beſide the contents of his Majeſties letters,they declared vnto him in generall points, the cauſe of their comming,and the mind of the Emperor well diſpoſed to a peace; and what great benefit would ariſe thereby to both parties:and laſtly turning ouer the blame of the late wars,and laying the fault thereof to the charge of others,ſweetned thereby the ſowre of their former dealings. Neither was the Baſſa likewiſe for his part to ſeeke of good words, but anſwered Preſents giuen by the Emperors Embaſſadors to the great Baſſa's.

ſwered them in Turkiſh by the mouth of Hibraim the chiefe Dragoman, who deliuered his G mind to them in Latine or Italian, according as the Embaſſadours had before vttered theirs: which parley ſo ended, certain of the chiefe of the Embaſſadors followers were admitted into the Diuano to kiſſe the proud Baſſa's hand. The ſame day the Embaſſadors alſo ſaluted Partau the ſecond Baſſa, and Ferrat the third in order and authority. To Partau they preſented two cups of ſiluer all gilt, beſide a clocke of the ſame making with the afore named, and two thouſand dollars: and the like to Ferrat. The next day they went to viſit the other three Baſſa's, Achomat, Piall, and Muhamet, preſenting euery one of them with two faire cups and a thouſand dollars. Theſe were the ſix Viſier Baſſa's to Selymus, then lying at court with him, men that for wealth and authority went before all other in the Turkiſh empire, as in the courſe of this Hiſtory may appeare. And ſo hauing viſited them in generall, the Embaſſadors to ſet their affaires H on foot, the fourth of September cloſed with Muhamet, to whom the ordering of Eſtate-matters was eſpecially committed. Yet after this firſt conference, becauſe it was neceſſary before ſo weighty affaires were broached, firſt to do the Turke reuerence, and to deliuer the preſents, with the Emperors letters to him written; for ſome few daies there was not any point at all of the Embaſſadors buſineſſe handled.

Preſents ſent vnto Selymus by the Emperour.

The ſecond gate.

Selymus not long after the Embaſſadors were arriued, went out for his diſport and pleaſure on hunting: ſo that in the mean time, after the preſents were giuen to the Baſſa's, matters ſtood ſtill altogether vnaduanced, vntill the 21 of September: and that day (Selymus being now returned from his diſport) it was appointed that the Embaſſadors ſhould haue audience at the Court. Whereupon they made choice out of their followers, of thoſe that ſhould attend vpon I them, which were not in all aboue twelue perſons: for they to whom this charge was committed, ſaid it was neither the manner, nor yet meet, that any great traine ſhould come before ſo great a Prince, and that they might not bring with them aboue that number: whereupon they appointed but ſix apiece to attend them; and of fifteen cups of ſiluer and gilt, being moſt curiouſly and cunningly engrauen, one of the faireſt among the reſt was giuen to each of thoſe twelue ro carry, and they ordered to go by two and two before the reſt, that came after in order with the reſt of the Preſents; which was two exceeding pretious clocks, like in bigneſſe to them before giuen to the Baſſa's, but far aboue them in value; & 45000 dollars for the tribute behind and yet vnpaied. The greateſt of thoſe cups was ſix ſpans and a halfe, and the leaſt two ſpans in height: ſome of them being double cups, after the high Dutch manner. The Embaſſadors K (whoſe comming a great multitude of the Ianizaries attended below at the gate of their lodging (beſide many of the Spahi's and Chiauſi's, and others of good ſort (which were come to honor them with their preſence to the palace) putting themſelues in readineſſe betimes in the morning, and taking horſe ſet forward toward the court. The formoſt were they that did beare the preſents in their hands, the people of the city in euery ſtreet flocking together in exceeding multitudes to behold them as they paſſed: and verily there had beene ſeldome times ſeene the like embaſſage in thoſe parts: for beſides the fame that was blowne abroad in euery quarter, That they were men ſent from one of the greateſt Princes in Chriſtendome; the diuerſity of their attire (ſo few as they were) more than any thing beſide, did repreſent the Maieſty of the Chriſtian Emperor to them that gazed vpon his Embaſſadors and their traine, the L people conceiuing thereby, that he was lord and ruler ouer many prouinces and countries. For they that were Hungarians belonging to the Biſhop of Agria (the chief embaſſador) being attired in long & ſober garments of very fine purple cloath, hauing their ſhooes pieced ouer the ſoles with yron plates, and halfe their heads ſhauen, ſeemed to differ from them but little: but on the other ſide, the high Dutch attired in black, with their veluet caps, and ſhort cloaks laied with ſiluer lace, & long breeches little leſſe than Rutter wiſe, and chaines of gold about their necks, appeared very ſtrange & vncouth to the Turkiſh people: ſo accompanied in this honorable wiſe, the embaſſadors entred the firſt gate of the great Turks palace. This gate is built of marble in moſt ſumptuous maner, & of a ſtately hight, with certain words of their language in the front therof ingrauen and gilt in marble. So paſſing thorow the baſe court, which hath on M the right ſide very faire gardens, & on the left, diuers buildings ſeruing for other offices, with a little Moſchy, they came to the ſecond gate, where al ſuch as came in riding, muſt of neceſſity alight: here ſo ſoon as they were entred in at the ſecond gate, they came into a very large ſquare court, with buildings & galleries round about it, the kitchins ſtanding on the right hand, with other

A other lodgings for ſuch as belonged to the court, and on the left hand likewiſe roomes deputed to like ſeruices. There are moreouer many halls and other roomes for reſort, where they ſit in counſel,handling and executing the publike affaires either of the court or of the empire;
with other matters, where the Baſſa's and other officers aſſemble together. Entring in at this ſecond gate in one part of the court,which ſeem'd rather ſome large ſtreet,they ſaw the whole company of the Solaches ſet in a goodly ranke, which are archers keeping alwaies neere vnto
the perſon of the great Turke,& ſeruing as his footmen when he rideth: they vſe high plumes of feathers, which are ſet bolt vpright ouer their foreheads. In another place there ſtood the Capitzi in like array,with black ſtaues of Indian canes in their hands:they are the porters and warders of the gates of the palace, not much differing in their attire from the Ianizaries; who B ſtood in ranke likewiſe in another quarter. And beſides all thoſe, with many more that were out of order, as well of the court as of the common people, thoſe Knights of the court which accompanied the embaſſadors thither,with other great ones alſo of like degree,were marſhalled all in their ſeueral companies. And among the reſt,the Mutſaracha's,men of all nations and all religions (for their valour the only freemen which liue at their owne liberty in the Turkiſh empire) ſtood there apparelled in damaske,veluet,and cloath of gold,and garments of ſilke of ſundry kinds and colours: their pompe was great, and the greater, for the turbants that they wore vpon their heads, being as white as whitenes it ſelfe, made a moſt braue and goodly ſhew well worth the beholding. In briefe,whether they were to be conſidered all at once,or in particular, as well for the order that they kept, as for their ſumptuous preſence, altogether without C noiſe or rumor; they made the Embaſſadors and the reſt of their followers there preſent, eye-witneſſes both of their obedience,and of the great ſtate and royalty of the Othoman court.
Paſſing through them,the Embaſſadors were led into the hall, where the Baſſa's & other great men of the court were all ready to giue them entertainment: they of their traine being at the ſame time brought into a roome that ſtood apart vnder one of the aforeſaid lodgings all hung with Turky carpets. Soone after (as their vſe and maner is) they brought in their dinner, couering the ground with table-cloathes of a great length ſpred vpon carpets,and afterward ſcattering vpon them a maruelous number of wooden ſpoons,with ſo great ſtore of bread, as if they had bin to feed 300 perſons: then they ſet on meat in order,which was ſerued in 42 great platters of earth, full of rice pottage of three or foure kinds, differing one from another, ſome of D them ſeaſoned with hony,and of the colour of hony; ſome with ſoure milke,and white of colour;
and ſome with ſugar: they had fritters alſo,which were made of like batter,and mutton beſide,or rather a dainty and toothſome morſell of an old ſodden Ewe. The table (if there had any ſuch bin) thus furniſhed, the gueſts without any ceremony of waſhing,ſate downe on the ground (for ſtooles there were none) and fell to their victuall, and dranke out of great earthen diſhes,water prepared with ſugar,which kind of drinke they call Zerbet. But ſo hauing made a ſhort repaſt,they were no ſooner riſen vp,but certain young men,whom they call Giamoglans, with others that ſtood round about them,ſnatcht it haſtily vp as their fees, and like greedy harpies rauened it downe in a moment. The Embaſſadors in the meane time dined in the hall with the Baſſa's. And after dinner certain of the Capitzies were ſent for the twelue of E the embaſſadors followers,before appointed to do the great Sultan reuerence:by whom (their Preſents being already conueied away) they were remoued out of the place where they dined, and brought on into an vnder roome,from whence there was an aſcent into the hall,where the Baſſa's were ſtaying for the Embaſſadors: who ſoone after came forth, and for their eaſe ſat them downe vpon the benches, whileſt the Baſſa's went in to Selymus; who before this time had made an end of dinner,and was remoued in all his royalty,into one of his chambers,expecting the comming of the Embaſſadors. All things now in readineſſe,and the Embaſſadors ſent for, they ſet forward with their traine, and came to the third gate, which leadeth into the priuy palace of the Turkiſh Emperor,where none but himſelfe,his eunuchs,& the yong pages his minions,being in the Eunuchs cuſtody,hath continuall abiding:into which inward part of F the palace none entreth but the Capitzi Baſſa (who hath the keeping of this third gate) & the Ceſigniers (that ſerue in the Turks meat) with the Baſſa's and ſome few other great men; and that only when they haue occaſion ſo to do by reaſon of ſome great buſines, or ſent for by the Sultan. Being entred in at this gate,which is of a ſtately and royall building, the Capitzi by whom they were conducted ſuddenly cauſed them to ſtay, & ſet them one from another aboue

The third gate.

ſwered them in Turkiſh by the mouth of Hibraim the chiefe Dragoman, who deliuered his mind to them in Latine or Italian, according as the Embaſſadours had before vttered theirs: which parley ſo ended, certain of the chiefe of the Embaſſadors followers were admitted into the Diuano to kiſſe the proud Baſſa's hand. The ſame day the Embaſſadors alſo ſaluted Partau the ſecond Baſſa, and Ferrat the third in order and authority. To Partau they preſented two cups of ſiluer all gilt, beſide a clocke of the ſame making with the afore named, and two thouſand dollars: and the like to Ferrat. The next day they went to viſit the other three Baſſa's, Achomat, Piall, and Muhamet, preſenting euery one of them with two faire cups and a thouſand dollars. Theſe were the ſix Viſier Baſſa's to Selymus, then lying at court with him, men that for wealth and authority went before all other in the Turkiſh empire, as in the courſe of this Hiſtory may appeare. And ſo hauing viſited them in generall, the Embaſſadors to ſet their affaires on foot, the fourth of September cloſed with Muhamet, to whom the ordering of Eſtate-matters was eſpecially committed. Yet after this firſt conference, becauſe it was neceſſary before ſo weighty affaires were broached, firſt to do the Turke reuerence, and to deliuer the preſents, with the Emperors letters to him written; for ſome few daies there was not any point at all of the Embaſſadors buſineſſe handled.

Selymus not long after the Embaſſadors were arriued, went out for his diſport and pleaſure on hunting: ſo that in the mean time, after the preſents were giuen to the Baſſa's, matters ſtood ſtill altogether vnaduanced, vntill the 21 of September: and that day (Selymus being now returned from his diſport) it was appointed that the Embaſſadors ſhould haue audience at the Court. Whereupon they made choice out of their followers, of thoſe that ſhould attend vpon them, which were not in all aboue twelue perſons: for they to whom this charge was committed, ſaid it was neither the manner, nor yet meet, that any great traine ſhould come before ſo great a Prince, and that they might not bring with them aboue that number: whereupon they appointed but ſix apiece to attend them; and of fifteen cups of ſiluer and gilt, being moſt curiouſly and cunningly engrauen, one of the faireſt among the reſt was giuen to each of thoſe twelue to carry, and they ordered to go by two and two before the reſt, that came after in order with the reſt of the Preſents; which was two exceeding pretious clocks, like in bigneſſe to them before giuen to the Baſſa's, but far aboue them in value; & 45000 dollars for the tribute behind and yet vnpaied. The greateſt of thoſe cups was ſix ſpans and a halfe, and the leaſt two ſpans in height: ſome of them being double cups, after the high Dutch manner. The Embaſſadors (whoſe comming a great multitude of the Ianizaries attended below at the gate of their lodging (beſide many of the Spahi's and Chiauſi's, and others of good ſort (which were come to honor them with their preſence to the palace) putting themſelues in readineſſe betimes in the morning, and taking horſe ſet forward toward the court. The formoſt were they that did beare the preſents in their hands, the people of the city in euery ſtreet flocking together in exceeding multitudes to behold them as they paſſed: and verily there had beene ſeldome times ſeene the like embaſſage in thoſe parts: for beſides the fame that was blowne abroad in euery quarter, That they were men ſent from one of the greateſt Princes in Chriſtendome; the diuerſity of their attire (ſo few as they were) more than any thing beſide, did repreſent the Maieſty of the Chriſtian Emperor to them that gazed vpon his Embaſſadors and their traine, the people conceiuing thereby, that he was lord and ruler ouer many prouinces and countries. For they that were Hungarians belonging to the Biſhop of Agria (the chief embaſſador) being attired in long & ſober garments of very fine purple cloath, hauing their ſhooes pieced ouer the ſoles with yron plates, and halfe their heads ſhauen, ſeemed to differ from them but little: but on the other ſide, the high Dutch attired in black, with their veluet caps, and ſhort cloaks laied with ſiluer lace, & long breeches little leſſe than Rutter wiſe, and chaines of gold about their necks, appeared very ſtrange & vncouth to the Turkiſh people: ſo accompanied in this honorable wiſe, the embaſſadors entred the firſt gate of the great Turks palace. This gate is built of marble in moſt ſumptuous maner, & of a ſtately hight, with certain words of their language in the front therof ingrauen and gilt in marble. So paſſing thorow the baſe court, which hath on the right ſide very faire gardens, & on the left, diuers buildings ſeruing for other offices, with a little Moſchy, they came to the ſecond gate, where al ſuch as came in riding, muſt of neceſſity alight: here ſo ſoon as they were entred in at the ſecond gate, they came into a very large ſquare court, with buildings & galleries round about it, the kitchins ſtanding on the right hand, with

to like ſeruices. There are moreouer many halls and other roomes for reſort, where they
company of the Solaches ſet in a goodly ranke, which are archers keeping alwaies neere vnto
warders of the gates of the palace, not much differing in their attire from the Ianizaries; who
all religions (for their valour the only freemen which liue at their owne liberty in the Turkiſh
well worth the beholding. In brieſe, whether they were to be conſidered all at once, or in particular, as well for the order that they kept, as for their ſumptuous preſence, altogether with-C out noiſe or rumor; they made the Embaſſadors and the reſt of their followers there preſent, eye-witneſſes both of their obedience, and of the great ſtate and royalty of the Othoman court.
Paſſing through them, the Embaſſadors were led into the hall, where the Baſſa's & other great
D them ſeaſoned with hony, and of the colour of hony; ſome with ſoure milke, and white of colour;
and ſome with ſugar: they had fritters alſo, which were made of like batter; and mutton beſide, or rather a dainty and toothſome morſell of an old ſodden Ewe. The table (if there
diſhes, water prepared with ſugar, which kind of drinke they call Zerbet. But ſo hauing made a ſhort repaſt, they were no ſooner riſen vp, but certain young men, whom they call Giamoglans,
the hall with the Baſſa's. And after dinner certain of the Capitzies were ſent for the twelue of E the embaſſadors followers, before appointed to do the great Sultan reuerence: by whom (their
ſent for, they ſet forward with their traine, and came to the third gate, which leadeth into the priuy palace of the Turkiſh Emperor, where none but himſelfe, his eunuchs, & the yong pages
his minions, being in the Eunuchs cuſtody, hath continuall abiding: into which inward part of F the palace none entreth but the Capitzi Baſſa (who hath the keeping of this third gate) & the Ceſigniers (that ſerue in the Turks meat) with the Baſſa's and ſome few other great men; and
whom they were conducted ſuddenly cauſed them to ſtay, & ſet them one from another about fiue paces,in a little roome,which neuertheleſſe was paſſing delicate,al curiouſly painted ouer G with diuers colours,and ſtood between the gate and the more inner lodgings. On both ſides of which roome,when all things els were whiſt & in a deep ſilence, certain little birds only were heard to warble out their ſweet notes, and to flicker vp and downe the greene trees of the gardens(which al along caſt a pleaſant ſhadow from them)as if they alone had obtained licence to make a noiſe. Selymus himſelfe was in great majeſty ſet in an vnder chamber, parted only with a wall from the roome wherein the Embaſſadours followers attended, whereinto he might looke through a little window, the portall of his ſaid chamber ſtanding in counterpoint with the third gate aboue mentioned. The Embaſſadors entring in,were led ſingle,and one after another,to make their reuerence vnto the great Turke. And in the mean time certain of the Capitzi with the Preſents in their hands fetching a compaſſe about before the window, muſtered them in his ſight. All this while not the leaſt ſound in the world being raiſed, but a ſacred ſi- H lence kept in euery corner,as if men had bin going to viſit the holieſt place in Ieruſalem. Yet for all that,the embaſſadors followers placed one from another(as is aforeſaid)were not aware that the great Sultan was ſo neere,looking ſtill when they ſhould haue bin led on forwards all together: howbeit they were ſet in one after another, neither did they that were ſo ſet out,return again into the roome,but hauing ſeuerally done their reuerence,were all(except the Embaſſadors,that ſtill ſtaid in the chamber)by one and one ſent out another way into the court: neither could he that came after,ſee his fellow that went before him, after he was once taken in to do his reuerence:but ſuddenly as the former was let out, the next was aduanced forward to the doore,where Iſman the Capitzi-Baſſa and the Odda-Baſſa,taking him by both arms and I by the necke,the one at the right hand,and the other at the left,& ſo leading him apace,by the way ſoftly felt his wriſts with their hands,leſt peraduenture he might haue ſome ſhort weapon in his ſleeue. Yet were they not all thus groped,as Marc. Antonio Pigafetta (the reporter of this negotiation)ſaith of himſelfe and ſome others alſo. Howbeit this hath bin,and yet is the manner of giuing of acceſſe vnto the perſon of the Great Turke, euer ſince that Amurath the firſt was after the battel of Caſſoua murdred by one of Lazarus the Deſpots men,who admitted to his preſence, in reuenge of the wrong done vnto his Maſter, with a ſhort poinard that he had cloſely hidden about him,ſo ſtabbed him in the belly, that he preſently died. And thus like men rather carried to priſon by ſergeants, than to the preſence of ſo mighty a Monarch, they were preſented vnto his Majeſty: he ſitting vpon a pallet, which the Turks call Maſtabe, vſed K by them in their chambers to ſleepe and to feed vpon,couered with carpets of ſilke, as was the whole floore of the chamber alſo. The chamber it ſelfe being not very great,was but darke, altogether without windows,excepting that one whereof we haue before ſpoken,and hauing the wals painted and ſet out in moſt freſh and liuely colours by great cunning,and with a moſt delicat grace:yet vſe they neither pictures nor the image of any thing in their painting. The ſix Viſier Baſſa's before mentioned,were ſtanding at the left hand as they entred in at the chamber dore,one by another in one ſide of the chamber,and the Embaſſadors on the right hand on the other ſide ſtanding likewiſe,& vncouered. The Dragomans were in another part of the chamber,neere the place where the Sultan ſat gorgeouſly attired in a robe of cloth of gold all embroidred with jewels: when as the Embaſſadors followers by one & one brought before him, L (as is aforeſaid)and kneeling on the ground,a Turke ſtanding on his right hand,with all reuerence taking vp the hem of his garment,gaue it them in their hands to kiſſe. Selymus himſelf al this while ſitting like an image without mouing,and with a great ſtate and majeſty keeping his countenance,dained not to giue them one of his looks. This done, they were led back again,neuer turning their backs towards him,but going ſtill backwards vntill they were out of his preſence. So after they had all thus made their reuerence,& were departed out of the chamber,the Embaſſadors deliuered vnto Selymus the Emperors letters, and briefly declared vnto him their meſſage:whom he anſwering in foure words,as,That they were to confer with his Baſſa's;preſently they were diſmiſſed. And ſo comming out of the two inner gates, they mounted on horſebacke, and tooke the way toward their lodging, being at their return accompanied with M the whole order of the Ianizaries,with their Aga & other captains:among whom were certain of their religious men called Haagi (which vſe to follow the Ianizaries)who continually turning about,and in their going,ſinging or rather howling out certaine Pſalmes and praiers for the welfare of their Great Sultan; gaue the Embaſſadours and their followers occaſion to

A wonder, that they either left not for wearineſſe, or fell not downe like noddies for giddineſſe.
All theſe were ſent, the more honourably to accompany the embaſſadors to their lodging: and beſide theſe, many more on horſebacke that attended them at their forth comming: in regard whereof, the embaſſadors when they were come to their lodging, to requite their greedy courteſie, franckly diſtributed amongſt them aboue foure thouſand dollars, and yet well contented them not.

The Embaſſadors after this entertainment at court, had diuers times conference with the great Baſſa's concerning peace, as Selymus had commanded: wherin by reaſon of the Turks vnreaſonable demands (as their manner is at their firſt meetings) nothing could be as then concluded: ſo that Selymus himſelfe being ſhortly after to depart for Hadrianople, where he was B to continue for ſome moneths (but rather as it was thought for that they could not agree vpon a point of great conſequence) the treaty for peace was intermitted, vntill ſuch time as a meſſenger diſpatched in poſt, might return vnto the Turks court, with ſome reſolute anſwer concerning that matter. So it was, that during the reigne of the late Emperour Ferdinand, that the Turke his ſubjects in Hungary paied all their taxes and tributes vnto their old Lords and maſters, abiding and liuing in the Emperors juriſdiction, as did the ſubjects of Ferdinand, to their lords that dwelt in the Turkes dominion and territories: now in this treaty for peace, the Turks (amongſt other their vnreaſonable requeſts) demanded to haue their ſubjects freed, and yet the ſubjects of the Emperor to pay as they were before accuſtomed. Which as it was a requeſt nothing indifferent, ſo was it no leſſe prejudiciall and hurtful vnto the Emperor his ſubjects C in Hungary: for which cauſe the Embaſſadors would not by any meanes conſent thereunto, before they knew the Emperors farther pleaſure concerning the ſame. Whereupon they diſpatched one Sig. Odoardo a gentleman of Mantua, very skilfull in the Turkiſh language and in ſuch like affaires, by reaſon that as well about this buſineſſe, as at diuers times before about other the like, he had beene emploied from Vienna to Conſtantinople in the Emperours ſeruice.
So Selymus ſhortly after, Viz. the twentieth of October, departing from Conſtantinople, in great magnificence paſſed by the gate where the Embaſſadors lay, with his whole court in armes, and in the ſame order that is vſually kept when he goeth to warre or taketh any great journey. After whoſe departure the embaſſadors hauing ſufficiently viewed the city of Conſtantinople, and then at good leiſure, to paſſe the time and to ſee the countries they had ſo often D both heard and read of, together with the ports and hauens on both ſides that narrow ſea which diuideth Europe from Aſia, embarking themſelues, & croſſing the mouth of the hauen betwixt Conſtantinople and Pera, paſſed all alongſt the coaſt on Europe ſide, vnto the Euxine or blacke ſea, and ſo backe againe by the other ſide of that ſtreight ſea: curiouſly noting the great ruins of the antient city of Bythinia, with ſome others alongſt the Aſian ſhore, together with the pleaſant ſcituation they in former times had, whileſt they yet flouriſhed in their glory, but now for moſt part (or rather altogether) laid in the duſt and brought to nought: and ſo returned againe to Conſtantinople. But whileſt they thus deceiued the time, and lay long expecting the returne, as well of their owne meſſenger ſent vnto the Emperour, as of Selymus himſelfe: they were aduertiſed in all haſte to repaire vnto him to Hadrianople, whether the E aforeſaid meſſenger was now come with full inſtructions of all things concerning the treaty for peace. For which cauſe they with great ſpeed making themſelues ready, and taking their leaue of Piall Baſſa (who for that he was Selymus his great Admirall, then lay at Conſtantinople) ſet forward the firſt of Ianuary in the yeare 1568; and ſo after nine daies trauell, at length arriued at Hadrianople about an hundred fifty three Italian miles diſtant from Conſtantinople.
Here they ſtaied vntill the peace was concluded, which was the ſeuenteenth of February: the chiefe capitulations wherof were, That either of thoſe great Princes ſhould ſtill hold what they had got each from the other in the late wars: That the Emperor ſhould yearely pay thirty thouſand duckats to the Turkiſh Sultan, as a tribute for Hungary, the tribute to begin in the beginning of Ianuary laſt paſt this yeare 1568: That the ſubjects of the Turks ſhould F pay nothing to the ſubjects of the Emperour, neither the Emperours any thing to the Turks, but to be both of thoſe paiments free. And that vpon theſe conditions there ſhould be a firme and ſure peace betwixt thoſe two great Monarchs for eight yeares next following: wherein the Vayuod of Tranſyluania was (as the Turks tributary) to be alſo comprehended. Neuertheleſſe, all things at this time thus agreed vpon, the Turks after their ſubtile manner finding ſundry cauillations,and raiſing many doubts about the aforeſaid capitulations,did what they G might to haue in ſome part altered what they had before agreed vpon, to the bettering of themſelues and the hurt of the Chriſtians:and ſo with many their vnreaſonable demands ſtayed the departure of the embaſſadors vntill the twentieth of March following. At which time hauing their diſpatch,and taking their leaue of the Great Turke and the Baſſa's,accompanied with Hebraim-Beg (Selymus his embaſſador vnto the Emperour) they by land returned towards Vienna; where they with the joyfull newes of peace the tenth of May arriued, being there two daies after at the court moſt honourably receiued. And fiue daies after,audience was giuen vnto the Turks Embaſſador; who well heard and better rewarded, ſhortly after returned with a full concluſion of peace from the Emperour, to Conſtantinople.

Embaſſadours ſent from Tamas the Perſian king,to Selymus

But whileſt this peace was thus in concluding,and the embaſſadors yet reſident at Hadrianople, H the ſixteenth of February came an honourable embaſſage from Shach Tamas the Perſian King,vnto the great Sultan Selymus, to intreat a peace betwixt them, or rather to conclude the ſame, being before agreed vpon the controuerſies, for which they afterwards fell to open war. Which embaſſage for that it is no leſſe truly than plainely ſet downe in a letter ſent from Erzirum (a city then in the confines of the Turks dominions towards the Perſians) written by a Chiaus to Muhamet chiefe of the Viſier Baſſaes;which Chiaus was of purpoſe ſent from Conſtantinople, to meet the ſaid Perſian embaſſador: I thought it not amiſſe for the better vnderſtanding thereof,to ſet downe the effect of the ſame letter as it was tranſlated out of the Turkiſh into the Italian by the Emperors embaſſadors interpreter. I

The effect of the Letter written to Muhamet Baſſa, the chiefe Viſier, by a Chiaus ſent of purpoſe to meet the Perſian Embaſſadour.

*After due ſalutations, this is the effect of that which wee thought good to make knowne vnto your Lordſhip. Now at this preſent (to wit in the beginning of the moneth Giuma Sulacchir) is in good health arriued the Embaſſador of Perſia,the Kings chiefe counſellour, called Schach Culi Soltan, attended vpon with a hundred and twenty Gentlemen, with guilt Turbants on their heads,and well furniſhed with ſpare horſes led in mens hands. Beſides whom he was accompanied alſo with two hundred knights K *all apparelled in cloath of gold, with foure hundred Perſian Merchants, in all aboue ſeuen hundred perſons; with a thouſand nine hundred beaſts, Camels, Mules, and Horſes; fiue couple of drums, euery couple being placed vpon a ſeuerall Camell, fiue Nacars, three trumpets, fiue flutes, and other inſtruments, in all about thirty muſitions,playing vpon theſe inſtruments: There were alſo two Choriſters or chaunters of the Alcaron,one Organiſt,one playing vpon a Turkiſh inſtrument like a Lute,two players vpon Sagbuts,with two other muſitions,eight in all. There were alſo foure bondwomen ſeruing in the Embaſſadors own chamber.
Who when he was with all this magnificent pompe come within one daies journey of Erzirum, the
* Sayms and Spahies aſſembling themſelues together to the number of eight thouſand men, went to meet him: amongſt whom were an hundred more, all apparelled in cloath of* Gold and Sattin: two thouſand men with guilt morrions on their heads: in which brauery we marching forward, the Perſian Embaſſadour L *amazed to ſee ſo great majeſty and pompe, ſaid, that all the army of Conſtantinople was come to meet him: and ſo being come into the city,cauſed all the inſtruments to be plaied vpon, euen from morning vntill night. The next morning, the Embaſſador inuited the Baſſa with all the Lords and officers; who being come, he entreated them to heare his muſicke: and in like manner the Lord Baſſa inuited the Perſians.
But as the Embaſſadour was going to the banquet,came another Sultan of the Kings, who brought vnto the ſame Embaſſador a guilt Turbant, and a rich gowne wrought with gold, which he cauſed him to put on by the way. By this Embaſſadour the Perſian King hath ſent all the armour of Sultan* Bajazet, with all his Camels and other wealth. The cauſes of the long ſtay of this Embaſſadour were ſpecially two: the one for that the Perſian King had cauſed to be made two pauilions of one piece, the curtanes being interlaced with gold, and the ſupporters imbroidered with the ſame: beſides this, he ſent two bookes of Hiſtories, M *and two Pearles, which in weight weighed ten * Meſcaly: one Balaſſo as big as a little Pearle; fourescore and two times an hundred * Tumenlich of ſtuffe, amounting to foureſcore and two ſummes of Aſpers,and forty Falcons: all which the Perſian King hath ſent vnto the Great Sultan,as to the only Monarch and Patron of the World. This* Schach Culi is the next in authority to the King, and ſo was in the time

 Schach Culi Soltan,was not the proper name of this embaſſador, but a title of honour, and ſignifieth as much as a prince ſeruant to the King.*

 Sayms are ſoldiers of greater honor than the Spahi, hauing for their ſtipend yearely 2000 Aſpers at the leaſt, out of the reuenues of certaine Townes and villages.*

 A Meſcali is foure drams.*

 Tumenlich is in value as much as the Turks aſper.*

A time of great King Hyſmael. Theſe two Perſian Sultans are the Kings chiefe Sultans and courtiers, and therefore ſet themſelues forth with all the pompe they can. Yet notwithſtanding all their brauery, being come to Erzirum within the view of our army, the Perſians were amaſed to behold the goodly order of the Othomans. One part of the Perſians are returned againe into Perſia. And if it pleaſe God, at the comming of my meſſenger vnto you, your Lordſhip ſhall vnderſtand of what condition and ſtate theſe two Princes and Sultans are. They haue each of them yearely ſix Tumoni: which maketh after the computation of the Othomans, ſix thouſand Aſpers. Your Lordſhip after this account may judge of the reſt. The other cauſe of the long ſtay of this Embaſſadour, was for that in Syruan the people were vp in rebellion, wherein many of them were ſlaine: to the appeaſing of which ſedition, this Schach Culy *was ſent, and now at laſt is come. From Erzirum in the beginning in the moneth of * Giuma Sulacchir, in the yeare* B of the Prophet Mahomet, 975.

This the Perſian embaſſador was with the greateſt pomp that might be entertained by the Turks at his firſt comming to Hadrianople, al the braue courtiers with the Ianizaries & other ſouldiers of the court going forth in moſt ſeemely order to meet him. Who now entred the city, and come before the houſe where the Emperours Embaſſadors then lay, and ſeeing certain of their retinue before the dore, asked of Iſuam the Capitzi Baſſa, what people they were; who told them that they were the followers of an Embaſſador that there lay, ſent from one of the greateſt Princes of the Chriſtians, namely, the Emperor, who was deſirous to make peace with the great Sultan his maſter. Whereunto the Embaſſador replied, that he would C willingly ſalute them: which Iſuam hearing, ſtreight way turned his horſe towards the place where they ſtood. Now the Emperors embaſſador being ſecret within a lettice, & ſeeing them come towards him, went forth and ſtood vpon the doore threſhold, and ſo with ſignes and words ſaluted one another. Among the others the Perſian embaſſador ſaid vnto the Emperors, That he would gladly talke with him, if it might ſo pleaſe the grand Seignior: Hebraim the Dragoman who then was with the Emperors embaſſadors, being interpreter. So hauing courteouſly ſaluted one the other, they departed, but neuer after came together. Two daies after, the Perſian embaſſadors (according to the manner of that barbarous nation, who with empty hands ſalute not one another) by his Checaia or ſteward of his houſhold, preſented all the Viſier Baſſa's with diuers rich gifts and preſents, euery one of them according to their degrees & places: and D the day after went himſelf to viſit them; where by the way fel out a ſtrange matter, like enough to haue coſt him his life. For a Giamoglan (as the embaſſador was going to viſit Muhamet the chief of the Viſier Baſſa's for the firſt) meeting him, ſhot at him with an harquebuſe, with purpoſe to haue ſlain him; but as God would, miſſed him, and hurt but one of his chiefe followers in the arme. Wherwith the embaſſador not a little diſmaid, as ſuppoſing himſelfe to haue bin betraied, turning his horſe, was about to haue gone to his lodging: but the great Baſſa in the mean time hauing knowledge therof, preſently ſent out men to guard him, and to excuſe himſelfe of the fact. Whereof the embaſſador being aſſured, held on his way. In the meane ſpace, the fellow who ſhot the harquebuſe, being apprehended, was brought before the Embaſſador and the Baſſa; who asking him for what cauſe he diſcharged the ſhot againſt the embaſſador? E he without change of countenance boldly anſwered, That he did it for no other cauſe but for that the embaſſador was an heretick, and ſent from an hereticall king, and an enemy to their religion: and therefore that it was not conuenient he ſhould come to intreat of peace with his lord; adding further, that he was not worthy of any peace. Which the Baſſa hearing, adjudged the deſperat villain the next day to be drawn at an horſe taile thorow the city, & then to haue his right hand cut off, and afterward his head, which was accordingly put in execution. After this, the Perſian embaſſador the 22 of the ſame moneth went to deliuer the preſents ſent from his maſter vnto the grand Seignior, and to kiſſe his hand; ſending firſt before him the Preſents vpon 44 Camels, whereof 34 were the Kings of Perſia, and the other ten his owne. The Kings Preſents was an Alcoran, with the authority of Ali, as they hold. For this is their cu- F ſtome, alwaies to preſent one ſuch Alcoran vnto the Princes to whom they ſend their Embaſſadours. It was couered with gold, and garniſhed with moſt precious ſtones. He preſented alſo a booke of Hiſtories, couered as the other: he gaue alſo a box, wherein was a very faire precious ſtone called Balaſſo, and two pearles of a wonderfull greatneſſe, with two purſes of an handfull long, full of jewels. Beſides theſe, he preſented alſo eight Fimari or Porcellaine diſhes (which we call China diſhes) made of moſt pure earth, kept aboue fifty yeres buried vnder the ground, to the end ſo to be fined and purified, which (as ſome ſay) wil milt and diſſolue if any poiſon be put into them. He gaue alſo two moſt ſtately pauilions, 20 great carpets of ſilke, and many other leſſer of ſilke and gold; alſo nine faire canopies to hang ouer the ports of their pauilions, things not vſed among the Chriſtians. He gaue alſo nine very faire carpets of camels haire, nine ſaddles ſet with ſtones after the Perſian faſhion, ſeuen ſtaues of ſiluer, ſeuen ſcimiters with red ſcaberts, ſeuen bowes with arrowes and quiuers, all wrought with gold and pretious ſtone; he preſented alſo many other carpets called Teſtich, made of the fineſt lawne, and ſo large, that ſeuen men could ſcarcely carry one of them. All the Faulcons were dead by the way. The preſents which the Embaſſadour gaue vnto the great Turke in his owne name, were alſo theſe: an Alcoran, a pauilion faire and large, certaine ſcimiters, bowes and arrowes richly garniſhed, with certain carpets of ſilk, and Camels haire. After which preſents ſo deliuered, & reuerence don vnto the great Sultan by the embaſſador, and thirty of his followers al in cloth of gold, he returned to his lodging, very honorably accompanied, as well by the Turks as them of his own retinue. Firſt beſides many others, there were a great company of the Spahies and Chiauſies, and other courtiers mounted vpon goodly horſes, well furniſhed & in decent order: here might a man haue ſeene ſtore of cloth of gold, veluet, damaske, & other kinds of ſilke. After theſe there followed about three hundred Perſian horſemen, apparelled after their manner, ſome with gownes made of diuers little pieces of taffata of ſundry colors, repreſenting the pictures of men, women, horſes, and other beaſts; and ſome of them imbroidered with floures and fruits of ſundry ſorts; ſome had alſo gownes of cloth of gold, but not ſo faire as the Turks; and ſome of veluet, but very few of cloth; for that the Perſians had no great plenty either of veluet or yet of cloth, except ſuch as they haue from the Portingals that trauel into thoſe Eaſtern countries; yet of ſilk & wool it appeareth they haue great plenty, moſt part of their gowns being of wooll quilted with bombaſt. After theſe horſemen followed many Perſian footmen, peraduenture all ſeruants; after whom came the Turkiſh horſemen: and laſt of al came a horſe of the embaſſador led by a Perſian; after which horſe followed 200 Ianizaries: and in the rereward of all came the embaſſador alone, gorgiouſly attired both himſelfe and his horſe. He himſelfe was inueſted with crimſon veluet, mingled with ſome other colors: his ſaddle and bridle were all bedeckt with jewels: the capariſon of his horſe, was all imbroidered with Turquoies and other pretious ſtones: the horne vpon the top of his Turbant (which the Turks call Meteuenchia) was altogether wrought with gold, and ſet with pretious ſtones: in briefe, vpon euery part of his body hanged jewels of great price. After the Embaſſadour, followed about 140 Perſian horſemen, and others of his court apparelled as before, ſome well, ſome ill, according to their ability. Now although the Perſians (as is to be thought) ſhewed all their pomp, yet they made nothing ſo faire a ſhew as did the Turks; neither are they ſo faire men of complexion, being for the moſt part of a ſwart and browne color, and rather little men than otherwiſe, not much vnlike to the Spaniards. The embaſſador being departed, the Preſents were all brought and ſhewed to Selymus; who allowed for their ordinary charges 500 ducats a day, for that indeed their number was great and their beaſts many. Theſe expences beſtowed vpon the embaſſadors, do preſently begin as ſoone as any of them enter into his dominions; and end, ſo ſoone as the buſineſſe for which they come is finiſhed. But long it was not, but that this embaſſador hauing concluded a peace betwixt the two great Princes, Tamas and Selymus, & diſpatched ſuch matters as he came for, returned home againe into Perſia. The Venetians alſo now at this ſame time, by their embaſſadors ſought to renue the league they had made with the great Turke, now expired: which as it was eaſily obtained, ſo was it of ſmall aſſurance; Selymus the next yeare quarrelling with them, and raiſing new wars, to the great hurt and diſturbance of that State, as ſhall forthwith appeare.

The Embaſſadours preſent to Selymus.

An honourable allowance.

Selymus now at peace with all the World (a thing of the Turks not much deſired) began to thinke of workes of charity: and purpoſing to build a magnificent temple at Hadrianople for his owne ſepulture, with a Monaſtery, a Colledge, and an Almes-houſe (as had his father, and other his anceſtours before him at Pruſa and Conſtantinople, led thereunto with a vaine and ſuperſtitious deuotion) was troubled with nothing more, than how to endow the ſame with lands and reuenues ſufficient for the maintenance of ſo great a charge: for that the Mahometan Kings, are by their ſuperſtition prohibited to conuert any lands or poſſeſſions

A to ſuch holy vſes, other than ſuch as they haue with their owne ſword won from the enemies of their religion, which they may (as they are perſuaded) as a moſt acceptable ſacrifice, offer to their great Prophet which diueliſh perſuaſion ſerueth as a ſpur to pricke forward euery of thoſe ambitious Princes to adde ſomething to their Empire. This his deuout purpoſe once knowne, wanted not the furtherance of many ripe heads, deuiſing ſome one thing, ſome another, as they thought beſt fitted his humor. But amongſt many things to him preſented, none pleaſed him ſo well, as the plot laid for the taking of the rich Iſland of Cyprus from the Venetians: a conqueſt of it ſelfe ſufficient, both for the eterniſing of his name, and performance of his own charitable works intended; with a large ouerplus, for the ſupplying of whatſoeuer wanted in his fathers like deuout workes at Conſtantinople. But that which moued him moſt B of all, was the glory of ſuch a conqueſt, which as his flatterers bare him in hand, might make him equall with any his predeceſſors; who in the beginning of their reigne, had vſually done or attempted ſome notable thing againſt the Chriſtians. Hereupon the matter was by Selymus propounded to the great Baſſaes to be conſidered of: without whoſe aduiſe and counſell, the Turkiſh Emperors ſeldome or neuer take any great wars in hand. Amongſt theſe graue counſellors, Muhamet the chiefe Viſier Baſſa, a man of greateſt authority (vnto whom Selymus was beholden, that he had ſo quietly obtained the empire) and a ſecret friend vnto the Venetians, ſeemed much to miſlike of that motion, perſuading Selymus not to yeeld thereunto: alledging beſide the danger and vncertainty of the expedition, that his father Solyman at the time of his death had charged him ſtreitly, that the league with the Venetians ſhould be religiouſly kept, C and that he could not with his honour without iuſt cauſe ſo quickly breake the league, which he himſelfe had but a little before moſt ſolemnly confirmed. But Muſtapha the ſecond Baſſa, ſometime Selymus his tutor, and therfore of him much honoured, with Piall Baſſa the Admirall (both enuying at the great honor of the Viſier Baſſa) ſo mightily impugned that he had before ſaid, and ſo importuned Selymus with the ſhew both of honor and profit attending that action, as alſo with the eaſineſſe therof (a great part of the Venetian Arſenall being but a little before burnt, and their forces much weakned) that he rejected the counſell of Muhamet, calling him in his choler, Chriſtian (which among the Mahometans is a word of no ſmal diſgrace:) and yeelding wholly to the perſuaſion of Muſtapha and Piall, preſently cauſed preparation to be made both by ſea and land, for the performance of that his reſolution. Which was not ſo couertly D carried in the Turks court, but that it was diſcouered by M. Antonius Barbarus the Venetian embaſſador; and not without cauſe ſuſpected by the Venetian Merchants, whom the barbarous Turks began now to cut ſhort in their trafficke, looking big vpon them, as men ſuddenly changed, and euill intreated them with hard ſpeeches, the vndoubted ſignes of greater troubles to enſue. The Venetian Embaſſador now out of doubt of the Turks purpoſe for the inuaſion of Cyprus, came vnto Muhamet the chiefe Baſſa, complaining of the breach of the league: and putting him in mind of the fidelity of the Venetian State toward the Turkiſh Emperour; requeſting him, that Selymus might not make too much haſt to begin that war, which would ſet all Europe on a broile; but rather by his embaſſadors firſt to declare his mind to the Senat, for that ſo it might haply come to paſſe, that all might be quieted, to the good of both parts with- E out war. Which the politicke Embaſſador requeſted not of the Baſſa for any hope he had to auert the war, for which the Turke had now all things in readineſſe, but only by ſuch an hope of compoſition, to hinder the Turks endeauors, & to win time, vntil that the State (being fully certified of all theſe matters) might make ready their fleet and forces, and ſo in armes be ready to anſwere their armed foes: neither did he euer leaue the Baſſa, vntill he had by his meanes procured, that one Cubates ſhould be ſent Embaſſador to Venice, to proue the minds of the Senators, whether they would willingly deliuer the Iſland, or aduenture to haue it taken from them by force. Theſe things and ſuch like as were then done at Conſtantinople, being by Letters ſent in poſt from the Embaſſadour, made knowne at Venice, brought a generall heauineſſe vpon the city: for why, that vnderſtanding and prouident State, warned by their F former harmes, of all others moſt dread the Turks forces. Cubates the Embaſſadour accompanied with Aloyſius Barbarus the Embaſſadors ſonne, and Bonricius his Secretary, departing from Conſtantinople, came by long journies to Raguſium, where Angelus Surianus ſent from Venice to meet him, was ready to receiue him; who being taken into his gally, brought him to Venice.

Muhamet Baſſa diſſuadeth Selymus from the inuading of Cyprus.

Selymus ſendeth Cubates his embaſſador to Venice.

In the mean time the Senators ſitting oftentimes in counſell, were diuided in opinibus concerning the chiefe matter they conſulted vpon: ſome there were, that thought it not good to G wage war againſt ſuch an inuincible enemy, nor to truſt vpon a vaine and idle hope, neither to commit all vnto the hazard of ſuch fortune as was vnto them in that war by the enemy propounded: they alledged, That they had alwaies vnfortunatly taken vp armes againſt the Turks, and that therefore they ſhould ſet before their eies, what harmes they had ſuffered, and how that beſide the loſſes already ſuſtained, they had alwaies in the winding vp of the warres loſt ſomething more: that it were better to part with Cyprus, ſo that they might quietly injoy the reſt, rather than to enter into armes: Time they ſaid, would at length giue them ſome one fit occaſion or other to recouer that they had loſt, and to reſtore their ſtate vnto their former honour; which for the preſent, was aboue their power to maintaine: To put their truſt in their H confederats (they ſaid) was but to deceiue themſelues: they ſhould remember how often euen ſmall cauſes of falſe ſuſpition, or hope of profit, or feare of harme, had vtterly fruſtrated and broken in ſunder the moſt ſolemne capitulations of the ſtrongeſt leagues: how often deſtruction had come thence from whence ayd was alwaies to haue bin hoped for, they needed not to ſeeke farther for examples, than from their own domeſticall affaires. Others were of a contrary opinion, as that the Iſland was by force of armes to be defended: ſaying, That nothing could be more diſhonourable, than without fight to depart with ſo notable a part of their ſeigniory; neither any thing more commendable, than to proue all things for defence of their honour; neither would the proud Turks, with whom no aſſured league could be made (as they ſaid) hold themſelues content with this yeelding vp of the Iſland, but by intreating of them I and giuing them way, become more inſolent: and when they had taken Cyprus from them, would alſo ſeeke after Creet & Corcyra, and ſo yeelding them one thing after another, ſpoile themſelues of all together: Ambitious and greedy Princes (they ſaid) grew more bold and inſolent by other mens feare: and that no great or notable matter was to be done without danger: that hard beginnings had oftentimes merry endings: that the fauor and good will of that inſatiable and greedy nation, was not to be gained but with ſo great loſſe and charge as that ſuch a coſtly piece would be much more hurtfull than war it ſelfe: beſide that, it much concerned other Chriſtian Princes to haue the Venetian State preſerued, and that therefore it was to be hoped, that they would to the vttermoſt of their power giue them aid. The matter thus debated too and fro, it was in the end reſolued vpon, to take vp armes in defence of their honour, K and by plaine force to withſtand the Turke.

The Turks embaſſador homely entertained at Venice.

So when Cubates the Turks Embaſſadour came to Venice, neither did any man of curteſie meet him, neither was any honor done vnto him, or ſo much as common courteſie ſhewed vnto him: but being afterward admitted into the Senat houſe with his two interpreters only, he deliuered Selymus his letters, incloſed in a little bag wrought with ſilke and gold; and ſo whilſt the ſame letters were in breaking vp, and tranſlating out of the Turkiſh language into Italian, deliuered alſo his meſſage by word of mouth, as followeth:

What great account the mighty Sultan my dread Soueraigne hath alwaies made of your moſt honourable friendſhip, is therein right well declared; that in the very entrance of himſelfe into his Empire, L he forthwith and without any hard or new conditions renewed his league with you: which he hath on his part alwaies kept moſt faithfully and vnuiolate; worthily grieuing the like kindeneſſe not to be ſhewed on your behalfe, neither the like care of keeping your faith to appeare in you; who by harbouring of Pyrats in your hauens, and murthering of his ſubjects, haue oftentimes broken the league. Which injuries, although they were by war to haue beene reuenged; yet hath he, ſo mighty a monarch, hitherto beene alwaies more mindfull of your honour and friendſhip, than of his owne majeſty and profit. But foraſmuch as there is no end of theſe injuries and wrongs, and that it is now come to that point, That longer to forbeare, might be imputed vnto him rather for cowardiſe than courteſie, as alſo that it much more concerneth your ſtate than him, and that therefore you ought no leſſe than he to deſire, that all cauſes of vnkindneſſe might be cut off, and order token, that in ſo great and mutuall good will, there ſhould be no falling M out by new quarrels dayly ariſing: the only remedy thereof is, if you ſhall deliuer vnto him the Iſland of Cyprus, the cauſe of all theſe grieuances. Now it beſeemeth you for your great wiſedome, to make ſmall reckoning of ſo ſmall a matter, in compariſon of the fauour of ſo great a Prince; which if you willingly of your ſelues yeeld vnto him, you ſhall right wiſely prouide for your affaires, and haue him ſo great a

A monarch alwaies your friend and confederat: whereas if you ſhall ſhew your ſelues obſtinate, and not to yeeld to this his ſo ſmall a requeſt, his purpoſe is, by ſtrong hand not only to take from you the Iſland, the cauſe of the war, but alſo to proſecute you with moſt cruell war both by ſea and land. And therefore I take God to witneſſe, all the blame of the calamities to enſue of ſo mortall a war, to be imputed vnto your ſelues, as the worthy reward of your wilfulneſſe and breach of faith.

Which ſaid, he in the name of Muhamet the Viſier Baſſa told the Senatours, That he was right ſory that this breach was fallen out betwixt the Emperor Selymus and them; and that although he doubted not but that they would right wiſely conſider of all things; yet he could B not for the good will he bare vnto them, but admoniſh them of ſuch things as he deemed for them both profitable and wholeſome: and therefore did moſt inſtantly requeſt them, and withall aduiſe them, not to enter into armes againſt ſo mighty a Prince, neither wilfully to plunge themſelues into ſuch dangers, as they could hardly or neuer find the way out; for that their ſtrength was nothing anſwerable vnto his, and that the euent of that war would be vnto them deadly: and therefore he tooke God and the loue that he bare vnto them to witneſſe, that he had in friendly ſort forewarned them of their harms, and aduiſed them for their good. Giuing them further to vnderſtand, that Selymus did nothing but thunder out moſt cruell threats againſt their State; which his indignation was raiſed of the manifold complaints brought againſt them to his court at Conſtantinople.

C Selymus his letters anſwerable to his Embaſſadours ſpeech, was alſo full of falſe ſurmiſed grieuances; he complained, That the Venetians had in warlike maner entred into the frontiers of his Empire in Dalmatia, and there had don great harme; that they had put to death certain Turkiſh pyrats whom they had taken aliue: that the Iſland of Cyprus was an harbor for the pyrats of the Weſt, and that from thence they robbed his peaceable countries, & ſurpriſed his ſubjects trauelling that way for deuotion vnto the Temple of Mecha, or otherwiſe about their affaires. And that therefore thoſe cauſes of diſcord might be taken away, and the hinderance of trafficke remoued, he required them to yeeld vnto him the Iſland of Cyprus: which if they refuſed to do, he would by force of armes take it from them, and by force of ſtrong hand cauſe them to do that which they might the better haue done frankly and of their owne accord, and D further, to make them vnderſtand how far the Turks did excell all other men in martial prowesse. As for the league before made betwixt his father and them, he ſaid he had renewed the ſame, not becauſe he had any liking thereunto, but becauſe he had as then ſet downe with himſelfe, for a while in the beginning of his Empire peaceably to endure all things.

The Venetians, for that they knew the Embaſſadours errand before his comming, hauing now read his Letters, gaue him ſuch anſwer as they had before reſolued vpon: which was, That the Venetians had at al times inuiolably kept their leagues with the Othoman Emperors, and had in regard thereof let ſlip many opportunities and fit occaſions for them to haue augmented their dominions in: That they could without any danger to themſelues, haue deſtroied the Turks fleet both at the Rhodes and Malta, and other places alſo; but that they more re-E garded their honour; and alwaies thought, that nothing better became great and magnificent Princes, than to performe their faith once giuen, and in all their actions to be like themſelues. And therfore had diſſembled and put vp many grieuous and bitter indignities, leſt they might be thought to haue firſt broken the league: That they had neuer paſſed their owne bounds, or inuaded the Turks; only to haue taken order, that no pyrats ſhould at their pleaſure roame vp and downe the ſeas. Now whereas all duties being on their parts ſincerely and moſt religiouſly kept; Selymus complained himſelfe to be wronged, whereas he himſelfe had done the wrong, and had contrary to the league, denounced war againſt them, expecting nothing leſſe; ſithence that they could not by the power of the league, they would by force of armes defend that Kingdome, which they by antient and lawfull right poſſeſſed, deliuered vnto them by F their Anceſtors. That God, in whoſe helpe they truſted, would weigh in indifferent balance, all mens words and deeds; whom they tooke to witneſſe, that they were the authors of peace, and Selymus the cauſe of warre: and that the ſame God would be now preſent vnto their juſt complaints, and forthwith after with his power to take reuenge on them, which falſifying their faith and promiſe giuen, and violating the ſacred league, had enforced them to take vp moſt juſt and neceſſary armes, which they would with the ſame courage mannage, that they had taken them in hand.

The reſolution of the Senat for war diuerſly liked, and diſliked of others.

With this anſwer the Embaſſador departed, let out by a ſecret poſtern, for feare of the people; who hauing got knowledge of the matter, were in great number aſſembled to the Court gate, muttering among themſelues, that it were wel don to rend in pieces that accurſed Turke, the meſſenger of his faithleſſe Maſter. Which outrage it was thought they would in their fury haue performed, had not ſuch as by the commandement of the magiſtrats garded him, better aſſured him of his ſafety, than either regard of duty or the law of nations; he by the way as he went ſtill ſtorming, and ſwearing by his Mahomet to be of that ſo great an indignity reuenged. This anſwer of the Senat vnto the Turks Embaſſador concerning war, was of ſome well liked and highly commended, as full of honour and valour. Others deemed it too ſharpe, liking of nothing that was ſaid or don to the further incenſing of the Turkiſh Emperor: being of opinion, that they might haue of him obtained a more indifferent peace by curteſie, than by rigor. As for the decreed war, they vtterly diſliked, foraſmuch as all wars were wofull, but eſpecially thoſe that were to be maintained againſt them that are too ſtrong for vs. In ſuch diuerſitie of opinions it appeared, That the Senat ſhould of that ſo honorable a decree reap ſuch commendation, as the euent therof ſhould afford (than which nothing is more vnreaſonable) if things fell out well, then was it wiſely and worthily done; if otherwiſe, then was it like to be reputed a fooliſh, a raſh, and wofull reſolution.

The Emperour, the French king and the king of Polonia intangled with their leagues, refuſed to aid the Venetians againſt the Turks.

what Chriſtian Princes promiſed to aid the Venetians.

The greater the danger was now feared from the angry Turke, the more carefull were the Venetians of their State: wherefore they forthwith ſent meſſengers with letters vnto the Gouernors of Cyprus, charging them with all carefulneſſe and diligence to make themſelues ready to withſtand the Turke, and to raiſe what power they were able in the Iſland, not omitting any thing that might concerne the good of the ſtate: and at the ſame time made choiſe of their moſt valiant & expert captains both by ſea and land, vnto whom they committed the defence of their diſperſed Seigniory, with the leading of their forces. Hieronimus Zanius was appointed Admirall, Lucas Michael was ſent into Creet, Franciſcus Barbarus into Dalmatia, Sebaſtianus Venerius into Corcyra, all men of great honour, experience and valour. Other meaner captains were alſo ſent with leſſe charge into the aforeſaid places, as Eugenius Zinglitus a noble gentleman with 1000 footmen into Cyprus, who had alſo the leading of all the horſemen in the Iſland: after whom County Martinengus promiſed to follow with 2000 footmen moe. The ſtrong cities were now by the Venetians in al places new fortified, armor, ordnance, and victuall prouided, aud whatſoeuer els they thought needfull for defence of their State. And foraſmuch as they well knew they had to do with too mighty an enemy, they by their Embaſſadors ſent for that purpoſe, earneſtly ſolicited moſt of the Chriſtian Princes to joyne with them in league, and to giue them aid againſt the common enemy, who as he was too ſtrong for any one of them, ſo were he not able to ſtand againſt their vnited forces. But the Emperor Maximilian excuſed himſelfe by the league he had not long before made with the Turke for eight yeares, which he ſaid he might not breake: yet he had before his eies a moſt pregnant example, what ſmall reckoning the Turke made of his faith and league, which he without any juſt cauſe had broken with the Venetians. The like excuſe vſed alſo Charles the French King, and Sigiſmund King of Polonia; who both ſeemed to be very ſorry for that the Venetians were fallen out with the Turke, but could not help them, for that they were in league with the Turkiſh Emperor. Neuertheleſſe the French King did them the curteſie, to offer himſelfe to be a mediator, if they ſo pleaſed, betwixt them and Selymus. The yong King of Portingall Don Sebaſtian pretended alſo for his excuſe the great plague which had but a little before raged in his kingdome, and much diminiſhed his people; as alſo that he was to maintaine wars by ſea againſt the Turks in the Eaſt-Indies, to the no leſſe benefit of the Chriſtian commonweale, than if he ſhould aid the Venetians in the Mediterranean. Only Pius Quintus then Pope, and Philip king of Spaine, with certaine of the Princes of Italy; namely, Philebert Duke of Sauoy, Guido Vbaldus Duke of Vrbin, Coſmus Medices Duke of Florence, and the Knights of Malta, promiſed them aid, which they afterward moſt honourably performed.

Selymus of himſelfe angry with the Venetians, and firme in his reſolution for the conqueſt of Cyprus, was vpon the report of Cubates his Embaſſadors bad entertainment at Venice, further inraged: he deemed the Majeſty of the Turkiſh Emperor contemned, and himſelfe in the perſon

A perſon of his Embaſſador diſgraced: ſeeing that they whom he had thought would haue yeelded vnto any thing, rather than the league ſhould haue bin broken, had ſent him ſuch a ſhort anſwer, and ſo contemptuouſly vſed his embaſſador, vnto whom they had not afforded ſo much as common curteſie. It did not a little moue him alſo, that the Venetians had in their letters ſent by his embaſſador, omitted the glorious titles vſually giuen the Turkiſh Emperors: wherfore in ſome part to ſatisfie his angry mood, he cauſed Marcus Antonius Barbarus the Venetian Embaſſador, and all the Chriſtian Merchants of the Weſt thorowout his Empire, to be clapt vp in priſon, and their ſhips ſtaied vnder an arreſt. And ſetting all other things apart, ſet himſelfe wholly for the preparing of ſuch things as ſhould be needfull for the intended war.

But foraſmuch as the Iſland of Cyprus was the prey whereafter the greedy tyrant ſo much B gaped, and for which the bloudy wars betwixt the Turke and the Venetians, with their Chriſtian confederats, preſently enſued; it ſhal not be from our purpoſe to ſpend a few words in the deſcribing thereof, as the ſtage whereon the bloudy tragedy following was as it were acted: as alſo how it came firſt into the hands of the Venetians, and by what right of them ſo long poſſeſſed (although it be in ſome part before declared) vntill it was now by Selymus the Great Turke, againſt all right iniurioully demanded, & at length by ſtrong hand wreſted from them. This Iſland lies in the fartheſt part of the Cilician ſea: it hath on the Eaſt Siria, on the Weſt Pamphilia, Southward it regardeth Ægypt, and Northward Cilicia, now called Caramania. It is worthily accounted among the greateſt Iſlands of the Mediterranian, containing in circuit 427 miles, and is in length (after the deſcription of Strabo) 175 miles, and in bredth not C aboue 65. It aboundeth with corne, wine, oyle, cotton wooll, ſaffron, hony, roſin, turpentine, ſugar canes, and whatſoeuer els is needfull for the ſuſtentation of man, whereof it ſends forth great abundance to other countries, of whom it craueth no helpe again. It was in antient time called Macaria, that is to ſay, bleſſed. The people therin generally liued ſo at eaſe and pleaſure, that thereof the Iſland was dedicated to Venus, who was there eſpecially worſhipped, & therof called Cypria. Marcellinus to ſhew the fertility thereof, ſaith, That Cyprus aboundeth with ſuch plenty of al things, that without the helpe of any other foraine country, it is of it ſelf able to build a tall ſhip from the keele to the top ſaile, and ſo put it to ſea furniſhed of all things needfull. And Sextus Rufus writing thereof, ſaith, Cyprus famoſa diuitijs paupertatem populi Romani, vt occuparetur ſolicitauit, ita vt jus ejus inſulæ auarius magis quam injuſtius ſimus aſſecuti: ſc. Cy-D prus famous for wealth, allured the pouerty of the people of Rome to lay hold vpon it, ſo that we haue rather couetouſly than juſtly got the Rule thereof. In the heart of the Iſland ſtandeth Nicoſia, ſometime the regall and late metropoliticall city thereof. And in the Eaſt end therof Famaguſta, ſometime called Tamaſſus, a famous rich city, the chiefe and only port of all that moſt pleaſant Iſland. Other faire cities there be alſo, as Paphos, Amathus (now called Limiſſo) and Cyrene. This Iſland of it ſelf long time maintained the majeſty of a kingdome, as then when Richard the firſt, King of England, paſſing that way with his fleet for the reliefe of the Chriſtians then diſtreſſed in the Holy land about the yere 1191, was prohibited there to land; and certain of his people by force of tempeſt there caſt on ſhore, were by the Cypriots either cruelly ſlaine or taken priſoners: which barbarous violence king Richard tooke in ſo euill part, E that he there by force landed his army, and reſted not vntill he had taken Iſaac the King priſoner, and ſubdued the Iſland. The king he ſent in chains of ſiluer to Tripolis, there to be kept in cloſe priſon; the kingdome he kept a while in his owne hand, which not long after he gaue, or as ſome ſay exchanged with Guido the titular King of Ieruſalem: for which cauſe the Kings of England for certain time afterwards were honored with the title of the Kings of Ieruſalem. This kingdome by many diſcents came at length to Ianus ſon of King Peter, who in the yeare 1231, was by Melechel a Sultan of Ægypt taken priſoner; but afterwards for the ranſome of 115000 Sultanins was ſet at liberty and reſtored to his kingdome, paying vnto the Sultan and his ſucceſſors a yerely tribute of 40000 crownes. This Ianus left a ſon called Iohn, who after the death of his father maried the daughter of the Marquis of Mont-ferrat: after whoſe death, F he married one Helena of the moſt noble houſe of the Paleologi in Gr[illegible]cia, by whom he had one only daughter called Carlotte; but by another woman a baſe ſon called Iames. This King Iohn was a man of no courage, altogether giuen to pleaſure, and according to the maner of his effeminat education, ſhewed himſelf in all things more like a woman than a man: which Helena his wife, a woman of a great ſpirit, quickly perceiuing, tooke vpon her the ſoueraignty and whole gouernment of the Realme, gracing and diſgracing whom ſhe pleaſed, and promoting to the Eccleſiaſticall dignities ſuch as ſhe beſt liked; aboliſhing the Latine ceremonies, and bringing in them of the Greekes, and tooke ſuch further order as pleaſed her ſelfe in matters of ſtate concerning both peace and warre; her husband in the meane time regarding nothing but his vaine pleaſure: wherby it came to paſſe that all was brought into the power of the Greeks the queenes friends. Now the queene her ſelfe was much ruled by the counſell of her nurſe, and the nurſe by her daughter: ſo that the people would commonly ſay, The daughter ruled the nurſe, the nurſe the queene, and the queene the king. The nobility aſhamed and weary of this manner of gouernment, by generall conſent of the people, ſent for Iohn the king of Portingals couſin german (whom ſome call the king of Portingall) to whom they gaue Carlotte the kings daughter in marriage, with full power to ſupply that want of gouernment which was in king Iohn his father in law. He taking the authority into his hands, quickly reformed the diſordred kingdome, as well in matters concerning religion, as ciuile policy. The Latine ceremonies were againe reſtored, and the gouernment of the daughter, the nurſe, and the Queene, brought to an end. But the miſchieuous daughter doubting the countenance of the yong king perſuaded her mother, as ſhe tendred her own life, to poiſon the King. Which thing the wretched woman (by the conſent of the queene mother, as was reported) in ſhort time performed, and ſo brought that noble prince, wel worthy longer life, vnto his vntimely end: whereby the gouernment was again reſtored vnto the Greeke queen, who in the name of her weake husband commanded again at her pleaſure. But aboue all, the nurſe and the daughter inſulted vpon the yong queene Carlotte: which ſhe not well brooking, grieuouſly complained thereof to Iames her baſe brother, requiring his helpe for redreſſe thereof: who not long after ſlew the nurſes daughter, not ſo much in reuenge of the wrong by her done vnto his ſiſter, as to prepare a way for himſelfe for the obtaining of the kingdome: grieuing inwardly, that ſhe or her husband ſhould be preferred before himſelfe. Which thing Helena the queene quickly perceiuing, perſuaded the King her husband to cauſe his baſe ſon to enter into the order of prieſthood, and ſo to become a Church-man, thereby to cut off all his hope of aſpiring vnto the kingdome: which the king at her inſtance did, and made him Archbiſhop of Nicoſia. In the meane time Carlotte by the perſuaſion of her mother and the nobility of the country, married Lewis ſon to the duke of Sauoy: who being for that purpoſe ſent for, came with all ſpeed to Cyprus. After that, the queene mother and the old nurſe (deſirous nothing more, than to reuenge the death of of the nurſes daughter, vpon Iames now Archbiſhop) deuiſed firſt how to thruſt him out of all his ſpirituall promotions, which were great, and afterward quite baniſh him the kingdom. Hereupon the queene wrote letters againſt him to the Pope, to haue him degraded, for that he being a man baſe borne, with his hands imbrued with guiltleſſe bloud, was vnworthy of holy orders. Which letters by chance came to Iames his hands: who inraged therewith, accompanied with a number of his friends and fauourits, ſuddenly entred the court, ſlew ſuch of his enemies as he found there, diuided their goods amongſt his followers, and as king poſſeſſed himſelfe of the regall city. In this broile the Greeke queene Helena died, and ſhortly after her husband alſo. All things being thus in a hurley and out of order, certaine of the nobility for redreſſe thereof, ſent for Lewis the husband of Carlotte, as for him to whom that kingdome in the right of his wife moſt iuſtly belonged: who vpon his arriuall was of all ſorts of men ioyfully receiued & welcommed as their king. Iames the vſurper vnderſtanding before of the comming of Lewis, and perceiuing the inclination of the people towards him, fled with diuers of his friends to Alexandria to craue aid of the Ægyptian Sultan: in whoſe court he found ſuch fauour, as that he was by the Sultans commandement royally apparelled and honoured with the title of the king of Cyprus, which he promiſed for euer to hold of the Sultans of Ægypt as their vaſſal and tributary. At which time the Sultan alſo by his embaſſadors commanded Lewis to depart the Iſle: who by all means ſought to haue pacified the Sultan, declaring vnto him his rightfull title, yet offering to pay vnto him the wonted tribute, and to allow vnto Iames a yerely penſion of 10000 duckats during his life. But all in vaine; for Iames ſtill preſent in the Sultans court, and wiſely following his owne ſuit, at laſt concluded with the great Sultan (who thought it more honour to make a king, than to confirme a king) and receiuing of him a great army, returned into Cyprus: where in ſhort time he ſo diſtreſſed Lewis, that he was glad to forſake the Iſland, with his wife, and to return into his country, leauing the kingdome of Cyprus again to Iames: who now by the ſupportation of the Ægyptian Sultan poſſeſſed therof, yet liued not without care of Carlotte & her husband Lewis, whom he knew the Cipriots wonderfully affected. Wherfore for the more aſſurance of his eſtate, he thought it beſt to joine in league and friendſhip with the Venetians, whom he knew to be of great power at ſea, and of all other fitteſt to croſſe whatſoeuer Lewis ſhould in the right of his wife attempt againſt him. Which league he afterwards made, and the better to confirme the ſame, tooke to wife Catherin Cornelia, the daughter of Marcus Cornelius a Magnifico of Venice, being before adopted to the Senat, and euer after their reputed daughter. Not long after this marriage, Iames died in the yere 1470, leauing the Queene great with child, who in due time was deliuered of a faire ſon; vnto whom with the mother the Venetian State became tutors, as their adoptiue fathers, & in their behalfe tooke vpon them the gouernment of the realme. This childe ſhortly after died alſo, not without ſome ſuſpition of poiſon; after whoſe death great troubles aroſe in the kingdom, inſomuch that Andreas Cornelius the queens vncle, a moſt graue counſellour, and gouernour of the Realme vnder the queene, was by the conſpiracy of certaine noble men ſlaine, and all the Iſland ready to reuolt from the queene. For appeaſing of which troubles, the Venetians were glad oftentimes to ſend their admirals with their gallies into Cyprus, to take order in the matter, and to aid the queene: who at length perſuaded by George Cornelius her brother, whileſt it was yet in her power, as a louing daughter to yeeld vp the kingdom vnto her adoptiue fathers, which ſhe deſtitute both of counſell and power, could not long hold ſo far from her friends, beſet on the one ſide with the Great Turke, and on the other with the mighty Sultan of Ægypt: She, I ſay, thus perſuaded by her brother, came to Venice, where ſhe was with the greateſt honor that could be deuiſed, receiued by the Duke & whole State at ſea in their great and goodly ſhip the Beucentaure, and ſo with all royall triumph brought thorow the midſt of the city vnto the place moſt richly for the time appointed for the receiuing of her: where ſhortly after, attired in all her royall habiliments ſhe came in great Maieſty vnto the Senat houſe, and there before the tribunal ſeat of Auguſtinus Barbadicus then Duke of Venice, laied downe her crowne and ſcepter, and as a moſt louing daughter reſigned vp her kingdome, to the great honor and profit of her country. Thus the kingdome of Cyprus was deliuered into the hands of the Venetians in the yeare 1473; which they peaceably held from that time, paying vnto the Sultan of Ægypt ſuch tribute as had the late King Iames: which yearely tribute they in like manner payed vnto the Turkiſh Emperors, after that the kingdome of Ægypt was by Selymus the firſt conquered in the yeare 1517, as due vnto him by law of Armes: with which yearely tribute both Selymus himſelfe, and Solyman after him, held themſelues well contented. But now this Turkiſh Emperour Selymus the ſecond, of whom we ſpeake, deſirous both of the honour of ſuch a conqueſt, and of ſo rich a prey, made no account of the accuſtomed tribute, but of the fruitfull Iſland it ſelfe: whereof he, as is before declared, hath by his Embaſſadour made a proud demand, but is thereof denied by the Senat.

Sabellic. Enne. ad. 10. lib. 8.

Selymus throughly furniſhed with all things neceſſary for the inuaſion of Cyprus, in the beginning of February ſent a great power both of horſe and foot into Epirus, and the frontiers of Dalmatia, to forrage the Venetian territory, eſpecially about Iadera; of purpoſe by that war ſo neere at home, to withdraw them from the defence of Cyprus ſo far off. About the middle of Aprill following he ſent Piall Baſſa with fourescore gallies and thirty gallions to keepe the Venetians form ſending aid into Cyprus. This Piall was an Hungarian, borne of baſe parents, but turning Turke, and giuing himſelfe to armes, was firſt preferred for his valor ſhewed againſt the Chriſtians at Zerbi, and afterward by many degrees riſe to the honour of one of the greateſt Baſſa's. He departing from Conſtantinople, and cutting thorow Peloponeſus and Helleſpontus, came to Euboea, and there for certaine daies lay in ſuch order, as if he ſhould haue preſently giuen the enemy battell: but vnderſtanding by his eſpials, that the Venetians grieuouſly viſited with the plague, and ſlowly relieued by their friends, were not like in haſte to come out, he took his courſe to Tenos an Iſland of the Venetians, to haue taken it from them. This Iſland is one of the Cyclades, and was by nature ſtrong, but ſtronger by the induſtry of the defendants, who liuing far from the Chriſtian countries, and compaſſed about with ſuch cruell and warlike enemies, as people far diſtant ſtood in dread of, could neuer for any feare or danger be remoued from the Chriſtian religion, or induced to ſubmit themſelues to the Turks gouernment, as moſt of the other Iſlands had. Piall here landing his forces, fought both by faire meanes and foule to haue perſuaded the Inhabitants to haue yeelded vp the Towne: but when he could get nothing of them but foule words againe, G he began by force to aſſault the ſame. Two daies the Towne was valiantly both aſſaulted and defended: but at length the Turks perceiuing how little they preuailed, and that the defendants were reſolutely ſet downe for the defence of themſelues and their Country; ſhamefully gaue ouer the aſſault, and abandoning the Iſland, directed their courſe toward Cyprus. For Muſtapha authour of that expedition (for his antient hatred againſt the Chriſtians made Generall by Selymus) had before appointed Piall Baſſa at a time prefixed to meet him at the Rhodes; and that he that came thither firſt ſhould tarry for the other, that ſo they might together ſaile into Cyprus.

Muſtapha hauing before ſent a great part of his army by land into Pamphilia, embarqued H the reſt with Haly Baſſa Generall of the forces at ſea, who yet ſtaied for him with the reſt of the fleet at Conſtantinople. This Haly was one of the chiefe Baſſa's, a man of great account, and ſometime an eſpeciall and noted follower of Muhamet Baſſa; but now (as it is oftentimes elſewhere ſeene, that men together with the change of fortune, change their minds and affections alſo) was become a great fauorite of Muſtapha. Now to colour ſo manifeſt a wrong and breach of the Turks faith, Muſtapha the Generall, according to the Turkiſh manner, a little before his arriuall in Cyprus, gaue the Venetians there to vnderſtand by letters of his comming, as alſo of his purpoſe for the taking of that Iſland from them: for that without ſome ſuch ſlender denouncing of war vnto them againſt whom it is intended, the Turks generally account their expeditions not to be altogether ſo lawfull or fortunate as otherwiſe; and therefore writ vnto I them in this ſort:

Muſtapha Baſſa, vnto the Venetians.

Muſtapha Baſſa his Letters vnto the Venetians.

THat the Kingdome of Cyprus by antient right belongeth vnto the kingdome of Ægypt, you are not ignorant; which being conquered by the Turks, is together with it become of right a part alſo of the Othoman Empire: that Iſland we come to challenge, leading after vs two hundred thouſand valiant ſoldiers: vnto which power, and the wealth of the Othoman Kingdomes (all which, the moſt mighty Emperor is about, if need ſhall be, to ſend thither, and to bend his whole ſtrength thereon) all the united forces of the Chriſtian Kings are not comparable; much leſſe the Venetians, ſo ſmall a part of Europe, forſaken K of their friends, can ſuffice. Wherefore we will and exhort you, for the antient amity which hath beene betwixt your State and the victorious Othoman Family, to yeeld this kingdome vnto the moſt puiſſant Emperour, whoſe very name is become dreadfull to all the nations of the World; and quietly and without reſiſtance to leaue the Iſland, with the loue and friendſhip of ſo great a Monarch to be for euer inuiolably kept betweene him and you. Whereas if you ſhall before ſuch wholeſome counſell, fondly prefer your vaine hopes, you are to expect all the calamities of war, with ſuch dreadfull examples as the angry Conquerours vſe to make of their vanquiſhed enemies. For reſolution whereof, we yet giue you halfe a moneths ſpace to bethinke your ſelues in: and ſo fare you well.

All this being now in readineſſe, and a moſt royall gally of wonderfull greatneſſe and beau- L ty by the appointment of Selymus prepared for the great Baſſa the Generall; he together with Haly Baſſa and the reſt of the fleet departed from Conſtantinople the ſix & twentieth of May, and at the Rhodes met with Piall, as he had before appointed. The whole fleet at that time conſiſted of two hundred gallies, amongſt whom were diuers galliots, and ſmall men of war, with diuers other veſſels prepared for the tranſportation of horſes: with this fleet Muſtapha kept on his courſe for Cyprus.

The Turks fleet deſcried in Cyprus.

They of the Iſland in the meane time carefully attending the enemies comming, from their watch-towers firſt diſcouered their fleet at the Weſt end of the Iſland, not far from Paphos: from whence the Turks turning vpon the right hand, and paſſing the promontory Curio, now called Del Le Gate, landed diuers of their men, who burnt and ſpoiled certaine villages, and with ſuch ſpoile and priſoners as they had taken, returned again M vnto the fleet; which holding on their former courſe, came at length to a place called Salina (of the abundance of ſalt there made) where they knew was beſt landing, and there in an open roade came to an anchor, where the Baſſa's without any reſiſtance vpon a plaine ſhore landed their army.

The Turks land in Cyprus.

Now

A Now all the hope of the Chriſtians, was to haue kept the Turks from landing, which they ſhould with all their ſtrength and power haue done; neither was it a matter of any great difficulty, for had the defendants but kept the ſhore, and from the dry and firme land valiantly repulſed their enemies, they might vndoubtedly with their ſhot and weapons haue kept them from landing, or els had done them greater harme: knowing in the mean time, that in all the Iſland was no good harbour for them to put into, and that riding in an open road ſubiect to al wind and weather, they could not long without danger of ſhipwracke ride it out: but they either terrified with the greatneſſe of the fleet, or preuented by the celerity of the enemy, to their great hurt omitted ſo faire an oportunity, as the wofull ſequell of the matter declared.
It exceedingly incouraged the Turks that they had ſo eaſily footed the Iſland, which they B thought they ſhould not haue done without a bloudy fight.

The Baſſa now landed, preſently intrenched his army, and forthwith ſent the fleet to tranſport the reſt of his forces out of Pamphilia into the Iſland. And at the ſame time ſent out certaine ſcouts to take ſome priſoners, of whom they might learne the ſcituation of the country, the beſt waies to paſſe them with his army, the ſtrength of his enemies, and what they did, and many other ſuch like things which it concerned him to know. But the greateſt queſtion among the Turks themſelues was, Whether they ſhould firſt ſet vpon Famaguſta or Nicoſia? Famaguſta ſtandeth low, altogether ſubiect to the ſcorching heat, which was then great, according as the time of the yeare, and nature of the country required: wherefore the Baſſa for feare of diſeaſes to ariſe in his army of the immoderate heat and vnwholeſome ſcituation of the place, C thought it better to begin his wars with the ſiege of Nicoſſa, and to make that city the ſeat of the war, for the conqueſt of the reſt of the Iſland. So hauing put all things in order, and well viewed the country, and finding nothing he needed to ſtand in doubt of, he ſet forward with his army toward Nicoſſa, which was about thirty miles diſtant, being the chiefe and richeſt city of all the Iſland. Which way ſoeuer the army marched, it ſpread a great deale of ground; and the neerer it came, the greater was the ſlaughter of the country people, and the number of priſoners taken of all ſorts. But when news of the enemies approch was brought into the city, a generall feare preſaging future miſery poſſeſſed the hearts of all men. There was not in the city any valiant or renowned captaine, who as the danger of the time required, ſhould haue taken vpon him the charge: neither any ſtrong army in the Iſland to oppoſe againſt the enemy: D the Gouernor of the city was one Nicholaus Dandulus, a man too weake for ſo great a burthen, who alwaies brought vp in ciuile affaires, was to ſeek how to defend a ſiege. Of the citiſens and country people he had taken vp foure thouſand footmen, and a thouſand horſmen, all raw ſoldiers, commanded by the gentlemen of the country, men of all others moſt courteous; but as well the captaines as the ſouldiers, as men brought vp in a plentifull country, fitter for pleaſure than for war. The greateſt hope and ſtrength of the city, was repoſed in twelue hundred Italian footmen, and ſix hundred horſemen. The whole number of the ſouldiers in garriſon for defence of the city, was deemed about 8000 horſe and foot: too weake a company againſt ſo fierce and ſtrong an enemy; and the more, for that the Baſſa an old and moſt expert Generall was there in perſon himſelfe preſent, a moſt ſeuere and abſolute commander, whom E it would haue beene a hard matter to haue withſtood with equall power. The Venetians had euer had great care of the Iſland of Cyprus, as lying far from them, in the midſt of the ſworne enemies of the Chriſtian religion, and had therefore oftentimes determined to haue fortified the ſame: yet fearing therby to ſeeme to diſtruſt or dread the Turks, and ſo giue them occaſion of offence, left it ſtill vndone. This city of Nicoſſa ſtandeth in the middeſt of the Iſland, in a plaine and champaine country, compaſſed round with a wall, as if it had been drawne with a compaſſe, and is in circuit about fiue miles: for the maner of the ſcituation, and magnificent buildings, aswell publique as priuat, many haue compared it vnto the beautifull city of Florence in Italy: and was for the wholeſome and commodious ſcituation thereof notably peopled.
This city had the Venetians of late fortified with new wals, thicke rampiers, and eleuen F ſtrong bulwarkes, according to the manner of the fortification of our time, and had raiſed three great fortreſſes for defence of the wall, which they furniſhed with a ſtrong garriſon, great ſtore of artillery, and other warlike prouiſion. Neuertheleſſe, they found by experience in this war, That fortifications are ſtrengthened by the defendants, rather than the defendants by the fortifications.

Nicholaus Dandulus Gouernour of Nicoſia.

The deſcription of Nicoſia.

The Turks beſiege Nicoſia.

Nicoſia battred and aſſaulted, & by the Chriſtians valiantly defended.

The 22 of Iuly, the Baſſa with his army incamped within a mile & a halfe of the city, when preſently the Turks by troups iſſuing out of the campe, rid contemptuouſly before the walls and gates of the city, and with often and loud outcries vpbraided the defendants: which by them being anſwered with ſilence, was taken as a token of their feare. And Muſtapha himſelfe comming as neere as he might without danger, tooke full view of the wals and ſcituation of the city. Shortly after, the enemy drew neerer vnto the city into a more open plaine, and with their tents filled the lower part of the hill, which they call Mandia: but the Baſſa's tent they ſet aloft vpon the hill, to the terrour of the defendants and incouragement of the Turks. The campe being fortified, the Turks with incredible labour and celerity brought their trenches from far, and at the firſt caſt vp ſome few forts, but afterwards, as their army increaſed, many mo; which they raiſed ſo high, that they ouertopped the wals of the city, and made the place more dangerous for the Chriſtians to defend. There hauing placed 70 great pieces of battery, they began to batter the city both day and night without intermiſſion; with ſuch an horrible thundring, that the earth trembled, the houſes ſhooke as if they would haue fallen down: at which time many were ſlaine, both with the deadly ſhot, and the broken pieces of ſtones beaten out of the wals: neuer was ſuch a feare as then within the city of Necoſia: euery day the enemy brought his trenches neerer and neerer, and reſted not vntill he had with reſtleſſe labour brought them vnto the very brim of the towne ditch, which the citiſens before the comming of the Turks had not well ſcoured. Being come ſo nigh, they firſt skirmiſhed a farre off with their ſmall pieces: but afterwards, they not onely battered the walls with their great artillery, but with ſmall ſhot, arrowes, and ſtones, ouerwhelmed the defendants, as if it had bin a ſhower of haile; ſo to haue driuen them from off the wall and rampires. In few daies, not only all the curtaines betwixt three of the bulwarks, was by the fury of the great ordnance beaten downe; but all places thereabout lay full of the dead bodies of the aſſailants and defendants. For although the Chriſtians fought at great diſaduantage, both for the number of men, and indifferency of the place: yet deſperation ioyned with extreame neceſſity, of all other the greateſt weapon, gaue them ſuch courage, as with ſhot, ſtones, timber, and ſuch like, to keep down their enemies, and defend their wals; and oftentimes to make great ſlaughter of them, with their artillery & murthering pieces, bent vpon them as at a certain marke, who the thicker they ſtood the greater was their harme. They alſo oftentimes diſmounted many of the great pieces and made them vnſeruiceable, and with feather beds and ſacks of cotton, wool, made vp their breaches: which the Turks labored again to burn with pitch barrels, and earthen pots full of wild fire. After long fight the Turks entring the ditch, made themſelues two waies to the walls, which they fortified on both ſides with faggots & earth; in ſuch ſort, as that they were ſafe from the loupes of the bulwarks which flankered the ditch. All this quickly performed, ſome preſently ſet vp ſcaling ladders: others filled the ditches with rubbiſh, wood, faggots, & earth; and others in the meane time with mattocks and leauers were digging down the foundations of the bulwarkes Conſtance and Padocatera, taking name of them that had the chiefe charge in the building therof. The Chriſtians right valiantly endured the firſt aſſault of the enemy, and ſtrucke downe dead into the ditches many of them that were climing vp the ladders: and had in ſhort time ſlain mo than they were themſelues in number, and inforced the reſt to giue ouer the aſſault. Theſe things were done in the beginning of the ſiege, whilſt yet both parties were ſtrong: in which hard conflicts a great number of ſoldiers were loſt, and moſt of the canoniers ſlain. After this aſſault, both parties for a while buſied themſelues and ſpent their time in their ingenious deuiſes: wherein it appeared that the Turks were much cunninger in deuiſing of meanes to take the city, than were thoſe Chriſtians in defending the ſame.

Now had the Venetians in the firſt motions of theſe warres, praied aid of diuers Chriſtian Princes, from moſt part of whom they receiued but cold comfort, as is before declared: yet now at length (though ſomewhat late) they had drawn into the confederation of this war, the Pope and the King of Spain: by whoſe example ſome other princes of Italy moued, put to alſo their helping hands. The Venetians, as they whom the matter moſt concerned, had in good time put their fleet to ſea, but knowing themſelues too weake to encounter the Turks, they lay ſtill vpon the coaſt of Dalmatia, about Iadera, expecting the comming of the Spaniſh Admirall with his gallies. Two moneths (wherein much might haue been done) were now paſt in this expedition, and yet no newes of his comming: ſo that what the ſpeed and induſtry of the

Venetians

A Venetians had well prepared, was by the delay and lingering of the Spaniards, marred. Beſides that, the plague began to ariſe in the fleet, lying ſo long in one place; which at length grew ſo hot, that many of the gallies had neither marriner nor ſouldier left in them: neither did this mortality ſo ceaſe, vntill there were twenty thouſand dead thereof; amongſt whom were many noble gentlemen of great account, which might haue done their country good ſeruice, had they been in time imploied.

Summer now almoſt halfe ſpent, and the plague well ceaſed, the Venetian Admirall weary of expecting of the comming of Auria the Spaniſh Admirall; gathering together his fleet which he had before diſperſed to auoid the infection, ſailed to Corcyra, where he met with Venerius, another of the Venetian commanders, who there ſtaid for him, hauing but a little be-B fore taken from the Turks Ceſtria, now called Suppoto, a town vpon the ſea coaſt ouer againſt Corcyra. The whole fleet of the Venetians being aſſembled together, was an hundred and ſe-uenteene ſaile, amongſt which were 12 great galeaſſes; but all too weake to giue battell to the Turks, as being themſelues ſtronger in ſhipping than in men. Neuertheleſſe, the Admirall ſorry and weary to ſee the ſpoile of the Venetian territory, and moued with the diſtreſſe of the beſieged in Nicoſia, rather than for any hope he had with that ſtrength to do any good againſt the Turks fleet, departed from Corcyra towards Creet, and the twelfth of Auguſt landed at Suda, a port of that Iſland. In the latter end of this month, Columnius the Popes Admirall, and Auria Admirall for the king of Spaine, arriued there alſo, whom the Venetian Admirall wel-commed with great joy and triumph. The whole fleet of the confederat Princes now at length C met together, conſiſted of an hundred ninety two gallies, and twelue galleaſſes, beſide victua-lers and other ſmall veſſels, laded with munition and other neceſſary prouiſion for the fleet.
Of theſe gallies the Pope had ſet out twelue, the King of Spaine forty two, the reſt with the galeaſſes were the Venetians. In this fleet were imbarked thirteen thouſand ſix hundred three-ſcore ſouldiers: of whom the Pope ſent eleuen hundred, the King of Spaine three thouſand nine hundred, and the Venetians eight thouſand ſix hundred and ſixty. Theſe three great commanders entring into counſell, what courſe to take in their proceedings in this war, after long diſcourſe too and fro, at length by the perſuaſion of Zanius the Venetian Admirall, reſolued to go directly for Cyprus, and to giue the Turks hattell, in hope thereby to raiſe them from the ſiege of Nicoſia. About the middeſt of September, this great fleet furniſhed with all things D needfull for ſuch an expedition, looſed from Creet, and with a faire gale of winde ſet forward for Cyprus; in all their courſe keeping ſuch order, as if they ſhould preſently haue met with the enemy. In the middeſt of theſe troubles died Petrus Loredanus, Duke of Venice, leauing the reſt of the care of that warre to Aloyſius Mocenitus, who ſucceeded him in the Dukedome.

The Venetian fleet of an hundred and ſeuenteene ſaile at Corcyra.

The Chriſtian fleet ſetteth forward toward Cyprus.

Whilſt the Chriſtians thus ſlowly proceed in their ſo weighty affaires, Muſtapha in the mean time laid hard ſiege to Nicoſia: and diuiding his army into foure parts, aſſaulted foure of the bulwarks of the city, with greater force than at any time before from the beginning of the ſiege. The aſſault was both long and terrible: fury, and the very ſight of the warlike Generall, who was there a preſent witneſſe, and beholder of euery mans forwardneſſe or cowardiſe (a E matter of great moment) beſides their natural fierceneſſe, carried the Turks headlong without any perill or danger. And on the other ſide, the greatneſſe of the danger, the feare to loſe both life and liberty, with the hope of reliefe, encouraged the defendants to dare any thing: ſo that the Turks could not approch the wals, or mount their ſcaling ladders, but they were preſently ſlain, or together with their ladders thrown to the ground. Many of the Turks were there ſlain, but eſpecially ſuch as were moſt forward: and of the defendants were alſo more loſt than ſtood with the ſafety of ſo ſmall a number: and foraſmuch as few or none eſcaped out of that fight vnwounded, the poore defendants were brought vnto a ſmall number. Many skilfull men were of opinion, that the city might haue bin that day taken, if the aſſault had by the Baſſa bin longer maintained, by bringing ſtill on freſh men: but ſuch was his loſſe, as that he was glad F for that time to giue ouer the aſſaut, and ſo with diſhonour to retire.

After this aſſault, it was by ſome of the captaines thought good, that they ſhould (whileſt they were yet of ſome reaſonable ſtrength in the city) ſally forth vpon the enemy: ſo to make ſhew, that they had yet ſome good hope in themſelues, and withal by ſo ſudden an eruption to performe ſomething vpon the ſecure enemy. Of which motion Dandulus the Gouernor in no caſe liked, as loth by ſuch a dangerous piece of ſeruice to diminiſh the number of the defendants, G and ſo to giue the enemy an eaſier means to take the city. Yet ſeeing all the captaines generally of another mind,he yeelded vnto their deſire. So in the hotteſt time of the day,when as the Turks leaſt thought that the Chriſtians would haue ſallied out,certain Italian companies vnder the conduct of Caſar Plonianus of Vincentia, and Albertus Scotus, iſſued out by the gate that leadeth to Famaguſta,and vpon the ſudden brake into the enemies trenches: where they found the Turks ſome playing, ſome ſleeping, but fearing nothing leſſe than that the Chriſtians whom they dayly braued,durſt to haue aduentured to come forth. At the firſt entrance the Italians preuailed, and brought a great feare vpon that quarter of the Turks army, and ſlew many. But when the Turks, awaked with the alarme, came running in on euery ſide, the Italians oppreſſed with the multitude,were glad to retire:in which retreat diuers of them H were ſlaine,and amongſt them their two leaders Caſar and Albertus: ſo that this ſally ſerued to no other purpoſe than to weaken the defendants themſelues, and to cauſe the Turks to keepe better watch and ward againſt ſuch ſudden eruptions.

Scouts ſent out of the city, taken by the Turks and executed.

All hope of long defending the city now almoſt loſt,and that the defendants could hardly ſtand vpon their wals,or ſhew their heads without preſent danger;they for want of better counſell,rather than for any hope of good ſucceſſe,ſent out certain ſcouts,men skilfull of the waies and paſſages of the country (whom they had for great reward induced to vndertake the matter) to craue aid of the country people,that were in great multitude fled into the ſafety of the mountains: and to tell them, that if they came not in time to their reliefe, their wiues and children,whom they had before ſent into the city, muſt needs in ſhort time fall into the enemies I hand,or periſh with hunger: but theſe meſſengers were by the vigilant enemy intercepted,and in the ſight of the beſieged tortured to death.

Letters ſhot into the city.

Muſtapha Baſſa in vain perſuadeth them of Nicoſia to yeeld

About the ſame time diuers letters were ſhot with arrows into the city,to perſuade the beſieged Chriſtians to yeeld themſelues;for that in ſo doing they ſhould find the Baſſa a mild and mercifull conqueror: wheras otherwiſe if they ſhould by wilfull holding out delay his victory,they were ſure to indure whatſoeuer could be indured or ſuffered. But when Muſtapha had thus in vaine with hope and feare tried the minds of the defendants, he called forth to parley certaine ſouldiers that were ſtanding vpon the bulwarke called Conſtantius, of whom ſome were by the conſent of the Gouernor ſent forth vnto him: vnto whom Muſtapha by his interpretor complained, That no anſwer was giuen vnto his letters; he ſet forth vnto them the glory, K power, and greatneſſe of the Turkiſh empire; and debaſed the ſtrength of the Venetians: then he perſuaded them to yeeld, propounding vnto them the miſeries that would fall vpon them if the city ſhould by force be taken; which he threatned would be far greater than the danger the Turks were to vndertake for the winning thereof; and that therefore it concerned none ſo much as themſelues, whether the city were giuen vp by compoſition, or els woon by ſtrong hand: he ſhewed vnto them the profit that ſhould ariſe vnto them by yeelding of it vp, and offered to them large entertainment, if they would ſerue him: and to conclude, told them, that they ſhould neuer afterward find at his hands ſo great grace as was at that inſtant offered them. The crafty Baſſa did what he might to haſten the winning of the city, both for that he doubted the comming of the Chriſtian fleet,& that his great army was exceedingly troubled L with contagious and grieuous diſeaſes,ariſing of the immoderat heat & drought in that ſo hot a country. But the ſouldiers thinking any thing more aſſured than the Turkiſh faith,anſwered him, That they did not as yet doubt their own ſtrength,& that they were ready to indure any thing that could happen,rather than to prefer the vncertain friendſhip of an vnknowne prince, before the gracious fauour of ſuch worthy Princes as they had ſo good experience of.

This anſwer cut off all the Baſſa's hope for taking of the city by compoſition: wherewith being both grieued & enraged,he commanded all things to be made ready for the aſſault:and the more to encourage his ſoldiers,promiſed vnto them great rewards and honors that ſhould firſt or ſecond mount the wals. After that,he gaue a generall aſſault vnto the city with all his power:wherein both he as a moſt worthy captaine,and his ſoldiers,fought moſt fiercely. You M haue to do (ſaid he) with the ſmall and laſt remainders of your enemies;which are ſcarce able to ſtand or hold their weapons in their hands, rather than with enemies indeed: ſhall you not then eaſily ouercome them, being but few and feeble, that haue vanquiſhed them when they were many and luſty? The end of all your labor is at hand,your hoped rewards approch; only

A play you the men, and faint not in this aſſault; the ſpoile of this rich city ſhal be the worthy reward of your labours; the fruit of all your trauell conſiſteth in this one moment. Whileſt he thus incourageth ſome, and reproueth others, they mindfull of his promiſes, and theſe of the diſgrace, altogether with their thick ſhot ſuffer no man to ſtand in ſafety vpon the wals; & out of their forts alſo with their great ordnance greatly annoied the defendants. This done, they attempted by the ruines of the wall, and in other places by ſcaling ladders to haue entred the city. Which terrible aſſault was by the cruell enemy maintained, not for ſome few houres, but for diuers daies together without intermiſſion, freſh men ſtill comming on in ſtead of them that were wounded or ſlain. Yet did the defendants valiantly indure all that ſtorm, and in ſuch weake caſe as they were, worthily performed what was poſſible for ſo few to doe: yet ſtill in B hope (the poore comfort of men in miſery) that reliefe might come by the approch of the Chriſtian fleet. At length, when the matter was brought to this point, that the Turks were in great hope to haue gained the wals, and Muſtapha himſelfe probably gueſſed, that the Chriſtians were now weary of the long aſſault, and ſore weakned with wounds and other infinit miſeries, not to ſeeke in a city ſo hardly diſtreſſed, and was in that his opinion alſo confirmed by certain fugitiue Chriſtians: he neuertheleſſe vpon the ſudden cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, & ſo retiring into his trenches, lay ſtil all the next day without any thing doing. The defendants thinking that he had giuen ouer the aſſault, becauſe of ſome aid that was comming to their reliefe, became more careleſſe of the enemy, & vpon the vain hope of ſuch aid, with leſſe diligence repaired their breaches and prouided for the repulſing of their enemies. But the Baſſa C in the mean time had choſen out of his whole army about 200 of his beſt captains & ſoldiers, all men of aproued valour and agility of body, whom the next day after, he ſent early in the morning, to make proofe if they could by ſcaling ladders ſecretly and without any noiſe ſet vp, get into the foure bulwarkes which he had before ſore ſhaken with his great ordnance. Theſe reſolute men leading the way, got firſt vp, after whom followed diuers others, and ſo tooke the aforeſaid bulwarks: when preſently after, other companies of their fellowes which ſtood ready for the purpoſe, comming on forward, did with their ſcaling ladders in diuers places recouer the top of the wals: for now the matter was not done by ſecret ſurpriſe, but by open force. In euery one of theſe bulwarkes were 70 Italians and as many Epirots, who there kept watch and ward; theſe men part aſleep, as fearing no ſuch danger, and part lying laſily vp-D on the ground, were there ſurpriſed on the ſudden and ſlain: otherſome of them awaked with the ſtrange and vncouth noiſe, betooke not themſelues luſtily to their weapons, but forſaking their ſtations leapt down out of the bulwarks at ſuch places as were next vnto them, ſome for feare ran vnawares into the middeſt of their enemies. Vpon this alarme ſome of the Chriſtian captains came ſpeedily to the walls with their companies, as did Eugenius, who whileſt he in vain crieth out to ſuch fearefull ſouldiers as he met, that they ſhould not ſo cowardly fly, and ſtaieth others that were flying, was himſelfe ſhot thorow with a ſmall ſhot and ſlaine. Other captains in other places likewiſe labored in vain to haue ſtaid the flying ſouldiers, whoſe perſuaſions, requeſts, and authority in ſo generall a feare, nothing at that time preuailed.

Nicoſia moſt terribly aſſaulted by the Turks.

The Turks gain the bulwarkes and walls of Nicoſia.

The defendants thus beaten from the wals and bulwarks, gathered themſelues into the mar-E ket place: but the citiſens ſtealing home to their owne houſes, there ſtood in the entrances of the ſame, fearefully expecting the deſtruction of the country, together with their owne. In the meane time the Gouernor of Aleppo with his regiment ſcoured the walls of the city round about, as he had in charge from the Generall: and without reſpect put to ſword all that he met, armed or vnarmed. At the bulwarke called Barbarus, it fortuned him to light vpon a company of Italians, who for a while fought deſperatly, but were in the end ouerthrowne and ſlaine. When he had thus cleared the wals, & left ſuch companies as he thought good in places conuenient for the keeping of them, he came down into the more open places of the city: and ſeeing them that were gathered together into the market place to haue caſt themſelues into a ring and to fight as men altogether deſperat, he cauſed certain murthring pieces to be bent vp-F on them: which they perceiuing, laied down their weapons, and yeelded themſelues vnto the mercy of the enemy. By and by all the gates of the city were ſtrongly guarded by the enemy, to the intent that no man ſhould go in or out. Dandulus the Gouernor, and Contarenus the Biſhop of Paphos, with the reſt of the nobility, and better ſort of the citiſens, had got themſelues into the towne hall, and their ſtood vpon their guard: vnto whom Muſtapha ſent word, that he would take them all to mercy, if they would without further reſiſtance yeeld themſelues. But G whiles meſſengers run to and fro, the Turks violently brake in vpon them, and there ſlew them euery man. After the death of theſe noblemen, the cruell enemy ſpared none: and hauing ſlain ſuch as they found abroad in the ſtreets, brake into the houſes, where they made hauocke of all things: yong babes were violently taken out of the hands of their mothers, virgins were ſhamefully rauiſhed, and honeſt matrons before their husbands faces deſpightfully abuſed, churches were ſpoiled, and all places filled with mourning and dead bodies: the ſtreets were in all places ſtained with bloud, for in the city was ſlain that day fourteen thouſand eight hundred threeſcore and ſix perſons. Neither was there any end of the ſpoile, vntill the greedy enemy had carried away all the wealth that long peace had heaped vp. It is reported, that the prey there taken, amounted to twenty hundred thouſand millions of duckats: 200 of the moſt H goodly and beautifull youths were choſen out of purpoſe to be ſent to Conſtantinople for a preſent for Selymus. In the city were taken alſo 250 pieces of great ordnance: whereof ſome were by the enemy carried away, and the reſt left for defence of the city. Thus the famous city of Nicoſia, ſometime the regall ſeat of the Kings of Cyprus, fell into the hands of the Turks, the ninth day of September in the yeare 1570, in whoſe power it ſtill remaineth.

Cyrene yeelded vnto the Turks.

Muſtapha hauing as he thought beſt diſpoſed of all things in Nicoſia, with the very terrour of his name, rather than by any force, brought moſt part of the reſt of the townes in the Iſland vnder his obeyſance; and by faire intreaty and promiſe of good vſage, brought backe again vnto their wonted dwellings the rude country people, who by the comming of the Turks were fled with all that they had into the mountains: them as men not to be feared, he commanded I to till and ſow their land as they were wont. The city of Cyrene is ſtrongly ſcituated, not far from the ſea, and was then well furniſhed of all things needful for the induring of a long ſiege.
Hither the Baſſa ſent one of the Sanzackes to ſummon the city, more to proue the courage of the defendants, than for any hope he had to haue the city deliuered vnto him. But Alphonſus Palacius then Gouernour of the city, terrified with the loſſe of Nicoſia, no ſooner ſaw the enemy, but that without any further deliberation or force vſed againſt him, he deliuered vp the towne vnto the Sanzacke; couenanting only in reward of his cowardiſe, That he might in ſafety depart from thence with all his garriſon ſouldiers: which was eaſily granted, and the city ſurrendred.

Famaguſta beſieged.

Muſtapha raiſeth his ſiege.

Not long after, Muſtapha leauing a thouſand horſemen, and three thouſand foot in garriſon K in Nicoſia, marched with the reſt of his army to beſiege Famaguſta. And the more to terrifie them of the city, he by a poore country fellow, whom he had for that purpoſe ſet at liberty, ſent vnto them in a basket the head of Nicholaus Dandulus, late Gouernor of Nicoſia, and at the ſame time ſent before him diuers horſemen, who vpon their horſemens ſtaues carried the heads of many of the noblemen ſlaine at Nicoſia, wherewith they rid as in triumph about the wals of the city. Which thing he did, in hope that they of Famaguſta terrified with ſuch a ſpectacle, and the late ouerthrow at Nicoſia, would for feare of like miſery yeeld themſelues. But deceiued in this his expectation, he encamped his army about three miles from the city. Afterwards hauing taken view of the city, and well conſidered of the ſcituation thereof, he with wonderfull celerity caſt vp diuers mounts againſt the ſame, and at the ſame time cauſed battery L to be laid againſt the great tower which defended the hauen: he himſelfe alſo in the meane while battering the gate that leadeth to Amathus. But perceiuing by the deſperat ſallies of the defendants, their great courage, and that it was like to haue much more to do in this ſiege than he had in the winning of Nicoſia, and Winter alſo now drawing faſt on (being about the latter end of September) he thought it beſt betime to prouide, that by lying there he hazarded not the honour he had with ſo much labor and danger before gained: and the rather, for that it was commonly reported, that the Chriſtian fleet was at hand: wherefore he riſe with his army, and retired himſelfe further off into the country, where he ſhortly after bilited his ſouldiers in the villages round about for that Winter.

The Turkes at ſea aduertiſed of the comming of the Chriſtian fleet, prepare themſelues for battell.

The Baſſa's at ſea, Haly & Piall, lying before Famaguſta, doubting the comming of the Chriſtian M fleet, which then lay at Creet, ſent out ſix galliots to diſcouer the doings of the Chriſtians: who returning with certaine priſoners taken in the Iſland of Creet, declared vnto the Baſſa's what they had learned concerning the Chriſtian fleet, and that it was already vpon the way to Cyprus. Vpon which intelligence the Baſſa's put their fleet in order of battell, and ſet forward

A forwards towards Limiſſo to haue met with the Chriſtians:who with a proſperous wind were comming betwixt the Iſlands of Caprathos and the Rhodes:but there vnderſtanding by their eſpials,that Nicoſia was loſt,and that the Turks were come to beſiege Famaguſta; they called a Councell of all the chiefe Commanders in the fleet, to conſult what were beſt to do in ſo dangerous a caſe. Columnius the Popes Admirall,and then chiefe Commander in the fleet, with Zanius the Venetian Admiral,were of opinion,That it were beſt to hold on theer courſe for Cyprus, and to relieue Famaguſta: for that it was like that the Turks proud of their late victory,were for deſire of prey, for moſt part gon aſhore into the Iſland, and ſo left their fleet but ſlenderly manned. Beſide that,they alledged, That the Venetian Senat had expreſly decreed, That they ſhould giue the Turks battell. But Auria the Spaniſh Admiral thinking it, B as indeed it was, to be a matter of great difficulty and danger,was quite of another mind, ſaying, That he could not but maruel,how the Venetian Senators ſitting at their eaſe in counſel, could before they knew their own ſtrength,and power of the enemy,the nature of their country, and purpoſe of their foes,determine what were fit for martial men to do;vnto whoſe actions no certaine rule could be preſcribed. All the ſhores (he ſaid) were kept with the enemies garriſons;ſo that what need ſoeuer they ſhould haue,they could neither get water or wood,or put into any harbor. Beſides that,the enemy would giue them battell at his own pleaſure, and not at theirs:for that they were not of ſo much power, as to inforce him to fight. And that if the Senat,which vſed to do al things warily,aud with great aduiſement,did but ſee the weakneſſe of their gallies,wanting both ſoldiers and mariners,they would be of another mind. He C alledged further, That they were to wage war in the enemies country, where there was no port to receiue their fleet,no peaceable place,no confederate city,nor King to friend: whereas the time of the yere grew euery day worſe and worſe,when as they had neither harbor to put into, neither were able to abide the ſea. And now that Nicoſia was loſt,for the relief whereof they were come ſo far,there was no reaſon longer for them to ſtay,the enemy ſo ſtrongly poſſeſſing the Iſland with his great army,as that there was not any hope to do any good againſt him:and that to keep him from victuall,and ſo to diſtreſſe him, was not poſſible,lying in a moſt fertile Iſland,and in the midſt of his own dominions:wheras they,who were ſtill to be relieued from far,ſhould ſooner feele the want than the enemy. He was victualled (as he ſaid) when he came from home,but for three months,in hope to haue made a ſhort diſpatch,& had now two thouſand D miles home. He ſaid moreouer, that he had expreſſe commandment from the king,to return to Meſſana before Winter,and that therefore ſo ſoon as the month was out he would depart.
The Venetian Admirall deſiring nothing more, than by battell at ſea to ouerthrow the Turks,and ſo to relieue the diſtreſſed Cypriots,vrged the Spaniſh Admiral to proceed in the voyage;ſaying,That ſo great aid was not ſent from the Pope and the King,only for the relief of Nicoſia,but to deliuer the whole Iſland from the danger of the Turk. Of the ſame opinion with the Spaniſh Admirall were diuers other great captains in the fleet;namely Sfortia: who ſaid,That nothing was to be ſo done,as might raſhly expoſe to caſualtie or power of the enemy, the publique fortune and majeſty of the Chriſtian commonweale,which was in that fleet greatly hazarded: That longer ſtay might bring futther danger:that in that fleet conſiſted the E whole welfare of the commonweale,wherin more might be loſt,if any miſhap ſhould chance thereunto,than was good to be gained by the relieuing of Famaguſta. The great commanders thus diffring in opinions,the Councell was in a heat diſſolued,and nothing concluded. Vpon which ſo foule a diſagreement,the fleet began now to return back again,but ſo,that it was not now as before,one,but three fleets,euery Admirall by himſelf drawing after him his fleet. Auria the Spaniſh admiral,who firſt returned,after he had bin 2 daies wonderfully with tempeſt toſſed at ſea,came at laſt to Carpothos,and departing thence,with much ado arriued with his fleet in the Iſland of Crete: from whence he by a meſſenger ſent of purpoſe, requeſted leaue of Columnius the Popes Admirall, that he might with his good will preſently returne home.
Whereunto Columnius anſwered, That he would giue him no ſuch leaue: but rather charged F him, in the duty he ought to the good of the Chriſtian Commonweale, not to depart, but to keep company with the reſt of the fleet vntill it were paſt Zacyothus,that ſo with their vnited forces they might more ſafely paſſe by the enemies countries: wheras otherwiſe,if any thing ſhould by his haſty departure fall out otherwiſe than well, it ſhould be imputed to the diſhonour of him that had forſaken his friends, and not of them that were ſo by him forſaken. G But to this Auria anſwered, That the welfare of the kingdomes of Sicily & Naples conſiſted in the ſafety of this fleet: and that therfore hauing haſt home, he could not ſtay to keep company with their heauy galeaſſes & other ſhips of burthen, which muſt oftentimes be towed forward. This he openly pretended for his departure; yet ſecretly ſought (as it was deemed) occaſion wherby to withdraw himſelf (being as he accounted the better man at ſea) from the to find an command of Columnius, whereunto he was full ſore againſt his will ſubiect.

After they had thus a while ſpent the time with reaſoning the matter to and fro, Auria of himſelfe without further leaue hoiſed ſaile, and ſo at length came to Meſſana in Sicily: neither did Columnius and Zanius ſtay in thoſe quarters long after him, but hauing endured much trouble at ſea, arriued at laſt, Columnius in Italy, and Zanius at Corcyra. Thus this mighty fleet H which had all this Summer filled the Mediterranian with all the countries thereabout, with the expectation of ſome great matter, was by the diſcord of the Generals diſſolued, hauing don nothing at all worth the remembrance. In this idle expedition many thouſands of right valiant men loſt their liues, being dead of diuers diſeaſes proceeding of change of diet, and vnſeaſonablenes of the weather in that hot clymat; amongſt whom was the valiant County Hieronimus Martinengus, ſent by the Senat with three thouſand ſoldiers for the defence of Famaguſta, who alſo moſt of them periſhed in that voyage. The Venetian fleet was no ſooner arriued at Corcyra, but Auguſtinus Barbadicus was ſent from the Senat to diſcharge Zanius the admirall of his office, and to ſend him priſoner to Venice: in whoſe room was placed Sebaſtianus Venerius Gouernor of that Iſland. I

The Turks Baſſa's at ſea certainly aduertiſed of the departure of the Chriſtian fleet, were not a little proud therof; as by the confeſſion of their enemies, their betters. Yet foraſmuch as the ſeas began then to grow rough, and no enemy appeared, they thought it to no purpoſe to keep the ſeas with ſo great a fleet, and therefore reſolued to leaue Muſtapha with his army in Cyprus, the next yere to make an end of his conqueſt ſo haply begun; and ſeuen gallies at ſea before Famaguſta, that no reliefe ſhould that way be brought into the City, and ſo to depart themſelues with the reſt of the fleet to winter in more ſafer harbors: Piall with the greater part of the fleet to Conſtantinople, and Haly with the reſt to the Rhodes. And becauſe they would for their greater credit prepare ſome worthy Preſent for their great Lord and Maſter Selymus, they fraughted a great galliot of Mahumetes the chiefe Baſſa's, and two other tall ſhips, with K the richeſt of the ſpoil of Nicoſia, and the choice of the priſoners there taken. But when they were ready to hoiſe ſaile & depart, as they were carrying out of the gallion, certain barrels of gunpouder which Muſtapha the Generall had commanded for his better prouiſion to be landed, a noble gentlewoman captiue in the gallion, wiſhing rather to die with honor, than to liue diſhonored, ſecretly fired the pouder; by force wherof the ſaid gallion with the other 2 ſhips, were ſuddenly rent in pieces, and all that was therin blown vp into the aire. Of all that were in thoſe three veſſels, none eſcaped with life but the maſter of the gallion, & two Chriſtian captiues, but periſhed together with the rich ſpoile. But the Baſſa's following their former reſolution, departed from Cyprus, and afterwards in ſafety ariued at Conſtantinople: where both then and all the Winter following, ſuch preparation was in making, as if Selymus had the next L yeare purpoſed ſome far greater matter than the conqueſt of Cyprus.

A deſperat fact of a woman.

Whilſt Sebaſtianus Venerius (now the Venetian Admirall) yet lay at Corcyra, the rude Acroceraunian people, more famous for nothing than for their theft and want of all things; by truſty meſſengers promiſed to deliuer into his power the ſtrong caſtle of Chymera, kept by a garriſon of 300 Turks, if he himſelf with a few gallies, and a conuenient number of footmen, would come into the bay of Ambracia: offring him good hoſtages for the better aſſurance of their promiſe. Of which their offer he gladly accepted, and forthwith went to the appointed place with a company of horſemen, three thouſand footmen, and certaine gallies; who were no ſooner landed, but that preſently a thouſand of thoſe rough mountaine people came vnto M them: with which power taking the hill, and repulſing the Turks garriſon comming to the reliefe of the Caſtle, he ſo diſcouraged them that were in the Hold, that the next night they let themſelues downe with ropes into the valley below; but being deſcried, were there all either taken or ſlain. And ſo in a very ſhort time was that ſtrong Caſtle taken by the Admirall; and

The ſtrong Caſtle of Chymera taken by Venerius.

A and a ſtrong garriſon of Chriſtians put into it in ſtead of the Turks.

Not long after, Quirinus the Vice-Admiral a man of great courage, landed with 24 gallies in Peloponeſus neer the Bay of Maine, and there vpon the ſudden both by ſea and land beſieged a ſtrong caſtle, which the Turks but two yeres before had built to trouble the Chriſtians paſſing that way. Which caſtle he took in fiue hours, and put to the ſword fiue hundred Turks which lay there in garriſon; and razing it down to the ground, carried away with him four and twenty great pieces of Artillery into the Iſland of Zacynthus.

Quirinus taketh a caſtle of the Turks in Peloponeſus.

At ſuch time as Muſtapha before lay at the ſiege of Famaguſta, Bragadinus gouernor of the town, and Baleonius a moſt expert Captain, from out of the high places of the city beholding the great army of the Turks (which couered the ground almoſt as far as they could ſee) with B the cunning manner of their fortication, were therwith much moued: and therfore thought it good betime to giue the Senat knowledge thereof, and in ſo great a danger to craue their aid. And that their requeſt might be of more weight, and haue the better hearing, they intreated Hieronimus Ragazonius Biſhop of the City, a reuerend and deuout man, to take vpon him that charge; vnto whom they ioyned Nicholaus Donatus a noble gentleman of Cyprus. The Biſhop at the firſt was very vnwilling to go, as loth in ſo great danger to leaue his flock: but at length ouercome with the intreaty of the Gouernor, and tears of the beſieged, ſuffered himſelfe to be intreated: and embarked in a gally about the going downe of the Sun, looſing out of the hauen, and hoiſing ſaile, with a faire gale of wind paſſed through the Turks fleet, which then lay at anchor before the city; and by the comming on of the night, and by the great way he made, C got him quickly out of ſight. After foure daies ſailing he came to Crete, and ſo at laſt to Venice: where, as he had before vnto the Admirall, ſo there vnto the Senat he declared the dangerous eſtate of the City, the ſtrength of the enemy, the weakneſſe of the defendants againſt ſo great a multitude, and the wants of many things needful for the holding out of the ſiege: and to be briefe, that except they ſent ſpeedy reliefe, the City could not be kept. Zanius at that time Admirall, carefull for the beſieged, cauſed foure tall ſhips to be loded with all maner of victual and a great quantity of gunpouder, and put into them 1700 ſelect ſoldiers, al which he ſent from Crete to the reliefe of them of Famaguſta; appointing M. Antonius Quirinus with twelue of the beſt gallies in all the fleet, to conduct the ſame thither. This Quirinus was a moſt valiant and expert Captain, meanly deſcended, but by ſeruice grown to be a man both of D great reputation and wealth: and therfore Zanius at his departure to Venice, although he knew the matter required haſt, yet preſuming vpon his wiſedome and carefulneſſe, left it to his diſcretion, when and how to performe that piece of ſeruice. Quirinus (not without cauſe) doubting to ſet forward, the ſeas as then full of the Turks gallies, ſtaid vntil Winter was wel ſpent, and then ſetting forward the ſeuenteenth of Ianuary, kept alooſe from the ſhips, which with a proſperous wind came directly before Famaguſta; in hope that the Turks gallies which lay in the mouth of the hauen, might ſo be drawne farther into the ſea, in hope of ſome good booty, he himſelfe ſtaying with his gallies in place conuenient out of ſight. Neither had the euent deceiued his expectation, had not his fierce nature hindered the ſame: for the Turks vpon the dawning of the day deſcrying the ſhips, made haſtily toward them: but Quirinus not able E longer to ſtay himſelfe, and before deſirous to fight with them, ſhewed himſelfe too ſoon in the open ſea, before the enemy was come neer the ſhips: whom as ſoon as the Turks had ſeen, and that there was no hope to withſtand him, they ſtayd their oares, and with all ſpeed retyred. But Quirinus following faſter vpon them, they were glad for ſafeguard of their liues, with all the power they could to run three of their gallies aground, and to run to ſhoare themſelues: which three gallies, Quirinus did with his great Ordnance beat all to pieces, and ſore gauled the other foure. The hauen thus cleered, he returned again vnto the ſhips, and brought them with the ſupply in ſafety to Famaguſta: vpon whoſe arriuall was great reioicing both among the garriſon ſouldiers and the Citiſens: for the Turks thought nothing leſſe, than that the Chriſtian gallies durſt at that time of the yeare haue put into thoſe dangerous ſeas: which F Quirinus well knowing, came forth again with his gallies, and roaming vp and downe at his pleaſure, took two of the enemies ſhips richly laded comming to the camp, with which booty he inriched his ſouldiers: and further incited by occaſion, landed his men in diuers places alongſt the ſea coaſt in Pamphilia, and there did great harme. So hauing filled the country with terrour and fame of his name, he returned againe to Famaguſta, where he notably encouraged the garriſon ſouldiers, perſuading them to remember their wonted valor: and fil- G ling them with hope that the Chriſtian fleet would be with them in the beginning of the next Summer, to deliuer them from their enemies, and to raiſe the ſiege. So hauing in twenty daies diſpatched that he came for, and done what good ſeruice elſe he could, he departed from Famaguſta, and within fiue daies after arriued at Crete.

It was not long, but Selymus had knowledge of this late ſupply put into Famaguſta, and of the harms don by Quirinus; wherwith he was ſo highly diſpleaſed, that he commanded the gouernor of Chios his head to be ſtruck off, and the Gouernour of the Rhodes to be diſgraced, whoſe charge it was to haue kept thoſe ſeas, ſo that nothing ſhould haue been conueied into Famaguſta. Neither ſpared he Piall Baſſa, but depriued him of his Admiralty, and placed Partau Baſſa Admirall in his ſtead, for that he had not the yeare before diſcomfited the Chriſtian H fleet at the Iſland of Crete, as it was ſuppoſed he might haue done.

From the beginning of this warre, the Venetians, with Pius Quintus then Pope, who greatly fauored their cauſe, had moſt earneſtly from time to time ſolicited Philip King of Spaine, to enter with them into the participation & fellowſhip of this war; which their requeſt ſtanding indeed with the good of his ſtate, he ſeemed eaſily to yeeld vnto: and therfore ſent Auria, his Admirall the laſt yere, with his fleet to aid them, but with ſuch ſucceſſe as is before declared. As for to ioin with them in perpetual league and confederation (as it was termed) againſt the common enemy, that he referred vnto the diſcreet conſideration of the two Cardinals, Granuellan and Pace, and Io. Zunica his Embaſſador, ſent for that purpoſe to Rome: promiſing to performe whatſoeuer they ſhould on his behalfe agree vpon or conſent vnto. At the ſame time, I and for the ſame purpoſe lay alſo Surianus the Venetian Embaſſadour at Rome: vnto whom the Pope ioined Cardinal Morone, Aldobrandinus, & Ruſticucius, with certain other of the chief Cardinals, as men indifferent to both parties, to moderat and compoſe ſuch differences & difficulties as ſhould ariſe betwixt the aforeſaid Commiſſioners for the king and the Venetians, concerning the intended league: but theſe graue men, ſent from ſo great princes about ſo great a matter (as well there could not be greater) were no ſooner met together and ſet in conſultation, but that forthwith they began to jar about the capitulations of the league. Neceſſary it was thought that a league ſhould be agreed vpon againſt ſo puiſſant & dangerous an enemy, but to find the way how the ſame might be concluded to the contentment of al parts, ſeemed a matter almoſt impoſſible: oftentimes theſe commiſſioners ſat, but the oftner the farther off: K if one difficulty were by the diſcretion of ſome appeaſed, in ſtead therof at the next meeting ariſe three others. The chiefe command of the army to be raiſed, the proportion of the forces, the maner of the war, with many other like circumſtances incident to ſo great actions, made great differences among them: but moſt of al, the indifferent proportioning of the charge, the Spaniſh commiſſioners ſeeking to return the greateſt part therof vpon the Venetians, and the Venetians vpon them: which was don with ſuch earneſtneſſe and ſtudy of euery man towards his own part, as if they had all there met for the bettering of the particular ſtate from which they were ſent, rather than for the common good. For the Spaniard, who in former time was glad to keep the frontiers of his large dominions in Italy, Sicily, Sardinia, Corſica, Majorca, L Minorca, yea and of Spain it ſelf, with ſtrong garriſons, for fear of the Turke; now that the war was riſen betwixt the Venetians and him, and the danger thereof tranſlated far off into other mens territories; enioied now in his own an vnwonted quietneſſe, to the great content of his ſubiects, and eaſing of his own charge in maintaining of ſo many garriſons as before: wherof many were now thought needles. Beſides that, he by the Indulgence of the Pope raiſed ſuch great ſummes of money vpon his Clergy, as was thought by many, ſufficient to diſcharge the charge of the war: For which cauſes he cared not for entring in any further league with the Venetians, but as it were in courteſie to ſend them a yearely aid, to maintaine a defenſiue lingring war, and ſo to keep the Turks buſied vpon the Venetian, a farre off from his owne Territories. But the Venetians, in whoſe Dominions the fierce enemy daily raged, as well in Dalmatia as in Cyprus, were euen for the ſame reaſons mooued to haſten and ſhorten the war, M that the Spaniard was to protract it: for beſide the neereneſſe of the danger, and the infinit calamities by them ſuſtained, their yerely reuenues ariſing for moſt part of their cuſtomes, were greatly impaired, and their traffick (the maintenance of their ſtate) almoſt quite cut off: which cauſed them more earneſtly to confederate themſelues with the Spaniard. But hard it was

A to ioyn in one, States ſo far differing in reſpect of their particular profit, and almoſt by nature contrary. Thus was all the laſt yere, and a great part of this alſo, ſpent by the aforeſaid Commiſſioners in turbulent and fruitleſſe conferences, but nothing was as yet concluded concerning the league: which troubled the Venetians not a little, being of themſelues too weake for ſo mighty an enemy as was Selymus, and yet no other certain ſtrength from their friends to reſt vpon. But whilſt they ſtood thus doubtful of the league with Spain, and quite out of hope of any attonement with Selymus; on the ſudden when it was leſt expected, it was by good fortune layd as it were in their laps, to make choice whether they would (as they had before moſt earneſtly deſired) ioyne in league with the Pope and the King of Spain, or els fall to agreement with Selymus: and that by this means.

B Muhamet the chiefe Baſſa, a ſecret friend vnto the Venetians, of whom he had been of long time honored, had no great liking of the proſperous ſucceſſe of Muſtapha in Cyprus, and therfore deuiſed night and day, how to croſſe the riſing of him, the competitor of his honor; and withall to help the Venetians, vnto whom he was much beholden. He by ſecret meſſengers had before oftentimes ſounded the mind of the Venetian Embaſſadour, and put him in hope, that if ſuit were made vnto Selymus for peace, it would vndoubtedly be granted; and further promiſed, to be himſelfe a helper and interceſſor for the ſame. But finding the Embaſſador to caſt many perils, and to giue ſmal credit vnto their talke, who had before by truſting them deceiued him: he did not ſo giue ouer the matter, but referring the further tempting with him vnto a more fitter time, for the preſent he took opportunity to enter into diſcourſe with Selymus C himſelf concerning the Venetians; and told him that it was reported, That they weary of the long alteration they had had with the Spaniards concerning the league, & now deſtitute of all hope and aid, would now haply of their own accord grant him that which they had before to him denied. And perceiuing him not vnwillingly to heare ſo of them, he proceeded further in the matter, to know his pleaſure what he would haue done therin, cunningly by the way of good counſell perſuading him vnto that which he moſt wiſhed himſelf to be don. Immediatly after, he ſecretly aduertiſed M. Antonius the Venetian Embaſſador, That there was great hope of peace, and that therefore the Senat ſhould vnder the colour of exchanging of priſoners, and redeeming of Merchants goods, ſend ſome fit man to Conſtantinople, with whom he would in ſecret confer of al ſuch matters as might further the pacification. This vnexpected D news from the Embaſſador brought to Venice, was well heard of the Senat: for they thought it much to concern their State, to haue a way opened wherby vpon tolerable conditions to make peace with the mighty tyrant, if that the league betwixt them and the King of Spain could not be concluded. Hereupon they made choice of one Iacobus Ragazonius to goe about the matter to Conſtantinople. This Ragazonius was a man of great ſpirit and dexterity of wit to take any matter in hand, and of a great reach and deep iudgement in the managing therof, and withall exceeding rich, and of ſo good carriage of himſelfe, as that he was therfore famous: al which things were thought of great moment to win the fauor of that couetous and barbarous nation. The Senat, although they had not yet made proof what men thought of the matter, yet doubted they not, but that vpon the report of the ſending this notable man, men E would thereof diuerſly diuine, euery man according to his own fantaſie, and that many of the wiſer ſort would indeed ſurmiſe, as the truth was, that he was ſent for to intreat of peace, although the exchange of priſoners, and redemption of Merchants goods, were the only things were openly pretended: and the Senat, although they thought it not amiſſe to haue it ſo vnderſtood, becauſe ſuch a ſuſpicion was like enough to ſtir vp both the Pope and the Spaniard to accept of ſuch conditions of the deſired league, as they had before reiected; yet leſt the hope of the league (which they for many cauſes thought good to cheriſh) thereby cut off, might cauſe the Pope & the Spaniard both to be cold in the matter, they certified both them and other Chriſtian princes, of the ſending of Ragazonius, yet of purpoſe concealing the ſecret drift of his going. Ragazonius throughly inſtructed by the Senat, was in a gally conducted to Raguſium: F which Caſſan Beg (the great Baſſa Mahometes ſon, Gouernor of Liburnia) vnderſtanding, met him vpon the frontiers, & told him, That he was ſent by his father, both to meet him and ſafe conduct him: which the martial man, contrary to the maner of the Turks courteouſly performed, honorably entertaining him, & afterward ſending him with a ſafe conuoy till he was out of all danger. Ragazonius comming to Conſtantinople, was there by night ſecretly receiued Muhamet Baſſa a ſecret friend vnto the Venetians, puts thẽ in hope of peace.

The Venetians ſend an Embaſſador to Selymus to intreat with him of peace.

Ragazonius the Venetian Embaſſadour commeth to Conſtantinople.

The conference betwixt Muhamet the Great Baſſa, and Ragazonius.

ued into the city, and at firſt brought into a little baſe Inne, and a guard ſet ouer him that he ſhould ſpeak with no man. But after three daies he was remooued to a much better place, and preſented with diuers kinds of dainty diſhes of ſundry kinds of meats. The effect of his meſſage was, to try the Turks minds, and after conference had with the Embaſſador to intreat of peace. At length hauing acceſſe to the great Baſſa Muhamet, after he had deliuered vnto him (as he had in charge) his meſſage concerning the exchange of priſoners and merchants goods, Muhamet asked him, If he had nothing in charge from the Senat concerning a pacification to be made? Wherunto he anſwered, that he had, but that he muſt firſt ſpeak with the Embaſſador, without whoſe aduice and counſel he was not of himſelf to do any thing. At that firſt incounter, the Baſſa to terrifie the meſſenger, declared vnto him the innumerable multitude of the Turks horſmen and footmen, which no nation (as he vainly boaſted) was able by force or policy to withſtand: alſo his great and inuincible fleets at ſea, with whom all the power of the Chriſtians ioined together, was not able to encounter; and much other ſuch like ſtrength and wealth of his: and that the Venetians were now no more able to withſtand Selymus, than they were in times paſt to reſiſt his father & his anceſtors. Yet he diſcourſed of this matter in ſuch ſort, as not therby to cut off the hope of the pacification: but ſaid, That the Venetians ſhould beſt haue prouided for the ſafety of their ſtate, if at the firſt they had liſtned vnto him, friendly & faithfully aduiſing them not to haue entred into arms, in which doing they ſhewed more courage than power: and that yet, as the caſe now ſtood, and that Selymus was in a moſt aſſured hope, in ſhort time to become lord and maſter of the whole Iſland, it ſhould be to their great good to prefer the fauour and good will of the Turks before war, and by the voluntary yeelding of Cyprus, gain to themſelues perpetuall peace and tranquility. As for the Iſle it ſelf, it was not now worth the hazarding of ſo many dangers, being deſtitute of inhabitants, which were almoſt all either ſlain or fled, the cattell driuen away, the townes ranſackt and burnt, and the whole country, of late moſt pleaſant and beautifull, now ſo ſpoiled and vnpeopled, that it could not of long time yeeld vnto him that ſhould haue it, any profit or commodity. Ragazonius being a coole and aduiſed man, and withall perceiuing that the Baſſa was not to be contraried in his talke, ſo tempred his anſwer, as that he ſhewed no token of feare, neither let any word fall that might offend his ears, ſaying, That he was right glad that he had found ſo much fauor in his ſight, as to haue acceſſe and leaue to talk with ſo great a Prince, who for wiſdome and grauity excelled all the reſt of the Princes of the great Emperors Court, who ſo far as he might with his loyalty towards his ſoueraign, had alwaies moſt gratiouſly fauored the Venetian ſtate: who alſo not ignorant of the vncertainty of worldly things, knew of all others beſt, that on both ſides were both men & arms, and that moſt mighty Princes had oftentimes with ſmall forces bin ouerthrowne, the euent of things neuer deceiuing men more than in matters of war: no power vpon earth being ſure, which could not within ſome bounds containe the ſtrength of it ſelf: and that therefore he was in good hope, that he ſo worthy a man, knowing beſt what belonged both to peace and war, would deuiſe ſome ſuch courſe as might ſort to the good and quiet both of the Venetian State and Turkiſh Empire; in which doing he ſhould find ſufficient matter for his eternal praiſe and glory, if by his diſcreet wiſdome a pacification might be made. Such talk hauing paſſed at their firſt meeting, Ragazonius had leaue to ſpeake with the Embaſſador, who then lay at Pera vnder ſafe keeping. In paſſing ouer to Pera, Ragazonius might ſee a fleet of Turkiſh gallies encountring one with another in maner of a fight at ſea, which the Turks had prouided of purpoſe to ſhew vnto him as a ſtrange ſight. Whereat Ragazonius ſmiling, ſaid vnto the Turks that were preſent with him, That it was a pretty childiſh ſport for him that had neuer ſeen the like before: but not to the Venetians, who were acquainted with theſe matters in earneſt, as the Turks ſhould well know whenſoeuer they had a mind to make proof what they were able to do at ſea. Ragazonius comming to the Embaſſador, had conference with him at large, and reſolued with him what to do in his negotiation. And ſo returning to Muhamet, eaſily diſpatcht with him for the exchange of priſoners and Merchants goods: but when they came to talk of the capitulations of a pacification to be made, at the firſt they were ſo far off, as if they would neuer haue met: but after much and often conference, ſomtime the one yeelding, ſometime the other, the matter was brought to ſome conformity, ſo that there was no ſuch great difference betwixt them, but that they were like enough to haue agreed. Pius the Pope, & Philip king of Spain aduertiſed of the ſending of Ragazonius

A to Conſtantinople, began to imagine as the truth was, that he was ſent about ſome treaty of peace, what colour ſoeuer the Senat pretended to couer the ſame. And therfore doubting leſt the Turkiſh Emperour hauing once made peace with the Venetians, ſhould turn his great forces already prepared, vpon the one or both of them, they thought it good for troubling of that peace, now with all ſpeed to haſten the league, which they had ſo long before delayed. For which purpoſe the Pope ſent the noble Columnius to Venice: who admitted into the Senat, declared at large how matters had paſſed at Rome concerning the league: and afterward, what profit might ariſe of ſuch a league concluded, and what harms might inſue of the ſame, neglected. And to haſten the matter, ſet as it were before their eies, how much it concerned the common good, but them eſpecially, to haue the ſame with ſpeed confirmed. As for to giue B any truſt vnto the Turks, was (as he ſaid) not beſeeming their deep wiſdome and iudgement; ſeeing they ſo often had bin by them rather deceiued than vanquiſhed. In concluſion, he requeſted them, That for his Holineſſe ſake, moderating in ſome part their hard demands, they would with ſpeed ioin with him and the King in a moſt firm and Chriſtian league. Although this ſpeech of Columnius had much moued the minds of the Venetians, ſo that many inclined to the league, yet were there many doubtfull therof, and could not be reſolued whether it were better to imbrace peace with the Turk, or the league with the Pope and the King. Peace pleaſed them, neither did the league diſpleaſe them: it ſeemed a matter moſt difficult, whether to reſolue vpon. They were fearful of the league either receiued, or reiected: the hope of victory, the inconſtancy of the Turks, their owne ſtrength at ſea, the large promiſes of the Chriſtian C Princes, the certain hope of the league, and vncertainty of the peace, perſuaded them to embrace the league. On the other ſide, the bad ſucceſſe of the yere before, their forces ſhaken, and almoſt ſpent in Cyprus, the ſuſpected and doubtfull faith of the confederats, with the vncertainty of the ſucceſſe, induced them to prefer the hoped peace before the league. So the Venetians in ſuſpence betwixt both, gaue the Embaſſador daily more doubtfull anſwers than other, neither by promiſe binding themſelues, neither by flat denial cutting off the hope of the league, by examples and arguments rather refelling what was by others alledged, than any way declaring what they themſelues thought. Somtime they alledged ſuch things as might make a man beleeue, that they were willing to ioin in league, and by and by again, they would ſeem neither to reiect nor accept of the ſame. In which doubtfulneſſe many daies paſſed. At D length the matter being propounded in the Senat, there found not vnlike diſpoſition of minds that it had among the meaner ſort: for ſome of the Senators inclined to the league, whoſe reaſons were grounded not vpon profit only, but vpon credit & honor alſo, which they wiſhed to be chiefly regarded: declaring alſo, what great ſecurity, honor and glory, ſhould redound vnto them, by entring into ſuch an honourable league. But the remembrance of former loſſes, the ſtrength of the Turk poſſeſſing a great part of the world, compared to their own, the terror of the enemies name, the feare of euill ſucceſſe, the ſmall hope of preuailing, induced others to like better of peace: whoſe opinion was alſo confirmed by this, That the confederation with thoſe Chriſtians, was of no more aſſurance or continuance than the Turks peace; beſides that, they alledged, That leagues were therfore of leſſe aſſurance, for that confederations and ami- E ties were ſeldom or neuer ſincerely & faithfully kept on both ſides, euery man commonly ſeruing his own turn, without care of other men. They alſo ſet as it were before their eies what great occaſions, euen ſmall ſuſpitions might giue princes to break their leagues, what ſtrange effects the fear of the loſſe of goods, or ſome part of their territory might work. After this ſo weighty a matter had bin thus with great contention throughly debated on both ſides in the Senat, it was at laſt put to voices, and ſo by conſent of the greater part, the league was as moſt honorable receiued, & the Turks peace reiected; & a decree of the Senat to that effect made. Ragazonius by ſecret letters from the Senat vnderſtanding of all theſe matters, began to deale more warily with Mahomet the great Baſſa in matter concerning the peace, and more hardly to yeeld to his demands, ſo propounding many difficulties of purpoſe deuiſed, requeſted of him, F That he might by his good leaue return to Venice, to be reſolued of many things by the Senat, whereof he was not able himſelf to iudge, & ſo to return to him again with more certain inſtructions: aſſuring him that the Senat would vpon knowledge of the conditions of the peace do and deuiſe many things for the furtherance of the ſame, which could not ſo well be done by letters as if he were there himſelf preſent to reſolue them vpon euery particular. This his requeſt queſt obtained, he with great ſpeed got him out of Conſtantinople: but was ſcarcely got out of the gates, when report of the league which the Venetians had made with the Pope and the King of Spain, was brought vnto the Court, and had in ſhort time filled the city, which made all the way as he trauelled more troubleſome, and fruſtrated that alſo which was before concluded concerning the exchange of priſoners & Merchants goods. Ragazonius being come to Venice, declared at large in the Senat the drift and purpoſe of the Turk, and what conference he had had with the great Baſſa, and in what forwardnes the peace was: for which his diſcreet carriage of the matter, his wiſdome was highly by the whole Senat commended, and he himſelfe afterward honourably rewarded. G

A perpetuall league concluded betwixt the Pope, the K. of Spaine, and the Venetians.

In the mean time the commiſſioners of Rome after long conſultation concluded a league, which they would haue to be perpetuall, as well for for inuaſiue as defenſiue wars againſt the Turke: and was by ſolemne oath confirmed by the Pope, the king of Spain, and the Venetian Senat the 24 day of May, in the yeare 1571. For the execution of which league, it was agreed vpon, That the ſea and land forces ſhould conſiſt of two hundred gallies, an hundred ſhips, fifty thouſand footmen, and foure thouſand fiue hundred horſmen, with a proportionat quantity of great artillery, victuals, and other things neceſſary, to be euery yeare ready in March, or at fartheſt in Aprill, to meet together at ſuch a place in the Eaſt, as ſhould be to them for that purpoſe appointed, to be imploied as the Admirals ſaw cauſe, & as the preſent ſtate of things ſhould require: H

The proportioning of the charge of the warres againſt the Turke: and the other capitulations of the league.

for maintenance of which charge it was agreed, that the king of Spain ſhould defray the one halfe, and the other halfe to be diuided into three equal parts, wherof the Venetians ſhould beare two parts, and the Pope the third; which if it ſhould be too heauy for him, then that remained by him vndiſcharged, to be diuided into fiue parts; whereof the King was to diſcharge three, and the Venetians two. I The charge thus proportioned, they tooke order alſo for the prouiſion of victuals, to be at a reaſonable price taken vp in any the confederats dominions, where the army or fleet ſhould chance to ſtay: yet ſo, that it ſhould be at the King of Spain his diſcretion, out of the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, firſt to take his prouiſion for the victualling of Guletta, Malta, and his own nauy. It was alſo agreed, That if the King of Spain ſhould at any time, when as the confederats had no common war, inuade Algiers, Tripolis, or Tunes, that then the Venetians ſhould of their own charge, aid him with fifty gallies well appointed: as alſo, that the king ſhould in like manner and with like forces ayd them as oft as they ſhould by the Turks be inuaded. But if it ſhould fortune the Roman territory to be inuaded, that then the aforeſaid Princes ſhould be bound with all their forces, to the vtmoſt of their power, to defend thoſe places, and the perſon of the Pope. K And that in managing of the confederat war, the three admirals ſhould confer vpon all matters, and whatſoeuer the greater part agreed togther vpon, that to be reputed as agreed vpon by them all: That Don Iohn of Auſtria, Charles the fifth his naturall ſon, and brother to the king, ſhould haue the chief command of the forces both at ſea and land: but not to diſplay his own enſigne, but the common enſign of the confederats. Alſo, that ſuch places as ſhould be gained from the Turk by the confederat army, ſhould be diuided amongſt the confederat princes, excepting Tunes, Algiers, and Tripolis, which ſhould remain only to the King of Spain: That all controuerſies ariſing amongſt the Generals ſhould be decided by the Pope, to whom the Venetians ſhould L lend twelue gallies, furniſhed of al things ſauing men and victuals, which the Pope ſhould of his own charge ſupply: Which gallies at the end of the war he ſhould again deliuer, in ſuch caſe as they then were: That an honorable place ſhould be left for Maximilian the Emperour, the French King, the King of Polonia, and the King of Portingall to enter into this league, whom with the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, it ſhould beſeem the Pope to ſtir vp in ſo good a quarrell: and that it ſhould not be lawfull for any the confederat Princes to intreat of peace, or enter into league, without the knowledge and conſent of the other confederats. And for the better proceeding of all things, it was agreed, That euer in Autumn the confederat princes ſhould by their embaſſadors at Rome conſult of the next wars, and as the things and occurrents ſhould require, to determine, whether their forces were to be increaſed or diminiſhed. M

The league proclaimed.

This league thus at length with much ado concluded, was not long after in time with great pomp and triumph openly proclaimed in Rome, Venice, and Spaine, to the great ioy of the greateſt part of Chriſtendome.

Whilſt

The Venetians the more to trouble the Turke, ſeeke to ſtir vp Tamas the Perſiā king to take vp arms againſt him.

A Whilſt theſe things were in doing,the Venetians the more to intangle the Turke, thought it good to make prooſe,if they might by any means ſtir vp Tamas the Perſian king to take vp armes againſt him: who as he was a Prince of great power, ſo did he exceedingly hate the Turks,as well for the difference betwixt the Perſians and them about matters of their vain ſuperſtition, as for the manifold iniuries he had oftentimes ſuſtained. There was one Vincent Alexander,one of the Secretaries for the ſtate,who hauing eſcaped out of priſon at Conſtantinople, was but a little before come to Venice, a wary wiſe man,and of great experience, who for his dexterity of wit, and skilfulneſſe in the Turkiſh language,was thought of all others moſt fit to take in hand ſo great a matter. He hauing receiued letters and inſtructions for the Senat,and furniſhed with all things neceſſary,trauelling through Germany, Polonia,and the B forreſts of Mœſia, in Turkiſh attire, came to Moncaſtron, a port towne vpon the ſide of the Euxine or blacke ſea, at the mouth of the great riuer Boriſthenes: where he embarked himſelfe for Trapezond,but was by a contrary wind driuen to Sinope, a City of great traffique; from whence he trauelled by rough and broken waies to Cutay, keeping ſtill vpon the left hand,becauſe he would not fall vpon any part of the Turks army (which was then marching towards Cyprus through all thoſe countries) neuertheleſſe he fell vpon a part thereof, from which he with great danger rid himſelf being taken for a Turke,and by blind & troubleſome waies,through rocks and forreſts,arriued at length at Erzirum,a ſtrong city of the Turks,then vpon the frontiers of the Turks dominions toward the Georgians. This iourney of Alexanders was not kept ſo ſecret,but that it was vented at Conſtantinople by a ſpie,who vnder the color C of friendſhip,haunting the Venetian Embaſſadors houſe at Pera, had got certain knowledge of the going of Alexander into Perſia. Wherupon certain courrors were ſent out with al ſpeed to beſet the three ſtreit paſſages into Perſia,wherby it was ſuppoſed he muſt of neceſſity paſſe with certain notes alſo of the fauour of the man,of his ſtature,and other marks,wherby he was beſt to be knowne. But he in ſo dangerous a countrey doubting all things,and fearing ſuch a matter, leauing his company behind him, with incredible celerity poſted from Erzirum to Tauris,and was a great way gone before the Turks currors came into thoſe quarters: who yet hearing of him,followed after as far as they durſt,but could not ouertake him. Alexander comming to Tauris,vnderſtood that the Court lay at Caſbin,about twelue daies iourney farther vp into the country; comming thither,the fourteenth of Auguſt of this yeare 1571,he chanced D to meet with certaine Engliſh Merchants,with whom he had before bin acquainted: by whoſe help he not only got to ſpeake with Ayder Tamas the Kings third ſonne, but learned of them alſo the manners and faſhions of the Perſian Court, and how to beare himſelfe therein.
The Perſians by reaſon of the intollerable heat, do moſt of their buſineſſe at that time of the yeare by night. Wherfore Alexander about midnight brought into Aider,declared vnto him the cauſe of his comming:and the next night admitted vnto the ſpeech of his aged father,deliuered his letters of credence,and in the name of the Senat declared vnto him,with what perfidious dealing Selymus the Turkiſh Emperour was about to take away Cyprus from the Venetians, with what greedineſſe and pride he had ſet vpon the Chriſtians, and that diſcharged of that war,he would of all likelyhood ſet vpon the Perſians,hauing the ſelfeſame quarrel vnto E the Perſians that he had vnto the Venetians,that is, an ardent and inſatiable deſire of ſoueraignty: a ſufficient cauſe for the greedy Turke to repute euery King the richer that he was, the more his enemy. After that, ſetting forth to the full the proweſſe of the Chriſtians, the wonderfull preparation they had made both at ſea and land, he perſuaded the King with all his power to inuade the Turke,now altogether buſied in the wars of Cyprus,and to recouer again ſuch parts of his Kingdome as Solyman the father of Selymus had taken from him. Wars he ſaid were more happily managed abroad than at home: that ſince he alone (the Chriſtian Princes all then at quiet) had withſtood the Turks whole force and power,he needed not now to doubt of his moſt proſperous ſucceſſe, the Chriſtian Princes now ioyning with him. That he was much vnmindfull of his former loſſes and wrongs, if he thought he enioyed an aſſured F peace; which he ſhould find to be nothing elſe but a deferring of war vnto more cruell times; and that the Turke if he ſhould ouerrun Cyprus,would forthwith turne his victorious armes vpon him: The end of one warre was (as he ſaid) but the beginning of another: and that the Turkiſh Empire could neuer ſtay in one ſtate: and that he ſhould obſerue not the Turks words, but his deeds; and how that the Othoman Emperours according to the opportunity of the times, vſed by turnes, ſomtime force, ſomtime deceit, as beſt ſerued their purpoſes: That no Princes had at all times by diſſembled peace & vncertain leagues more deluded ſome, vntill they had oppreſſed others. He wiſhed alſo, that at length this his cunning dealing might appear to the world: and that Princes would think, that being combined together, they might more eaſily ouercome the Turk, than being ſeparated, defend their own: That in former times, ſometime will, ſometime occaſion, was wanting to them to vnite their forces: and that therfore they ſhould combine themſelues for their common good againſt the common enemy: That it concerned no leſſe the Perſians than the Chriſtians, to haue the power of the Turk abated: and that this taking vp of arms, ſhould be for the good of the Perſian king howſoeuer things ſhould fall out; if well, he ſhould then recouer what he had before loſt, with much more that was the Turks: if otherwiſe, yet by voluntary entring into armes to countenance himſelf, and to giue the Turk occaſion to think that he feared him not: which was (as he ſaid) the only way to preſerue their common ſafety, which would be vnto al the confederat Princes eaſie enough, if they themſelues made it not more difficult than the power of the enemy. The ſpeech of the Embaſſador was willingly heard: wherunto the king anſwered, That he would conſider thereupon what he had to do: and in the mean while, a faire houſe was appointed for the Embaſſador and his followers, and bountifull allowance of the Kings charge. He was alſo many times ſumptuouſly feaſted by the noblemen, whom he ſtil requeſted to be mediatours to the King, to take that honorable war in hand. The King had at that time a ſon called Iſmael, a man of great ſpirit, whom he kept in durance, for that he with too much inſolency made roads into the frontiers of the Turks dominions, to the diſturbance of the league his father had before made with the late Turkiſh Emperor Solyman: vnto him Alexander hauing acceſſe, was of him courteouſly heard; who fretting and languiſhing for very grieſe of reuenge vpon the Turks, wiſhed, that either the king his father had his mind, or he himſelſe the power of a king: and ſaid, That if euer it were his good fortune to obtain the kingdome, he would indeed ſhew what he then in mind thought. But of him more ſhal be ſaid hereafter. Whilſt this matter went more ſlowly forward in the Perſian Court than the Embaſſador would haue had it, news was brought to the Court, of the great victory which the Chriſtians had much about that time obtained of the Turks at ſea: vpon which occaſion the Embaſſador ſolicited Tamas more earneſtly than before, to make himſelſe partaker of the victory of the Chriſtians, by entring into confederation with them, and by taking vp of arms, rather than to hold vncertaine friendſhip with the Turks in their miſeries, by whom he had bin ſo often wronged. This he ſaid was the only time for the Perſian king to recouer his former glory, the like offer whereof would neither often chance, neither long ſtay: and that if he ſuffered ſo fit an opportunity to ſlip away, he ſhould afterwards in vain wiſh for the ſame, when it were too late. This ſo wholſome counſell was well heard, but preuailed nothing to ſtir vp the aged King: who then troubled with rebellion in Media, or weary of the former wars he had had with the Turk, and glad of ſuch peace as he had then with him, anſwered the embaſſador, That foraſmuch as the Chriſtian Princes had made a perpetuall league amongſt themſelues, he would for 2 yeres expect the euent, and afterward as occaſion ſerued, ſo to reſolue vpon peace & war. This improuident reſolution of the King, brought afterward vnprofitable and too late repentance to the whole Perſian kingdom; when as within a few yeres after, all the calamities which the Senat had by their embaſſadors (as true prophets) foretold, redounded to the great ſhaking therof. For the Cyprian war once ended, and peace concluded with the Venetians, Amurath the ſon of Selymus, ſucceeding his father in the Turkiſh Empire, inuading the Perſian King, tooke from him the great countrey of Media, now called Siluan, with a great part of Armenia the Great, and the regal city of Tauris, as ſhal be hereafter in due place declared. At which time the Perſian, who now refuſed to take vp arms, or ioyne in league with the Chriſtian Princes, repented that he had not beſote hearkned to the wholſom counſell of the Venetians: and taught by his own harms, wiſhed in vain, that the Chriſtian princes would again take vp arms and ioine with him againſt the Turke.

Muſtapha Baſſa returneth to the ſiege of Famaguſta.

Muſtapha the great Baſſa and General of the Turks army, furniſhed of all things that could be deſired for maintenance of his ſiege, and ſouldiers in great number dayly repairing vnto him out of Cilicia, Syria, the leſſer Aſia, and the Countries thereabout, beſide great ſupplies brought vnto him by Haly Baſſa from Conſtantinople; inſomuch, that it was thought

A thought he had in his army two hundred thouſand men: began now that Winter was paſt, in the later end of Aprill, to draw neerer vnto Famaguſta, and with incredible labour to caſt vp trenches & mounts againſt the City, of ſuch height, that the defendants from the higheſt places of the city could ſcarcely ſee the points of the Turks ſpears, or tops of their tents, as they lay incamped: which was no great matter for the Baſſa to perform, hauing in his camp forty thouſand pioners alwaies ready at his command.

The City of Famaguſta is ſcituat in the Eaſt end of the Iſland, in a plain and low ground betwixt two promontories, the one called S. Andrews head, and the other the head of Græcia. It is in circuit two miles, and in form foure ſquare; but that the ſide toward the Eaſt, longer and more winding than the reſt, doth much deform the exact figure of a quadrant: it is almoſt B on two parts beaten vpon with the ſea, the other parts toward the land are defended with a ditch not aboue fifteen foot broad, a ſtone wall, and certain bulwarks and parapets. Vpon the gate that leadeth to Amathus ſtandeth a ſix cornered tower: other towers ſtand out alſo in the wall, euery one of them ſcarce able to contain ſix pieces of Artillery. It hath a hauen opening toward the Southeaſt, defended from the iniury of the weather by two great rocks, betwixt which the ſea commeth in by a narow paſſage about forty paces ouer, but after opening wider giueth a conuenient harbor to ſhips, whereof it cannot contain any great number, and was now ſhut vp with a ſtrong chain. Neer vnto the hauen ſtandeth an old Caſtle with foure towers, after the antient manner of building. There was in the city one ſtrong bulwark, built after the maner of the fortification of our time, with paliſadoes, curtains, caſements, and ſuch C like, in ſuch manner, as that it ſeemed almoſt impregnable. All which, although they made ſhew of a ſtrong and well fortified city, yet for that there wanted many things, it was thought too weak long to hold out againſt the great power of the Turk: but what wanted by reaſon of the ſcituation and weak fortification, that the Gouernour and other noble captains ſupplied in beſt ſort they might, with a ſtrong garriſon of moſt valiant ſouldiers, the ſureſt defence of ſtrong places. There was in the city two thouſand and fiue hundred Italians, two hundred Albanois horſmen, before entertained by the Gouernour; and of the Cypriots themſelues were muſtred two thouſand and fiue hundred mo, all men reſolutely ſet down to ſpend their liues in defence of their country.

Muſtapha with wonderfull celerity hauing brought to perfection his fortifications, planted D his battery of 64 great pieces; amongſt which were foure great Baſilisks of exceeding bignes; wherewith he continually without intermiſſion battered the wals of the City in fiue places; but eſpecially that part of the wall that was between the hauen and the gate that leadeth to Amathus. And with great morter pieces caſt vp huge ſtones, which from high falling into the City, with their weight brake downe the houſes they light vpon, and fell oftentimes through their vaults, euen to the bottome of their cellars, to the great terror of the beſieged. The wals in diuers places ſore ſhaken, and the houſes beaten down, he began to aſſault the city: which the defendants (their forces yet whole) valiantly repulſed, and not only defended their wals and draue the Turks from the breaches, but furiouſly ſallied out vpon them, and hauing ſlaine and wounded many, wonderfully diſturbed their fortifications, & abated their courage: E neither did the enemy with greater fury maintain the battery or aſſault, than did the Chriſtians the defence of the city, ſtill ſending their deadly ſhot into the thickeſt of that great multitude; inſomuch that in few daies the Baſſa had loſt 30000 of his men: and the captains themſelues wondring at the valor of the defendants, as if they had not now to do with ſuch Chriſtians as they had before ſo oftentimes ouerthrown, but with ſome other ſtrange people, began to deſpair of the winning of the city. The Turks thus doubting, & almoſt at a ſtand, the Chriſtians in the mean time made vp their breaches with earth, baskets, wool ſacks, and ſuch like, not ſparing their very beds, and bed-cloths, cheſts, carpets, & whatſoeuer els might ſerue to fil vp the breach. Among many wants they feared, the greateſt was the want of pouder which with continuall ſhooting began greatly to diminiſh: wherefore to reſerue ſome part thereof F againſt al extremities, they thought it beſt whilſt yet ſome ſtore was left, to vſe the ſame ſtore ſparingly, and to ſhoot more ſeldome. But the Turks ſtill drawing neerer and neerer the city, & caſting vp mounts higher than the wals of the city, with earth & faggots filled vp the ditch: which done, they of the broken ſtones made wals on either ſide, to ſaue themſelues from the flankring ſhot of the Chriſtians; then giuing a freſh aſſault, they vſed not only their ſhot and other miſſiue weapons,but came foot to foot,and notably fought in the breach hand to hand. Which manner of fight (as if it had been ſo agreed vpon) they euery day maintained for the ſpace of ſix houres. And although the Turks by reaſon of their multitude were diuided into many parts,and freſh men ſtill ſucceeded them that were weary; yet ſuch was the courage of the defendants, that euery man requeſted to haue the places of moſt danger, and from thence with couragious hand repulſed the Turks with exceeding great ſlaughter. But for all that,the furious enemy maintaining the aſſault,not only by day,but by often alarms in the night alſo, kept the Chriſtians continually in doubtfull ſuſpence and readineſſe, as if they ſhould haue receiued a preſent aſſault: and as ſoon as it was day, with freſh men that had ſlept their ſleep, deſperatly aſſailed the Chriſtians almoſt ſpent and megre for lack of ſleep and reſt. Force not preuailing, the reſtleſſe enemy leauing nothing vnattempted, by a queint deuiſe was like to haue taken one of the gates of the city:there was growing in the Iſland great plenty of a kind of wood much of the nature of the Firre or Pitch tree, eaſie to be ſet on fire, but hardly to be quenched,but diffring in this,that in burning it gaue forth ſuch a noiſom ſmell, as was not by any man well to be endured:of this kind of wood the Turks brought a wonderfull quantity to one of the gates called Limoſina, which once ſet on fire, could not by the defendants by any means be quenched,although they caſt whole pipes & tuns of water at once into it,but moſt terribly burning cloſe vnto the gate by the ſpace of foure dayes, with the vehemencie of the heat and lothſomneſſe of the ſmell,ſo troubled the defendants,that ſcarce any of them could endure to ſtand vpon the wall, but forſaking the ſame, were euer and anon like to haue giuen the enemy leaue to enter.

Bragadinus the Gouernour,more careful of the common ſafety than of his own danger,ceaſed not ſtill to be going about from one place to another; telling the Italians, That now was giuen the fitteſt occaſion they could deſire, for them to ſhew their valor in,and to gaine great honour of their barbarous enemies: that it would be to their eternall glory, if by their onely means without any other help, the city ſo far off from the reliefe of the Chriſtians might be defended,and the great power of the Turks defeated:this(he ſaid)was the only time wherein it ſtood them moſt vpon to play the men;for if they could keep that little was left, the reſt of the Iſle would be eaſily recouered:and although the Turks army exceeded far in number, yet did they excell them in proweſſe and valour; whereby a few, and as it were but an handfull of men,had oftentimes preuailed againſt moſt infinit multitudes:now all the eies of the world, as well friends as foes to be fixed vpon them, ſo that if they held out againſt ſo great a power, both their enemies would admire their valour, and all Chriſtendome extoll their inuincible courage and proweſſe, and that they themſelues ſhould therby reap both great profit and honour: neither that any thing could be alledged, why they ſhould not be compared with the worthy knights of Malta, who to their eternall fame deliuered themſelues out of the mouth of the Turke,and left to the world a moſt faire example for men valiantly to ſtand in ſo good a quarrell vpon their own defence:Nicoſia(he ſaid)was loſt rather by the cowardiſe of the defendants, than by the valour of the enemy. He alſo praiſed the fidelitie and courage of the Græcians, who for any feare or danger could neuer be remoued from the Venetians, or induced to ſubmit themſelues vnto the Turks gouernment:and perſuaded them,with the ſame reſolution to defend their owne city, that they ſaw in the Venetian ſoldiers,fighting for them, and for their own honour to ſtriue with the Italians, in defence of their State, their countrey, their wiues, and children, againſt the tyrannie of the Turks; foraſmuch as aid would in ſhort time come,and ſet them free from all danger. The Senat alſo in like maner had ſent letters to Famaguſta,willing them to be of good cheere,and yet a while to hold out the ſiege, and that they ſhould be in ſhort time relieued.

Baleonius alſo Generall of the garriſon ſouldiers, himſelfe in armes was preſent at euery skirmiſh,carefully foreſeeing what was in euery place and at all times to bee done; and by encouraging of his ſouldiers, and aduenturing of his perſon, ſhewed himſelfe to be both a worthy commander and a valiant ſoldier. Neither did the ſoldiers alone,but euen the women alſo what they might, ſtriuing aboue the power of the ſtrength both of the minds and bodies;ſome bringing meat,ſome weapons vnto the defendants,and others,ſtones,beds,cheſts,and ſuch like ſtuffe to make vp the breaches. But victuals beginning now to wax ſcant,8000 of the vulgar ſort of people were turned out of the city,who al in ſafety were ſuffred to paſſe through the midſt of the Turks army,to ſeek their liuing in the country.

Thus

The Turks ſeek to vndermine the City.

A Thus whilſt open force preuailed not according to the Turks deſire, they began in foure places to vndermine the City, in hope to haue found entrance: but the defendants doubting ſuch a matter, by diligent liſtning, and great veſſels ſet full of water neer vnto the wals, and drums laid vpon the ground, by the mouing thereof diſcouered their works, and with countermines fruſtrated thoſe of the enemy: yet in ſo great a ſtir and hurly-burly all things were not poſſibly to be diſcouered; wherby it came to paſſe, that whilſt the defendants were altogether buſied in defending the wals, a mine not perceiued was ſuddenly blowne vp neer to the tower ſtanding vpon the hauen; by force wherof a great part of the wall thereabout was in a moment with a moſt horrible noiſe ouerthrown. With the fall therof the Turks thinking the City as good as taken, with an horrible ſhout and outcry mounted the wall, and in the breach ſet vp B their enſigns; County Peter, who had the charge of that part of the wall, being not now able to defend the ſame, ſo ſuddenly ouerthrown: which Neſtor Martinengus quickly perceiuing, came ſpeedily from his own ſtation, to repulſe the enemy now ready to haue entred. The fight became there moſt fierce and terrible, on the one ſide hope, on the other ſide deſperation, inraged their minds: the Turks were in hope, that if they forced themſelues but a little they ſhould forthwith win the city; and the defendants propounding nothing vnto themſelues but ſhamefull death and torture, fought as men altogether deſperat. The Turks truſted to their multitude, and the Chriſtians to their valor. In the mean time, Andreas Bragadinus with certain great pieces aptly placed, out of the caſtle ſlew a number of the Turks as they were comming to the breach. Baleonius hearing of the danger, came in haſt with a company of couragious ſoldiers, C to relieue them that were fighting at the breach, and cheering vp his followers, thruſt himſelf with the formoſt into the face of the breach; and there not only appointed what was to be don, and with cheerfull countenance encouraged his ſoldiers, but with his own hand, hauing ſlain many, took one of the Turks enſigns, when as he had before ſlain the bearer thereof, and tumbled him headlong into the ditch. With the ſight therof others incouraged, both on the right hand and on the left, made there a notable battell, as men fighting for their laſt hope. In fine the Turks were glad to retire, leauing behind them foure thouſand carkaſes of their ſlain fellows in the town ditch, with fourteen of their enſigns which were brought into the city. Neither was this victory gained without ſome loſſe of the Chriſtians; about a hundred were ſlain, among whom were Robertus Maluetius, Dauid Nocius, Celſus Feto, Eraſmus Firmo, all Captaines. D

For all this, they in the city, took ſmall reſt, the Turks great ſhot ſtil thundring in amongſt them; & that in ſuch furious ſort, as that in one day (which was the eighth of Iune) were numbred about fiue thouſand great ſhot, ſhot into the city. With which continuall battery, one of the round bulwarks of the towne was ſo ſhaken, as that a part of the front therof was fallen downe into the ditch, and another part ſtood leaning ready to fall, in ſuch ſort as that it was not longer to be defended: which the Chriſtians perceiuing, preſently vndermined the ſame bulwark, and in the mine placed certain barrels of gunpouder. The Turks comming to aſſault the place they had ſo ſore battered, the defendans after ſome ſmall reſiſtance feigned themſelues to retire for feare, ſo to draw the enemy the faſter on; who was no ſooner come to the E place deſired, but that fire being put to the mine, blew vp the bulwark with al them that ſtood thereon; of whom ſome were ouerwhelmed with the earth it ſelfe, other ſome were blowne vp in the aire, and falling downe again, miſerably periſhed; and other ſome ſhot (as it were) out of a gun, fell down a great way off, and ſo were rent in pieces: which was vnto the defendants a moſt pleaſant ſight. About ſix hundred of the Turks periſhed at this aſſault, amongſt whom were Muſtapha Generall of the voluntary ſoldiers, and Feregates a man of great marke amongſt the Turks. But by the haſty firing of the mine, there periſhed alſo about an hundred of the Chriſtians, ouertaken in their owne deuice, amongſt whom were alſo ſome of great account.

The Turks inflamed with their loſſes, were more inraged with the ſpeeches and perſuaſions F of Muſtapha their general; who moſt earneſtly exhorted them, with one conſent to aſſaile their enemies, now driuen into a corner of the Iland, ſpoiled of al their country, truſting more vnto the ſtrength of the place, than of themſelues, intreating for nothing more, than with their liues to depart thence. But what place (ſaid he) is there impregnable for the Turks? Nicoſia, Zigeth, and ſuch other ſtrong Townes woon, what are they but the monuments and teſtimo-nies of the cowardiſe of the Chriſtians,and the proweſſe of the Turks?This day (ſaid he)wil G confirm your former labors & victories,which you before vndertook for honor,but here ſhal you haue honor mixt with gold,and prey ſufficient to make you all rich. The Turks incouraged with this ſpeech of their General,as men forgetfull of all dangers, began a more terrible ſiege than before;and hauing with incredible labor made three great mines; and firing them, ouerthrew a great part of the caſtle wall,the notable defence of the hauen. Which don, they with all their force oftentimes aſſailed the city,as if it ſhould haue bin their laſt labour;neither ceaſed they ſo to do night or day. At which time alſo that part of the city which is beaten vpon with the ſea,was aſſaulted by them in the gallies alſo.

The poor Chriſtians ſpent with deadly wounds,continual labor, perpetual watching both night and day,and now brought to ſmal number, hardly withſtood the furious enemy, aſſaying H them in ſo many places at once, and held out that tempeſt rather with courage than ſtrength. In the mean while the enemies army increaſed daily,the Turks in hope of the like ſpoil they had at Nicoſia,continually repairing out of the countries therabout,to the camp.
The Chriſtian captains ſeeing their men with continual aſſaults ſore ſpent (inſomuch that how many ſoeuer they ſeemed to be,there was not aboue 300 ſound men left) but 7 barrels of pouder remaining,want of al things daily increaſing,and hope of aid decreaſing,& the Venetians, their only comfort,ſo far from them;the captains (I ſay) themſelues began to quaile in courage: and the rather, for that the relief ſent from Venice could not poſſibly be brought them,but ſtaid at Crete; the Turks gallies ſtil lying before Famaguſta,ſo that nothing could in ſafety be brought thither. This fear of the Captains could not long be hid or diſſembled, I but that it was of the Citiſens perceiued: who hauing neither power to hold out the ſiege, neither place left to fly vnto, ouercome with neceſſity,came flocking to the Gouernour, crauing of him aid and comfort; and with aboundance of tears beſought him,in this Common deſperation to take compaſſion of them,their wiues,and children,a people that had always ſo wel deſerued of the Venetian State. Their Walls (they ſaid) were beaten down, their Bulwarks ouerthrown, the ſoldiers that remained ſpent with wounds, watching, and famin; the Enemies ſtrength increaſing daily; ſo that they muſt needs in ſhort time all periſh with the ſword,if the city were by force taken. Wherfore they beſought him,that yeelding to neceſſity, which no power was euer able to withſtand, he would at laſt whilſt time yet ſerued, prouide for the ſafety of ſo faithfull and kind a people,and not to refuſe any conditions,how hard K ſoeuer.

They of Famaguſta parley with the Turks

The requeſts and tears of the Citiſens of Famaguſta, with the due conſideration of the diſtreſſed ſtate of the City,mooued Bragadinus to compaſſion; who comforting them vp in beſt ſort he could,perſuaded them to be of good cheer,for that he had care both of them and their ſtate, and would ſo prouide for them, as that they ſhould neuer repent themſelues of their fidelity and loialty toward the Venetian State. Hee in the mean time conſidering the greatneſſe of the danger which preſently hung ouer all their heads,propounded the matter in a general councel called together for the ſame purpoſe;where after a little debating the matter, they all agreed to yeeld: only Baleonius at the firſt diſſenting, as doubtful of the Turkes faith;but afterwards yeelding vnto the opinion of the reſt. So an herauld being ſent vnto the L Baſſa,a truce was taken for certain daies to parle in, and hoſtages giuen on both ſides, during which time not ſo much as a dart was thrown,or an arrow ſhot from either ſide. After a few daies parly the conditions were agreed vpon, wherupon the City ſhould be yeelded into the power of the Baſſa;which were theſe: Firſt,That the inhabitants in the city yet aliue,ſhould in ſafety injoy their liues,liberty,and goods,with the free exerciſe of the Chriſtian religion.
That the Gouernour with the reſt of the Captains and ſouldiers might in ſafety depart with bag and baggage; and at their departure to take with them fiue great pieces of ordnance and three horſes, which ſoeuer it ſhould pleaſe them to make choice of;& that the Turks ſhould ſafely conduct them into Crete,finding them both victuall and ſhipping. All which things were with more kindnes promiſed,than with fidelity performed: yet all theſe matters agreed M vpon and conceiued into writing,as alſo by ſolemn oath on both ſides confirmed;the gouernor ſending a meſſenger before,requeſted that he might haue leaue to ſee the Baſſa,and to deliuer vnto him the keyes of the city. Leaue being granted, Bragadinus the Gouernor, Baleonius, Andreas Bragadinus, Laurentius Thepolus Earle of Paphos, Io. Antonius Quirinus, Aloiſius Martinengus,

A tinengus with a great ſort of other Captains came into the Camp: but before they entred into the Baſſa's pauilion, they were commanded to deliuer their weapons, which they all did. At the firſt meeting Muſtapha entertained them curteouſly, and with many glorious words, as if it had bin in admiration, extolled their worthy valour and courage; ſaying, That he was glad now to know them by face, whoſe valiant minds he had before known by their moſt valiant deeds. Now proweſſe and valor ſeemed not only in ſafety, but alſo honoured of the Enemy: when after a long diſcourſe, the falſe Baſſa revolved vnto the miſchief and trechery he had before reſolued vpon; complaining, that certain of his men taken at the ſiege, had bin afterward againſt all reaſon and order ſlain. Which the gouernor and the reſt vtterly denying, hee ſtart vp as in a rage, and with high words and ſtern countenance vrging the fact, commanded them B all to be forthwith caſt in bonds; and ſo bringing them out of his pauilion, in the ſight of the Army, contrary to his oath and promiſe cauſed them all to be ſlain. At which time Bragadinus and Theupolus were oft times commanded to lay down their heads to haue had them ſtruck off: yet was their execution deferred, and their liues reſerued, not to ſaue them, but with more exquiſit puniſhment and torture to ſatisfie the barbarous cruelty of the faithleſſe and vnmercifull Tyrans. The next day after, Bragadinus hauing his ears before cut off in deſpight, was brought forth to be wondred at, and tortured with the moſt extremeſt kind of torture that Tyrannie it ſelf could haue deuiſed: for diſpoiled of his jewels and attyre, and a basket laid vpon his ſhoulders filled with earth, he was inforced oftentimes to carry the ſame, to repair the rampiers that were ouerthrown; and euer as he paſſed by, the proud Baſſa inſulting C vpon him, to fall down and kiſſe the ground at his feet: and ſo buffeted with the Turkes fiſts; and ſpurned as a dog with their feet, was in great deriſion and deſpight asked, whether he hoped that Chriſt his God would come to helpe him or no? Which indignity of it ſelf bitter and miſerable, the dignity of the man made much more miſerable; whoſe comly and ſtately countenance, with his long and reuerend beard, euen in that extremity added vnto him a certain majeſty and grace. In this ſo foul a ſight of vertue troden vnder foot, the poor Chriſtians could neither wel ſtay their tears, nor let them fall for fear of the Turks diſpleaſure. But the forſworn Baſſa, not only forgetfull of all humanity, but inraged rather with extream cruelty, cauſed that noble and worthy Bragadinus to be ſet in a chair, and his skin flain off from him quick: a puniſhment vnworthy of him that ſuffered it, but moſt worthy him that inflicted the D ſame. Yet in ſo great & horrible a torture he was not heard to let fall any word not beſeeming a faithfull Chriſtian, and the honor of his country; only he called vpon God for mercy, and deteſted the Turks perfidious trechery, and ſo breathed out his life. But the Tyrant, worthy of eternall infamy, not ſatisfied with the torture of the liuing man, cauſed the head to be cut off from the dead body, and vpon the point of a ſpear to be ſet vp on a high place for all men to look vpon. His skin alſo ſtuffed with chaffe he cauſed to be hanged vp at the yards arm, and ſo to be caried about; not ſo true a trophy of his victory, as a teſtimony of his perfidious tyrannie.
Two daies after, County Theupolus, after he had bin moſt ſhamefully intreated, ful of the marks of the Turks cruelty, was (to make an end withall) ſhamefully hanged in the market place. With what cruelty the Baſſa had tyranniſed vpon the Nobility, with the ſame he E alſo raged vpon the meaner ſort of citiſens, of whom ſome he ſlew, ſome he chained in the galies, and caried away the reſt into bondage: 300 Chriſtians, ſome ſoldiers, ſome citiſens, that came forth with the gouernor to ſee the Turks camp, were there alſo ſlain. Neſtor Martinengus a famous captain eſcaped the tyrants hands, being hidden by one of the Baſſa's Eunuchs; who by the help of a Greek fiſherman got to Leptis, and from thence to Crete, and ſo afterwards to Venice; where he faithfully reported to Aloyſius Moſenicus the Duke, the whole proces of that War, with the loſſe of that City: and that in the ſpace of threeſcore and ten daies there was aboue a hundred and forty thouſand great ſhot diſcharged againſt the city. Such Noblemen and gentlemen as eſcaped out of this ſo general a ſlaughter, baniſhed their Country, and in miſery, diſperſed without hope of return, led afterward a miſerable and vagrant life, though F ſome of them euen at this day (as I haue bin credibly informed) are by the Venetian State right wel maintained. The country people and artificers were generally by the Turks ſpared, for the peopling of the Country. This was the fatal ruin of Cyprus, one of the moſt fruitfull and beautiful Iſlands of the Mediterranian. The loſſe wherof not without cauſe grieued many Chriſtian princes, as ſometime a kingdome of it ſelfe, but now a prouince of the Turkiſh

Whilſt Muſtapha yet lay at the ſiege of Famaguſta, the other two Baſſa's, Partau and Haly, (the one the Admiral,and the other General of the ſoldiers appointed by Selymus for the keeping of the ſea,that no relief ſhould be ſent by the Venetians to Famaguſta: and further, as occaſion ſerued to infeſt their dominions) about the midſt of May arriued in Eubœa, with 230 gallies: whither Vluzales Viceroy of Algiers,with diuers other the Turks notable pyrats reſorted vnto them with their gallies. With this fleet departing from Eubœa,and ſailing alongſt the coaſt of Myſia,Ionia,Caria,and ſo directly toward the Rhodes,they were met with 30 gallies of the Turks aduenturers. After that, hauing left certain gallies to lie before Famaguſta, they directed their courſe for the Iſland of Crete, and the thirteenth of Iune put into H the bay of Amphimalea,now called Suda,and there landed 12000 men.

The Turk with a great fleet arriues at Crete.

Crete deſcribed

The Iſland of Crete,now called Candia,is greater than Cyprus,but leſſer than Sicilia or Sardinia: but for fertilitie comparable with any of the Iſlands of the Mediterranian. It was in antient time famous for many things,but eſpecially for a hundred cities which ſtood therin, as witneſſeth amongſt others, Seneca, Vrbibus centum ſpecioſa Creta: but at this time it hath only three,Candia a Colony of the Venetians,wherof the Iſle now taketh name; Canea, and Rhetimo. The circuit of the Iſland is fiue hundred and twenty miles, ful of hills; for which cauſe people of the Country are much delighted in hunting;in it is no nauigable riuer or venimous creature. It is now moſt famous thorow a great part of the World, for the good Malmſey which there groweth, and is from thence in great aboundance ſent into many far I countries. Therin grows alſo great plenty of Cypres trees, ſeruing for ſhipping. It is at this day ſubject to the Venetians. The Turks being landed, and ranging vp and down the Country, did what harm they poſſibly could,burning and ſpoiling all as they went; vntil that at laſt they were vpon the ſudden incountred by Franciſcus Iuſtinianus, who but a little before their landing was come into the Iſland with a thouſand ſouldiers,and now joining with the Iſland people,notably charged them,being altogether diſperſed and ſeeking after prey, and hauing ſlain many of them,inforced the reſt to retyre to their Gallies. The next day the Turks landing again in great number,burnt diuers towns,and ranſacked Setia and Rhetimo,where they took a rich prey,and caried away many priſoners. But loded with their booty,diſperſed,and fearing nothing leſſe than to be at that time ſet vpon, they were aſſailed by Lucas Michael a K valiant Captain, two thouſand of them ſlain, and with the loſſe of their booty and priſoners glad to retyre vnto their Gallies. Thus repulſed from Crete,they took their courſe to Cythera, Zacynthus,and Cephalenia, Iſlands ſubject to the Venetians;where beſides other harmes by them don, they carried away with them ſix thouſand poor Chriſtians into moſt miſerable captiuity.

The Turks driuen from Crete.

Departing thence,and ſailing alongſt the coaſt of Epirus, they came to Suppolo an hauen town in Epirus,which Venerius in the beginning of theſe wars had taken from the Turks,but was now again by them recouered. After that,they came to Dulcigno, which the Turks had but a little before beſieged by land,for that the Gouernor therof and of Antivari (another town of the Venetians vpon the frontiers of Dalmatia) had compacted with three hundred L Epirots to ſtir vp the country into rebellion,and to reuolt to the Venetians. For the effecting wherof the Epirots requeſted of the Venetians ſix thouſand ſoldiers to make head;which the Venetians promiſed to ſend them. Wherupon the aforeſaid Epirots forthwith took Arms, and raiſed moſt part of Epirus into rebellion:vnto whom was ſent at the firſt a captain with a hundred Italians from Catora. But when the Epirots vainly expecting the promiſed aid,ſaw themſelues on euery ſide hardly beſet with their enemies,diſpairing of any good ſucces,they yeelded themſelues to the mercy of Achmetes Baſſa, Selymus his great Lieutenant in Grecia, (who to repreſſe that ſo dangerous a rebellion was come thither with an Army of fourſcore thouſand Turks.) So was a moſt fair occaſion loſt,when as the reſt of the Epirots, inflamed with the hope of liberty, were ready to haue come vnto their friends already in Arms,and by M their example like enough to haue raiſed all Grecia into rebellion. But now deceiued of their expectation,they bewailed their miſery,and truſting to the promiſe of the Venetians, they had caſt themſelues and al theirs into moſt manifeſt danger. They of Dulcigno ſeeing themſelues hardly beſet both by ſea and land,ſent to Partau Baſſa, and couenanting with him, That A fair occaſion let ſlip.

A they might in ſafety depart, deliuered vnto him the town; and ſo Sara Martinengus gouernor of the town, with the gariſon ſoldiers, were in four ſhips conueyed in ſafety to Raguſium. As for the citiſens, promiſe was kept with them after the Turkiſh maner. In the ſame hurly the Turks took alſo the towns of Antivari and Budua. Antivari was both by ſcituation and fortification ſtrong, and furniſhed with a good gariſon. Neuertheles Alexander Donatus gouernor therof, a man of no experience in martial affairs, ouercome with the preſent fear, & diſpairing to be able to hold the town, cowardly yeelded the ſame vnto the enemy. Which his beaſtly cowardiſe the Senat ſuffered not vnpuniſhed, but confiſcating his goods, and remoouing him from the Senat, caſt him into exile. From Antivari, the Turks following their good fortune, departed with their fleet into the Bay called Rizonicus, but now the Bay of Catharo, and B both by ſea and land layd hard ſiege vnto the ſtrong Town of Catharo, called in antient time Aſcrivium: againſt which they caſt vp two great bulwarks, and planted theron nine great pieces of Artillery, wherwith to haue battered the Town and Caſtle. But the defendants as reſolute men ſallying out, put them from their Ordnance, and inforced them againe to their Gallies.

Certain ſtrong townes of the Venetians yeelded vnto the Turks.

Cowardiſe puniſhed.

Whilſt theſe things were in doing, Vluzales and Caracoza, both men of great account and name among the Turks, got leaue for ten days of the Admiral, with 60 Gallies to ſpoile the Iſlands neer therabouts ſubiect vnto the Venetians. Who comming to the Iſland Curzola, about eighty miles Eaſtward from Raguſium, landed their men, with purpoſe to aſſault the town of Curzola, of the ſame name with the Iſland. Which Anthonius Contarenus the gouer- C nor therof perceiuing, in the dead time of the night fled for fear out of the town, into the rocks and places of more ſafety, after whom the townſmen followed alſo: ſo that in the town were not left aboue 20 men, and about 80 women; who with weapons in their hands, after the reſt were fled, came to the walls, as wiſhing rather there to die, than to fall into the hands of the barbarous enemy. But at ſuch time as the Turks began to approch the town, and the women with ſtones, fire, and ſuch weapons as they had, were beating them off, and with greater courage defending the place, than was to haue bin in their ſex expected, by the goodnes of God a great tempeſt aroſe ſuddenly out of the North, which ſo outragiouſly toſſed the gallies, that Vluzales & Caracoza were glad to giue ouer the aſſault, and to get them thence into a place of more ſafety. Sailing alongſt the coaſt, they by the way ſpoiled Lyſna, Bracia, and Liſſa, D little Iſlands vpon the coaſt of Dalmatia, out of which they carried away 1600 poor Chriſtians into captiuity. Theſe arch-pyrats at their pleaſure roaming vp and down the ſea, fortuned to light vpon a ſhip of the Chriſtians, bound from Meſſana to Corcyra, which they took, and in rifling therof found certain letters directed to the gouernor of Corcyra, certifying him of the league then but lately concluded among the Chriſtian Princes. Which letters they ſent in poſt to Selymus, to giue him knowledge therof: who therupon writ to his Admirals, With all hoſtility to infeſt any of the dominions of the Chriſtian Confederats.

Curzola forſaken by the men, is defended by women.

The Turks fleet thus raging and reigning in the Adriatick, brought a great fear not onely vpon the coaſts of Dalmatia, Iſtria, and the Iſlands therabouts which were by them moſt afflicted, but alſo vpon the ſea coaſt of Apulia, and all alongſt that ſide of Italy, yea and vpon the E city of Venice it ſelf: inſomuch as they were glad to fortifie aswel the City, as the frontiers of their dominions, with new fortifications and gariſons, as did alſo the King and the pope in Italy: for why, no ſhip or gally could now look out of any port but it was preſently ſurpriſed and taken by the Turks. Which with the ſundry calamities before receiued, ſo confounded the Venetians, that they in their aſſemblies and conſultations ſeemed rather to quake for fear, than after their wonted maner, grauely to conſult how the enemy was to be repulſed. Yet for the more ſafety of their city, and for fear leſt the Turks fleet ſhould forcibly break in vpon them, they ſtrongly fortified the paſſages through the rock or bank which defendeth the city from the ſea, and kept continually twelue thouſand men in readines in the City, for the more aſſurance therof.

F All the Turks fleet being again met together, Partau and Haly departed from Aulona, the 26 of Auguſt, and ſailed directly to Corcyra: which little Iſland ſeemed to be compaſſed in round with the great enemies fleet. Partau Baſſa at his firſt arriual there landed 800 horſemen and a thouſand foot, who ranging vp and down the Iland, did great hurt, and burnt the very ſuburbs of the city. At which time the gariſon ſoldiers ſallying out vpon them with a thouſand horſmen and 500 foot ſlew a great number of them, and among the reſt one Paphus Rays a man of great name. Thus the Turks fleet hauing don wonderful harm in the Venetian territory, G as wel in the Iſlands as vpon the frontiers of Dalmatia, inriched with the ſpoile of thoſe countries, and carying away with them fifteen thouſand moſt miſerable captiues; departing from Corcyra, arriued al in the bay of Corinth, now called the gulf of Lepanto, where we wil for a while leaue them to ride in ſafety.

The Turkes put into the Bay of Lepanto.

At ſuch time as this great fleet (the terror of that part of Chriſtendom) firſt put into the Adriatique, Venerius the Venetian Admiral then lying with fifty gallies at Corcyra, and fearing if he ſhould longer ſtay there, to be inforced with ſo ſmall a power to fight againſt ſo ſtrong an enemy, or els ſo to be ſhut vp, that he could not joyn his forces with the Spaniſh fleet, which was daily expected; vpon the comming of the fleet departed thence to Meſſana, H there more commodiouſly and more ſafely to attend the comming of Don Iohn of Auſtria, general of the Spaniſh forces. At his comming Columnius met him with 12 gallies (which the great Duke of Florence had ſent in the aid of the Confederats) and three gallies of Malta, who only were yet come thither, and with great honor receiued him. Not long after, M. Antonius Quirinus and Antonius Canalis came thither alſo with 62 gallies, before appointed by the Venetians for the relief of Famaguſta, but now called back again to join with the reſt of the fleet: and in ſhort time the gallies of Sicily arriued there alſo. At laſt after long expectation in the later end of Auguſt came Don Iohn with his Spaniſh fleet; a man then about 24 yeares old, in whom wanted no honorable parts, his mothers blemiſh only excepted: who although he was moſt dear vnto his father Charles the fift, yet left he him nothing by his Wil, but only I commended him to his ſon Philip as his brother. The Venetian and the Popes Admirals hearing of his comming, went to meet him, and that with ſuch triumph and joy, that all the former heauines before conceiued of his long ſtaying, was turned into gladnes, with moſt aſſured hope of triumphant victory; their doubled forces, and two great fleets joined in one, encouraged them aboue meaſure, filling all the Weſt with expectation of ſome great matter.
The Venetian fleet conſiſted of 108 gallies, ſix galliaſſes, two tall ſhips, and a great number of ſmall galliots. Vnto them were joined 12 gallies of the Popes, of whom Columnius was admiral.
And with Don Iohn the General, and Auria the Spaniſh Admiral, came 81 Gallies, of whom three were from the Knights of Malta. In this fleet, beſide mariners, were reckoned to be twenty thouſand men, an Army not only beautiful for ſhew (as conſiſting of moſt choice K bodies) but indeed ſtrong and puiſſant, old beaten ſouldiers almoſt throughout it, in euery place intermixed with others of leſſe skil: many known to be men of great experience, rich and luſty bodies, were by name called forth to this ſo honorable ſeruice; and diuers others of great nobility, as wel old men, as yong and luſty gallants, for the naturall hatred they bare against the Common Enemy, came, and as voluntary men cheerfully thruſt themſelues into that religious War; euery of which Noblemen as they were greater by birth or power, ſo had they drawn after them a greater number of their fauorits and followers, ſtrong and able bodies of their own charge brauely armed, who ſought for no other pay for their pains and danger, but by ſome notable victory to eterniſe their names, or honourably to ſpend their liues in ſo iuſt a quarrel, as for the defence of the Chriſtian faith and Religion. Among theſe moſt honorable L and reſolute men were three of greateſt mark, Alexander Farneſius Prince of Parma, in time to be the honor and glory of Italy his natiue country; whoſe vntimely death in the low Countries euen his honorable enemies lamented; and being dead, is not without cauſe and worthy deſert accounted among the moſt politique and famous leaders of our age. The ſecond was Franciſcus Maria prince of Vrbin, a yong man honorably deſcended, and of an inuincible courage. And the third P. Iordanus Vrſinus, an honorable gentleman of the family of the Vrſini in Rome.

The forces of the confederats meet together at Meſſana.

Don John of Auſtria General.

All the power of the confederat princes thus met together at Meſſana, and al things now in readineſſe, a Councel was called by the General, to reſolue what courſe to take in thoſe moſt dangerous wars, againſt ſo puiſſant an enemy: vnto which Councel were admitted onely Don M Iohn the General himſelf, and Aloiſius RecheZenes, of ſome called Requeſenius, great Commendor of Caſtile, the Generals lieutenent, or rather director of his actions; Sebaſtianus Venerius the Venetian Admiral; and Auguſtinus Barbadicus General proueditor, of equal authority and reputation with the Admiral; and one Secretary. Marcus Antonius Columnius the Popes admi-rall,

A ſal,with Pompeius Colonna his kinſman. The chief point wheron theſe great Commaunders were to reſolue,was, Whether they ſhould aduenture the general fortune of a battel againſt ſo ſtrong an enemy,or only ſeek to defend the frontiers of their own dominions. Which queſtion (as all others of like ſort)was of diuers diuerſly fanſied, euery man pleaſing himſelfe with his own reaſons. Requiſenius, Don Iohn his chief Counſellor(without whom he willingly did nothing,and vndoubtedly a man of great valour and experience) ſpeaking firſt, ſaid, That the Enemies ſtrength was neceſſarily to be known,before they committed all to the fortune of a battel; and that therfore delay was to be vſed,leſt improuident haſt ouerthrew all. Matters of War that were to be decided by the ſword,were (as he ſaid) with great and ſound aduice to be adminiſtred,for that the errors of battel,wherby all was to be put in haſard, were not again B to be amended. He highly commended Scipio Africanus,who counſelled great Commanders not to fight with the enemy but vpon ſome great advantage, or els therunto forced by neceſſity.
But as things now ſtood,what opportunitie could be miniſtred,or aduantage taken,the enemy keeping himſelf cloſe within the bay of Corinth,and no apparant means how to draw him out from thence. Neither that he for his part was of ſo great ſpirit,as within the harbor in place of diſaduantage,without hope,to ſet vpon an enemy in common eſtimation ſtronger than himſelf. For what diſhonor ſhould they incur, if hauing receiued ſome notable loſſe; they ſhould be inforced with ſhame to giue ouer the enterpriſe begun? And to beſiege Orichus, Dirrachium,or Caſtrum Novum,frontier Towns of the Turks, ſo to draw them out to battel; what were this more, than to ſhew a certain fear & diſtruſt in themſelues, and to diſcourage C the minds of the ſouldiers? For as well the Enemy, as the common ſouldior,would forthwith deem ſuch a poor attempt to proceed of a meer fear,as to make a vain ſhew of ſomthing doing,when as they durſt not incounter the enemy in his ful ſtrength. As for the other reaſon drawn from Neceſſity; What neceſſity had they,ſo deſperatly to ſet vpon the enemy, who vpon the approch of Winter muſt needs in ſhort time lay vp his Gallies; and being already in ſafe harbor, would neuer be drawn to the haſard of a battel, eſpecially like hope,like ſtrength, like danger appearing on both ſides? Wherfore it were beſt in his opinion, only to make a great ſhew of their forces, ſo to terrifie the barbarous Enemy; but in no caſe to hazard the hope of the whole Chriſtian Commonweal vpon the fortune of one battell. He further alſo propounded vnto him the vncertain euents of things, the common chances of War, D the ſtrength of the Enemy as wel by ſea as by land, with whom they themſelues were not (as he ſaid) indeed comparable. Then what an infinit heap of miſeries was like to ouerwhelm the Chriſtian Commonweal,if they ſhould in any thing miſcarry. And that therefore ſafe aduice was in this caſe to be preferred, before that which was attended vpon with great and imminent danger.

The Venetians vrge battell.

On the other ſide the Venetians, who thought all delay both infamous and dangerous to their State,were far of another opinion. Where Venerius and Barbadicus not only vehemently perſuaded,but moſt inſtantly requeſted the Generall, with the reſt of the great Commanders, That as ſoon as opportunity ſerued they would commit the matter to the trial of a battel, and not make that Councel,which their couragious minds might make moſt glorious & E fortunat,by declining of battel to become diſhonorable & fruſtrat. If deſire of honour (ſayd they) mooue vs not,ſhal neither theſe things mooue vs? the loſſe of ſo great and chargeable a preparation, the ſpoiling of our frontiers, and the inſolencie of our enemies, which we increaſe by delay? We defend our ſelues and ours,we inuade not them: We go not about to driue the Turk out of his Empire; but that we our ſelues be not by him driuen out of our own countries. Wherfore we ought ſo much the more readily and ſpeedily to think of battell,by how much the neceſſity of him is greater that repulſeth a danger,than of him that offreth the ſame. What are our weapons blunt, or our hands benummed? Shall the Turks ſo often prouoke vs,& we ſtil be vnreuenged? Shall we alway ſhew our weapons, & neuer fight? One fortunat battel is able to blot out the infamy of former time, & to fil vs with hope of future happines.
F If nothing els, let the very indignity of the matter ſtir vs vp to battell. And what doubt is there but that the Enemy ſwelling with pride,wil come forth with his fleet and giue vs battel? Think you that a ſmal diſcredit wil inſue to our honour and reputation,if contented with a vain brag,hauing not once skirmiſhed with the Enemy, or ſo much as ſeen him,we ſhall return home,to the generall ſhame of Chriſtendom? See how many peſtilent inconveniences veniences

uenienccs will inſue, if we ſhall take this courſe. This manner of proceeding wil fil all mens minds with diſpair; the people wil murmure, That they are to no purpoſe oppreſſed with exactions and tributes. The confederat princes (carefull of this war) will ſay, That they haue in vain wearied themſelues with often embaſſies and care therof. The proud enemy wil account our departure, or declining of battel, for a maniſeſt victory. The next year we may looke for him again with a greater and ſtronger fleet, which wil not only make a more heauy War, but deſtroy and bear down all before it. At which time who can aſſure vs that the Chriſtians will haue the like preparation, if we ſhal now delay to fight. What labor is to be taken? what coſt to be beſtowed, to ſet forth again ſo great a fleet? Vnto theſe cauſes which impoſe vpon vs a neceſſity and force to fight, is adioyned not only a ſingular regard of our honor, but a moſt notable opportunity alſo offered. We neuer had a greater fleet, nor better furniſhed with men, munition, and all things els to be required for the gaining of a notable victory: & who knows not the Chriſtian gallies are far ſtronger than the Turks? Beſides that, the greateſt part of their beſt ſoldiers are in hope of prey gon into Cyprus, who there ſeeking after ſpoil, & forgetful of the enemy, without controlment glut themſelues with the pleaſures of that rich Iſland, wherby their fleet is ſo much the weaker. All which things, as they promiſe no hard victory, ſo do they propound vnto vs honor, glory, fame, and moſt honorable rewards; & open vnto vs the way both for the defence of the preſent, and recouery of that hath bin before loſt. What then ſtand we ſtil looking for? or why do we not in Gods name ioin that battel, which is vnto vs not only neceſſary, but profitable alſo. G H

Thus much ſaid, they began to intreat and beſeech the General and the reſt, not longer to ſuffer the Chriſtian commonweal to receiue loſſe vpon loſſe, but to repoſe their only hope in the good ſucces of one worthy battel; and neuer to look for the like opportunitie if they let ſlip the preſent. This matter of ſo great conſequence thus thorowly debated among the greateſt commanders, they thought it good to hear alſo the opinions of other noble Captains, of no leſſe experience than themſelues (then in the fleet) before they would conclude any thing. Among the reſt, Antonius Cornea and Gabriel Serbellio, both Spaniards, and for their great wiſedom and valor had in general reputation of all men; beeing demaunded their opinions, with moſt ſubſtantial reaſons declared the neceſſity of giuing battel; and that it was not ſo dangerous as to be therfore ſhunned or delaied, forſomuch as that violent enemy was far eaſier to be dealt withall at ſea than at land, where he muſt fight without his great multitude of men, the Turks chief hope, and onely means wherby they haue obtained ſo many victories againſt the Chriſtians. And ſo concluded their opinions with an effectuall perſuaſion to ſet forwards to Corcyra, and without delay as occaſion ſerued to giue the enemy battel. Which their opinion being generally wel liked, was ſhortly after by the General and the reſt approoued, & a reſolution ſet down for the giuing of battel. Which was no ſooner known but there was a general reioicing through the army, euery man cheerfully preparing himſelf to lay down his life in defence of the Chriſtian Commonweal, and that with ſuch an erneſt deſire of battel, that euery day now ſeemed nothing els but a delay of a moſt aſſured victory. I K

Cornea & Serbellio perſuade the giuing of battell.

The confederats put their fleet in order of battell.

Yet before they ſhould come into the ſight of the enemy, the three Admirals thought it good to bring forth the fleet into the ſea, and there to martial the ſame in ſuch ſort, as if they ſhould euen then preſently haue ioined battel: to the intent, that by ſuch orderly diſpoſing of their fleet, and by appointing to euery man his place he was to keep, they might ſo acquaint them with the order of the battel, as that they ſhould when time ſerued, of themſelues without further direction, martial themſelues, and ſo more readily enter into battel. The next day the Admirals brought forth their fleets into the open ſea: in the right wing (which conſiſted of fifty three Gallies) was Auria placed; in the left wing was Auguſtinus Barbadicus with the like number of Gallies alſo; and in the middle battel ſtood the General himſelf with ſeuenty gallies: on the right hand of the General ſtood Columnius, and on the left Venerius his aſſociats. Thus with equal front the fleet ſet forward, as if they ſhould euen preſently haue ioined battel. Betwixt the wings and the middle battel was left no more ſpace but for three gallies to row: in the rereward behind the General followed Requiſenius, the great Commaunder of Caſtile, with his gallies. After Columnius followed the Admiral gally of Genoa, wherin was Alexander Farneſius Prince of Parma: and behind Venerius came the Admiral gally of Sauoy, and in her the Prince of Vrbin; in the ſpace betwixt the middle battel and the left wing, was L M

A placed Paulus Iordanus : and betwixt the middle battel and the right wing was Petrus Iuſtinianus with the gallies of Malta : vpon the left wing attended Anthonius Canalis, and Quirinus on the right. About half a mile behind all the reſt followed Alvarus Bacianus Marquis of Sancrace, and Admiral of the Neapolitan fleet, with 30 gallies; a man of great experience in matters at ſea, and now ſo placed, to be at all times ready to relieue this or that part of the fleet, as the fortune of the battel, or impreſſion of the enemy ſhould require. The Chriſtians had repoſed great hope in ſix galliaſſes; which furniſhed with great ſtore of ordnance, & certain ſelect companies of moſt reſolute ſoldiers, ſeemed rather like caſtles than ſhips. Theſe galliaſſes conducted by Franciſcus Dodus a moſt expert captain, were placed aboue half a mile from the fleet, two of them before each wing, and the other two before the middle battell: ſo far diſtant B one from another, as that with equal ſpace they anſwered the whole bredth of the front of the fleet, which was almoſt the ſpace of fiue miles, and ſerued the ſame in ſtead of moſt ſtrong bulwarks. The gallies throughout the fleet kept not cloſe together, but ſuch a conuenient diſtance one from another, as might ſerue for them at liberty to diſcharge their Ordnance when time ſhould require. In the wings, as alſo in the main battel, were the Popes, the Kings, and the Venetian Gallies indifferently intermixed, that by the quality of the danger they ſhould haue more care to relieue one another than if they had ſerued apart. Ioannes Cardonius a moſt valiant captain, with 8 gallies of Sicily and 2 galliots, was appointed to go ten miles before the fleet, to deſcry what he might of the enemies doings, and in his return to join the one half of his gallies to the one wing, and the other half to the other.

C In this ſort they departed from Meſſana, with purpoſe to ſeek out the enemy; and not long after came to Paxo; where of a ſmall broil at the firſt had like to haue riſen a great miſchief: for the next day, whilſt Don Iohn ſtaied there to take a view of the Venetian Gallies, and how they were furniſhed both of men and munition; he finding them but weakly manned, for ſupplying that want, appointed 4000 Spaniards and a thouſand Italians to be put abord into the Venetian gallies where moſt need was.

Amongſt theſe ſouldiers was one company vnder the command of Mutius Tortona their Captain, a man of an vnquiet and furious nature: who going aboord the gally of Andreas Calergus, firſt fel to words with the Captain of the gally, and after much ſtir into plain fight; ſo that in a trice they were altogether by the ears, as wel the ſoldiers as the captains: of al which D ſtir Mutius was the only author. Venerius being not far off, and hearing of the matter, ſent the captain of his own gally to appeaſe the tumult: who thruſting himſelf into the midſt of the furious multitude, was by Mutius in his fury fouly intreated, and diuers of them that came with him ſhrewdly beaten. Which thing Venerius (himſelf alſo of an hot nature) taking as don in diſgrace of the Venetians, and therwith exceedingly moued; to the terror of others cauſed Mutius and his Enſigne-bearer to be hanged vp at the yards arm of the ſame gally; to the great offence of all the Spaniards. The Generall alſo taking this execution in euill part, ful of choler and indignation grieuouſly complained, that he himſelf as General was therin not a little wronged; and that it became euery man to know what belonged to his place, and not to incroch vpon his betters: ſo ſhould the conditions of the league be better kept, if euery E Commander could keep himſelf within the bounds of his own authority. Venerius (he ſaid) whoſe authority was inferior to his, could not of right without his command determine any thing againſt Mutius a Spaniſh captain: and that therin his honor was impaired. For which if he had not a publique and honorable amends, he threatned by force of arms to redreſſe his wrong, and the league being broken, to carry away with him the Kings gallies. Neither wanted there ſome, who fauoring Don Iohns quarrell, and angry with the Venetians, laid ſtill more coles on the fire that was already too great. Hereunto Venerius ſent word vnto the Generall, That he ſhould do wel to moderat his anger, and at leiſure to aduiſe himſelfe, and better to vnderſtand the matter; ſo ſhould he plainly ſee, that there was neuer more iuſt and wholſom execution don vpon any, than vpon thoſe mutinous perſons. But if he, carried away with the F heat of youth, ſhould attempt any more violent courſe than ſtood with the common quiet, it were not to be marueiled if he afterward repented. He (as he ſaid) was alſo in Arms, and ready to ſhew himſelf a man. The matter was grown to that heat, that it was not onely not far from the breaking off of the league; but euen at the point to haue ſet all on a broile, and to haue put the whole fleet in great danger. Had not Columnius the Popes Admirall, againſt this tempeſt oppoſed himſelf:he with al his power labored to cure the wounded mind of the General,and to appeaſe his anger ; telling him, That the Common enemy would hardly be withſtood by them all,being at vnity and concord among themſelues:but if vnto the forrein danger were alſo ioined domeſtical diſcord,then were the Chriſtian commonweal vndon.But if he would moderat his anger,and more regard the honor and credit of the Venetian Admiral,than the puniſhment of a ſeditious man, euen they which were vnto him friends, and enemies vnto the Venetians,would highly commend his moderation & ſtaidnes. Yea,that howſoeuer the matter was don,it could not be now vndon. But whatſoeuer Venerius had don,was in his opinion iuſtly don. That it was alwaies ſo accounted and obſerued,that when princes joined their forces together, in matters that concerned the common mannaging of War,nothing was to be don without the command of the Generall ; but in matters belonging to the priuat gouernment of euery mans regiment,euery General had power of life and death ouer them that were vnder his command. Which to be ſo,was as he ſaid herby to be vnderſtood: King Philip was King of many kingdoms , and that he might long ſo be he heartily wiſhed : Now if any Millanois had committed any capital crime worthy of death,in the kingdom of Naples , ſhould the iudgment of that crime be of right to be referred vnto the King himſelf,as the chief Soueraign ? or vnto the Gouernor of Millain, where the offendor was born? or rather to the ciuil Magiſtrat of Naples,in whoſe iuriſdiction the fault was committed,and ſo of right there to be executed ? What difference was there then,but that Mutius might iuſtly ſeem to haue bin rightly puniſhed by Venerius, who although he were a Spaniſh Captain, had yet raiſed a mutiny in a Venetian Gally which was vnder the commaund of the Venetian Admiral. Beſide that, the diſcipline of War ſomtime required a ſeuere and exemplary kind of puniſhment. For which cauſe it was both notably and truly ſaid of Clearchus, That a General was to he more feared of his ſoldiers,than the enemy. And that among the antient Romans it had bin the cuſtom,euen for priuat men with more ſeuere puniſhment to reſtrain the factious Citiſen,than the moſt cruell enemy. That the fact was not ſo much to be regarded, as the intention of him that did it. That it was the duty of Commaunders to withſtand the madnes of the mutinous. The author of ſedition and tumult, he ſaid, had ſuffered but condign puniſhment of his fact:who if he had eſcaped vnpuniſhed,would but haue bin the more diſordred. But now his exemplary puniſhment would deter others from the like inſolencie: Beſide that,the external danger was ſuch,as ought to reconcile them were they neuer ſo great enemies. That ſuch men as they were ſhould aboue all things regard what might profit or hurt the Common cauſe ; in contemplation wherof all priuat injuries were to be remitted : and the rather, for that the honor and diſhonour of the good or bad ſucces of ſuch an important action ſhould redound vnto themſelues,but eſpecially to the General. His own duty he had as he ſaid diſcharged,in dealing ſo plainly and faithfully with him,and could do no more but pray vnto God,with mercifull eie to behold the troubled Chriſtian Commonweal in ſo dangerous a time.

Don Iohn ſtill envieth Venerius.

Thus was the mutiny at Paxo by the great labour of Columnius hardly appeaſed. Neuertheleſſe Don Iohn could not afterwards endure to participate with Venerius his Counſels,or ſo much as to come into his company : but all was don by Barbadicus the Venetian Prouidetor.

Barbadicus a notable man.

This Barbadicus was not inferior to Venerius in courage and valor,but far beyond him in diſcretion : a man of a tall and goodly perſonage, wel coloured,his beard grizy, though not for age, for why he was not aboue fifty years old : beſides that,in his eies and countenance appeared a vivacitie or liuelines of ſpirit : in his very gate and comly motion of his body hee carried a certain grace and majeſty : his talk and ſpeech was alwaies calm and temperate, his counſell graue and ſound ; ſo that he was greatly honored and beloued of all men. His chief endeuor alſo was, to further the hope of attonement betwixt the Spaniards and the Venetians,ſo well begun by Columnius. And ſo all things brought into ſome reaſonable good tearms,they departed from Paxo and came to the Iſland of Corcyra, the ſpoil wherof wel declared the Enemies late being there. From thence they departed vnto Cephalenia, where they by Letters from Pau.Contarenus Gouernour of Zacynthus, were aduertiſed, That the Turks fleet of three hundred and three and thirty ſail, of one ſort and other, lay in the gulf of Corinth, which is now called the gulf of Lepanto. Wherupon they ſhortly after remooued, with full purpoſe to haue gon to Petala,an hauen lying oppoſit ouer againſt the Iſlands (or rather rocks) called

Echinades,

A Echinades, but now Corzulares, and ſo to the bay of Corinth, to draw the enemy forth to battel: but ſtayed with contrary winds they put back again into the vally of Alexandria, another port in the Iſland of Cephalenia; from whence they afterward departed to the Iſlands Corzulares, where by the way they vnderſtood by letters out of Crete, That Famaguſta was loſt. With which bad news they were no whit diſcouraged, but rather inflamed with deſire of reuenge. From the Iſlands they went to Galanga, a good harbour, where they ſtaied one night, purpoſing the next day to haue gon to the mouth of the gulf of Lepanto, there to dare the Turks to battel.

The Turks Baſſa's Partau and Haly, who then lay in good ſafety within the gulf, hearing of the comming of the Chriſtian fleet, began to conſult with the reſt of the moſt expert Captains, B Whether to giue the Chriſtians battel, or to keep themſelues ſtil within their ſafe harbor: vpon which doubt they were among themſelues of diuers opinions. Amongſt the reſt, Chiroche a man of great years and authority, and withall a moſt noble Captain, exhorted the Baſſa's, in no caſe, when no need was, vpon a vain-glory to aduenture all to the fortune of an vncertain battel: it was, as he ſaid, the part of wiſe and worthy commanders, to moderate with reaſon their happy fortunes, for that therunto were incident many accidents, wherby their former felicity might be diſgraced. They had already run along the enemies coaſt, ſpoild the frontiers of his countries, and were with much honor & greater ſpoil ſafely returned, hauing increaſed the Turkiſh empire with many ſtrong towns of the enemies. The Iſland of Cyprus was with wonderfull good fortune brought vnder the Turks obeiſance, the enemies great prouiſion C at ſea fruſtrated, in ſuch ſort, as that hauing loſt diuers of their gallies, they were neuer yet able to draw their ſwords: they had with their fleet at their pleaſure romed vp and downe the Adriatick, and diſplaied their victorious enſignes almoſt vnto the very City of Venice. What could they then deuiſe or wiſh for more honorable or glorious, than with the ſafety of their fleet, yea without any loſſe at all, to haue performed ſo great matters? Now the three General commanders of the enemies fleet to be ſo at diſcord among themſelues, as that they were ready to fall in ſunder of themſelues; who now vpon the approch of winter, and for want of victual muſt needs in few daies return home again, neuer herafter to meet again with like ſtrength at ſea. And therfore to what purpoſe were it, by force of arms and vncertain battell, with danger to ſeek for the ſoueraignty and command of the ſea, which would forthwith of it D ſelf without any danger fal vnto them? neither ſhould they by the doubtful victory ſo much increaſe their honour, as by the vncertain euent of a battell blemiſh the ſame, if any thing ſhould fal out otherwiſe than wel. And that therfore they ſhould do well to take heed, that in ſeeking to augment their former victories, they hazarded not their honor already gained; but wholſomly to delay the War, and keepe themſelues in ſafety with their fleet within the gulf, and not to go out at the enemies pleaſure, but when they ſhould ſee good themſelues, at ſuch time as the enemy was not ſo wel prouided. So ſhould they (he ſaid) without any great labor or danger attain to the full of their own deſires.

Partau Baſſa was of opinion, that the Chriſtians would not at all offer him battel. Which opinion the Chriſtians had alſo of him: and in this queſtion, for giuing or not giuing of battel, E ſeemed neither to approoue or diſlike that Caroche had ſo grauely ſpoken, but as a man indifferent, loth to incur any blame, ſhewed himſelf ready either to ſtay or ſet forward, as ſhould be thought fit by the greater part. But Haly Baſſa, a man of a hoter ſpirit, and the great Champion of the Turks, could not indure to hear of any delay, but of preſent battell. The pleaſure of Selymus, the hope of victory, the remembrance of the diſpleaſure of Pial Baſſa had the laſt year incurred, for not giuing the Chriſtians battell, induced him now in no caſe to refuſe battel, but forthwith to go out of the gulf, and to accept therof if it were offered. In which opinion he was the more confirmed by the relation of Caracoza a famous Pyrat, and in great account among the Turks; who in a ſwift galiot taking view of the Chriſtian fleet, had reported it to be much leſſe than indeed it was; deceiued as it was afterward thought by not taking ful F view therof, by reaſon of his poſting haſt; or els blinded by the Iſland, which lying behind the fleet, ſuffered him not perfectly to deſcry the ſame. Vpon which report there was great reioycing among the Turks, who now after their accuſtomed maner dreamed of nothing but victory and ſpoil. So that Haly, vainly perſuaded that his fleet was both the greater and ſtronger, would now needs fight, in hope that the Chriſtians vpon firſt ſight of the Turkes fleet would either retyre and ſaue themſelues by ſhamefull flight, or els in aduenturing battel at ſo great ods, by their fooliſh hardines receiue a notable ouerthrow. This opinion of the Baſſa was alſo not a little confirmed by the perſuaſion of Caſſanes, Barbaruſſa's ſon, Vluzales, and Chais Beg Gouernor of Smyrna, all men of great mark and experience, eſpecially in ſea matters. And although Partau the other Baſſa ſtood wauering as a man in doubt, and Chiroche Gouernor of Alexandria, with Carabuzes Gouernor of Cilicia, and Mechmet Gouernour of Eubœa, men of no leſſe worth than the other, vpon better conſideration were of a quite contrary mind, for not giuing the Chriſtians battel. Yet ſuch was the authority of Haly, or rather his importunitie, forced to his own deſtiny, that his opinion preuailed; ſo that now out they muſt needs and fight. Albeit that two other Spies ſent out after Caracoza, and hauing more perfectly viewed the fleet, returning with ſpeed told the Baſſa's as truth was, That the Chriſtians very ſtrong and wel appointed, were comming with enſignes diſplaied, of purpoſe to fight; and that their fleet was in number much greater than was before ſuppoſed. With which news ſo far contrary to their expectation, the Baſſa's were exceedingly troubled: and demaunding whether the formoſt gallies were all Venetians or not; and being anſwered that they were intermixt, ſome Venetians, ſome Spaniſh and of the other Weſtern countries, they began to doubt the worſt, and became exceeding penſiue. Neuertheles knowing themſelues to be of all things wel furniſhed, hauing now victualled in the bay of Corinth, and there alſo taken in 12000 Ianizaries and Spahies, drawn out of the garriſons of Ætolia, Acarnania, Peloponeſus, and the countries there by, all reſolute men, and four thouſand other common ſoldiers, and that they could not now with their honor ſhrink back, they held it ſtil for the beſt to on hold their former reſolution for the giuing of the Chriſtians battel. Yet before their ſetting forward, calling together the captains and chief commanders of the fleet, Partau the more to incourage them, ſpake vnto them as followeth:

We are to fight (ſaid he) *fellows in arms, with that kind of men whom our anceſtors haue driuen out of Eubæa, the Rhodes, Mitylene, Peloponeſus, and Tripolis, and we our ſelues but yeſterday out of the famous Iſland of Cyprus; whoſe cities and ſtrong towns, in number infinit, our Emperor hath as the reward of his wars; whom we haue alwaies vanquiſhed as well by ſea as by land: and ſhall it then now repent you that you in this war imbrued in the Chriſtian bloud, haue ſunk or taken many of their ſhips and gallies? That you haue caried away great and rich ſpoils? that you haue taken whole Iſlands and cities at the firſt aſſault? That we haue by proof ſhewed vnto the world, what force there is in the Turk to ſubdue ſtrong cities and towns? and what little power is in the Chriſtians to defend the ſame? What direction brought vs victory before, the ſame ſhall alſo at this preſent giue vs the like. Not to ſpeak of that, that we far excell them both in number of men and gallies; this is more to be reckoned of, that we excell them in valour and proweſſe: for you being old expert ſoldiers, from your infancie trained vp in the wars, hardned in infinit battels, and full of courage and ſtrength, ſhal fight againſt weak freſh-water and effeminat ſoldiers; who entertained for pay (of the refuſe of all Nations) know nothing belonging to the warres; or forcibly preſſed out of Cities, ſerue not becauſe they would, but becauſe they can neither will nor chuſe. But to ſpeak no more of the maner of the Chriſtian ſoldiers, who are nothing els than the perpetual exerciſe of your renowned proweſſe; and to come vnto him vnder whoſe fortune and conduct they ſerue: What ſhould I ſay? Should I compare either of vs (who haue ſpent our liues in victories and triumphs: who born & brought vp amongſt arms, haue with our right hands gained vnto our ſelues honor and fame) with this ſtripling and half-moneths captain, who neuer ſaw battels but theſe? Who in a leſſe matter neuer ſhewed proofe of himſelf, why ſhould he be accounted of in a greater? who in ſo mighty a cauſe needeth a tutor; and ſuch a one as indeed bears the name of a General, more for his honor, than for any worth in himſelf. Beſides, amongſt the enemies is ſuch diſſention, that euery man regardeth his own priuat, ſerueth as pleaſes himſelf, contemneth and is contemned: wheras with vs is ſuch conſent, that it canot be deuiſed how the ſoldiers in general ſhould more truſt their commanders, or the Commanders their ſoldiers. What things were by the diſcipline of war or carefulnes of a General to be prepared, all thoſe you haue abundantly and plentifully in readines: Onely this laſt warlike labour remaineth; which once diſpatched, our Enemies ſhal be diſcomfited euen in that wherin their greateſt confidence reſteth. They ſhall be deſpoiled of their honour and traffique at ſea: and that * city once ſubdued (which is alone the glory of the ſea) there ſhal be no hope left*

A for the Chriſtians, whether by ſea or land: and (that we haue alwaies wiſhed) Italy, faire Italy (wherein theſe matters are plotted againſt vs) ſhall be in our hand and power: wherefore let vs with ſuch courage aſſaile our enemies, as beſeemeth moſt victorious conquerors, men ſo many times conquered: And ſo ſet forward, as if you ſaw our Emperor himſelfe encouraging you, and giuing you the ſignall of battell; of his bounty, and the preſent victory, expecting all felicity and bliſſe.

This comfortable ſpeech with great grauity deliuered by the Baſſa, ſo encouraged the Turks, as that they all with one voice and mind ſeemed to deſire nothing more than battel: for they ſtill poſſeſſed with the firſt report of Caracoza, a[illegible]ncouraged by the Baſſa's ſpeech, were in good hope to haue fought the battell vpon great aduantage, and therfore thought vpon nothing B but preſent victory. Whereupon ſetting forward with great cheerefulneſſe, they came out of the gulfe, and ſhaped their courſe for the Iſlands Echinades, about mid-way betwixt Lepanto and Patras, before little Iſlands, or rather obſcure rocks, ſcarcely appearing in the ſea, but now to be made famous throughout the World, by the moſt notable battell that euer was fought in thoſe ſeas.

The Iſlands Echinades, or Corzulares.

The Chriſtians alſo comming ſtill on towards the enemy, the ſeuenth of October in the afternoone vnderſtood by their eſpials, that the Turks fleet was comming, and euen now at hand: whereupon the Generall commanded the great Enſigne of the confederats (the appointed ſignall of battell) to be forthwith diſplaied, and a great warning piece to be ſhot off out of his Admirall gally. And himſelfe gliſtering all in bright armor, with Cardona Admirall of Si- C cilia, and Soto his ſecretary, in a long boat went to all the ſquadrons of the fleet one after another, exhorting them with cheerefull countenance to follow their leaders, and to play the men: remembring, that they that day carried in their hand the wealth, honour, glory, and liberty of their countries, yea, and the very religion of their forefathers; and that that daies victory would bring vnto them and theirs perpetuall felicity: whereas otherwiſe, if they ſhould as cowards ſuffer themſelues to be ouercome and vanquiſhed, it would be vnto them the beginning of all manner of moſt woſull calamities. To which and other his like ſpeeches, the Captaines and ſouldiers (before of themſelues cheerefull enough) in euery place where he came gaue ſuch applauſe with the ioyfull cry of Victory, Victory, ſo often and ſo cheerefull in all places reſounded, as that it was taken as a lucky aboadment of the glorious victory ſhortly af- D ter enſuing. In like manner Auria in the right wing, and Barbadicus in the left (for the fleet kept the ſame order that they had appointed before at Meſſana) ceaſed not by all comfortable ſpeeches to encourage their followers: ſhewing vnto them, That now the time was come they ſo long wiſhed for, wherein they not oppreſſed with multitude, might at length ſhew their true valour againſt the falſe and faithleſſe enemies, who being indeed nothing els but baſe & contemptible ſlaues borne to bondage, and hauing loſt their owne liberty, came to impugne the liberty of others; bringing with them a greater terror of their name, than valour of their perſons: and that therefore, if euer, they would now ſhew themſelues valiant and couragious, and that day, wherein of all others true force was to be ſeene, to abate the pride of the barbarous and cruell enemy, and to make their reioycing for the conqueſt of Cyprus ſhort, before E they had well taſted the pleaſures thereof. At which time alſo, the Captaines generally thorowout the fleet, with cheeerfull countenances and couragious ſpeech encouraged their ſouldiers; leauing nothing vnſaid that might hearten them on; or vndone, that might further the victory.

Neither were the Turks wanting to themſelues (although it was fallen out much contrary to their expectation, to ſee the Chriſtians, who they before thought durſt not haue ſhewed themſelues, now ready to dare them battell) but encouraged with their former victories, and furthered with a faire gale of wind, came on proudly with their fleet orderly and gallantly ſet after their wonted manner in forme of a Croiſant or halfe-Moon, their fortunat enſigne: neuertheleſſe in their comming on they were much troubled with the brightnes of the Sun, which F then ſhining full in their faces, with his bright beams ſo dazled their eies, that they could not well ſee how to their moſt aduantage to direct their gallies. In this fleet of the Turks were two hundred and fifty gallies, fifty galiots, and twenty brigadines & other ſmall veſſels: all which a far off ſhewed like a thicke wood, but cumming neere hand, preſented (as we ſaid) the forme of a Croiſant. The middle battell in number much like the Chriſtians, was conducted by the great great Baſſa's Haly and Partau, attended vpon with Agan Maſter of the Turks Arſenall; Muſtapha Zelibi the Treaſurer; Achmat Bay, with Mahomet his younger brother, the ſonnes of Haly: Achmat Aga Gouernour of Teuthrania: Aſſis Caiga Gouernour of Calipolis: Caracoza, Caſſanes the ſonne of Barbaruſſa; Malamur Gouernour of Mytilene: Dely Solyman Gider Captaine of Chios; Caſſambeius Gouernour of the Rhodes; Proui Aga Captaine of Nauplium; Giaper Zelibi Preſident of Calabra; Dordagnan, Dondomeni, and many others, whoſe barbarous names I purpoſely omit: all men of great account and place, and for their experience at ſea the chiefe ſtrength of the Turkiſh Empire. The right wing was by the appointment of the Baſſa's commanded by Mahomet Be[illegible]th fifty ſix gallies, with whom were alſo many worthy Captaines; and in the left wing was Vluzales the old Arch-pyrat, but now the Vice-Roy of Algiers, with ninety fiue gallies, accompanied with Carielo and Arabey his two ſonnes, with a multitude of pyrats, men of his owne profeſſion, but moſt valiant and expert ſouldiers. In the rereward came Amurathes Dragut, with thirty gallies, and diuers other ſmall veſſels.

The great and notable battell betweene the Turks and the Christians, commonly called, the battell of Lepanto.

Now was the day well ſpent when both the fleets were ready to giue battell, the enemy ſtil comming on almoſt in the ſame order that the Chriſtians did: for their middle battel came directly againſt our middle battell, and their wings againſt ours. So the ſignall of battell on both ſides giuen by the ſhooting off of certain great pieces; the Turks after their maner comming on with an hidious cry, firſt light vpon the ſix galiaſſes, which lying at anchor almoſt a mile before the fleet, as moſt ſtrong bulwarks, out of their forecaſtles poured out thier murthering ſhot vpon the Turks, now come within their danger; and in their paſſing by ſo plagued them, by diſcharging their whole broad ſides, firſt the one, and eftſoons the other vpon them, that hauing receiued great loſſe, and diuers of their gallies ſunke, they were inforced to breake their order, and to fall further off. Which ſo much the more troubled the Turks, for that they had before ſuppoſed, thoſe great carts and vnſeruiceable ſhips (as they accounted of them) to haue carried little or no great ordnance on their ſides, after the manner of their gallies: for the vſe of the galeaſſes was not vnto the Turks known, vntil now that they had receiued from them moſt notable harme: which as it was the beginning of their miſery, ſo was it vnto the Chriſtians of greateſt importance for the gaining of the victory. At which time alſo the wind, which all that day had much fauoured the Turks, was now (God no doubt fighting his own battell) come about to the Weſt, and with a pleaſant gale in the time of the fight carried the ſmoke of the great ordnance vpon the Turks, to their no ſmall diſaduantage. Yet for all this loſſe and diſorder in their fleet, the fierce enemy with wonderfull pertinacie paſſing by theſe galeaſſes, quickly repaired again to their places, and made good their diſordred ſquadrons, and with all their force aſſailed the Chriſtian fleet. The trumpets, drums, and other inſtruments of war had ſcarcely wel ſounded, when all ſhook with confuſed cries, flames of fire, thundring of artillery, and other noiſe of the mariners and ſea men: wherwith many were ſo aſtonied as if they had bin both deaf and blind, hauing vpon the ſudden almoſt loſt the vſe both of their ſight & hearing. At which very inſtant a man might haue ſeen the whole ſhowers as it were of arrows and darts mixt with the deadly ſhot, flying from the one fleet to the other; the maſts broken, the ſaile-yards ſtrucke downe, the tackles rent, and all confuſed with horror and feare. Haly beholding the Admiral gally (which was eaſie to be known by the flag) & vſing the ſurpaſſing cherfulnes of his mariners & rowers, ran vpon her with ſuch violence as if he would haue preſently ſtemmed her: but being with like force incountred by the Admirall, they met together with ſuch violence, that both their beaks were with the feaze broken off, and ſo fell into the ſea. There began a moſt cruell fight betwixt theſe two great commanders, who had before drawne vnto them the ſtrongeſt gallies in their fleets, and the choiſeſt men in their armies. In the Admiral gally of the Chriſtians were 400 ſelect men pickt out of the whole army, moſt of them Captains & antients, men of approued valor; who not only valiantly repulſed their furious enemies, but with greater courage inforced them to ſhrinke backe, and preſſing hard vpon them, entred the gally euen to the main maſt; where the enemy ſtrengthned with new ſupplie, fought couragiouſly, repulſed the Spaniards, and cleered again their gally. Many were there wounded on both ſides, and many ſlain. Don Iohn ſeeing his men giue way, ſent in new ſupply; wherewith the other encouraged, beſtirred themſelues more luſtily than before, and hardly charged the Turks, who with like hope and like courage encountred them. The battell was like vnto the

A ebbing and flowing of the ſea: thrice the Turks were driuen euen vnto the maine maſt; and thrice ſtrengthned with new ſupplies, they with great ſlaughter repulſed the Chriſtians backe againe.

Venerius perceiuing the danger of the General, was about to haue aſſailed the poupe of Haly his gally, ſo to haue indangered her, being ſet vpon both before and abaft: but in comming thither he was encountred by Partau the other Baſſa, who with a company of gallies oppoſed himſelfe againſt him, and that with ſuch celerity, that hauing made ſhew as if he would haue charged him afront, he by and by ſet vpon his ſide. Which vnexpected manner of fight ſo ſuddenly faſhioned, at the firſt much troubled the Chriſtians; who afterward gathering courage, notably defended themſelues. Venerius (vpon whoſe valor the Venetian State reſted) gallantly B armed, not only incouraged his men, one while with intreating, another while with threatning, but was himſelf in the midſt of them fighting; whoſe great honour much moued the minds of his ſouldiers, but his reuerend yeres more; to ſee him (being aboue 77 yeres old) to performe all the parts of a braue youthful commander, in the very face of the greateſt danger. The fierce enemy hauing ſlain many of the Chriſtians, preſſed on more furiouſly, & fighting cloſe together, entred the prow of Venerius his gally now bared of defendants, and with their multitude rather than true valor oppreſſed the Venetians: who had there no doubt bin ouercome, had not Ioannes Lauretanus and Catherinus Malipetra, two valiant captains, and lying not far off, ſpeedily come to their reliefe. By whoſe comming in, the fight was in the turning of an hand quite altered; ſo that they which a little before fiercely aſſailed the Venetian gallies, were now glad C to defend their owne: ſo for a ſpace the fight ſtood indifferent, but in proceſſe of the battell, thoſe two worthy captaines, whileſt they alſo performe the parts of moſt reſolute ſouldiers, were both ſlain; ſhot through with ſmall ſhot. The fall of theſe notable men did rather enrage than diſcourage the minds of their ſoldiers: ſo that blinded as it were with fury, and ſuddenly become other men, they deſperatly preſſed in vpon the Turks: ſo that whileſt they on the one ſide kill and wound them, and Venerius more hardly chargeth them on the other; the terrour of the battell was turned from them that was euen at the point to haue been vanquiſhed, vpon the victors; and our men after great ſlaughter of the Turks, tooke two of their gallies: Partau the Baſſa in a long boat eſcaped the danger, and ſo got him out of the battell. Not farre off thence, Columnius the Popes Admirall, as a valiant Chiefetaine hardly aſſailed other of the D Turks gallies, and made amongſt them great ſlaughter: one ſingled from the reſt, he took, and diſordred the other. Lignius the Admirall of Genoa with like courage thruſt himſelfe into the thickeſt of the enemies, and there made a notable fight. Many an enemy fell about the Prince of Parma, Rueres, Vrſinus, Cornea, and Iuſtinianus; who for their preſent honor, and future fame, fought moſt couragiouſly.

Venerius comming to the relief of Don Iohn is incountered by Partau Baſſa.

Venerius in danger.

Lauretanus and Malipetra ſlaine.

At which time Chiroche or Sirocke (of ſome called Mahomet Bej) with his right wing with great confidence came forward againſt the left wing of the Chriſtian fleet; but falling before he was aware into the danger of the galeaſſes, was from out of them miſerably beaten with the great ordnance, hauing many of his men ſlaine, and diuers of his gallies ſunke and torn, few of the huge and deadly ſhot falling in vaine into the ſea, by reaſon of the thick ſtanding of the E Turks gallies: where alſo diuers of the enemies were burnt with pots of wildfire caſt into their gallies out of the tops of the galeaſſes. Chiroche to auoid the danger of the galeaſſes, & to ſhun the dangerous ſhelfe betwixt him and the main (which the riuer Achelous running betweene the borders of Acarnania and Ætolia, and there falling into the ſea, maketh) ſent a great part of his gallies vnder the conduct of one Alis a notable renegat of Genoa, to caſt about aloofe vpon the right hand, and ſo to come vpon the backe of Barbadicus the leader of the left wing of the Chriſtian fleet. Which he perceiuing, forthwith turned his gallies, & with their prows receiued the firſt onſet. The great ordnance firſt on both ſides diſcharged, diuers of the gallies grapled faſt together; in ſuch ſort, as that they incountred one another not with their miſſiue weapons only (as with their ſmall ſhot, arrowes, and darts) but with their drawne ſwords foot to F foot. Among the reſt, the fight of two of the Chriſtian gallies was moſt notable; in the one was Barbadicus himſelfe, in the other Marcus Ciconia, vpon whom fell ſix of the enemies Gallies, and vpon Barbadicus fiue: who although they were on euery ſide diſtreſſed with a moſt doubtfull and dangerous fight, yet did they moſt valiantly with worthy reſolution endure the ſame. In the fury of this battell, Barbadicus encouraging his ſouldiers, and fighting himſelfe

euen there where moſt danger was, was hit in the left eie with an arrow, and ſo ſtrucke into the braine almoſt thorow the head: wherewith falling preſently downe, he was taken vp for dead; howbeit he died not thereof vntill three daies after. The ſuppoſed death of this worthy man much troubled the Chriſtians, and both the armies felt his fall (ſuch force there is in the valour of one worthy man) for the Turks now as conquerors luſtily boorded the gally, troubled with the loſſe of the Captaine; and the Venetians as men diſcouraged gaue way: the galley there had vndoubtedly bin loſt, had not Fredericus Nanius and Syluius Porcia with their gallies ſpeedily come to her reliefe: by whoſe comming in ſuch an alteration was made, as that the gally before halfe taken, was not only cleared, but diuers of the Turks gallies alſo boorded, and ſome of them taken, not without the great ſlaughter of the Turks. In this ſo hard and mortall a conflict, Syluius was grieuouſly wounded in the thigh and in his right ſide. It is reported of Barbadicus, That lying that euening at the point of death, the battell then ended, he like another Epaminondas, asked which part had got the victory: and being told that the Chriſtians had got it, and that the Turks fleet was moſt part taken, and the reſt ſunke or burnt; he with his eies caſt vp to heauen, gaue vnto God immortall thankes therefore, and not long after ioyfully departed this life, to liue in bliſſe for euer.

The death of Barbadicus.

Ciconia hardly beſet, and in danger to haue beene loſt, is relieued.

Ciconia in the meane time hardly beſet with ſix of the enemies gallies, (as we haue before ſaid) was himſelfe ſore burnt with wild-fire and hurt in the face; and hauing indured a long and terrible fight, was now euen at the point to haue been loſt; when ſudden reliefe comming in, he was now contrary to all hope ſaued, and therewith ſo much encouraged, that with his weary and wounded ſouldiers, as men from death reuiued, he afreſh charged the enemy, and tooke one of the principall gallies, with one of the Turks faireſt enſignes, which in the Venetian Armory is yet there to be ſeene: of his worthy valour, his honeſt wounds in his face and the fore part of his body, were moſt certaine and vndoubted witneſſes.

Not far off, in the ſame wing Ioannes Contarenus an honourable and valiant gentleman, did with his great ſhot exceeding much harme amongſt the Turks gallies: which Chiroche perceiuing, and therewith inraged, ran ſo fiercely vpon the ſide of Contarenus his gally, that with his beake he had wel neer ſtemmed her; & preſently grappling faſt with her, was like to haue boorded her: whom neuertheleſſe the Chriſtians notably repulſed, with greater ſlaughter than was thought poſſible for ſo ſmall a number to haue made: neither did the enemies fall vnreuenged, but all imbrued with the bloud of the Chriſtians. Seldome hath bin ſeene a more cruel fight, or more reſolute Captaines to encounter hand to hand. But after the battell had of long time ſtood doubtfull, the hope of the Chriſtians increaſed vpon two cauſes, for which the courage of the enemy quailed: firſt, for that many of the Turks being ſlaine or wounded, they were brought to a ſmall number; then, for that both parties ſaw Chiroche himſelfe ſlain: from which time the enemy as well deſtitute of a leader to conduct them, as of freſh ſupplies to relieue them, began to be cut down right or taken: which their danger was the more increaſed, becauſe the gally bulged with the great ſhot, was now leake, and in danger to ſink: wherfore the Turks in that wing ouercome with deſpaire, began to thinke rather how to ſaue themſelues by flight than by fight, repoſing their truſt in nothing more than in the neernes of the main. But as they were turning about toward the ſhore, they were preuented by the Chriſtians: who entring the gally, and hauing ſlain and driuen ouerboord almoſt all that were left, took Chiroche, yet breathing, but halfe dead; and ſeeing ſmall hope of his life, with freſh wounds made an end of him.

Diuers and doubtfull was the whole face of the battell: as fortune offered vnto euery man his enemy, ſo he fought; according as euery mans diſpoſition put into him courage or feare, or as he met with mo or fewer enemies, ſo was there here and there ſomtime victory, and ſometime loſſe. Many fights were in ſundry places ſeene mingled together: ſome gallies whiles they run to ſtem others, are themſelues by others ſtemmed: ſome, which you would thinke were flying away, falling by fortune vpon one victorious gally or other, ſuddenly take them: other ſome, as if they had bin of neither part, row vp and down betwixt the battels. The chance of war in one place lifteth vp the vanquiſhed, and in another ouerthroweth the victorious: all was full of terror, error, ſorrow, and confuſion. And albeit that fortune had not yet determined which way to incline, yet the Chriſtians at length began to appeare much ſuperiour both in courage and ſtrength: and the Turks ſeemed now rather to defend themſelues, than to aſſaile their enemies.

A Bazanus in the rereward intentiuely marked all the whole fight, and euer as need required, ſent in preſent aid, without reſpect whether they were the Popes gallies, the king of Spaines, or the Venetians, that were diſtreſſed. In this long and terrible fight it chanced, that the Turks ſeeing the Chriſtian Generals gally hardly charged on the prow by Haly Baſſa, to be almoſt bared of defendants in the poupe, all the ſoldiers hauing their hands full before, were about to haue boorded her abafte, and to that purpoſe were fetching a compaſſe about her. Which Bazanus quickly perceiuing, gliſtering in bright armour came ſpeedily in with certaine gallies, and by oppoſing of himſelfe againſt them ſtaied their courſe. In all the battell was not ſeene a more cruell fight; for hauing diſcharged many volleys of ſhot, and arrowes and darts without number, they grapled at length together, and came to the ſword, where with the formoſt, B Bazanus not only with words, but with his preſence and valour wonderfully encouraged his ſouldiers, hauing receiued in his target of proofe two ſmall ſhot. Many were on both ſides ſlain. The Spaniards attempting ſundry times to haue entred the Turks gallies, were with great loſſe repulſed: but not giuing it ſo ouer, neither giuing the enemy leaue to breath, or ſo much as to looke behind him, valor was vanquiſhed by pertinacie, and the Spaniards hauing ouerthrowne and ſlaine their enemies, enjoyed their gallies.

Now had Don Iohn with like courage and ſtrength, but with doubtfull victory, fought three houres and more with Haly Baſſa: when after ſo dreadfull and dangerous a fight, and many a deadly wound on both parts giuen and receiued, our men began to faint, and brought to the vttermoſt of their deuoire, were in danger to haue beene ouercome, had not Don Iohn betaken C himſelfe vnto his only and laſt refuge. He had (as is before ſaid) reſerued vnder the hatches 400 of his beſt and ſelect ſoldiers, for their valour choſen out of the whole army againſt all the euents of ſo long and dangerous a battell: theſe men attentiuely attending euery becke of Don Iohn, vpon ſigne giuen, as was before appointed, ſuddenly ſtart out and with a terrible cry and deſperat onſet aſſailed the enemy, before almoſt ſpent with labor and wounds. This freſh and vnexpected company ſo ſuddenly grown vp, firſt aſtonied, and afterwards confounded, & with a great ſlaughter vanquiſhed the Turks, and poſſeſſed the gally. The Baſſa deadly wounded in the head with a ſhot, and all imbrued with bloud, was taken, and as a joyful ſpectacle brought to Don Iohn; who ſeeing him ready to breathe his laſt, commanded him to be deſpoiled of his armor, and his head ſtrucke off. Which preſently ſet vpon the point of a ſpeare, he for a ſpace D held vp aloft with his owne hand, as a trophy of his victory, as alſo with the ſight thereof to ſtrike a terror into the minds of the other Turks, who in the other gallies faſt by fought yet right valiantly: neither was he therein deceiued; for the Turks beholding the knowne countenance of the Baſſa their late General, and a flag of the croſſe ſet vp in the top of his gally, and the noiſe of the Chriſtians, crying Victory, running thorow the army; were therewith ſo diſcouraged, that confounded with fear they turned their gallies and with might and main made toward the land, which was not much more than a mile off. Which Canalis and Quirinus, yet breathing with the late ſlaughter of the Turks, perceiuing, with their gallies hardly purſued the flying enemy, and ſunke and tooke diuers of their gallies. Partau his ſon by the ſtaying of the reſt got time to run his gally on ground, and ſo forſaking her, ſaued himſelfe and his men E by running aſhore: ſo did alſo diuers others run themſelues aground and forſake their gallies, which preſently became a prey vnto the Chriſtians. In this hot conflict Caracoza the famous pyrat (who abjuring the Chriſtian Religion, had turned Turke, and of long time done exceeding much miſchiefe vpon the coaſts of the Chriſtian countries) valiantly fighting, was ſlaine by Buzzacharinus of Padua, by whoſe death many were deliuered of great feare.

Haly Baſſa ſlain.

The Turks middle battell diſcomfited.

Caracoza the famous pyrat ſlaine.

Haly Baſſa had brought forth with him his two ſons Achmat and Mahomet, the one 23 yeares old, and the other 13, the nephewes of the great Emperor Selymus, by his ſiſter married to Haly; them their father had placed in a great gally, with a ſtrong guard of the Ianizaries: who ſeeing the diſcomfiture of the main battell, with the danger now drawing neere vnto themſelues, were exceedingly affraid, and therefore to ſaue themſelues, thought it beſt with all ſpeed to F make toward the maine. But in ſo doing they were preuented by Requiſenius the great Commendor, who with his furious Spaniards boording the Turks, already diſmaied and running away, ſlew of them a great number; and after a great fight and much cruell execution done, tooke the gally, and that which pleaſed him more, the two ſonnes of Haly both aliue. In the time of which fight, the poore Chriſtians who ſat chained in the gally, had as ſlaues long ſerued in great miſery; now perceiuing the Chriſtians to preuaile, brake off their gyues, looſed one another, and with ſuch weapons as firſt came to hand luſtily laid about them, and notably furthered the victory.

Notwithſtanding all this good ſucceſſe, the fortune of the battell ſtood yet doubtful in the right wing. There ſtood in either battell two of the moſt noble chieftains one againſt another: on the Chriſtian part Iohn Andreas Auria the Spaniſh Admiral; and for the Turks Vluzales: both moſt valiant and expert commanders, wel known the one to the other, for that they had of long vſed the ſame ſeas, equall for their military diſcipline, as alſo for their noble acts, but far vnequall for number of their gallies: for the Turks had of one ſort & other almoſt twice ſo many.

Auria, whether it were for that he would in the beginning of the battel warily decline the danger, and not hazard his gallies, wherein his chiefe honour would be alſo indangered; or elſe afraid leſt the enemy, who far exceeded him in number of gallies, ſhould extend his wing at large, and incloſe the Chriſtian fleet behind; vpon the ſignall of battell giuen, ſhrunke farther off from the reſt of the battel: but whether vpon policy, that it might be at his choice either to fight, if the reſt of the army preuailed, or to retire if they ſhould be ouercome; or that he vpon martial policy declined the force of too ſtrong an enemy; diuers men diuerſly gloſed: but what the cauſe was indeed the wiſeſt could not ſurely tell. Howſoeuer the matter ſtood, it ſeemed his purpoſe was by policy to counteruaile what he wanted in ſtrength. This his falling off ſeemed vnto the Turks moſt ſtrange, to whom his quick departure ſeemed at the firſt in maner of a flight. Neither was Auria content with that ſpace he had firſt ſeparated himſelf from the army; but the ſecond time fell off farther, and there ſtaying and houering a looffe off, ſeemed to await ſome good opportunity to take the enemy at ſome aduantage: hauing in the mean time one of the galeaſſes of Piſa lying before him, as it were in ſtead of a bulwark, which with often ſhot much troubled the enemy. Vluzales alſo extending his wing, took ſuch a ſpace, as that he ſeemed able to haue cumpaſſed in and incloſed Auria; yet offered not battell, but rather lay as expecting if any aduantage ſhould be giuen him by the Chriſtians, than raſhly or vnaduiſedly to offer himſelf or his galies to any deſperat danger.

He had not long ſo lien, but that according to his deſire, 12 of the Venetian gallies, which had withdrawn themſelues from Auria, & without any order or direction romed to and fro, fell into his danger: theſe gallies cut off from the reſt, Vluzales with wonderfull celerity incloſed, and with the multitude of his gallies bording them one by one, ſlew the defendants, and tooke the gallies. In this fight many of the Knights of the Order of S. ſtephen moſt valiantly fighting were ſlain. Benedictus Superantius a noble Venetian, ſeeing moſt part of the men ſlain, himſelf mortally wounded, and his gally now almoſt taken, reſoluing rather preſently to die, than to fall into the hands of his enemies, deſperatly put fire to the ſtore of pouder he had in the gally, and blew vp himſelfe, his ſoldiers that were left, with a great number of the enemies together.

The report of the great ordnance and noiſe of the battel in that part of the fleet being heard, they which had now in the middle battel got the victory, together turned their gallies thitherwards to aid Auria, but not in one ſquadron together, but commming along one after another, as euery man had ſooner or later cleered himſelfe of his enemy: amongſt the reſt, Petrus Iuſtinianus (Admirall of the gallies of Malta) comming formoſt, was incountred with three of the Turks gallies, with whom he with his knights had a great and moſt terrible fight. Which Vluzales beholding, and aboue all others hating the Knights of the Order, ſpeedily ſent in other three gallies to help their fellows. So Iuſtinian hardly beſet with ſix gallies, and oppreſſed with the multitude of his enemies, had loſt fifty of his moſt valiant knights, with one of his enſignes, and with much adoe hardly defended himſelfe. But being now brought to the laſt caſt, and the gally in the judgment of all men giuen for loſt, lo, two other of the gallies of Malta, who had ſo valiantly fought with other three of the enemies gallies, that they were now vpon point to haue taken them all, ſeeing the danger of their Admiral, forſook their vanquiſhed enemies, & with all ſpeed came to reſcue him: where they found him yet aliue, but ſhot in with three arrows, and ſtill fighting couragiouſly at the decke of his gally, with thoſe few he had yet left, beſet round with their enemies: but by the comming in of theſe two gallies, as if it had bin by help ſent from heauen, the Turks were notably repulſed, and the Admiral with his gally reſcued, as a prey out of the mouth of the greedy Lyon.

Vluzales vnderſtanding that the maine battell and right wing of the fleet was ouerthrowne by the Chriſtians, for feare gaue ouer the fight, and leauing the gallies he had taken, A and hoiſing ſaile, was the firſt in that wing that fled. Which Cardonius perceiuing, who was come in before the reſt, ſuddenly ſhewed himſelf at his back, and by aſſailing the hindermoſt gallies, did what he might to ſtay their flight vntil the reſt of the victorious gallies were come in. But whilſt he ſo eagerly purſueth the flying enemy, fifteene of the Turks captains inraged with ſuch an vnwonted diſgrace, and mindfull of their wonted prowesse, ſtaid their flight, and contrary to the expectation of the Chriſtians, turned themſelues and renewed the battell: What minds they bare, the euent ſhewed; for in a trice almoſt all Cardonius his ſouldiers and marines were ſlaine: nothing letted the taking of the gally, but that Vluzales ſeeing Don Iohn, Columnius, and Venerius neere at hand, and making towards him, and Auria alſo comming faſt on, was afraid longer to ſtay, and therefore giuing ouer the fight, fled as faſt as he could: yet B carrying away with him one gally of Cyprus, and one enſigne of the Knights of Malta, as teſtimonies of his own valor when he ſhould appeare before Selymus. The Chriſtians although weary of the long fight which they had almoſt by the ſpace of fiue houres indured, yet ſo long as they were in any hope to ouertake any of their flying enemies, hardly purſued them in chaſe: but when they perceiued it preuailed not to follow farther, and that it was more than time to ſee to their weary and wounded ſouldiers and mariners, they ſtaied from further purſuit; for why, the night now came faſt on, vnder the couert whereof the crafty old pyrat flying for life with ſailes and oares, eſcaped with thirty (or as ſome write, forty) gallies againe into the bay of Lepanto.

The Chriſtians hardly purſue the flying enemy

It was a horrible ſpectacle to ſee, how in this battell the ſea was ſtained with bloud, and couered with dead bodies, weapons, and the fragments of the broken gallies; beſides the great C number of them that were ſlain, & beaten into the ſea: many of the Turks blinded with feare, caſting away their weapons, to eſcape the fury of the enemy, threw themſelues headlong into the ſea, but finding no hope to recouer the land, laboured againe to come to the gallies; or els fainting by the way, were miſerably drowned. Others, either halfe dead, weake, and vnskilfull of ſwimming, or ouercharged with their armour, the ſea alſo deuoured: yea, many that could well ſwim, wearied and wounded, ſunke for feare. Others vpon plankes and the pieces of the broken gallies, ſought to ſaue themſelues; and not knowing what to follow or what to ſhun, wofully periſhed. Other ſome ſwimming, and pitifully intreating their enemies, rather to take them priſoners than to kill them, were (as it oftentimes chanceth where things are done vpon D choler, rather than vpon diſcretion) without compaſſion ſlaine: in which doing, the Chriſtians thought they did rather reuenge former injuries to them done, than to do them any wrong: with ſome mercy more preuailed than wrath; who remembring the common chance of warre, choſe rather to take the Turks priſoners (wofully crauing nothing but their liues) than without mercy to kil them. The number of the Turks loſt in this moſt famous battell, could hardly be known, by reaſon that many of them were drowned. Antonius Guarnerius writing the hiſtory of this war, reporteth two & thirty thouſand to haue periſhed: but they which write more ſparingly thereof, reported not paſt halfe ſo many to haue beene ſlaine: of whom theſe were of greateſt name; Haly Baſſa the Generall, Mahomet Bey (otherwiſe called Chiroche or Siroche) Gouernor of Alexandria, Caſſanes the ſon of Barbaruſſa, with his ſon Malamur Gouernor of Mytilene; E Gider Gouernor of Chios, Caſſambeius Gouernor of the Rhodes, Proui Aga captaine of Nauplium, Muſtapha Zelibi the great Treaſurer, Caracoza the famous pyrat; with many others, whom but to name were tedious. The chiefe priſoners there taken, were Achmat and Mahomet the ſons of Haly Baſſa, both afterwards ſent as Preſents to the Pope, of whom the eldeſt died by the way at Naples; the younger preſented vnto the Pope by Columnius at Rome, was there honourably kept priſoner: and Mechmet Bey, Gouernor of Euboea; and about three thouſand fiue hundred others were in that battell taken alſo. The chiefe of them that eſcaped by flight, were Partau Baſſa, who ſeeing all go to wracke, fled in time in a long boat to land: and Vluzales, who (as it was afterwards certainly known) but with fiue and twenty gallies, and ten galliots, fled to Lepanto. Of the enemies gallies were taken an hundred threeſcore and one, forty ſunke F or burnt: and of galliots and other ſmaller veſſels were taken about ſixty. The Admirall gally then taken amongſt the reſt, was ſo godly and beautifull a veſſell, that for beauty and richneſſe ſcarce any in the whole Ocean was comparable vnto her. The decke of this gally was on both ſides thrice as great as any of the others, and made all of blacke Walnut tree like vnto Ebony, checkered, and wrought maruellous faire, with diuers liuely colours and variety of hiſtories hiſtories. There was alſo in her diuers liuely counterfeits, engrauen and wrought with gold with ſo cunning hand, that for the magnificence thereof it might well haue bin compared vnto ſome princes palace. The cabbin gliſtered in euery place with rich hangings wrought with gold twiſt, and ſet with diuers ſorts of precious ſtones, with certaine ſmall counterfeits moſt cunningly wrought. Beſides this, there was alſo found in her great ſtore of the Baſſa's rich apparell; wrought with the needle, ſo curiouſly and richly emboſſed with ſiluer and gold, that his great lord and maſter Selymus himſelfe could hardly put on more royall or rich attire. His casket there alſo found with ſix thouſand duckats in it, with a yerely penſion of three hundred duckats, was giuen in reward to a Greeke, borne in Macedonia, which ſlew the Baſſa; and was therefore alſo knighted by Don Iohn: who had alſo giuen vnto him the Burrell of the Turkes ſtanderd, which at his returne to Venice (where he had of long time before dwelt, and ſerued in the Arſenall) ſold vnto the goldſmith: whereof the Senat hauing intelligence, redeemed it of the goldſmith, paying for euery ounce a duckat, and layed it vp amongſt the trophies of that moſt famous victory. It was all of maſſiue ſiluer, guilt and engrauen round about with Turkiſh letters. On the one ſide was written, God doth conduct and adorne the faithfull in worthy enterpriſes: God doth fauour Mahomet. On the other ſide, God hath no other God, and Mahomet is his Prophet.

The Greek that ſlew the Baſſa, honourably rewarded.

This notable victory thus happily obtained, Don Iohn the Generall, with Venerius and Columna, the other two Admirals, came together; whom the Generall friendly embraced, but eſpecially Venerius, calling him father, and attributing vnto him the greateſt part of the victory. Afterwards, all together with their hands and eyes caſt vp towards heauen, they vpon their knees gaue immortall thankes vnto Almighty God. So did alſo the reſt of the captains and maſters; commending one anothers valour and good ſeruice: but eſpecially theirs, who for their religion and country had there moſt honourably ſpent their liues; which were in number about 7566. Amongſt whom, the chiefe men that were ſlaine, were Ioh. and Bernardinus, of the honourable family of Cordona in Spaine, Horatio Caraffa, and Ferantes Bisballus, Virginius, and Horatius, noble Romans, of the honourable family of the Vrſini. Of the Venetian Nobility, Auguſtinus Barbadicus, Benedictus Superantius, Vincentius Quirinus, Ioannes Lauretanus, Marinus Contarenus, Catherinus Malipetra, Georgius and Andreas Barbadicus, Marcus Antonius Landus, Franciſcus Bonus, Hieronimus Contarenus, Antonius Paſchaligus, Hieronimus Venerius, all of the Order of the Senators. Beſides diuers other honourable Gentlemen, who well deſerued to be enrolled in the eternall monuments of Fame. Of the knights of Malta were alſo many ſlaine, amongſt whom of the German Nation theſe were chiefe: Ioachim Spart, Commendour of Moguntia and Franckfort, Ro. of Hambergh, Commendour of Hemmendorf, and Fra. Droſt. Of them that were wounded, theſe were of greateſt name: Don Iohn the Generall, Venerius the Venetian Admirall ſhot through the foot, Paulus Iordanus, Troilus Sauell, and Mar. Molinus, with diuers others of leſſe fame, to the number of almoſt ſeuen thouſand.

The number of the Chriſtians ſlain in the battell of Lepanto.

Great was the joy conceiued of this victory, but to none more welcome, than to the poore Chriſtians faſt chained to the Turks gallies, of whom twelue thouſand were thereby deliuered from moſt miſerable thraldome, and contrary to all hope reſtored to their ancient liberty.

Two daies after this victory, Venerius ſent Humfredus Iuſtinianus with newes thereof vnto the Senat at Venice: who comming in at the Adriaticke port about noone the 19 of October, by ſhooting off of certain great pieces, gaue warning vnto the city of his comming, which at that time hung in a great ſuſpence betwixt hope and feare. The citiſens generally awaked with the report of the great ordnance, came flocking by heaps to the port, euery man longing to heare the firſt newes. There they might ſee Iuſtinian comming a far off with his gally, but when he was come neerer, they might perceiue all the mariners attired like Turks, and foure of the Turks enſignes hanging behind at the poupe of the gally, which filled their mindes with the hope of good newes, deeming it to be (as indeed it was) part of the ſpoile of the enemy. But after that Iuſtinian was landed (which he had much to do for the preſſe) and was gone to the court, with a world of people following after him, crying out for newes; and had there deliuered his letters, and at large diſcourſed of all the ſucceſſe of the battell (which was forthwith blowne into the City) and that the mariners alſo after his departure had reported the victory, and that the enemy was in a great battell ouerthrowne! good God, how the

A the people as men ouerjoyed, ran vp and downe the ſtreets, doubling and redoubling the joyfull name of victory. The Senators alſo rejoycing together, gaue thanks to God with publike praiers and joyfull hymnes in euery Church: and afterwards by ringing of bels, peals of ordnance, bone-fires, & other ſuch like things, ſhewed all the tokens of joy poſſible. And to make this joy the more generall, all priſoners were ſet at liberty, and all debts that exceeded not the ſumme of fiue and twenty crownes, payed out of the common treaſurie; which was generally done through all the Venetian Seigniory: and a decree made, That that day whereon the victory was gotten, which was the ſeuenth of October, dedicated to the memoriall of Iuſtina, ſhould for euer be kept holy-day: and for the perpetuall remembrance thereof, a great maſſe of mony was coined, with the impreſſion of Iuſtina vpon it, and an inſcription B declaring the victory. Many alſo their neighbor Princes ſent their Embaſſadors congratulatory to Venice; namely, the Dukes of Sauoy, Florence, Ferrara, Parma, Mantua, and Vrbin, and the Knights of Malta. In which ſo publike joy no man was ſeene to put on any mourning garments, or to ſhew any token of heauineſſe, although many had loſt their deareſt friends and neereſt kinſemen; whoſe liues they reckoned not loſt, but giuen vnto the Chriſtian Commonweale. The like rejoycing was alſo made in Rome, in Spaine, Naples, Sicilia, and Malta, eſpecially at ſuch times as Embaſſadors from their neighbour Princes, came to joy them of this victory: yea, and afterwards in other countries further off was like rejoicing and ſignes of joy, as with vs here in England.

This is that notable battell, commonly called the battell of Lepanto, fought neere vnto the C Iſland Curzolari, the ſeuenth day of October, in the yeare 1571, the like whereof was neuer fought at ſea againſt the Turke, wherein he loſt his chiefe ſtrength at ſea, with moſt of his beſt ſea captains: and might thereby well perceiue what he and his ſucceſſors were to feare, if the Chriſtian Princes at unity amongſt themſelues, all diſcord ſet apart, ſhould in zeale of their religion joyne their inuincible forces againſt them.

In the middeſt of all this joy, generally conceiued of the late victory, one of the chiefe priſoners of the Turks, hearing it compared with the loſſe of Cyprus (for that Selymus had therein loſt his fleet, his beſt men of war, with great ſtore of ordnance) by a fit compariſon ſhewed it not to be ſo, ſaying, That the battell loſt, was vnto Selymus as if a man ſhould ſhaue his beard, which would ere long grow again; but that the loſſe of Cyprus was vnto the Venetians, as the D loſſe of an arme, which once cut off, could neuer be againe recouered. Declaring thereby the great inequality of the loſſe.

A witty and fit compariſon made by a Turk to ſhew that the loſſe of Cyprus was greater than the loſſe of the battell of Lepanto.

The rich ſpoile taken from the enemy in this moſt glorious victory, was thus diuided amongſt the princes confederat. Vnto the Pope were allotted 19 gallies, two galliots, nine great pieces of ordnance, two and forty leſſer pieces, and fourescore and one priſoners. Vnto the king of Spaine eight and fifty gallies and an halfe, ſix galliots and an halfe, eight and fifty great pieces and an halfe, eight great murthering pieces & a halfe, an hundred twenty eight leſſer pieces, and a thouſand ſeuen hundred and thirteen priſoners. Vnto the Venetians were aſſigned for their ſhare, nine and thirty gallies and a halfe, foure galliots and a halfe, nine and thirty great pieces and an halfe, fiue great murthering pieces and a halfe, foureſcore and ſix leſſer pieces, E and a thouſand one hundred threeſcore and two priſoners. The reſt were beſtowed vpon ſuch other Princes as had giuen aid, or otherwiſe well deſerued in that ſeruice.

The ſpoile of the enemy diuided amongſt the confederats.

The joy conceiued of this victory was not ſo great amongſt the Chriſtians, but that the ſorrow thereof was amongſt the Turks far greater. Selymus himſelfe was then at Hadrianople, where eight daies after the battel, news was brought vnto him, That his fleet was ouerthrown and almoſt all taken or ſunke by the Chriſtians. Which ſo ſoone as he heard, he was ſtrucken with exceeding griefe: and ouercome with melancholy, would not that day ſuffer any man to ſpeake with him. And the rumor of the ouerthrow ſtill increaſing, had in ſhort time filled all places with feare, teares, mourning, and heauineſſe: ſome bewailing their parents, ſome their children, ſome their husbands, ſome their friends or kinſmen, there loſt. But that which moſt F grieued the Turkiſh Emperor, was the loſſe of ſo many worthy and expert captains, of ſo many skilfull maſters and notable ſouldiers; who brought vp all their liues at ſea, were not thought inferior to any then liuing: beſides the perpetuall ignominy and vnwonted diſgrace, thereby inflicted vnto him and his poſterity for euer. Wherefore full of wrath and indignation, he was about to haue commanded all the Chriſtians in his dominions (in number infinit) to be put to death. Doubting indeed nothing more, than that they weary of the Turkiſh thraldome, and G deſirous of innouation, ſhould with weapons put into their hands, riſe vp againſt him, and take part with the other Chriſtians his enemies. But whilſt the other Baſſa's (as men diſmaid with the cruelty of the command) ſtood all ſilent, Muhamet Baſſa for his former deſerts in great fauor with the tyrant, thought it good to make proofe if his fury might by reaſonable perſuaſion be mitigated, and ſome better courſe taken, both for the honor of Selymus himſelfe, an dthe common good of the State: yet well knowing how full of danger it was, in that tyrannicall gouernment, openly to ſpeake any thing contrary to the good liking of the wilfull Emperour, he durſt not apertly contradict him: but leaning as it were to his opinion and pleaſure, by little and little to draw him from himſelfe; and ſo before he were aware, to lead him into his own H deuiſe, and by delay moderat the rigour of his former fury. To which purpoſe he cunningly ſet vpon him in this ſort.

Muhamet Baſſa cunningly diſſuadeth Selymus from ſo rigorous a reſolution, by filling his head with moſt neceſſary conſiderations.

Your anger (ſaid he) moſt magnificent and inuincible Emperour, againſt the Chriſtians, is moſt juſt:
and in this my deſire exceedeth all others, That they ſhould endure and ſuffer ſuch puniſhment as they haue of right deſerued. Yet it behoueth vs to ſatisfie our wrath, as men better regarding their own good, that the hot deſire of reuenge. And foraſmuch as I am for your many and vndeſerued fauours, in all loyalty bounden vnto your highneſſe aboue others; I reckon it in part my duty, ſo much the more franckely to deliuer my opinion, ſuch as it is, in matter of ſo great importance. Neither will I attemper my ſpeech in any reſpect to the comforting of your grieued minde: for how can it be that you, who following the worthy examples I of your noble progenitors, haue alwaies heretofore ſhewed your moſt heroicall and couragious mind, contemning all the chances of Fortune, ſhould not for euer after ſhew your ſelfe to be rather dreaded of all men, than dreadfull of any? Let others, whoſe kingdomes are built vpon vncertainty, ſubiect to the reuolution of time, and change of Fortune, yeeld vnto their euill haps: as for you, whoſe empire is founded by the mighty hand of the moſt Higheſt, and compaſſed about with an impregnable defence, and are your ſelfe by the prwer of Grd appointed King and Commander of Nations and people in number infinite; Fortune may well a little pricke you, but neuer ouerthrow you. As for this late miſchance, if it muſt needs ſo fall out, as proceeding from ſome immutable and eternall cauſe; muſt it be therfore alwaies fixt and permanent?
Only thoſe miſeries and miſchiefes which the cowardiſe or fooliſhneſſe of men bring vnto themſelues, haue their firme and certaine calamities: other common euents comming from other cauſes, haue K alſo their common and ſudden changes: but how this late miſhap at ſea may be amended, and your former glory there againe recouered, is hereafter to be conſidered. Now for the preſent (in mine opinion) this one thing, as of all others moſt neceſſary, is to be prouided, That the weake and worſt fortified places of your Empire, moſt ſubiect to danger, may be preſently ſtrengthened with ſtrong garriſons; and that by your preſent repare vnto the Imperiall City, you cheere vp the minds of your heauy and diſmaied ſubiects: which done, what ſhall let, but that you may at your pleaſure be reuenged to the full of the Chriſtians? For there is no cauſe why we ſhould feare the Chriſtians, ſix hundred times and more before ouerthrowne: both our enemies and we are the ſame men we haue bin for many ages, we beare the ſame minds, the ſame bodies, the ſame ſtrength, the ſame weapons, wherewith me haue gotten infinite victories, both of them and others.
And although ſuch be the ſtate of man, as that he cannot otherwiſe but ſomtime or other taſte of the worſt L fortune; yet I thinke this preſent misfortune to be rather imputed vnto ſome fatall cauſe to vs vnknowne, than to the valor of the Chriſtians. Beſides that, we may well enough oppoſe one ouerthrow againſt our ſo many and infinite victories: yea, we are to giue immortall thanks vnto Almighty God, that we haue by force of armes ſubdued the rich and famous Iſland of Cyprus, and that your high deſignes haue in that point ſorted to your hearts deſire. And hard it is in mine opinion to judge, whether this late vnfortunate battell ſhall more hurt vs, or the Chriſtians: for beſides that the multitude of the Turks hath no feeling of ſo ſmall a loſſe, they will not as men diſcouraged, giue themſelues to mourning and vaine lamentations, but with greater courage and fury come forth againe into battell, and reuenge this loſſe with the infinit calamities of the Chriſtians: who after this their good hap, will according to their wonted manner giue themſelues to exceſſe, pleaſure, careleſneſſe, and eaſe, vnto their owne farther confuſion. Thus haue I in briefe M faithfully declared mine opinion: yet with that ſubmiſſiue loyalty, as that whatſoeuer ſhall proceed from the mouth of your imperiall Majeſty, ſhall be of me deemed moſt wiſely and magnificently conſidered of.

A The Baſſa was in ſuch grace and authority with Selymus, that his opinion in counſel preuailed,& the tyrants wrath by his perſuaſion was well aſſuaged. But by the comming of Vluzales to court, the remainder of his former griefe and melancholy was fully quieted: who after he had excuſed himſelfe of the late ouerthrow,& declared what he had himſelfe done in the battell,and in teſtimony thereof,preſented him with one of the enſignes of the knights of Malta, told him alſo,how that he had left the Chriſtian fleet ſo rent and torn,as that it could not poſſibly be made ſeruiceable againſt the next yeare: which newes was both of Selymus and the reſt gladly heard. In the mean time Selymus placed this Vluzales in the ſtead of Haly Baſſa that was ſlain:and ſtreitly commanded the great officers which had the charge of his nauy,to build new ſhipping night and day:and further injoyned euery Gouernor out of his prouince he had B in charge,to haue in readineſſe one gally or two againſt the next Spring,as wel for the defence of his own dominions, as to reuenge the loſſe he had ſo lately ſuſtained:whereunto alſo many of his great men put to their helping hands,& cheerfully furthered his deſire. New ſupplies of ſoldiers were alſo preſently raiſed,and put into his frontier towns,great ſtore of new ordnance caſt,weapons and armor prouided, and whatſoeuer els the neceſſity of the preſent time required. So with the Turks ſtood reaſon & induſtry,rather than with the Chriſtians, who(as ſome note)rather wanted diſcretion how to vſe the victory,than valor to gain the ſame: which whether it chanced for that proſperity begetteth negligence, or that men joying in their pleaſant bliſſe,regard little the time to come,I leaue it to the judgement of the wiſer to determine.

After this ſo memorable a victory, the three great commanders of the fleet ſat in counſell C to conſult,what farther courſe they were beſt to take. But foraſmuch as Winter began now to approch, and that they could not much do vntill their fleet was new furniſhed and manned, they all reſolued for that time to diſſolue the fleet, and the next Spring in the beginning of Aprill,to meet together againe at Corcyra. Whereupon Don Iohn and Columnius returned to Meſſana, where they in ſafety arriued in Nouember; and departing thence, and taking their leaue the one of the other, arriued, Don Iohn at Naples, and Columnius at Rome: where they were in both places with great joy and triumph receiued.

The Chriſtian fleet diſſolued.

The Venetians for all that grieued with the loſſe of Cyprus,gaue not ſo ouer,but repairing their nauy with thirty gallies,wherein were imbarked ſix thouſand ſouldiers, won a caſtle in Epirus called Margarita: and alſo recouered the towne of Suppoto, which the Turks had D that Summer before taken from them; but now hearing of this ouerthrow, did vpon the approch of the Venetian fleet,againe forſake it. The gallies alſo of Creet conducted by Canalis, intercepted many of the Turks veſſels laded with captiues and the ſpoiles of Famaguſta, as they were paſſing thence to Conſtantinople.

Although vpon the late obtained victory, a certaine reconciliation had bin made betwixt Don Iohn and Venerius, yet of the former diſſention remained an inward heart-burning of one of them againſt the other: for which cauſe,the Spaniards requeſted the Venetians to appoint another Admirall in his place. Venerius was now indeed a man of great yeres,and his ſtrength far ſpent;yet for that in his aged body reſted great wiſedom & courage,and that they thought him for his great deſert worthy of all honour,they were wonderfull loth, and vnwilling therin E to gratifie the Spaniard: for why, they well knew there was no other cauſe of the Spaniards proud hatred, but that he had ſtood againſt them vpon the honour of the Venetians: and farther, they liked not that the Spaniard ſhould ſo preſumptuouſly preſcribe vnto them, whom they ſhould place or diſplace, in or out of their honorable offices. Neuertheles,not forgetting what commodity came by concord,and what euils of diſcord,and that they might not againſt ſo mighty an enemy wel ſpare the help of the Spaniard,they reſolued to make choice of ſome other;who ſucceeding Venerius, might with one conſent manage their wars together with Don Iohn and Columnius. There was then one Iacobus Fuſcarinus their chiefe Gouernour in Dalmatia, who but a little before had notably fortified Iadera, and the other frontier towns, and for the ſpace of foureteene moneths had notably repreſſed the furious incurſions of the Turks:of F him then abſent and not deſirous of the place (as of a man of worthy deſert) the whole State by generall conſent made choice for their Admiral & General by ſea againſt the Turke:which moſt honourable place he receiued not with all the ſolemne ceremonies thereto belonging at Venice, as the manner was, but at Iadera: from whence he in the Admirall gally ſent for that purpoſe by Aloyſius Grimanus his ſucceſſour in Iadera, ſailed ouer to Corcyra: where he found the old Admirall Venerius, with no leſſe care prouiding for all things, than if he ſhould himſelfe haue ſtill continued the war. Of which great care Fuſcarinus at his comming eaſed him, by taking it wholly vpon himſelfe.

Whilſt Fuſcarinus thus lay making his preparation againſt the next Spring at Corcyra, Sara Martinengus, who had the charge of the Adriaticke (by the counſell of Venerius, who was now returned to Venice) vpon the ſudden landed his men, & beſieged Caſtro Novum, a ſtrong towne of the Turks in the borders of Iſtria, where at his firſt comming he tooke the ſuburbs, and had in ſhort time brought the towne to great extremity. But in the height of his hope to haue woon the towne, hearing that the Beglerbeg of Græce was with great power comming thither, he was glad to raiſe his ſiege, and with all ſpeed to get him againe to ſea. The Turks in like manner, to diſtreſſe the ſtrong town of Cataro, holden by the Venetians in the borders of Dalmatia, built a great and ſtrong fort vpon the paſſage from ſea to the towne, wherein they placed great ſtore both of men and artillery: in hope by keeping them of the towne from all reliefe by ſea, at length to gaine the towne which they had many times in vaine attempted by force; for by land it was already inuironed with the cruell enemy, poſſeſſing the country round about it. Iacobus Superantius the great Prouidetor, then lying at Corcyra with the Admirall, vnderſtanding how Cataro a town of no ſmall importance, was thus both by ſea and land by the enemy diſtreſſed: with twenty gallies manned with the moſt choice ſouldiers could be pickt out of the whole fleet, tooke vpon him the raſing of the fort, and relieuing of the towne. Superantius with this ſelect company, and certaine other gallies which met him by the way, came by night before the mouth of the bay of Cataro, and there diuiding his fleet, left the one part thereof at anchor before the fort, and with the other himſelfe couragiouſly paſſed by the fort, further into the bay: at whom the Turks out of the fort made diuers ſhot, but (by reaſon it was darke) to ſmall purpoſe. In paſſing by, Superantius tooke ſuch view as he could of the fort, and by and by began on that ſide to batter the ſame; as did alſo the other gallies on the other ſide: and withall landed their men on both ſides; who vpon ſignall giuen, ran reſolutely to the fort, and by plaine force entering the ſame, preuailed vpon the fearefull Turks, and put them to the ſword euery mothers ſon; ſo that of all that great garriſon, was not one left aliue to carry newes of the ſlaughter. This fort was in length fiue hundred paces, but not ſtrong towards land, from whence no ſuch feare was doubted. In it was taken ſeuenteen great pieces of ordnance, with much faire armour, and great abundance of victuals: and ſeuen galliots which lay at anchor vnder the fort. Cataro thus relieued, Superantius with victory returned againe to Corcyra.

Superantius relieueth Cataro, and taketh a great fort of the Turks.

Fuſcarinus the Venetian Admirall with all things in readineſſe, hauing long lien at Corcyra, expecting the comming of the confederates, as was before appointed; ſent Superantius the Prouidetor with fiue and twenty gallies to Meſſana, to haſten the comming of Don Iohn, and to attend vpon him by the way. But comming thither, and thinking to haue found a great fleet and a ſtrong power in good forwardneſſe to haue ſet forward, he found ſuch ſmall preparation, as well ſhewed the Spaniards ſmall care for repreſſing of the Turke, and that they would not be very forward in the ſeruice intended. Which filling him with griefe and indignation, cauſed him to complaine vnto himſelfe of their vnfaithfulneſſe, and to bewaile the ſtate of his country, with the whole Chriſtian common-weale: for Don Iohn had before ſolemnely promiſed vnto the Venetian Embaſſador, that all things ſhould be in readineſſe againſt the appointed time: but now a great part of Summer was paſt, when ſcarce ſome few companies, and about fifty gallies were met together at Meſſana; and when Auria would come with the reſt, no man could tell. So that the carefull Prouidetor ſtood now no leſſe in doubt of the Spaniards delay, than of the Turks fury.

Selymus ſends out Vluzales with two hundred gallies.

Selymus, after the great ouerthrow he had receiued at the Iſlands Corzulares, for feare he ſhould be driuen quite out of the ſea, was aboue all things carefull for the renuing of his nauy: and hauing partly new built, partly repaired two hundred gallies, commended them to the conduct of Vluzales; with expreſſe charge, That by how much things had fallen out worſe the laſt yeare, he ſhould with ſo much the more care now beware of the like danger; and not goe out of the bounds of the Archipelago, or to aduenture battell but vpon aduantage, or at leaſtwiſe vpon an euen hand.

This Vluzales (otherwiſe called Occhiall) was an Italian borne in Calabria, who in his

A youth taken at ſea by the Turks,and chained in the gally,and afterward renouncing his faith, by many degrees grew vnto the higheſt preferments amongſt the Turks,and ſo became an exceeding plague as wel to his own country as all other of the Chriſtians bordring on the Mediterranian.
He now Admirall for the Turk,after the manner of the proud Barbarians,threatned with fire and ſword to be reuenged vpon the Venetians; which knowne at Venice,much troubled them, as well acquainted with the fury of the old Archpyrat. Beſide that, Antonius Barbarus their Embaſſadour, all the time of this war kept in ſafe cuſtody at Conſtantinople, had by letters certified them,what a great fleet,and what a ſtrong army Selymus had prouided againſt them: and that he himſelfe told 250 ſaile of gallies when they ſet forward from Conſtantinople, beſide ſome other that were to meet with him at Calipolis: and that therefore B they ſhould beware how they incountred with the Turks fleet but vpon equal ſtrength. It was alſo at the ſame time commonly reported, That king Philip chief of the Confederats,careleſſe of the wars againſt the Turk in the Eaſt, was about to turn his forces vpon the Kingdomes of Tunes or Algiers, neerer vnto him; as indeed he did the yeare following. The Venetians intangled with ſo many difficulties were euen at their wits end, and day by day the Senat ſate from the riſing of the Sun to the ſetting of the ſame,conſulting how all theſe miſchiefs were to be remedied. But foraſmuch as the greateſt danger was to be feared from the Turks fleet, as then houering euen ouer their heads; they by Letters commanded Fuſcarinus their Admiral, That whether the Confederats came vnto him or not, he ſhould forthwith take his courſe towards the Eaſt,and there according to the enemies deſignes,and his own diſcretion and valour, C to do what he ſhould think beſt to be done for the common good of his country,and not to refuſe to ioyn with the enemy in battell, if he ſaw any good hope of victory. Neither ceaſed they at the ſame time, both by their Embaſſadors and letters, earneſtly to call both vpon the Pope and the King, to haſten their forces to incounter the enemy before he ſhould come out of his own ſeas; and to carry the terrour of the war home to his own doores,rather than to receiue it at their owne. The like meſſage was alſo done to Don Iohn, putting him in minde what his place,what the time,and what the danger of the time required; intreating him (if it were poſſible) of himſelfe to adde ſomthing vnto that haſt which the neceſſity of ſo important a cauſe required. Who neuertheleſſe, for all the meſſengers and letters to him ſent (which were many) went ſtill on faire and ſoftly,delaying from day to day; telling, That he would D by and by come, and that the Spaniards would alwaies be ſo good as their word. Which was ſo far from his thought,that afterwards finding one excuſe after another,he not only ſtaid his comming, but called back again Requiſenius alſo, whom he had ſent before with twenty gallies to Corcyra. Now were two months (fitteſt for the wars) vainly ſpent; when Superantius grieued to ſee time to no purpoſe ſo ſlip away, and fearing leſt the reſt of the Summer ſhould to as ſmall effect in like manner paſſe alſo, with great inſtance importuned him to haſten his journy. Then at length Don Iohn anſwered, that the Venetians requeſted but reaſon, neither that he wiſhed for any thing more than to ſatisfie their deſires,but that a greater care hindred the leſſe, which was firſt to be preuented: He was aduertiſed (as he ſaid) that the French King pretending the ſuppreſſing of certain pyrats, had aſſembled a great fleet at Rochel, with purpoſe E indeed to inuade Spain,now that the king was buſied in theſe wars againſt the Turk;and that therfore they muſt pardon him if he preferd the regard of Spain before others, being expreſly commanded from the king,not to depart from Meſſana vntill he had other commandment from him. But whether this excuſe by France proceeded of a true fear or otherwiſe, the Venetians much doubted; and the rather, for that the French King vnderſtanding thereof by the Venetians,was therwith (as reaſon was) exceedingly offended: proteſting, that he was euer ſo far from that purpoſe of hindring any the confederat princes in that their religious war,that if the troubles of his own country would haue ſo permitted,he would gladly haue giuen them aid therin. Many there were alſo that thought, Enuy the antient enemy of vertue and valor, to haue had a great power in this delay; doubting whether the Spaniards would more reioyce of the F victory wel hoped for,if they ſhould ioin with the Venetians,or grieue if the ſame ſhould by the Venetians be obtained without them. Superantius weary of diſcourſes and long expectation, and almoſt out of hope of any help in time from the Spaniard; how vntowardly ſoeuer things went, thought better yet warily to moderate his griefe, than in ſo dangerous a time to giue any occaſion for the Spaniard to fall quite off. Yet ſpake he not fawningly or flatteringly of the matter, but with a certaine modeſt grauity declared, That he had thought heauen would ſooner haue fallen, than that Don Iohn would not at the appointed time haue come to G Corcyra. And withall beſought him, and wiſhed him to beware that he brought not the common ſtate into ſome great danger: if they had to do with ſuch an enemy as might be delaied with, then he ſaid he could eaſily abide delay; but now, for that the war and the enemy was ſuch, as wherein, or with whom neuer any Generall had delaied without loſſe, to what end did he longer defer or trifle out the time? or what other fleet did he expect? If they ſhould diuide their forces, then were they all too weake, but vnited together, ſtrong enough to defend the common cauſe. The neerer the enemy came, the more haſt were to be made to ioyne with the Venetian fleet. And what could be (as he told him) more honorable or glorious, than for him a noble young Gentleman royally diſcended, of whom the world had conceiued a great hope, that he would in martiall honour exceed the glory of his moſt famous anceſtors, H againe to vanquiſh the proud Turk, the greateſt and moſt mighty Monarch of the world, to fight the battell of the Higheſt, to aſſure the Chriſtian commonwealth againſt ſo puiſſant an enemy, and to purchaſe vnto himſelfe immortall glory and renown. As for the French, there was no ſuch thing to be feared as was pretended, who with ſuch ſlender preparation, not worth the name of a fleet, was not ſo vnaduiſed as to ſet vpon a Kingdome of ſuch ſtrength and power as Spain. Furthermore he ſaid, that it concerned not the Venetians more than the King himſelfe, to haue the Turks repreſſed: whoſe Kingdoms of Naples, Sicilia & Spain, were no leſſe than their territory, expoſed to danger by ſea. The good ſucceſſe of their affaires in the Eaſt would open the way to the conqueſt of Africk: but if the Turk ſhould preuaile, then were they I to deſpaire, not of Africk, but of all Italy, Sicily, yea and of Spain it ſelfe. The time (he ſaid) and neceſſity of the war, with the extremity of the danger of the whole and common ſtate, required that he ſhould with all his power and ſpeed poſſible, take vpon him the defence of the common cauſe, or to ſay more truly, of the Chriſtian commonweale, then ſo dangerouſly impugned. Theſe reaſons drawn from the common good and the truth it ſelfe, much moued the Generall: but the Kings pleaſure was to be preferd before all reaſons or dangers that could be alledged. But hearing afterward, what reſolute command the Venetian Senat had ſent vnto their Admirall, he became exceeding carefull: for he feared leſt if the Admirall ſhould without his help fight the battell and gain the victory, he would conuert all the glory therof vnto himſelf: but if he ſhould chance to be ouerthrown, it would turn to his vtter reproch and perpetual K infamy, that in ſo neceſſary a time he had withdrawn himſelf from the common cauſe. Wherefore as a man perplexed, and in doubt what to doe, he ſtood for a while as one at his wits end: yet at laſt, he vpon deliberation reſolued to take a middle courſe, and ſo neither without the command of the King (by whoſe preſcript order all was to be don) to depart with the fleet from Meſſana; neither altogether to fruſtrat the Confederats of the expected ayd. And to that purpoſe ſent two and twenty gallies vnder the conduct of one Lilly of Andrada (a noble Gentleman) to the Venetian Admirall at Corcyra; with whom went alſo Columnius with the Popes fleet. Now was Pius Quintus the late Pope dead, and Vgo Boncompanius, by the name of Gregorius Decimus Tertius, Pope in his ſtead; who vpon the ſame conditions with his predeceſſour, had entred into the league, and liking very well of Columnius, kept him ſtill for his L Admirall.

Don Iohn in doubt whether to ſend aid to the Venetians or not.

He ſendeth Lilly of Andrada, with 22 gallies.

Long had Fuſcarinus expected the comming of the Confederats, and albeit that the yeare was far ſpent (Auguſt being then come) and no ſuch aid ſent as he had expected; yet deſiring to do ſomthing worth the remembrance, and beſeeming their honour, he earneſtly perſuaded Columnius and Lilly to ſet forward with him toward the Eaſt, and with their vnited forces to giue the enemy battell: telling them, That if they were all of like courage, they ſhould go not only to the glory of the preſent battell, but to the great honor and aduancement of the Chriſtian commonweale. After that, he extenuated the power of the enemy, ſaying, That he could not but maruell from whence ſuch a number of gallies as was reported, could ſo ſuddenly be gathered; or whereupon ſo great confidence and boldnes was grown vnto them, ſo lately ouer- M thrown and put to flight: the enemies fleet (he ſaid) was the yere before ouercome and diſperſed, the Captains and mariners ſlain; and that therfore it was not credible, that ſo many gallies could with ſuch celerity be built, and ſuch a number of mariners and maſters as was needfull in ſo ſhort time prouided: That the prouiſion of the enemy was by flying fame made ſo

A greater than indeed it was or poſſible could be : for why, they might eaſily gueſſe what the enemy was able to do, by the Chriſtians themſelues, who could not without much adoe and great labour build their fleets, and train vp their Mariners and Maſters : and that therfore letting fame flie, which commonly maketh things greater and more dreadfull than they are; he was verily perſuaded, that the enemy was glad to vſe moſt vnskilfull and ignorant as well Mariners, Maſters, as ſoldiers: who ſuddenly taken vp in the inland countries, and put into the gallies, knew not ſo much as the very names of the ropes and tacklings, and other equipage: and then thoſe gallies which they had were like enough to be [illegible] weake, as of them which were the laſt yere rent and bruiſed, & now again botched vp, or [illegible] built of green timber, could not be nimble or greatly ſeruiceable. Wherefore he exhorted them, as valiant men to ſet forward B against the enemy; and that with the greater courage, for that the laſt yeares victory had opened vnto them the way for the gaining of another. Which if it ſhould ſo fall out, as good hope there was, they ſhould therby take from the proud enemy both power and hope (but in long time) to be able to recouer his ſtrength at ſea: ſo that they in the mean time without fear; might at their pleaſure take the rich Iſlands in the Archipelago. Now if the Turks declining battel, ſhould retire themſelues into the Helleſpont, then might they with fire & ſword ſpoil all the frontiers of their dominion on this ſide the ſtreits, and open a way vnto the Chriſtians to do great matters.

Hardly were Columnius and Lilly perſuaded by the Admirall: neither did they thereunto giue their conſent, vntill it was decreed, That they ſhould not in any caſe ioin battell with the C enemy, but with their gallions & galeaſſes firſt placed in the front of the battel, in whom conſiſted the greateſt hope of the victory. So ſetting forward toward the enemy, & come to Commentitia, letters were brought vnto them from Don Iohn, certifying them, that he was now by letters from the King commanded to come towards the Eaſt, and to ioin his forces with the confederats; but yet that for certain daies he could not come, vntil he were better prouided of all things neceſſary: and that therfore they ſhould in the mean time careffully looke vnto all things, promiſing ſo ſoon as he poſſibly could to come to them. Vpon theſe letters Columnius and Lilly began to doubt, whether to go on further, or to expect the comming of the Generals yet foraſmuch as he had not expreſly written any thing concerning their ſtaying, and Fuſcarinus vrged them forwards, on they went, with their fleet diuided into three battels. The whole D fleet conſiſted of 155 gallies, ſix galeaſſes, and twenty tall ſhips: in the right wing was Superantius; in the left wing Canalius; and in the middle battell, Columnius, Fuſcarinus, and Lilly; and in the rereward followed Quirinus. Before each battell went two of the galeaſſes ſtil in readines for preſent battell. In this order they came firſt to Zacynthus (commonly called Zanto) & ſo to Cerigo: the next day after to Colubraria (commonly called Dragonaria) ouer againſt Cerigo. Here Angelus Surianus a valiant gentleman, ſent before to diſcouer the enemy, & what ſtrength he was of, returning vnto the fleet, declared vnto the Admirall, That the Turks fleet, conſiſting of 160 gallies, 60 galliots, and four great ſhips, lay about Maluaſia, in the entrance of the bay called Sinus Argolicus, vpon the borders of Peloponeſus, about fifty miles off from the Chriſtian fleet. Shortly after, the ſame fleet was again diſcouered making for Maleas E wherupon the Chriſtians, before reſolued to fight whereſoeuer they ſhould meet the Enemy, forthwith put themſelues in order of battel, and ſo with their galeaſſes in the front, made with what ſpeed they could toward him. Theſe two fleets were thought for many reſpects almoſt equal: the enemy was in number moe, but inferiour in ſtrength. The Chriſtian fleet by reaſon of the heauines of the galeaſſes, made but ſmal way; and the enemy afraid of the great ſtore of Ordnance the galleaſſes carried, durſt not come neer them. The Turks fleet was rather nimble than ſtrong, but ours more firm and forward. Look wherin each exceeded the other, therwith they endeauored to help themſelues and annoy the enemy. The Chriſtians fearing to be circumuented by the multitude of their enemies, oppoſed their ſhips and galeaſſes before them as a moſt ſure forteſſe: and the Turk, by how much he had had the worſe ſucceſſe the yeare F before, was ſo much the more carefull to beware how he indangered himſelf within the reach of the galeaſſes. The Chriſtians deſired nothing more than to fight and to come to handy blows: but the Turk who thought it ſufficient for the preſent not to be ouercome, ſomtime made away as faſt as he could, and by and by ſtayd again, if haply he might haue taken the gallies ſeparated from the galeaſſes; neuer ſeeming willing to aduenture further than reaſon

The number & order of the Chriſtian fleet.

The Chriſtian fleet and the Turks almoſt equall.

The Turke warily declineth battell.

and diſcretion were. The enemy ſeeing the Chriſtian fleet comming ſtill on, and ready to giue battell, firſt ſeemed as if he would haue don the like, but afterwards turned his courſe vpon G the right hand, and kept aloof alongſt the coaſt of Malea: At which time the Chriſtians, although they were very deſirous to haue followed them, yet the Turks with their nimble fleet were quickly too far gon for the Chriſtian fleet to ouertake them, eſpecially with their heauy ſhips. That day almoſt ſpent as it were in the chaſe of the enemy, towards the going down of the Sunne, the enemy put into the current of the ſea betwixt Cerigo and the Harts Iſland, in bredth about ten mi[illegible] there diuiding their fleet into three parts, lay in good order, as expecting the comm[illegible] Chriſtians, with the prowes of their gallies turned, as if vpon the confidence of the p[illegible], which they had filled ouerthwart, they had purpoſed nothing more than to fight. Yet both fleets ſeemed reſolued; the one not to fight without the galeaſſes, and the other not to come neer thoſe hot ſhips, from whom they had but the yeare H before receiued ſo great harm. And although the enemy, as was afterwards known, purpoſed nothing leſſe than to fight, but vpon great aduantage; yet fearing by open flight to diſhonor his lord and maſter, and by granting as it were of victory, to increaſe the fame of the Chriſtians, the crafty pyrat made a great ſhew of that he leſt indeed purpoſed. For pretending a great deſire to fight, he indeed deluded the Chriſtians hope: who although the wind had failed them, yet in hope the enemy would abide them battell, with much labour and rowing came ſo neer him, that the great ſhot began to fly too and fro on both ſides: but when the matter ſhould haue come to haue bin tried by dint of ſword, then it plainly appeared what the enemy had indeed purpoſe: for ſtill keeping the prowes of his gallies vpon the Chriſtians, he by let- I tle and little ſhrunk back, and beſide that the ſhadow of the night began then to approch, he cauſed all his great Ordnance, charged only with pouder, to be ſhot off, and ſo in the thick of the ſmoake retired vnſeen; colouring his ſubtill departure alſo, by certain lights left in their cock-boats, making ſhew as if the whole fleet had ſtill there ſtaid. By this means the Turks with great celerity eſcaped, being alſo holpen in this, that the Chriſtians hindred vp the heauineſſe of the galeaſſes, could not but faire and ſoftly purſue them: for theſe galeaſſes, as they are veſſels of great ſeruice, ſo are they alſo heauy and vnweldy, and not fit for chace. The departure of the enemy at length known, the Chriſtians alſo vnwilling to fight by night, returned to Cerigo. Two daies after, the Turks ſtayd in the bay of Tenarus (now called Metapan) & the Chriſtians at Cerigo; contented in that, that the enemy was the cauſe that the battell was not fought, and reckoning his weary and couert declining of battell, as a ſecret con- K feſſion of the victory. The third day after, the Chriſtians deſirous of nothing more than to joyn in battell with the enemy, in their former order ſet forward from Cerigo, and ſailing all the night, were in the break of the day deſcried from land by the Turks: whereupon Vluzales by ſhooting off of certain warning pieces commanded all his men to go abourd, and to put themſelues in readines for battell. And now the Chriſtians were not far off, when as the Turks (leſt declining of battel, might reproue them of feare) came out of the hauen, with their fleet diuided into three battels: whereof the left wing was extended a great way into the ſea, the right wing ſtill keeping neer vnto the maine, and in the middle battell was Vluzales himſelfe: who came all on no faſter than the tide draue them, ſtaying their courſe oft times of purpoſe, L to haue drawne the gallies of the Chriſtians from the galleaſſes and ſhips. Vluzales ſeeing his fleet thus in order, and fearing nothing more than the galliaſſes, commanded both the wings of his fleet (hauing in each of them fourſcore gallies) to fetch a great compaſſe about, the one on the right hand, and the other on the left, aloofe off from the galleaſſes, and ſo to aſſaile the wings of the Chriſtians on the ſides or behind: in hope ſo to haue diſordered their battell, and without danger to haue drawne the gallies from the galleaſſes and the other heauy ſhips. Which their intent the Chriſtians perceiuing, in their wings turned about their gallies alſo, in manner of the new Moone, their maine battel ſtill facing the middle battell of the Turks. The wings of the Turks fleet thus farre ſeparated from the middle battell, ſeemed to preſent vnto the Chriſtians a great aduantage: which Fuſcarinus (intentiue to all the offers of good fortune) M quickly perceiuing, and calling vnto Columnius and Lilly, and ſhewing them the enemies main battell at hand, and the wings gone a great way off, requeſted and perſuaded them, That not ſtaying for the heauy Ships and Galleaſſes, they would with him vpon the ſudden aſſaile the enemies middle battell now deſtitute of the wings: not doubting but ſo to ouerthrow

Vluzales meaning nothing leſſe, yet maketh ſhew of battell.

The Chriſtians deſirous of battell, go againſt the Turks.

A the enemies greateſt ſtrength there, before the wings could, now they were ſo far gone, ioyne themſelues to the battell again. What could (as he ſaid) haue hapned more wiſhedly, than to haue their battell diuided. So that they might at more aduantage fight againſt euery part therof, now ſeparted, than againſt all three parts at once. If they had thought themſelues not only equall, but too ſtrong for the whole enemies fleet, ſhould they not the better ouercome them apart and diſperſed. The opportunity, as he ſaid, was but ſhort, and therefore to be forthwith reſolued vpon. If they would take the preſent occaſion of victory then offred, and as reſolute men charge their enemies, little fearing any ſuch thing, they ſhould by their celerity and valor, teach the Turks what the Chriſtian diſcipline of war and power was able to do: but if they would therein vſe delay, they ſhould ere long in vain wiſh for the like occaſion they B had let ſlip, when as their battell was again ſtrengthned with the wings. This the Admirals ſpeech was of moſt that heard it ioyfully receiued, and his counſell well liked; and that with ſuch a generall cheerfulneſſe of the ſouldiers, as ſhewed in them no want of courage to haue giuen the enemy preſent battell. But Columnius and Lilly being of the ſame mind they had bin alwaies, ſaid it were dangerous ſo to do, for fear of drawing the whole three battels of the enemy at once vpon them, againſt which they ſhould be too weak, without the help of the galeaſſes and heauy ſhips: and therfore ſaid flatly, That without thoſe veſſels ſo much feared of their enemies, they would in no caſe hazard the fortune of a battel. But whether Columnius and Lilly were of that opinion for that they ſo thought, or were ſo charged by Don Iohn (of whom they altogether depended) not to fight in his abſence, many doubted. The wings of the Chriſtians C in turning about to confront the enemies wings, were a little diſordred: which the Turks perceiuing, and taking the preſent opportunity, with 15 of their gallies were about to haue charged the ſtragling gallies: which Superantius perceiuing, to ſtay their courſe, went out couragiouſly againſt them with foure gallies, and made with them a great fight: in the heat whereof, Superantius ſeeing forty more of the enemies gallies comming towards him, and doubting to be incloſed, with all ſpeed ſent for relief, which came preſently in, namely twenty gallies, with two of the galeaſſes: which forthwith ſent their thundring ſhot ſo thick and furiouſly among their enemies, that in a little time eighteen of their gallies were by them al rent and torn; and the Turks therwith diſmaied, were glad in ſuch haſt to returne, as if they had rather fled than retired. Superantius hauing at that fight but one of his gallies ſhot through, returned again to D his place. Of this light fight many deemed what would haue bin the euent of the whole battell, if the opinion of Fuſcarinus had preuailed. Both the fleets falling again into their order, although the Chriſtians could not ſo faſt follow, as the Turks went before them; yet came they ſo neer them, that oftentimes they changed bullets, as well with their ſmall ſhot as their great. And yet for all that, it was by many ſigns gathered, that neither the Turks would abide preſent battell, neither the Chriſtians longer delay, if by their enemies they ſo might. The Chriſtians had agreed (as is before ſaid) not to ioyn in battel without their galleaſſes and tal ſhips: which Vluzales wel vnderſtood, both by the fugitiues and his own eſpials, as alſo by their maner of ſailing. And he himſelfe, although he had no great deſire to fight, yet to be the better able to fruſtrat the endeuors of the Chriſtians (who with great labour drew with them the E galeaſſes and other heauy ſhips) ſent his chargable great ſhips to Maluaſia, there to be vnrigged; wherby he diſcharged himſelf of a great burthen, & made himſelf able at his own choice and pleaſure, to leaue or take, to fight or not: and alſo with ſuch ſoldiers and other neceſſaries as were in the ſame great ſhips, ſupplied the wants of his whole fleet. By which policy the matter was brought to that paſſe, that if the Chriſtians would needs draw the enemy to battel, they muſt of neceſſity forſake their galeaſſes, their moſt aſſured ſtrength; or if they would not leaue them, then they could not by any means inforce the ready enemy to fight. The day now declining, the enemy ſuppoſing himſelf to haue done enough for that time, both for the abating of the heart of the Chriſtians, and encouraging his owne people, in ſeemly order, as one not afraid, ſailed with his fleet to Corona. The Chriſtians in like manner retiring F themſelues to Cerigo.

The Turks fleet at Corona, and the Chriſtians at Cerigo.

Whilſt things thus went, Don Iohn by a frigot ſent of purpoſe, gaue knowledge to the fleet, that he was come to Corcyra, ſharply blaming the great commanders for their departure, and that they ſtayd not for his comming: and further commanded them as their Generall, all other things ſet apart, forthwith to meet him at Zacynthus, there to reſolue of all matters.

Don Iohn ſendeth word to the fleet to meet him at Zacynthus.

Columnius wholly deuoted to the Spaniards, and preferring the fauour of Don Iohn before the reſt,hearing his meſſage,was in ſuch haſt to haue returned,that he would haue perſuaded Fuſcarinus to haue left the heauy veſſels and other weak gallies at Cerigo, and with a hundred of the beſt gallies with all ſpeed to haue returned to the Generall. Of which opinion was alſo Lilly:but Fuſcarinus more careful than the reſt,as he whom the danger more concerned,would not yeeld to that perſuaſion:for that in ſo doing, they ſhould (as he ſaid) leaue the ſhips and galleaſſes,the chiefe part of their ſtrength,in danger to be ſpoiled by the enemy; whom they now kept at a bay without the help of their general;and ſhould,as he wel hoped,by often prouoking of him,at one time or other draw him to battell,and haue ouer him a notable victory. And therefore requeſted them for the loue of God, and the zeale they bare vnto the common good of all Chriſtendome, not to depart farther off, nor to ſuffer the enemy to eſcape out of their hands, neither by their departure to leaue the Iſlands of the Venetians ſubiect to the fury of the enemy:whereas the Generall might at his pleaſure and without danger come vnto them,they lying betwixt the enemy and him. But Columnius and Lilly reſolutely ſet down,hap what hap ſhould,to do what Don Iohn had commanded,would not liſten to the reaſonable perſuaſions of the Venetian Admirall, but told him flatly, That if he would not in that they had ſaid yeeld to them,they would forthwith leaue him to himſelf,and with their gallies preſently return to Zacynthus,as the Generall had commanded. Whilſt they were yet thus diſcourſing,news was brought,that the enemy was come with his fleet into the fret of Cerigo:which cauſed them all with one conſent to reſolue in ſuch order to paſſe by the enemy,as if they ſhould haue giuen him preſent battell:wheras before,they were determined by the perſuaſion of Fuſcarinus to haue gon to Crete, and there leauing the ſhips and galeaſſes in ſafety,to haue afterwards returned to the General. In ſuch order the Chriſtians paſſed by the enemies fleet, which lay ſtill in the fret of the ſea without mouing, ſtanding as it were rather vpon the guard of themſelues,than reſolued for battell. In three days ſailing they came to Zacynthus,where they found not Don Iohn,but two of his gallies,& commandment,that they ſhould there leaue their heauy ſhips, and with their gallies come to Cephalenia, where they ſhould not faile to meet him. Hereupon the Venetians were exceedingly grieued, and muttered through the whole fleet,That the Spaniards bearing themſelues vpon their wealth, were too proud,and in compariſon of themſelues, regarded neither the conditions of the league, neither any other mens credit,but troad all men vnder foot; & would now vſe the Venetians not as their friends and confederats, but as their ſlaues and vaſſals, feeding them in the mean time but with vaine hope. Yet foraſmuch as the time and neceſſity ſo required, they were content to be ouerruled: and ſo leauing the ſhips and galeaſſes at Zacynthus, went with the reſt of the fleet to Cephalenia:whither Don Iohn was not yet come,and ſent word thither, That if they had any deſire to ioin their forces with his,they ſhould yet come further back vnto him to Corcyra. This meſſage(which they had rather feared than expected) much troubled the Venetians;who readier to ſuſpect euery miſchiefe, than to hope for any good,began to fret and complain, That the Spaniards could very wel tel the Venetians what they had to do,and forgot in the mean time, what was on their own part to be performed. A hard thing it was to ſay,and yet to be ſaid,that now they had more to do with thoſe their dallying friends and confederats, than with their enemies: for with their enemies they were to fight but in time of battell, but with them they were to wreſtle at all times and in all places. They were by them (as they ſaid) drawn from the ſight of their enemies, when as they might haue bin ouerthrowne: not to the intent that with their vnited forces they might more ſafely fight againſt them, or vnder the conduct of Don Iohn gain the victory;but rather leſt any thing ſhould haue bin don which might be to the honor or profit of the Venetians:and that time which was to haue bin beſtowed in the managing of the war,ſpent in lingring and delaying, and vain going forward & backward to no purpoſe. One only way there was (as they ſaid) to haue diſpatched with the Turke, which was by ouercomming him in another notable battel,& ſo to haue vtterly broken his ſtrength at ſea:which courſe the confederats made no leſſe difficult by their ofwardnes and delaies,than the enemy by declining of battell: That they had long ago by many ſecret ſignes probably coniectured, that the Spaniards had more care to hinder & croſſe other mens doings, than to do any thing of themſelues: That their endeauors were to fruſtrate thoſe great hopes which promiſed vnto the Chriſtian commonweale the greateſt felicity and happines, together with immortall glory:

Don Iohn ſendeth for the fleet to Cephalenia,where he alſo faileth to meet them.

Don Iohn commandeth the fleet to repaire vnto him to Corcyra.

A glory:and, That the Turks of late diſcouraged with the fortunat proceedings of the Chriſtians,might again reioice at their miſhaps.

The Chriſtian fleet al together at Corcyra, ſetteth forward again towards the enemy.

The Venetians, notwithſtanding all theſe their murmuring ſpeeches, loth to fall off from the Spaniard,kept ſtill on with the reſt vntil they came to Don Iohn at Corcyra,who then lay with 53 gallies,and 18 ſhips at Spilca,in the vtmoſt end of the Iſland. At their firſt meeting, Don Iohn ſhewed himſelf not a little offended,that they had not with more duty before attended his comming: and they againe not a little complained of his long ſtay,with many other their grieuances, which were tedious here to rehearſe. The fleet now all with much ado at length met together,which conſiſted of two hundred gallies,nine galeaſſes,and thirty ſix tall ſhips:it was by generall conſent agreed, That they ſhould again ſet forward toward the Enemy. B They were not yet vnder ſaile, when two of their eſpials brought them news,that the enemies fleet(weakly furniſhed both of mariners and ſouldiers)was come to Naudrinum:which filled them all with good hope,that the Turks fleet ſo euill prouided,might in that place vpon the ſudden be eaſily oppreſſed,and the rather, if they came vpon them vnexpected. Wherfore becauſe they would not be deſcried, they kept not their courſe on right forth, but ſayling by night,kept aloof vpon the right hand:& hauing paſſed Zacynthus,came with great ſilence vnto the Strophades,where they lay at anchor all that day. In the euening they looſed thence, ſo caſting their courſe, that the more to terrifie the enemy, they might before day fall vpon him; and be ſeen in the mouth of the hauen where he lay, before there could be any report made of their comming thither. But this courſe ſo well ſet, the time was ſo euill caſt, that it C was fair day long before they could come to the appointed place,when the Turks out of their watch towers diſcouered afar off the comming of the Chriſtian fleet,gaue warning therof vnto their fellows: wherupon an alarm was preſently raiſed in the towne, and all men in armes ran headlong to the wals and to the hauen. But the Turks out of hope with their euill rigged fleet to be able to withſtand the Chriſtians,and not daring to truſt to that weak harbour, they all now in a great hurly burly ran confuſedly hand ouer head, ſoldiers and mariners, aboord: and whilſt they had yet time,got them in haſt out of that harbour,and as men chaſed by their enemies, got them into ſafe harbour at Modon,a ſtrong town of Peloponeſus, about ſix miles off. Columnius was ſent before the reſt of the fleet to haue purſued them:but they were got ſo far before him,that they had recouered the harbor before he could ouertake any of them. D The Chriſtian fleet comming before the harbour, and leauing a ſpace as it were of purpoſe for the enemy to come out into,there lay in the face of the town,daring the Turks battell. But when they had ſo lien almoſt all that day,and no man durſt come out; and now towards the euening certain ſignes of tempeſt appeared,the Chriſtians fearing to be by force of weather driuen on ground, put farther off again to ſea. Then at length Vluzales ſent out certain light gallies to follow in the taile of the fleet, when the Confederats ſuddenly ſtaying their courſe, and turning their prowes vpon them,draue them headlong again into the harbour:and afterwards retyred themſelues with the whole fleet into the Iſlands Oenuſæ, now called Sapientia, right oppoſit againſt Modon. The next day wanting freſh water, they remoued to the bay of Meſſana,there to water in the mouth of the riuer Pamiſus,which there falleth into the ſea: where E in paſſing by Corone,they were oftentimes ſhot at out of the town; and landing their men to water,were encountred by certain troups of horſmen,ſent for that purpoſe by Vluzales. There was water deerely bought with the liues of many there ſlain on both ſides: in the end, the Chriſtians preuailing, watered, and ſo returned againe to the Oenuſæ from whence they came.

The Chriſtians offer the Turks battell.

The deſcription of the bay of Modon.

Methone or Modon(for it is by both names known) ſtandeth almoſt in an Iſland ſtretching far into the ſea, where toward the Weſt runneth out a long point of the land a great way into the ſea; in the vttermoſt part whereof ſtandeth a great round tower. The towne it ſelfe, is on the one ſide incloſed with the ſea,and toward the land ſo ſtrongly fortified,as that it ſeemeth almoſt impregnable: Towards the South commeth in a faire bay about three miles wide,ſafe F from all winds except the Northerly wind only;and ſhut vp by a little Iſland in the mouth of the bay,maketh a ſafe & quiet harbor,with two entrances therinto on either ſide of the Iſland. Within this bay lay the Turks fleet, with the ſterns of their gallies toward the land,and their prows toward the ſea. At the Southerly comming in of the bay ſtandeth an hil, which the inhabitants call Albus:on the top whereof,the enemy had placed ſix great pieces of Ordnance, wherwith to keep the Chriſtians from entring that way. So had they alſo vpon that point of G the main, which (as we ſaid) runneth out from the town, and vpon S. Bernards rock, planted other great pieces of Ordnance to defend that paſſage alſo. The Chriſtians comming vnto the mouth of the bay, there lay with their fleet diuided into foure parts, but yet doubtful what to do: for beſide that the entrances of the bay were but narrow, they were alſo far more dangerous to be entred, by reaſon of the great Ordnance planted vpon them. Neuertheles, the Venetian Admirall in hope of good ſucceſſe, and loth to let the fearfull enemy ſo to eſcape out of their hands, would fain haue perſuaded the General with his whole fleet to haue entred the bay, and there in the harbor to haue oppreſſed the enemy: which he ſhewed to be no matter to do, for that the enemy was too weak in ſtrength, and could not be from land relieued. In which doing, they ſhould indeed ouerthrow but one fleet; but in the ouerthrowing of that one, cut H in ſunder all the ſinews of the Turkiſh Empire by ſea: and raiſing a tumult in the bay, and filling all with a generall feare, ſhould vndoubtedly at the firſt onſet put the enemy to flight: Which don, what ſhould let, but that carrying about with them the terror of the victory, they ſhould with their victorious fleet, take from the Turke all the Iſlands of the Ægeum? That truly and wiſely it was ſaid of Themiſtocles, That whoſoeuer had the command of the ſea, muſt needs alſo preuaile in the reſt, and at length carry away the victory by land alſo. It was (as he ſaid) the part of good chieftains, not to be wanting vnto themſelues when occaſion was offered: beſides that, they were the ſame Turks, whom they had but the yeare before vanquiſhed; and what had that one yere either taken from them, or giuen vnto the Turks? or what ſhould they feare ſix pieces of Ordnance mounted vpon a hill, who if they ſhould vndertake the battell, I were not to fear the great ſtore of Ordnance in 260 of the enemies gallies and galliots? I my ſelf (ſaid he) will be the guid and leader, in whatſoeuer ſhall ſeem moſt difficult and dangerous: and will in perſon my ſelfe be the firſt that ſhall enter the harbour, and aduenture the firſt danger. Great victories (he ſaid) were not to be gained but with great aduentures; & that therfore the matter were to be haſted, before more aid ſhould be ſent vnto the Turks. Wherefore they ſhould as reſolute men attempt that, the Turks thought the Chriſtians durſt not to haue attempted; and with the ſame courage brake into the bay, wherewith they had but the yere before broken the ſtrength of the ſame enemy; and by the power of God carry away another notable triumph of the vanquiſhed Turks: who ouercome in a ſecond battell at ſea, muſt needs depart with all their maritime territories. With euill liking of the Spaniards was the K Venetian Admirall heard: and Don Iohn the Generall, deeming both the time and place vnfit for the attempting of ſo great an exploit; rehearſed on the one ſide, the ſtrength of the enemy, the diſaduantage of the place, the difficulty of the battell, with the manifold and great calamities receiued by the ouerhaſty & raſh atempt of their enemies: That the enemies ſtrength was not to be ſo much deemed by the eye, or by report, as by reaſon; and that many in ſeeking to increaſe their former glory, had in ſo doing ouerthrown the ſame: That the Chriſtians in entring and aduenturing the harbor, ſhould on the one ſide be beaten with the Artillery from the hil; and on the other, with the artillery out of the caſtle of Modon: and that it was not like that Vluzales ſhould if need require, lack aid from land: who but the other day had ſent great troups of horſmen to haue kept the Chriſtians from watring: L that a matter of ſo great importance was (by Fuſcarinus his leaue) not raſhly to be taken in hand, vpon an heat and hautineſſe of ſtomack, but vpon graue and mature deliberation: for if they ſhould in a place of ſo great diſaduantage, hazard the fortune of a generall battell, it ſhould ſeem that either he knew not that kind of fight and force of the enemy, or els would make the bay of Modon more famous by the ouerthrow of the Chriſtians, than was the Curzulari by the ſlaughter of the Turks. Then what a ſhame would it be, if they which were about to oppres the enemies fleet, ſhould themſelues be ouerthrown, and that in their own deuice. He had rather (as he ſaid) preſerue his own fleet, than to take 600 of the enemies gallies, and to acount the ſame for a greater honor. Which he determined not, for that he would not haue any thing don; but that vnripe occaſions ſhould not be too much haſtned, and as it were thruſt headlong forward: wheras time M would giue opportunity for the ouerthrow of the Turks fleet, ſo that they ran not blindly on headlong: & that in future time the Venetians would reioice that they had ſo moderated their deſires. The Chriſtians (he ſaid) had ſufficiently preuailed, if thoſe things ſhould fall out well, which were warily and aduiſedly conſidered and reſolued vpon.

Don Iohn refuſeth to follow the counſell of the Admirall.

The

A The matter thus on both ſides debated, and nothing don, they returned with the fleet into the port of Nauarinum. This proceeding, as it diuerſly moued the Spaniards and the Venetians, ſo brought it forth diuers ſpeeches, euery man ſpeaking in fauour of his own nation. The Spaniard openly vaunted, That he had moſt wiſely reſolued, for that how deer the counſell of the Venetian Admirall would haue coſt if it had bin followed, the thing it ſelf (as he ſaid) ſhewed, by the extreme danger therof preſented, not in the doubtfull opinion of men, but laid open before their eies. The Venetian on the other ſide more deſirous of battell, the neerer they had ſeen the opportunity to haue preuailed vpon the enemy, the more impatiently they endured ſo aſſured a victory, to haue bin let ſlip out of their hands: and thereof ſpake accordingly.

B The Chriſtians lying at Nauarinum, conſulted of many things what they were beſt to take in hand: and reſoluing at laſt, by ſea & land to beſiege the caſtle of Modon, which kept the paſſage into the bay, and defended the Turkiſh fleet, they returned again thither, & landed 7000 of their beſt ſoldiers, to beſiege the caſtle. And at the ſame time, appointed the galeaſſes with certain gallies to batter it alſo from the ſea: which the more commodiouſly to do, they ioined two of their greateſt gallies together ſide to ſide, which they made faſt with maſts and ſtrong ropes, and ſo bourded them clean ouer, wheron as on a platform, they placed gabions al affront, filled with earth, and great Ordnance betwixt to haue battered the Caſtle. But when this Engine (in maner of a floating fort) ſhould haue performed the ſeruice for which it was deuiſed, it proued vnſeruiceable, after it had with much ado bin brought thither, being ready to ſinke C with the weight of the great Ordnance and other things wherwith it was ouercharged. For which cauſe, and for that they vnderſtood a great number of horſemen to be come into the town, they gaue ouer the ſiege vainly begun, and put again with their fleet to ſea. It fortuned at the ſame time, that a tall ſhip of Venice departing from Zacynthus, and comming alongſt the coaſt of Peloponeſus, with prouiſion for the fleet, was deſcried by the enemy; who thinking to do the Chriſtians a great diſhonor, if they could almoſt in the ſight of their fleet surpriſe her, they ſent out certain light gallies to haue taken her, Vluzales in the mean time with the reſt of his fleet, lying in the very mouth of the bay, ready to come out if the Chriſtian fleet ſhould once ſtir to relieue her. Which the Chriſtians perceiuing, and wel hoping that ſo the enemy would be drawn to battell, ſent out Columnius with his gallies to reſcue the ſhip; and D others alſo which lying aloof, might get in betwixt the Turks gallies & the bay: Don Iohn and the Venetian Admirall lying ready to haue giuen battell, if Vluzales ſhould haue come forth: but the Chriſtians comming on with a ſmall gale, the enemy being afraid, by ſhooting off of certain warning pieces within the bay, in time called back the gallies that were already gone out of the bay: who all forthwith came in, excepting Mohomet the nephew of Barbaruſſa, a moſt famous captain amongſt the Turks, who as one of great courage, and deſirous of honour, ſtaid a little without the bay, with greater courage than diſcretion, expecting who ſhould aſſaile him. Him the Marques S. Crucis ſet vpon, and had with him a great and terrible fight: but in the end the Marques preuailing, ſlew Mahomet with all his Turks, and with honor caried away the gally. So the diſhonor which Vluzales would haue don the Chriſtians, fell vpon himſelfe, E hauing in his own ſight loſt one of his beſt captains with his gally.

The Prince of Parma in vain beſiegeth Nauarinum.

The next day, becauſe the yeare ſhould not paſſe without ſomthing don, nor the hope of ſo great a preparation come to nothing, the Chriſtians determined to beſiege the Caſtle of Nauarinum (which was in antient time called Pylus) more famous for nothing, than for that it was the natiue place of old Neſtor. The City of Nauarinum ſtandeth vpon a riſing ground, ſtretching ſomwhat into the ſea; wherinto it hath a large proſpect, and a faire large hauen, but ſubiect to the North wind. It is defended with a point of the main, running compaſſe into the ſea, whereon ſtandeth an old Caſtle. Some ſent before to view the ſcituation of the place, brought word back, that the caſtle might in three days be won. The performance of which exploit, was committed to Aleſander Farneſius Prince of Parma, whom the Venetians furniſhed F with munition and victual. He landing with 2000 Italians, a thouſand Spaniards, and 500 Germans, began with twelue great pieces to batter the caſtle. And albeit that the battery was planted ſo far off, as that it did the enemy no great harme; yet haply the enterpriſe had taken effect, if by taking the ſtreight and troubleſome paſſages through a rough and thick forreſt, the City had bin kept from relief: but foraſmuch as thoſe paſſages were left free, the enemy cunningly oppoſed policy againſt force; for ſalying out of the city they gaue the Chriſtians an hot skirmiſh. And in the mean time whilſt the Chriſtians were ſo buſied, by a port toward the forreſt on the other ſide of the City receiued in great number both of horſe and foot. The report of this new come aid cauſed the Prince to raiſe his ſiege, and to go again aboord. And now reſted all the hope of gaining the town in the ſtrength of the fleet, and that not ſmall, for that the Turks not relieued with victuals by land, were now by the confederats kept from them alſo by ſea: for at that time the Turkes were troubled with two great miſchiefs, the famin and the plague. For no prouiſion had there bin made, as in a thing neuer feared; and that little being ſpent that was in the Towne, they were inforced to ſeek for victuals farther off: which comming but ſparingly, as in time of dearth, was oftentimes by the way intercepted by the ſouldiers which lay about in the country villages, wanting victuals no leſſe than they in the city. And the more men the Beglerbeg of Greece brought down for defence of the ſea towns, ſo much the more the wants of all things daily increaſed. So that no man doubted but that in ſhort time all would be brought to extream penury. What a dearth the mortalitie had made, the want of men in gallies wel declared: for many of the gallies for lack of mariners and ſoldiers were ſent away into Eubœa, or left at Maluaſia, or carried away to Conſtantinople. Thoſe which ſtaid in the bay of Modon were ſcarſe an hundred gallies, and forty galliots, and they ſo ſlenderly manned, that the greateſt gallies had not aboue a hundred and twenty men in them, and they ſo megre and faint, as that they could ſcarſly hold vp their weapons. The Chriſtians vnderſtanding of theſe things, were in good hope, that by continuing the ſiege, they ſhould without danger gain a notable victory. For which cauſe Fuſcarinus perſuaded the Spaniards (of whoſe conſtancy he doubted) to hold it out as men of reſolution. Shewing them, That in the euent of this action reſted for them for euer to be feared or contemned of the Turks: who except they ſhould be changed into fiſhes or into birds, could not (as he ſaid) without a notable ouerthrow eſcape their hands out of the Bay. But vnto this his hope and counſel the euent was not correſpondent: for the Spaniards, whether it were for the tedious nes of the ſiege, or for want of victuals, or for the approch of winter, or els moued with ſome other reaſons, began to think of the matter diuerſly: and at the firſt a report was raiſed, That the Chriſtians giuing ouer the ſiege, would ſhortly return home; and the reaſon was, for that they wanted bisket, and had ſcarſly victuals left for fifteen daies, which was to be reſerued for their long journy home. Beſides that, the approch of Winter did call them from the action: and that hauing don what they might, they could neuer draw the enemy forth to battell. And therfore hauing ſufficiently, and as far as was poſſible, already diſcharged their duties, they were now alſo to regard their ſafety, and to foreſee, that their fleet, wherein the wellfare of them all was repoſed, were not too far indangered. At the firſt theſe ſpeeches were divulged by the common ſouldiers and mariners of ſmall credit or reputation; but afterward by more, and they alſo men of better place and ſort. Yea Don Iohn himſelfe, whether it were to ſome other purpoſe, or that he ſo ſpake in good earneſt, began to lay the fault vpon others, why he, ſo lately come from Meſſana, ſhould in ſo ſhort time want victuals and all things els neceſſary.

The weaknes of the Turks fleet.

The Venetians murmure againſt the Spaniards.

With theſe vnexpected reports, and ſo far different from the Confederation, the Venetian Admiral with the reſt of the Venetian Commanders were exceedingly troubled, and grieued aboue meaſure: for it ſeemed not credible, that they which but a little before were come from the moſt fertile and plentifull cuuntry of Sicilia, in all ages the moſt fruitfull and abundant granary and ſtore-houſe of Italy, both in peace and war, could ſo ſoon want victuals. Could eighteen tall ſhips, which ought by the capitulations of the league to haue come loded with bisket, victuals, and other warlike and neceſſary prouiſion, be come empty? or but to haue brought ſo much as might ſuffice but for a moneth only? If this were don without the knowledge of Don Iohn, where was then the care of a Generall? If he winked thereat, where was his zeal to the confederation, or to what purpoſe came he to Corcyra? Was it to auert the Chriſtian fleet (hauing once or twice met with the enemy) from doing any good vpon him? Could it come into any mans head (beſides that in ſo doing he was therin to extinguiſh the glory of a moſt certain victory, like to work the Turks confuſion) by the infamy of a voluntary returne to increaſe the glory and renown of his enemy, and to bring a perpetual ignominy & diſgrace vnto the honour of the Chriſtians? Verily the Spaniards therein not to ſhew themſelues ſo

A willing to haue the power of the Turks abated, as the ſtrength of the Venetians not increaſed.

The Venetian Admirall perſuadeth the Spaniards in no caſe to returne from the enemy.

These things Fuſcarinus and the Venetians ſomtimes fretted at amongſt themſelues; and otherwhiles the Admirall himſelfe expoſtulated the ſame with Don Iohn and Columnius; and in the preſence of the greateſt counſellors ſhewed, not only how profitable, but alſo how ne-ceſſary perſeuerance was in all martiall affairs: That it was an old and vſuall matter for men in beſieging of their enemies, to ſuffer many difficulties: if they ſhould, hauing performed nothing, return with the fleet, who would doubt but that both their labour and charge was again the next yeare to be renewed? And what could this delay be elſe, but a propagation of their further calamities? That therfore it much concerned the Chriſtian Commonweale, although they had not all things in abundance, yet reſolutely and with patience to endure the B ſcarſity of victuals. If want of bisket were feared, the Generall might eaſily remedy that matter, by ſpeedily ſending for thoſe ſhips which lay laded with victuals good ſtore at Tarentum: which thing might in ſhort time be performed. In the mean time he promiſed to ſupply the Spaniards wants with part of his own ſtore: and that he had rather his men ſhould liue with roots, than to let the enemies fleet coupt vp, ſo to eſcape his hands: That the deſire to protect the honour of the Chriſtians, would ouercome all difficulties. Beſides that, the matter would be but ſhort, if it were done at once, in one continued courſe; and would vndoubtedly be by them performed, if they gaue not ouer the thing they had ſo well begun, till they had accompliſhed it. They (as he ſaid) might in good ſafety lie with their fleet in the ports of Nauari-num, Sapientia, and Capraria: wheras the enemy, lying ſhut vp in the bay of Modon, ſhould C haue but a bad and dangerous Winter harbor; and October being now begun, ſhould in ſhort time be in danger to periſh with bluſtring ſtorms and rage of the ſea, familiar vnto that time of the yeare; or els inforced with the extremity of the weather, and with want, to aduenture into the open ſea, and with their weak forces to ioin battell. What ſhould therfore let, why they ſhould not for 10 or for 15 daies continue the ſiege, as beſt beſeemed the honor of themſelues, the valour of their ſouldiers, and worthines of the Chriſtian name? What a terrour it would be vnto the enemy, to ſee the Chriſtians ready to endure all extremities and wants, to gaine the victory ouer the Turks? Again, what diſhonour and diſcredit would be vnto themſelues, if they ſhould ſuffer the enemy (ſhut vp and not daring to fight) to eſcape: eſpecially, when as they might ſitting ſtill, end the war? The Senat of Venice, he ſaid, moſt reſted vpon the valor D and courage of Don Iohn, and therefore he requeſted him not to deceiue the great hope they had of him conceiued: for how much ſhould he himſelfe blemiſh his own honour, if when he had before relieued the afflicted ſtate of the commonweale, he ſhould now, when it was moſt of all to be holpen, forſake the ſame? Which ſhould not be much vnlike, as if a man ſhould with great labour purchaſe great ſtore of pretious pearles, and vpon an humorous paſſion caſt them all into the ſea: That men generally held a great opinion of him the General, an honorable remembrance of his victory, and regard of his valour; all which, how much the more pregnant and honorable ſhould they be, by the ſecond vanquiſhing and ſubduing the moſt mighty monarch of the world: and that if the action well begun, ſhould be effectually proſecuted by the goodnes of God, the direction of the Commanders, and the reſolution of the ſouldiers, in E ſhort time the Chriſtians ſhould carry the victory from the Turks, and make him their general equal not only with the great chieftains of the preſent time, but euen with the moſt famous commanders of all former ages. Wherunto Don Iohn replied, That the action then in hand no leſſe concerned the Spaniards than the Venetians: and that he had in his life deſired nothing more, than to ſtand the Chriſtian Commonweale in ſtead: That he pointed at the ſame mark with Fuſcarinus, and in zeale to do good to the Chriſtian commonweale, gaue place to no man; but indeed to perform it, was a thing much more difficult than to ſay it: leſſer things (he ſaid) were to be ouerpaſſed, to reſerue themſelues for the performance of greater: and therfore mar-uelled that Fuſcarinus alone could not ſee things moſt manifeſt before his eies; who otherwiſe could with his piercing wit ſee through the deepeſt matters: could he think by any o-F ther means to abate the power of the Turk, than if they kept their fleet whole; that it was euer the maner of the greateſt & worthieſt commanders, rather to ſhun preſent dangers, than to increaſe their territories: that nothing was ſo wel purpoſed, which might not be of ſome wrongfully ſuſpected: but his faithful meaning to be pure & without ſpot, and albeit that the opportunity ſerued not for him to ſhew it, yet was his deſire & endeuor nothing leſſe: and that Fuſca- rinus, ſhould do well more intentiuely to conſider, what the cauſe, the matter, and the time required: G That the maner of war at land and at ſea were much different: and that although wars of both ſorts were to giue place to the moſt vnſeaſonable time of the yeare, vnfit for any kind of war, yet might men at land, better endure the winter ſtorms in their tents and cabbins, than at ſea in their gallies, where oftentimes will, skil, wiſdome, nor valor help not: but that (except it be ſo prouided and foreſeen, that the ſeaſonable time of the yere, and commodious for ſayling, may be taken) al muſt together periſh by ſhipwrack. What, would he haue them to ſtriue aboue their power with the winter ſtorms, and famin, the greateſt extremity of nature? Beſides that, he was verily perſuaded, that the Turks inioying the commodities of a good harbor, and of a rich city, would there in ſafety winter, the country of Peloponeſus relieuing them with al neceſſaries: when as the Chriſtians in the meane time, except they in time returned home, H ſhould lie expoſed to the rage of the ſea, ſtanding as it were in a continuall watch, not laying away their weapons in the depth of Winter and dead time of the yere, which in reaſon ought to giue reſt to all men. And that therefore euery man ought for the preſent to beare his own grieuances, and not by the harms of his friends or confederats, to ſeek his owne auaile. And that he, bearing himſelfe vpon the inward integrity of his good will toward the Venetians, would this ſay, howſoeuer Fuſcarinus ſhould vnderſtand it, That if the Kings fleet ſhould by long ſtaying, there periſh, it would no leſſe concern the Venetians, than the king himſelf: and taking God to witneſſe, would ſolemnly promiſe, Nothing to be vnto him more leifer or religious, than to be preſt ſo ſoon as the time of yeare would giue leaue, and by his endeauour to make al men know, that he had no leſſe care of the Venetian ſtate, than of the kings affairs, neither I deſired any thing more, than to be accounted, & indeed to be a moſt conſtant vpholder of that moſt Chriſtian league, and that beyond al expectation, euen in the iudgement of the Venetians themſelues: but for the preſent they muſt pardon him, if he gaue place vnto the neceſſity of the time: as for the offer of the communicating of their victuals, that would not be any help, but the deſtruction of both the fleets; for ſo they ſhould both ſooner feele the want: wherefore it were much better to preſerue the fleet, which they might vſe in the next yeares wars, than wilfully to caſt away the ſame by famine, and the rage of the ſea. In brieſe, what an indignity ſhould the Chriſtians ſuſtain, if they themſelues ſhould by the ſame meanes be ouerthrown, whereby they had thought to haue ouerthrown others.

The Spaniards about to return without the knowledge of the Venetians.

Now the Spaniards were ſo reſolutely ſet down for their departure, that not only without K the conſent of the Venetians, but euen without their priuity, their departure was reſolued on, and ſecret command giuen to the maſters of the gallies, with all the haſt that might be, to depart thence to Meſſana. Which the Venetian Admiral vnderſtanding, and therwith troubled as with an vnexpected matter, came aboord the general, & greatly complained of his purpoſe for ſo ſudden a departure: requeſting him a while to ſtay, vntil the two gallies made faſt together in the harbor of Nauarium (as is before ſaid) with the Ordnance vpon them might be put in good ſafety, and neither they, or any thing els left for a prey to the enemy. With much ado, Fuſcarinus perſuaded him no ſtay that night, that thoſe gallies might be brought out of the harbor, and all things put in order for their departure. The reſt of the night was ſpent in debating of the matter too and fro: where Don Iohn would needs haue it conceiued into a publike L inſtrument in writing, That the fleet by the generall conſent of the three Admirals returned for lack of victuals: wherunto the Venetian Admirall hardly conſented. But when the inſtrument ſhould haue bin made and confirmed, Don Iohn better aduiſed by one of his Secretaries, That the ſame would redound vnto the great diſhonour both of the King and himſelfe, that the fleet comming out of the fruitfull country of Sicilia, ſhould in a months ſpace want victuals, changed his mind for the writing, and only requeſted the Venetian Admirall to credit him and Columnius, in that they had ſaid concerning the want of victuals: promiſing him, that if vpon the way he ſhould meet with the victuals that were ſent for, he would forthwith return & giue him aid, as the time and occurrents ſhould require: but in the mean time to proceed by common conſent, to do that which was moſt needfull. Hereupon they returned: and M comming to Corcyra, they met the expected ſhip laded with victuals. Now is not Fuſcarinus vnmindfull of his duty, but comming to Don Iohn, put him in remembrance of his promiſe; [illegible] That it was not vnlike, but that the enemy ſo ſoon as he vnderſtood of their de-[illegible] come out of the bay, and returne with his fleet towards Conſtantinople; and being

A being but weake manned, and worſe furniſhed of mariners, might eaſily be ouertaken vpon the way and ouerthrowne. But Don Iohn was not by any meanes to be thereunto perſuaded; pretending, that he was by the King commanded forthwith to return. So the expectation of great matters to haue bin this yeare done, came to nought, but vaniſhed into ſmoake: and nothing performed worth ſo long a diſcourſe, more than to ſee with what difficulty great actions are managed, wherein the hands of many great ones are required; who jealous of their own honor, or enuying at others, corrupt with delaies the faireſt opportunities, and by their croſſe dealing, no leſſe than the enemy, hinder the common good, whereat they would all faineſt ſeeme to aime. From Corcyra Don Iohn departed to Meſſana, and Columnius vnto Rome. Fuſcarinus with greater honour than ſucceſſe returned to Venice, where he was with great joy receiued, B both of the Senat and the citiſens in generall: and ſo (no leſſe famous for his patience and moderation towards the other confederats, than for his policy and valor) with the good liking of all men gaue vp his charge, in few yeares after to receiue a greater.

About this time, Amida King of Tunes (of whom much is before ſpoken in the life of Solyman) being but a little before driuen out of his kingdome by the Turks (who had of long by little and little incroached vpon him) and as a priuat man liued in exile with his two ſons at Guletta with Franciſcus Tonares, Gouernour thereof; hearing of the great ouerthrow of the Turks at Lepanto, and of the good ſucceſſe of the Chriſtians, ſent Embaſſadours to Don Iohn Generall of the confederat princes, then lying in Sicilia, humbly requeſting his aid for the recouery of the kingdome; promiſing to defray the whole charges of the war, and foreuer to C hold his kingdome of the King of Spaine, as his vaſſall and tributary. Which his requeſt well conſidered of, and the matter thought of no ſmall conſequence for the ſafety of the Chriſtian countries lying ouer againſt that part of Affricke, to haue ſo dangerous an enemy remoued; Don Iohn the yere following (in the beginning of October) by the commandement of the king of Spaine his brother, departing from Drepanum in Sicilia, with an hundred and fiue gallies and forty ſhips, arriued the next day about noone at Guletta, where the gallies of Malta came vnto him, and ſhortly after Iohn Andreas Auria the Admirall with nineteen more, and Columnius the Popes Admirall with foureteene moe, all well appointed. At his arriuall at Guletta, he vnderſtood by Amida and the Gouernour, the whole eſtate both of the city and of the kingdome of Tunes: and that the Turks and Moores, terrified with ſo greet a fleet, were about to D forſake the city. Wherefore hauing well viewed the place, he the next day after landed his forces about foure miles from the city, and ſent two thouſand fiue hundred footmen before the reſt of the army to the city; who found it all deſolate, the Turks and Moores being before for feare fled, ſome to Carauana, ſome to Biſerta: who entring without reſiſtance came to the caſtle, wherein they found two hundred Moores, who ſaid they kept it for Amida their King; but yet would by no means ſuffer the Chriſtians to enter. All which was forthwith made knowne to Don Iohn, who then becauſe it was almoſt night, would not mooue, but early the next morning ſet forward with his whole army; and entring the city, before abandoned by the inhabitants, and ſo comming to the caſtle, found nothing therein but great ſtore of oyle, butter, and wooll.

E Amida the late King, by the commandement of Don Iohn all this while ſtayd at Guletta. But whileſt Don Iohn was yet at Tunes, newes was brought vnto him the 13 of October, That the Turks garriſon before fled out of Tunes, with diuers Moores, comming to Biſerta, were there kept out by the citiſens, and not ſuffered to enter: for which cauſe they began to burne and ſpoile the country thereabout. Whereupon the Generall ſent Tonares the Captain of Guletta thither with part of the army; who encountring with thoſe Turks ouerthrew them, and had the city by the citiſens peaceably deliuered vnto him.

The iuſt iudgement of God vpon Amida the late King of Tunes.

The kingdom of Tunes thus eaſily once again recouered from the Turks, Don Iohn thorowly informed of the faithleſſe and cruell dealing of Amida the late king, and that in deteſtation of the Chriſtians and their religion, he had already had intelligence with the Turks, and proF cured the death of ſome of the Chriſtians; gaue this definitiue ſentence vpon him, being yet in the caſtle of Guletta: That foraſmuch as he had of long time bin the author of great diſcord and endleſſe troubles in that kingdom, and had moſt vnnaturally depriued Muleaſſes his father, firſt of his kingdome, and afterward of his ſight; and in like manner tyrannized ouer his naturall brethren, the rightfull heires of that Kingdome, whereby the Turks had taken occaſion ſion both to inuade and poſſeſſe the ſame: he ſhould therefore by the commandement of the king of Spaine be carried priſoner with his two ſonnes into Sicilia, there to remaine for euer. G Which heauy doome he taking moſt grieuouſly, and yet crying out for mercy, was forthwith thruſt into a gally, and with his wife and children tranſported into Sicilia, there to liue in perpetuall exile: the iuſt reward of his mercileſſe and vnnaturall dealing with his father and brethren; God no doubt requiting him with the like meaſure he had before meaſured vnto them.

Mahomet, Amida his brother, made King of Tunes, and vaſſal to the King of Spaine.

After that (the King of Spaine ſo commanding) Mahomet, Amida his elder brother, and right heire of that kingdome, was appointed king in his place: who departing from Guletta to Tunes, was receiued as King, and there by ſolemne oath promiſed for euer to be the King of Spaine his vaſſall, and to do whatſoeuer he ſhould command.

There was before departed out of Tunes forty thouſand Moores, who now came and offered H their ſupplication to Don Iohn, that they might again returne and liue with their new king; which their requeſt being eaſily granted, they in great numbers euery day returned into the city. Shortly after, fifteene hundred Turks, with 3000 of thoſe wilde people which ſome call Arabians, ſome Alarbes, ſore troubled all the paſſages about the city: who were at laſt by the Chriſtians ouerthrowne, and an hundred and fifty Chriſtians whom they had taken priſoners, reſcued. After that, Don Iohn by the aduice of his moſt expert and ſkilfull captaines, commanded a ſtrong caſtle to be built in the middle way betwixt Guletta and Tunes: and for the performing therof left Gabriel Serbellio with two thouſand Italians, and Calazar a Spaniard with other two thouſand at Guletta. And ſo hauing performed that he came for, and diſpoſed of I all things as he thought beſt, returned againe into Sicilia.

A grieſe of griefs it is, and ſorrow almoſt vnconſolable, when worthy actions moſt happil begun, ſort not to ſuch happy end as was in reaſon hoped for. The greateſt and moſt famous victory of all ages gained againſt the Turke, ſeemed to haue lightened a Chriſtian Commonweale, and great hope there was, that the Chriſtians falling into vnity amongſt themſelues, would by an happy exchange make the Turkiſh empire the ſeat of their wars, and to turn into the Turks dominions, the terrour, ſlaughter, and other calamities of war, which had ſo many yeres afflicted the Chriſtian commonweale. But by how much the more the ioy was amiddeſt ſuch daily calamities and teares; ſo much greater was the ſorrow ſo great an hope to be come to nought, and men to be ſo blinded with the darkeneſſe of enuy and diſdaine, that they could not ſo much as think, with what diſhonor and danger of the common ſtate, they ſhould ſhrink K from ſo iuſt, ſo honorable, and ſo needful a ſeruice, including in it ſelfe the generall good of all Chriſtendome. When poſterity ſhall conſider what things might then haue bin don, and the deuiſes whereby the common cauſes were ouerthrowne; it will worthily blame and greatly lament ſo notable a victory and fit opportunity, ſent as it were from heauen for the effecting of great matters, to haue bin let ſlip & paſſed ouer ſo lightly regarded. This made, that they who before had repoſed all their hope in arms, had now no other confidence or hope of their welfare, but in concluding of peace. Truly the Venetians both ſpoke & thought honorably of king Philip, as of a moſt faithfull, iuſt, deuout, and honorable prince: yet greatly blaming his officers and others of great authority about him, as men more regarding their owne priuate, than the L good of the Chriſtian commonweale. In theſe perplexities of the Venetians, king Philip promiſed them to ſet forth a greater and ſtronger fleet againſt the next yeare, and to be ſooner in readineſſe with all his forces and warlike prouiſion, and ſo to help them in all he might. Who for all that gaue ſmall credit to thoſe promiſes, for that with the like they had bin oftentimes before deceiued. And therefore as truſting moſt vnto their owne ſtrength, they with all carefulneſſe and expedition entertained moe ſoldiers; of whom ſome they put into their fleet, the reſt they placed in their garriſons in Creet, in Dalmatia, and their frontier townes in Epirus. Neither were the Turks then idle, as the report went; yet were they thought to manage that war with greater fame than ſtrength: for they had of purpoſe giuen it out, That they would the next Spring with diuers armies inuade the Venetian Territories, in Creet, in Dalmatia, M in Epirus, yea, and in Italy it ſelfe; and with their innumerable multitude both of horſe and foot ſo ouerwhelme the Venetians, that they ſhould not be able poſſibly to hold out. This and more too they brauely vaunted of: but indeed Vluzales comming to Conſtantinople, had brought his fleet ſo ſhaken and ſo weake, as that it ſeemed not poſſible but in long time

The Venetians weary of the delayes and croſſe dealing of the Spaniards, reſolue to ſue vnto the Turkes for peace.

A. to be againe repaired, and furniſhed with ſoldiers and mariners, in ſtead of them that had bin loſt, ſome in fight, but moe by the contagiouſneſſe of the infection. But howſoeuer the matter ſtood, the Venetians carefull with the expectation of great matters, and in ſmall hope of good ſucceſſe, comparing their own ſtrength with the ſtrength of the enemy: yet were they no leſſe diſcouraged with the delaies and croſſe dealing of the confederats, than with all the prouiſion of the enemy. It ſtucke in their minds, how that the Spaniards at ſuch time as Cyprus might haue bin defended, delaied their comming ſo long, that Nicoſia being loſt, it was time to return: neither could they forget that lingering delay to haue bin the cauſe of the great mortality amongſt their men dying in the fleet at Iadera: They remembred alſo, that the commodities which of ſo notable a victory were moſt plentifully to haue bin reaped, were by the ſlender B proſecuting of the ſame, ſo ſparingly taken, that the former dangers ſtill remained: And that Don Iohn, who ought by appointment to haue bin at Corcyra in the beginning of Summer, was ſcarcely come thither in the latter end of Auguſt: And that he in the third yeare of this war, at ſuch time as their fleet was with great labor and charge again repaired, would not or liſted not to aduenture to haue againe ouerthrowne the enemies fleet, but in the very action to haue alwaies trifled away the greateſt part of Summer, before his Spaniards could ſet forward; and when he might ſafely haue come to Cerigo, to haue called backe Foſcarinus and the reſt, then facing of the enemy, and euen ready to haue giuen him battell: It was then ſecretly ſuſpected, the Spaniards to haue ſtaied of purpoſe, and to haue dallied on the time, that the Venetians hauing ſpent their forces, might be the more expoſed and ſubject to their injuries:
C It ſtucke faſt not in their minds alſo, but euen almoſt in their eyes, what things had happened of former times in their confederations with that nation: they were grieued in the ſpace of three yeres an hundred times, twenty hundred thouſand duckats to haue bin to little or ſmall purpoſe ſpent in that war: Beſides that, they doubted leſt the Flemings with their confederats ſhould ſo intangle the king of Spaine in defending of his owne territories, as that he ſhould not be at leiſure to ſend any aid into the Eaſt: in which caſe, what hope or helpe were they to looke for? How ſhould they then defend the reſt of their Seiginory in the Eaſt? How ſhould their empty coffers ſuffice to maintaine ſo great armies both by ſea and land, as might withſtand ſo puiſſant an enemy? Long were the diſcourſes, and effectuall the perſuaſions, that the Venetians had amongſt themſelues, to induce one another, and all in generall, more circumſpect D to conſider, not only what had already paſſed, or was preſently in hand; but alſo more warily to foreſee what would be the courſe and what the euent of a matter ſo important: and betime to breake off the confederation, which they had alwaies found to haue ſtood them in ſmall ſtead. In reuoluing of theſe things, only one remedy ſeemed moſt effectuall for the curing of their afflicted State; which was, by deſiſting from war, to conclude a peace with the Turke, howſoeuer: which they were the rather in good hope to attaine, for that diuers ſpeeches concerning the ſame had paſſed at Conſtantinople, and were from thence againe reported at Venice. All men thus inclining to peace, the Senat referred the proceeding therein vnto M. Antonius Barbarus their Embaſſador, (who all the time of theſe wars had lien in ſafe cuſtody at Conſtantinople) willing him therein to vſe the helpe of the French Embaſſador, who E had alwaies beene a perſuader of peace.

Selymus hauing got the Iſland of Cyprus and diuers other places from the Venetians, & yet well wearied with the harmes and loſſes he had himſelfe receiued both by ſea and land, was alſo deſirous enough of peace. So that the French Embaſſador might, as it was thought, haue got a reaſonable and indifferent peace, if he had but expected the opportunity of time: But he (whether moued with the common harmes, or ſome other ſecret cauſes to him beſt known) in making too much haſt, & ſeeming too deſirous of peace, much hurt the common cauſe of the Venetians, which he moſt deſired to haue furthered. Selymus hauing found him, reſolued with Muhamet the great Baſſa, what he would haue done: who at ſuch time as the ſame Embaſſador came vnto him about the matter, told him, That he had himſelfe many times moued, yea & ſo F far forth as he might, importuned his great lord and maſter for peace, but could neuer find him willing to heare thereof, vntill that now at length ouercome and wearied with the continuall ſollicitation of ſuch as might do moſt with him, he had yeelded thereunto. So the thing that Selymus himſelfe vndoubtedly deſired, that the crafty Baſſa ſeemed him with moſt difficulty to grant, rather vpon the inſtance and contemplation of them that labored for the ſame, than for Selymus himſelf deſirous of peace.

Muhamet Baſſa dealeth cunningly with the French Embaſſador ſolliciting the peace in the behalfe of the Venetians.

The Venetians ſend their Embaſſador of purpoſe to Conſtantinople to entreat a peace.

A peace concluded betweene Selymus & the Venetians.

any deſire he had thereunto of himſelfe. For certaine daies at the firſt the French Embaſſador was moſt curteouſly heard, and the Baſſa with faire & cunning ſpeech promiſed, that the matter of pacification ſhould eaſily & in ſhort time be compoſed: and ſo at their firſt conferences things paſſed rather in generall termes, than that any condition of peace were particularly agreed vpon: only this was on both parts conſented vnto, That the Venetians ſhould ſend their Embaſſador of purpoſe, for the full concluding and confirming of the deſired peace. Which charge was by the Senat committed to Iacobus Superantius, in whoſe wiſedome and valor they had repoſed great hope and confidence. He was no ſooner come to Conſtantinople, and the Turks deliuered of the feare of the Chriſtian ſword, by the diſſolution of the confederation, but that all things were changed, & the Venetians glad to endure the proud looks of the Turks, their diſdainfull ears, their deſpightfull ſpeeches, their long and inſolent attendance, with many other ſhamefull indignities: Yea, the Baſſa was ſo ſhameleſſe, as proudly to aske them, How they durſt be ſo bold as to impugne the great Emperor Selymus his fleet at ſea. Whereunto the Embaſſador anſwered, That the Venetians had alwaies honored the Maieſty of the Turkiſh Emperors, neither had at any times taken vp armes againſt him, but in their own reaſonable defence, when force was by force to be repulſed, a thing lawfull euen for the wild beaſt in the wild wilderneſſe to do. At the firſt intreaty of the peace, the Baſſa ſeemed to put the Venetian embaſſador in good hope, that the Venetians according to his requeſt ſhould enioy their territories in Dalmatia in as ample manner as in former times, and bounded with the ſame bounds, whereof they had in theſe wars loſt ſome part about Iadera. But when the matter ſhould haue come to the ſhutting vp, the Turke began to ſhrinke from that he had before promiſed, refuſing not only the reſtitution of the territory they had indeed by treaſon got, but by cautelous expoſitions of his meaning, framing the concluſion of the preſent peace vnto the forme of their former leagues, required, That as the Turks had now yeelded to them Maluaſia, and Nauplus, ſo now they ſhould redeliuer vnto them two other places of like worth and importance: As for not reſtoring the territory they had taken about Iadera, to colour their deceit, they pretended that they might not by their law reſtore vnto the Chriſtians any town or place wherein were any church or temple dedicated or conuerted vnto the Mahometan religion, as was there: and further, That the ſame territory was already giuen by Selymus in reward vnto his ſouldiers, men of deſert, from whom without great iniury it might not be againe taken. Hereupon the French Embaſſador complained, That promiſes were not performed: and the Venetians ſo fretted, that they were euen about to haue returned as men ſhamefully deluded, without concluding of any thing. Yet when no better could be obtained (the Turks ſtill ſtanding vpon ſuch hard termes) the Embaſſadors by the appointment of the Senate concluded a peace with the Turke; whereof theſe were the chiefe capitulations: firſt, That the Venetians ſhould giue vnto Selymus three hundred thouſand duckats, one hundred to be preſently paied, and the other two hundred by equall portions in two yeres next following: then, That the merchants goods ſhould be indifferently on both ſides reſtored: and laſtly, That ſuch places of the Venetians as the Turke was already poſſeſſed of, ſhould ſtill remaine vnto the Turks; but that ſuch towns or places as the Venetians had taken in the Turks dominion, ſhould be again forthwith reſtored. For the firſt payment of the mony the Turke were earneſt, thereby as by a fine for an offence committed, to make this league vnto him more honourable.

This peace at Conſtantinople concluded the eleuenth day of February in the yeare 1574, was by the decree of the Senat confirmed, and afterwards the 13 of Aprill following ſolemnly proclaimed at Venice, to the great wonder of the other Confederats. For the better ſatiſfying of whom, the Popes Nuncio, with the Embaſſador of Spain, were ſent for into the Senat houſe. And although there were many things that grieued the Venetians, yet did they forbeare all hard ſpeeches, and of that their moderation receiued ſo much the more honor, as it is more difficulty for an angry man to ouercome himſelfe, than others. The duke with calme and temperat ſpeech, framed to the purpoſe, declared vnto them, That anger and hope, two euill counſellors, being ſet apart, he had concluded a peace with the Turke: not for that he was deſirous of the Turks friendſhip, which what account it was to be made of, he right well knew; but for the loue he bare to the State, which was not onely with loſſe, but euen with death it ſelfe to be maintained. How he had been ſpoiled of the kingdome of Cyprus, he further declared: and that the Venetian ſtate grew euery day weaker and weaker by the continuall wars

A and that therefore, before it were by loſſe vpon loſſe come to the vttermoſt of extremity, they not able to maintaine ſo heauy a war, were to take ſome better courſe for the preſeruation of that which was yet left of their Seigniory: for that the ſafety of the Venetian State ſhould at all times be a ſure fortreſſe and defence of the Chriſtian common-weale againſt all the furious attempts of the enemy, and vncertaine euents of time.

The fame of this ſudden and vnexpected peace was for the juſt and common hatred of the Chriſtians againſt the Turks, generally euil taken: and the Venetians for the concluding ther-of hardly ſpoken of, as if they had betraied the whole Chriſtian common-weale, or at leaſtwiſe their Confederates. For men were for the moſt part of opinion, that the Turks peace would be but feigned and deceitfull; and that hauing gained time to ſet things in order, accor-B ding to his deſire, he would for the naturall grudge he bare vnto the Chriſtians, come to his old courſe, and as he had alwaies done, breake the league and take vp armes. Some ſaid, That the Venetians forſaking of their friends and confederats, would in their owne deuiſes periſh; yet ſo, as that their deſtruction would turne to the generall harme of all Chriſtendome: and theſe men were of opinion, That in that caſe, and againſt that enemy, a dangerous warre was to be preferred before an vncertaine and diſhonourable peace. Neuertheleſſe the Venetians beſides that they for the preſent eaſed themſelues of many an heauy burthen, ſo haue they thereby enjoyed the fruits of a long and happy peace, and found the ſame vnto their State both wholeſome and profitable vntill this day. It was thought by the ſequel of matters, That Selymus was the more willing to haue peace with the Venetians, that hee might the better C recouer the kingdom of Tunes and the ſtrong caſtle of Guletta from the Spaniards: who with the knights of Malta now gaped more after Tripolis and the other port townes holden by the Turks vpon the coaſt of Barbary, than how to defend the Venetians their Confederats. Thus with the loſſe of Cuprus and ſome part of the Venetian territory in Dalmatia, ended the mortall and bloudy war betwixt Selymus and the Venetians. In the courſe whereof is well to be ſeene, what great matters the vnited forces of the Chriſtian Princes were able to do againſt this moſt mighty enemy, if all diſcord and contention ſet apart, they would in the quarrell of the Chriſtian Religion joyne with heart and hand againſt him, and fight the battell of Chriſt Ieſus.

The peace by experience found profitable vnto the Venetians.

Selymus now at peace with them who before moſt troubled him; to keepe his men of war D buſied, ſhortly after conuerted his forces againſt Iohn Vayuod of Valachia, & ſo at length joy-ned all that Prouince to his Empire. This country of Valachia was in antient time called Dacia: it hath on the Eaſt the Euxine (now called the blacke ſea) on the South the famous riuer Danubius, on the Weſt Tranſyluania, and on the North Raſſia. It is diuided into two parts, the one called Tranſalpina, & the other Moldauia (of the riuer Moldavus running thorow the middeſt thereof) but far paſſing the other both in greatneſſe and abundance of paſture. That part called Tranſalpina, Mahomet, ſyrnamed the Great (which won Conſtantinople) made ſubject to the Turkiſh empire; but vpon Moldauia, the other part he only impoſed a yerely tribute of two thouſand duckats. After which time the Vayuods of that country, aided ſometime by the Hungarians, and ſometime by the Polonians, riſe vp oftentimes againſt the Turks, and refuſed E to do their Homage. It chanced, that Bogdanus Vayuod of that country, fauoring the Poloni-ans, and joyning in league with them, liued much in Raſſia, as purpoſing from thence alſo to haue taken his wife. Which Selymus ſuſpecting, with a great power chaſed him into exile, and placed in his ſtead one Iohn (called of his countrymen Iwan, and of ſome Iuonia) the ſuppoſed ſon of Stephanus ſomtime Vayuod of that country: who with Ieremias Czarnieuleczius (a Mol-dauian, who afterward notably betraied him) hauing of long time liued amongſt the Turks, to be the more gratious amongſt them, renounced his faith, and being circumciſed, turned Turke; and following the trade of merchandiſe, became amongſt them a merchant of ſuch fame, that he became very familiar and well acquainted with the great Baſſa's of the Court, and at length with Selymus himſelfe. He vnderſtanding by his friends neere about the Turkiſh F Emperor, of his purpoſe for the remouing of Bogdanus, corrupted with rewards the great Baſſa's, to be mediators for him to Selymus, that commended by them, he might be preferred to be Vayuod of Moldauia: ſtill increaſing the ſuſpition Selymus had conceiued of Bogdanus, and telling him, That he ſupported by the Polonians, was like enough in ſhort time to reject his obedience to his Imperiall Majeſty. Selymus at the inſtance of the Baſſa's nominated this Selymus chaſeth Bogdanus out of Moldauia, and placeth Iohn Vayuod in his ſtead.

Iohn the Vayuod, who with a great power of the Turks horſemen entring into Moldania, eaſily poſſeſſed himſelfe of the Country, Bogdanus being then abſent in Ruſſia, and as then ſuſpecting no ſuch matter: who yet afterwards attempted in vaine by the helpe of the Polonians to haue againe recouered his Country; but finding no poſſibility ſo to do, fled afterwards into Muſcouia, where he long time after liued.

Ioh. the Vayuod falleth into ſuſpition with Selymus and the Baſſaes of the Court.

Iohn now quietly poſſeſſed of Moldania, for ſome few yeares held the ſame with the good liking of the Turke, paying him his wonted tribute: but afterwards repenting himſelfe of his wicked reuolt from the Chriſtian Faith, and now eftſoone againe embracing the ſame, and (ignorant of his owne fortune) perſecuting with too much ſeuerity thoſe which withſtood his comming into the Country, eſpecially ſuch great men as tooke part with Bogdanus; and now after his returne vnto the Chriſtian faith, not fauouring the Turks as he was wont, but croſſing them in many matters, became ſuſpicious both vnto Selymus and the Baſſa's his old friends. Which the Vayuod of the leſſer Valachia (commonly called Valachia Tranſalpina) vnderſtanding, he became a ſuter vnto the great Baſſa's of the Court for his brother Peter, and earneſtly trauelled with them, that as Iohn ſupported by Selymus, had driuen Bogdanus out of Moldauia, ſo Peter his brother might in like manner by his helpe driue Iohn out alſo. In which his ſute he ſpared for no coſt, neither ceaſed by malitious ſuggeſtions to increaſe the ſuſpition already conceiued of Iohn the Vayuod: who hauing rejected the Mahometan Religion, and againe embraced the Chriſtian Faith, would (as he ſaid) in ſhort time, as had Bogdanus, joyne hands with the Polonians, and caſt off his obedience towards the great Sultan, by whom he had beene ſo highly promoted. Beſides that, this malitious man offered, That his brother Peter for ſuch his preferment, ſhould pay yerely vnto Selymus twice ſo much more as did Iohn, namely, an hundred and twenty thouſand duckats by the name of a tribute.

The Baſſa's before corrupted, and moued with the greatneſſe of the Tribute, perſuaded Selymus, by an Embaſſadour to ſend for Iohn the Vayuod, to come vnto him himſelfe in perſon, and to command him to giue place to ſuch a man as he ſhould ſend thither in his ſtead; which if he ſhould refuſe to do, then to denounce vnto him open war. Hereunto Selymus, who had euen then much emptied his coffers with the loſſe of his fleet in the battell of Lepanto, and the chargeable wars againſt the Venetians, was eaſily induced: and to that purpoſe ſent his Embaſſador to the Vayuod: who hauing audience the one and twentieth of February, at the ſame time that Henry Valoys (afterward the French King) was crowned at Cracouia, deliuered his meſſage as followeth:

The commanding ſpeech of the Turks Embaſſador to Iohn the Vayuod.

Selymus the Great Emperor of the Turks ſendeth me vnto thee, Iohn, Vayuod of Valachia, his Tributary; with this command, (whereunto his pleaſure is, that thou ſhouldeſt without delay ſend him anſwer:) firſt, he chargeth thee to ſend him not ſuch a tribute as he was wont, but twice ſo much more, to wit, an hundred and twenty thouſand duckats. If thou ſhalt refuſe ſo to do, there is another ready to giue it both for himſelfe and his poſterity. But Selymus mindefull of thy conſtancy, fidelity, and valour, will not be troubleſome vnto thee in thy gouernment, if thou forthwith ſend the aforeſaid tribute. Which if thou ſhalt refuſe to do, then his will is that thou ſhouldeſt giue place to another, and thy ſelfe returne with me to Conſtantinople, there to anſwer the matter: otherwiſe, I am in his name to denounce all hoſtility and the calamities of war both vnto thee and thy country.

This proud meſſage of the Embaſſador ſtrooke farther into the minde of the Vayuod than any would haue thought: yet diſſembling his griefe, he commanded him to be brought to the Lodging appointed for him; telling him, That in a matter of ſo great importance, and ſo much concerning the whole State of his Country, he could not giue him ſo preſent anſwer as he required; but that vpon mature deliberation had with his Nobility and Counſell, he would in ſhort time anſwer him accordingly. The Embaſſadour being gone to his Lodging, the Vayuod forthwith began deepely to conſider of Selymus his demands; and that in the Turks Faith was no aſſurance, which he kept or brake with the Chriſtian Princes as beſt fitted his owne turne: and beſides that, That if he ſhould grant to pay that ſo great and heauy a Tribute in ſo great pouerty of his Kingdome, ſore waſted with ciuile war, Selymus would not be therewith long contented, ſo long as any man would giue him more, but happily would the next yeare exact a greater; and in the end ſuch an one as he with all his ſubjects ſhould not be

A be able to pay, which it ſhould not be ſafe for him at any time to refuſe, ſo long as any man would giue it. Wherefore calling together the Nobility and States of his country, he brake with them in this ſort:

The ſpeech of the Vayuod vnto his Nobility and ſubjects.

If euer you were to conſult and deliberate of a moſt important and difficult matter, this verily is that time: for Selymus the Turkiſh Emperor, enflamed with inſatiable auarice, and I know not by whoſe perſuaſion, not contented with his wonted tribute, exacteth of vs twice ſo much more. If you ſhall grant it, it ſhall not much concerne me, as not to be paied by me your Soueraigne, but by your ſelues and your poſterity: if we deny it, forthwith he denounceth vnto vs fire and ſword, with all the calamities of war. And in this bareneſſe of our Kingdome, almoſt ſpoiled by ciuile wars, how ſhall we be able to pay it him? B wherefore declare your minds. Verily I foreſee, that if you ſhall in this yeeld vnto Selymus, and grant him ſo great a tribute, he will not therewith long hold himſelfe contented, but euery yeare extort a greater, vntill he haue altogether eaten vs vp. Wherefore it were better for vs (in mine opinion) to loſe our liues together with our wiues and children, than to ſuffer ſo great an indignity: neither is it mine own eſtate that troubleth me; for why, it is you that are to pay it and not I. Wherefore if you liſt not to endure this ſo diſhonourable and baſe a ſeruitude, let me forthwith ſo vnderſtand from you: and I will for my part ſo prouide, as that I wil not only not pay vnto the barbarous tyrant the new and heauy tribute he demandeth, but not ſo much as any tribute at all; ſo that you be not wanting both to your ſelues and me. I know right well (beloued and fellows in armes) what I owe both to you and the common-weale, for whoſe good and welfare I am alwaies ready to lay downe my life.

He had no ſooner thus ſaid, but that a ſecret ſorrow and vnwonted ſilence had as it were oppreſſed the whole aſſembly. At length, as men awaked out of an heauy and dead ſleepe, they murmured among themſelues, that the Turkiſh Emperor ſhould ſo without reaſon oppreſſe them, with doubling and redoubling of his tribute: and were generally of opinion, That the Vayuod had not ſo planly as truly ſpoken of the intollerableneſſe thereof: and that therefore they had rather die, than to indure ſo great diſhonor, joyned with ſo foule a ſlauery. And therupon offered vnto the Vayuod to ſerue vpon their own charge, and with him vpon the banke of Danubius to meet the proud enemy, and there in defence of their liues and liberty, to fight it out vnto the laſt man. The Vayuod in few words commending their fidelity, and taking of D them an oath for the faithfull performance of that they had ſo reſolutely promiſed, ſent for the Turks Embaſſador, and gaue him this ſhort anſwer:

I, for the antient fidelity and allegiance which I owe vnto my Lord and dread Soueraigne, the mighty Emperor Selymus, would willingly yeeld vnto him the tribute he requireth, were it not that I know the minds of my people to abhorre the ſame: wiſhing rather to endure all calamities, hap whatſoeuer hap may, than to yeeld vnto ſo diſhonourable and ſhamefull ſlauery. Wherefore ſithence I cannot by any meanes extort the ſame from my ſubjects, tell my Lord Selymus; That I moſt humbly requeſt him, not to take the ſame in euill part, whoſe amity I wiſh to be vnto me, rather an ornament and refuge, than diſgrace or hinderance. And that vpon that good hope I both asked, and for my ſingular fidelity obtained of him the E Vayuodſhip of Moldauia: which my good hope I moſt heartily beſeech him may not deceiue me.

With this anſwer he diſmiſſed the embaſſador vnrewarded, and with a ſafe conuoy brought him vnto the banke of Danubius: which his homely vſage of the Embaſſador, cauſed him not a little to be ſuſpected, to be in mind changed from Selymus. The Embaſſadour ſent away, the Vayuod not ignorant of the ſudden inuaſions of the Turks, forthwith began to raiſe his army: and at the ſame time, ſent Embaſſadors vnto Henry King of Polonia his neereſt neighbor, certifying him of the dangerous ſtate of Moldauia, the ſureſt bulwarke of the Polonian kingdom, which once ouerthrown, opened a faire and eaſie way for the common enemy into Polonia: and therefore requeſted him, that as the Kings of Polonia had of antient time, euen for the F ſafety of their owne State, protected that country; ſo it would pleaſe him now in like manner in ſo dangerous a time, to giue him aid, or at leaſtwiſe to giue leaue vnto ſuch of his ſubjects as were willing to ſerue for entertainment, to come vnto him, whom he would with all honour and bounty vſe according to their place and quality. Whereunto the King anſwered that foraſmuch as he and his prediceſſors the kings of Polonia, had for the ſpace of more than an hundred yeres bin in league with the Turkiſh kings and Emperors, he could not either ſend him aide, or yet giue leaue to any of his ſubjects to ſerue againſt the Turke, as he deſired. With this anſwer the Vayuod was much troubled, as there deceiued where he moſt hoped for reliefe: yet hearing of certain companies of the Polonian Coſſacks, which hauing long lien in hope of prey vpon the ſide of the great riuer Boryſthenes, were returning empty home, he by fit meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, offered them great entertainment to ſerue him in his warres againſt the Turke; of which his offer, they (as men liuing for moſt part by ſeruice) gladly accepted; and ſo without the knowledge of the King went vnto him, to the number of twelue hundred, with their captains, men of great courage and valor, of whom Suiercenius was chiefe: who were by the Vayuod honorably entertained, and did him in theſe wars right worthy ſeruice. Theſe Coſſacks are light horſemen, lying moſt commonly vpon the borders of the Polonian kingdome towards the Tartars: an hardy and valiant kind of men, whoſe beſt liuing is the ſpoile they take from the enemy; and their beſt lands, their horſe and launce. For albeit that the Turks and Tartars are moſt commonly in league with the Polonians, and ſeeme neuer ſo deſirous of peace; yet do they oftentimes in great numbers, vpon the ſudden break into the countries of Podolia, and Raſſia, part of the Polonian kingdome, and there do great harme, if they be not in time repreſſed or cut off by the aforeſaid light horſemen, who for that purpoſe lie alwaies in wait for them, as doth the Hawke for the prey.

Selymus vnderſtanding the anſwer of Iohn the Vayuod, was therewith exceedingly enraged, and the more by the bitter complaint of the Embaſſador, who angry with the Vayuod, that he was of him no better regarded nor rewarded, ſpared not to the vttermoſt of his power, to incenſe the angry Emperour againſt him, as if his honor had bin in the perſon of himſelfe contemned and violated. Wherfore without delay, he ſent thirty thouſand Turks, and two thouſand Hungarians vnto the Palatine of Valachia Tranſalpina, that joyning thoſe forces to his owne, he might take Iohn the Vayuod, and ſending him in bonds to Conſtantinople, to place Peter his brother, Vayuod in his place. The Palataine glad of this command, and hauing raiſed his owne power, together with the Turks and the Hungarians, ſwam ouer the riuer Moldavus, hauing in his army about an hundred and two thouſand fighting men: a power, not only ſufficient to haue driuen the Vayuod out of Moldauia, but alſo to haue ſhaken a right puiſſant king in his kingdome. The Palatine in the midſt of ſo great a ſtrength, little fearing, & leſſe regarding the ſudden comming of the Vayuod, ſuffred his men with their horſes to lie diſorderedly here and there, diſperſed in the large medows and paſtures all along the faire riuer ſide; ſo the better to refreſh themſelues, weary of their long trauel. In the mean time certain ſcouts came to the Vayuod then at dinner, certifying him, that the enemy with an huge army (the certain number whereof they could not well deſcry) was come ouer the riuer: and now reſting themſelues, had turned off their horſes into the rich medows thereabout, in ſuch diſordered and careleſſe manner, as that they might with a ſmall power be eaſily ouerthrowne. The Vayuod glad of this newes, forthwith ſent before Suiercenius with his Coſſacks, and 5000 other light horſemen, more certainly to deſcry what the enemy did, with the manner of his lying; and he himſelfe with the reſt of his army followed faire and ſoftly after. Suiercenius with great ſilence approching the enemies camp, ſuddenly light vpon the enemies ſcouts, in number about 500; who encloſed before they were aware, were taken euery man by the Coſſacks, and by them ſtreightly examined of the ſtate of their army and campe. Who for ſafegard of their liues now in their enemies power, frankly confeſſed, how that the Palatine lay ſecurely there by, reſting his army, not ſo much for the refreſhing thereof after his trauell, as with greater ſtrength to ſet vpon the Vayuod with his freſh ſouldiers: and that in the army were about ſeuenty thouſand Valachians, thirty thouſand Turks, and three thouſand Hungarians; who now diſperſed and ſleeping in ſecurity, might eaſily be ouerthrown. Of all theſe things Suiercenius aduertiſed the Vayuod; requeſting him with all poſſible ſpeed to haſten his comming, for the obtaining of a moſt notable and aſſured victory; he in the mean time lying cloſe with his men not far from the enemy. The Vayuod certified of all theſe things, came without delay, and forthwith commanded Suiercenius with his men to giue the onſet vpon the enemy: purpoſing himſelf with the reſt of his army on the other ſide, to charge the diſordred camp in three places.

The Palatine with the Turks ouerthrowne by the Vayuod.

A ces. Suiercenius according as he had in charge, with a great and terrible outcry, ſuddenly ſet vpon the ſecure enemies: who diſmaid with the ſuddenneſſe of the vnexpected danger, ſtood as men aſtonied, not knowing which way to fly, or how to make reſiſtance. But whiles Suiercenius with his light horſemen thus on the one ſide filleth the camp with tumult, terrour, ſlaughter, and feare; behold, euen as a ſudden tempeſt, commeth the Vayuod, bearing all the diſordered camp down before him: neither had the enemies any meanes to fly, hauing put their horſes a great way off from them into the rich paſtures; but there taken vnarmed, were miſerably ſlain. In all the camp was lamentation and mourning, death raging in euery place with ſuch fury, that of ſo great an army as of late paſſed the riuer, few or none eſcaped, more than the Palatine with Peter his brother, who by great chance with much ado getting horſes, ſwam ouer B the riuer, and ſo came to the caſtle of Brailouia in Valachia; all the reſt were ſlaine, and left to be of the beaſts of the field, and birds of the aire deuoured. It was a moſt horrible ſpectacle to ſee the ground couered with the bodies of the dead, al ſtained with gore bloud, and their weapons of all ſorts lying by them. In the campe were found great riches, all which the Vayuod gaue vnto his ſouldiers, and there ſtaied foure daies to refreſh his wearied men. After that, he with his victorious army entred into Valachia, the Palatines country, where he tooke many caſtles and townes, and put to the ſword all that came in his way, men, women, and children, without reſpect of age or ſex: and burnt all the country townes and villages before him as he went; ſo that all that part of the country of Valachia Tranſalpina, was couered with ſmoke and fire, to the terrour of the beholders. The aged fathers were in euery place drawne forth to C ſlaughter, the young babes were cut in pieces, the matrons and virgins defiled, and afterwards ſlaine, and in briefe all the cruelty that could be deuiſed, performed: in the bloudy execution whereof the Vayuod commended his men, perſuading them in like manner ſtill to proſecute the victory, and that the reſt of their labours were all but for prey and booty, for the enriching of themſelues. In this hauocke of all things, it was told him, That the Palatine with his brother Peter, the men whom he moſt ſought after, were in the caſtle of Brailouia not far off: whereupon he forthwith marched thither with his army. The city of Brailouia ſtandeth vpon the riuer Danubius, and had in it a caſtle of ſome good ſtrength, defended both by the nature of the place, and a ſtrong garriſon of the Turks, which Selymus had appointed for the keeping thereof, as the key of the country; not far from this city the Vayuod encamping his arD my, writ vnto the captaine of the caſtle, forthwith to deliuer vnto him the Palatine, with Peter his brother, his mortall enemies; who neuer wronged by him, had inuaded his country, and ſought after his life, and being ouerthrowne in battell, were fled vnto him: which if he ſhould refuſe to do, he threatned neuer to depart thence, vntill he had to his further harme, conſtrained him by force to yeeld them. Theſe letters he ſent by two Valachian captiues, to be deliuered vnto the captaine of the caſtle: whereunto he returned anſwer by foure Turks, two of the city, and two of his own ſeruants, by whom he alſo ſent ten great ſhot, and as many ſmall, with two Turkiſh arrowes, and this meſſage.

For that I know thee to be the ſeruant of my dread Soueraigne Selymus, I regard thee: and will not E deny the ſame men to be with me, whom thou ſo much requireſt. But foraſmuch as I vnderſtand, that thou of late haſt ſlaine a great number of the ſeruants of the great Emperour, who by his commandement were bringing Peter the brother of the Palatine into Moldauia: I therefore tell thee, that except thou betime raiſe thy ſiege, I will feed thee and thy followers, with ſuch diſhes as theſe; whereupon thou and thine army gorged to the full, ſhall all afterwards dangerouſly ſurfet and caſt. Farewell.

The blunt anſwer of the captaine to the Vayuod.

This rough anſwer ſo much moued the Vayuod, that he commanded hands to be laid vpon the aforeſaid foure meſſengers; and their noſes, lips, and eares, being cut off, both their feet to be with great nailes faſt nailed vnto a long piece of timber, and ſo with their hands hanging downward, to be ſet vp before the city, & ſo left for the captain and the citiſens to gaze vpon. F Signifying withall to the captain that ſent them, that he himſelf with the other fugitiues his gueſts, ſhould in like manner be ſerued, if they fell into his hands. Immediatly after, he aſſaulted the city, and vſing the cheerfulneſſe of his ſoldiers, by plaine force tooke the ſame, the defendants being not able to hold them out. There was made great ſlaughter of the Turks, Barbarous cruelty.

The City of Brailouia taken by the Vayuod & raſed downe to the ground.

whereas no man was taken to mercy ; the very babes were ſlaine, together with their mothers, G and bloud ran like riuers into the Danubius. For the ſpace of foure daies this bloudy execution indured : no place ſerued for refuge, euen the moſt ſecret and obſcure places were ſearched and the poore creatures there found, drawn forth and ſlaine. The fury was ſo great, that no liuing thing, no not ſo much as the very dogs were ſpared. Much gold, ſiluer, plate, jewels, and other rich ſpoile was there found, all which became a prey vnto the greedy ſouldiers : for that city was of all others in thoſe quarters the richeſt, as a place much frequented, and injoying long peace, as after ſuch time the Turks were fully poſſeſſed of Græcia, not being troubled with any wars, vntill now, that it was by the Vayuod firſt ranſackt, and afterwards raſed downe to the ground, and nothing thereof left ſtanding, more than the bare caſtle it ſelfe: which the Vayuod durſt not aduenture vpon, for that it was well fortified, and furniſhed with ſo ſtrong a H garriſon, as that it could not without his great loſſe be taken.

The Turkes againe ouerthrown by the Vayuod.

Whiles the Vayuod was thus buſied in the ſpoiſe of Brailouia, news was brought vnto him of the comming of 15000 Turks to the reliefe of the caſtle : againſt whom he forthwith ſent Suierceuius with his Coſſackes, and other 8000 Moldauian horſmen; who ſuddenly comming vpon the Turks, diſordered and fearing no ſuch matter, ſlew almoſt 14000 of them, and chaſed the reſt vnto the caſtle of Teina. Of this victory Suiercenius in all haſt certified the Vayuod, and withall, that there was another great power of the Turks comming, which might eaſily be alſo ouerthrowne, if he leauing the ſiege of the caſtle of Brailouia, would without delay come and joyne his forces with his. He glad of that news, and well perceiuing how difficult and dangerous that ſiege would be vnto him, riſe forthwith with his army, and went to Suiercenius, and I afterwards vpon conference had with him, laid ſiege to Teina: which city taken without much labor, he put to ſword all the people found therein, not leauing one aliue : and by the ſeruice of Suiercenius ouerthrew the Turks comming towards Brailouia.

Selymus in doubt to haue bin thruſt out of Valachia by the Vayuod.

Selymus in the meane time much troubled with the proceeding of the Vayuod, and doubting to be quite thruſt out of Valachia Tranſalpina (which he was like enough to haue been, had not the treaſon of Czarnieuiche hindered the matter) prepared new forces for that ſeruice ; and after the manner of the Turks in time of their greateſt diſtreſſe, appointed generall ſupplications and praiers to be made vnto his Prophet Mahomet, for the better ſucceſſe of his wars ; the vndoubted ſigne of his feare.

The Vayuod after ſo many victories againſt the Turks, purpoſing for a while to breake vp K his great army, called vnto him his old friend Ieremias Czarnieuiche, vnto whom, as vnto the man he of all others moſt truſted, he had reſolued to commit the charge, with part of his army, to keepe the Turks from paſſing againe ouer the riuer Danubius into his country: and in deliuering to him his charge, ſpake vnto him as following :

The kind ſpeech of the Vayuod to Czarnieuiche Sith Fortune hoth hitherto anſwered our deſires (worthy Czarnieuiche) with moſt rare and perpetuall ſucceſſe againſt the Turks, our moſt cruell enemies, we are thankefully to take the ſame, and to render moſt humble and hearty thanks vnto Almighty God, that it hath pleaſed him, the Author of all Victory, ſo to haue proſpered our endeauours againſt theſe fierce and deuouring enemies. Now what remaineth for the preſent, but to diſband mine army, wearied with labour and trauell, and to giue my ſouldiers leaue to L depart home to reſt themſelues, that ſo I may as occaſion ſhall require againe vſe their freſh forces for our better ſeruice: you in the meane time with thirteene thouſand of my ſelect ſouldiers, ſhall lie vpon the ſide of Danubius, to keep the Turks from paſſing the riuer. Haue good regard I pray you, vnto this your charge, which I vpon an eſpeciall truſt, grounded vpon your antient loue and fidelity, haue at this time impoſed vpon you. And let me from time to time with all expedition vnderſtand from you of euery motion of the enemy, that ſo we may in due time prouide for him accordingly.

And ſo in token of his greater fauour, taking his leaue of him with a kiſſe (as the manner of thoſe people is) gaue leaue vnto the greateſt part of his ſoldiers to depart home, yet with this charge, to be alwaies in readineſſe whenſoeuer they ſhould be called vpon. M

Czarnieuiche hauing receiued his charge, & promiſing vnto the Vayuod the vttermoſt of his faithful deuoire, went towards Danubius, & there moſt carefully kept the paſſages with continuall watch and ward. It was not long but that great numbers of the Turks were come downe to

A to the other ſide of the riuer, and moe were ſtill comming, yet none of them was ſo hardy as to aduenture the great riuer; Czarnieuiche with his horſemen lying in the faces of them, ready to receiue them on the other ſide. Which the Baſſa whom Selymus had ſent with his army, perceiuing, ſent certaine men pickt out for the purpoſe, to Czarnieuiche, to ſound him, if he might by any means be drawn to come ouer, in ſecret to talke with him: and the more to moue him, beſide his conduct for his ſafety, ſent him by the ſame meſſengers thirty thouſand Hungarian duckats for a preſent. With which ſo faire a bait Czarnieuiche allured, receiued the mony, & faithfully promiſed to come: and ſo ſhortly after, ſecretly paſſing ouer the riuer, had conference with Peter the Palatines brother, who then lay on the further ſide of Danubius, with a great power of the Turks. In this conference, Peter declared vnto him in how great danger B the Vayuod ſtood, and how highly Selymus was offended with him, That he his tributary and vaſſaile ſhould worke the deſtruction of his ſo great armies: which his heauy diſpleaſure he could no otherwiſe ſatiſfie but with his head: and that therefore he ſhould no longer rule in Moldauia, for that gouernment was by the great Emperor giuen vnto him. Wherefore (ſaid he) if thou be wiſe, whileſt it is yet in thy power, gaine the good will of Selymus by ſome good deſert: for an eaſie matter it is to begin any war, but an hard matter to end the ſame. Foraſmuch as it is not alwaies in the ſame mans power to begin wars, and at his pleaſure to make an end. Euery foole may when he liſt enter into armes, but muſt lay the ſame downe when it pleaſeth the conqueror. Now you haue a faire opportunity, and it is in your owne power to procure his friendſhip for euer, better ſtanding with your affaires than war. And albeit you may hope well C of the power of the Vayuod, yet wiſedome would not, that you ſhould prefer vncertainties before things certaine: you haue now receiued 30000 duckats, the earneſt of your further deſerts; which ſhall hereafter haue alſo their due rewards in moſt full and bountifull meaſure. Wherefore if you will do your ſelfe good, and prouide both for your ſafety and preferment, confound not your own good fortune, with the broken and deſperat ſtate of the Vayuod, but ſuffer the Turks to paſſe as friends ouer the riuer of Danubius: for I am come (ſaid he) with a great and puiſſant army from the mighty Selymus, to take vpon me the gouernment of Moldauia, and to ſend the Vayuod in bonds to Conſtantinople: and of me, being once Vayuod, what is it that for ſo great deſert thou and thine may not aske and obtaine? Wherefore I pray thee conceale the comming of the Turks, and withdraw thy ſelfe from the riuer: ſo ſhall we paſſing D ouer the riuer with our populous army, eaſily oppreſſe the Vayuod with all his power, and at once reuenge all the former injuries and diſgraces done both vnto Selymus and vs.

Czarnieuiche hath ſecret conference with Peter the Palatines brother, who cunningly perſuadeth him to giue the Turks paſſage.

With greedy men what will not the foule deſire of gold worke? Czarnieuiche ouercome with the golden promiſes of Peter; and forgetfull of his faith before giuen vnto the Vayuod, yeelded vnto all he requeſted: and drawing his forces further off from the riuer, as if it had bin for his more ſafety, gaue the Turks free paſſage. There was then in the Turks army two hundred thouſand men, well appointed, and furniſhed with great ordnance and all other things neceſſary both for the field and for ſiege, who by the ſufferance of the falſe traitor paſſed quietly ouer the riuer. Czarnieuiche forthwith poſting to the Vayuod, certified him, how that the Turks truſting to their multitude, had paſſed the riuer of Danubius, againſt whom he was not able (as E he ſaid) to make head: and that therefore he ſhould do well, without delay to go againſt them with ſuch forces as he had then in readineſſe; which joyned vnto his, might eaſily ouerthrow them. Glad was the Vayuod of this newes, and filled with the hope of good ſucceſſe, demanded of him what ſtrength the enemy might be of? They are (ſaid he) not much aboue twelue thouſand that be already come ouer, but are ſtill comming more and more, and will before your comming thither be aboue fifteene thouſand.

Czarnieuiche corrupted, giueth the Turks leaue quietly to paſſe ouer the riuer of Danubius.

The Vayuod lay then at the ſiege of the caſtle of Teina (hauing before taken the city) but hearing this news, raiſed his ſiege, and ſo in foure daies came and incamped within three miles of the enemy: and forthwith ſent forth Suierceuius with his Coſſackes, and Ieremias Generall of the horſemen, with ſix thouſand horſe, to take view of the enemies camp, and to vnderſtand F what might be of their deſignes. Theſe two captains marching together, chanced to fall vpon the Turks ſcouts, in number about ſix thouſand horſemen, with whom they had a light ſkirmiſh; and in ſhort time put them to flight. Of theſe ſcouts they tooke one, and him grieuouſly wounded, whom being examined of the ſtrength of the enemy, and feeling himſelfe wounded to death, told them diſſemblingly, that the Turks were not in number many. But the Coſſacks doubting of the truth of that report, & probably conjecturing by ſo great a number of ſcouts, that the enemy was of far greater ſtrength than was ſuppoſed or reported; quickly certified the G Vayuod thereof, wiſhing him in time to prouide for the ſafety of himſelfe and his army, and not too much to truſt Czarnieniche, whom they had a good while before ſuſpected. But the Vayuod nothing doubting of the faith of him whom he had a long time found moſt faithfull in the time of his hardeſt diſtreſſe, and vſed as a moſt truſty companion in all his trauels, anſwered nothing, but that he knew whom he truſted; and that it was not now time to ſtand in doubt, or to be afraid; and that he would ere long come and take view of the enemies campe himſelfe: for that he was not come ſo far to fly, but to fight in defence of his country and ſubjects, euen to the laſt gaſpe. And ſo fortifying his campe neere vnto a lake that runneth out of Danubius (for the more conuenient watering of his army) hee ſet forward with all his H power againſt the enemy.

Neere vnto the enemies campe was an high hill, from whence the Vayuod had thought to haue deſcried the number of them, with the manner of their lying: but cumming thither, he could deſcry nothing but foure companies of ſcouts a far off, one company from another; who alſo vpon the ſight of the Moldauians withdrew themſelues of purpoſe out of ſight vnto the army, which then lay in a low valley behind an hill, not to be diſcouered vntill a man were almoſt vpon it. The Vayuod ſuſpecting the enemy to be at hand, diuided his horſemen, in number 30000, into 30 companies, and placing before euery company certain field pieces, ſo marched ready to giue battell. His footmen, in number many, a rude and homely kind of people, but vnto him of all others moſt faithfull, and armed with ſuch country weapons as they had, I he placed by themſelues. So marching on, he came to another hill, from whence he might not far off eaſily deſcry the huge army of the enemy, and how he had been by the treaſon of Czarnieuiche deceiued: whereupon he preſently ſent for him; who ſent him word backe again, That he could not now come, the enemy being ſo nigh at hand, but that he ſhould forthwith ſee him in the field as forward as the forwardeſt againſt the enemy. Czarnieuiche had then vnder his command 13000 of his moſt choice ſouldiers in the army: who vpon the ſignall of battell on both ſides giuing (for the Turks were now alſo ready) firſt according to his promiſe ſet forward, as if it had bin to haue giuen the onſet: but being come neere vnto the enemy, forthwith (as he had before agreed) cauſed his enſigne to be let fall, and his men with their caps vpon the points of their ſpears and ſwords, in token of their voluntary yeelding and ſubmiſſion, to bow K downe their heads & bodies; whom the Turks with their ſpears and lances holden vp on high, joyfully receiued as their friends, or rather as men taken to mercy. The reſt of the army almoſt diſcouraged with this ſo ſudden a reuolt of ſo great a man, retired in haſte to the Vayuod, crying out vnto him, That all was loſt. But he nothing diſcouraged therwith (as a moſt reſolute man in the moſt ſudden dangers) with comfortable words cheered them vp, willing them as couragious men to follow him againſt the enemy, whom they in all things exceeded, excepting number, which alwaies gaue not the victory. The Turks perceiuing the Moldauians lately reuolted vpon the joyning of the battell (as men in conſciences wounded) to ſhrinke backe, thruſt them perforce into the head of their battell, making of them no more account, but to blunt the enemies ſword; and ſuch as hung back, they themſelues ſlew: vpon whom as falſe L traitors the Vayuod cauſed his field pieces to be moſt furiouſly diſcharged; ſo that moſt part of theſe trecherous men there ſlaine, ſome by the Turks, ſome by their owne friends, receiued the juſt reward of their infidelity and treaſon, accompanied with perpetuall infamy. Ouer the dead bodies of theſe traitors the Turks comming on, were at the firſt notably encountered by the Moldauians; and after a moſt cruell fight, as if they had been diſcouraged began to retire, but indeed of puporſe to haue drawne the Chriſtians before they were aware, within the danger of their great ordnance, and ambuſhes, which they had before aptly & couertly placed for that purpoſe. Which Suiercenius well acquainted with the Turks fineſſe, perceiuing, with much ado ſtaid their further purſuit, and ſo auoided the danger prepared for them. The Turks deceiued of their expectation, came on againe afreſh, with no leſſe fury than at the firſt: whom M the Chriſtian right valiantly receiued, and made with them a moſt cruell and mortall battell; wherein many both of the Turks and Chriſtians fell, and neuer riſe againe. But what was ſo ſmal a power againſt ſuch a world of men? after long fight, the Moldauians oppreſſed with the multitude of their enemies, began to giue ground: and ſeeing no other remedy, but either to fly

The Moldauians ouerthrown or

A or to die, betook themſelues to flight, wherein moſt part of them were ſlaine, the furious ene-mie ſtill hardly purſuing them at the heeles: of the Coſſacks were left only two hundred and fifty. The horſemen (the chiefeſt ſtrength of the Vayuod) thus by the treaſon of Czarnieuiche ouerthrowne, the Vayuod with twenty thouſand footmen, and ſuch horſmen as had now after the battell ioyned themſelues vnto the footmen, retired into a towne not far off, which he but a little before had raſed; but was now glad in the ruines thereof to fortifie himſelfe againſt the ſudden and furious aſſaults of the Turks: who the ſame night ſo beſet the Vayuods camp with ſuch a multitude of men, that no man could goe in or out of the camp, or the vttermoſt part of that hugy army be from any place deſcried.

*The Vayuod hauing fortified himſelfe within the ru-ines of an old town, is beſieged by the

The next day (which was the 11 of Iune) the Turks ſhot diuers great ſhot into the Vayuods B camp, but to ſmal purpoſe; for the Chriſtians had (for ſo ſhort a time) notably fortified themſelues within the ruines of the old town. Which the Turks wel perceiuing, and withall conſidering how hard and dangerous a matter it would be to aſſault the Vayuod in his ſtrength: they ſent meſſengers vnto him, to perſuade him without delay to yeeld himſelfe, & to repoſe more truſt in the mercy of the Turks, than in his own broken forces; eſpecially in his ſo hard diſtreſſe, being ſo beſet, as that he could not poſſibly eſcape; and out of hope of all reliefe; and therefore ſhould by ſuch voluntary yeelding, ſeeke for grace of his enemies, rather than by a deſperat obſtinacy to caſt himſelfe into a moſt certain deſtruction, where no mercy was to be expected. Whereunto the Vayuod anſwered, That he was not ignorant into what danger he was brought, rather by the treaſon of Czarnieuiche and his followers, than by the valour of the C enemy; yet had left with him a ſtrong power of moſt valiant and reſolute men, who would in his quarrell & defence of themſelues, ſell their liues very deare vnto the Turks: neuertheleſſe, that to auoid the further effuſion of bloud, he could for his part be content to yeeld vnto his hard fortune, ſo that the great Commanders of the Turks army would condiſcend vnto ſuch reaſonable conditions as he ſhould propound, & for the performance thereof giue him their faith, not once or twice, but 7 times by ſolemn oth to be taken. Of this his offer the Turks accepted: willing him to ſet down the conditions: which were, firſt, that the Polonian Coſſacks might in ſafety depart into their country, with their horſes and armor: then, that they ſhould without any violence offered to his perſon, ſend him aliue & in good ſafety to the great Emperor Selymus, before him to anſwer his owne cauſe: as for the Moldauians, he ſaid he needed D not to couenant any thing, for that the iniury offered vnto them tended alſo to the hurt of the Emperour himſelfe, and of him whom he ſhould appoint Vayuod, whoſe ſubiects they were.
Theſe conditions (as reaſonable) were well liked of the Turks, and ſo according to his deſire, confirmed ſeuen times by the ſolemne oath of euery Captaine and Commander in the army, both for themſelues and their followers. Vpon this agreement, the Vayuod brought al his army out of their trenches wherin they had lien ſtrongly incamped, and there with heauy heart tooke his laſt leaue of his ſoldiers, to the generall griefe of them all: amongſt whom he diuided ſuch mony & jewels as he had, as a remembrance of his kindneſſe. And there in the ſight of them al diſarming himſelfe, accompanied only with Oſmolius a Polonian, went in maner of a ſuppliant to the Turks camp, where he had full foure hours talk with the great commanders E of the army, vntill that at laſt Capucius Baſſa (either offended with his ſpeech, or vnmindfull of his faith before giuen) with his ſcimitar vpon the ſudden ſtruck him a great blow ouerthwart the face, and another croſſe the belly: whom ſo wounded, & as yet but halfe dead, the Ianiza-ries took and cut off his head, which was forthwith ſet vp vpon a lance, for all men to behold.
His dead body they bound by the feet to two cammels, & ſo ſhamefully tore it in pieces; and happy was he that could get any little piece therof, or imbrue his ſword with the leaſt drop of his bloud. This was the lamentable & wofull end of Iohn the Vayuod of Moldauia, a right valiant and worthy man, ſhamefully murdered by the perfidious Turks, who had he been more conſtant in the Chriſtian faith, had not haply fallen into ſo great miſery. Whoſe wofull fall may ſerue as a moſt notable example of the vncertainty of theſe worldly things: for as no man F for a time had of the Turks moe or more glorious victories, ſo in the end, and as it were in demonſtration of mans fragility, no man periſhed more miſerably. The Vayuod thus perfidiouſly murthered, the Turks with like trechery forthwith ſet vpon the Moldauians, and ſlew them down right as beaſts appointed for the ſlaughter. Which the Coſſacks beholding, and hoping for no beter meaſure, thruſt themſelues into the thickeſt of their enemies, & there valiantly fighting were all ſlain,except ſome few of the better ſort reſerued for ranſom, among whom was Seiuerceuius & ſome other captains;who were afterwards for great ſums redeemed, G

All Valachia and Moldavia ſubdued by the Turks.

After this victory and ſhamefull murther of the Vayuod, the Turkes ouer-ran all Molda-via,and put to the ſword all the nobility of the country, with many of the country people. Of whom they alſo,as their maner is in countries new conquered,ſent great numbers in colonies into the fartheſt part of the Turkiſh Empire: and for the more aſſured poſſeſſion therof placed ſtrong garriſons in euery Town and caſtle,as they thought it moſt conuenient. Thus all Valachia,both the higher and lower,fel into the Turks hands in the year 1574,and was by Selymus joined vnto the Turkiſh empire,none of the leaſt things by him don:for beſide the gaining of ſo great a country (the moſt aſſured bulwark of Polonia) he hath therby opened a fair and eaſie way for his ſucceſſors,either to enter into Podolia or Raſcia, parts of the Polonian H kingdom,yea and into Polonia it ſelf: which they wil vndoubtedly in time do,if God in mercy bridle not their immoderat deſires,and with his mighty hand protect the dangerous ſtate of that kingdom.

Selymus at the ſame time not a little grieued with the loſſe of the kingdome of Tunes, and that Don Iohn had there done the year before; began forthwith to caſt in his minde, how hee might again recouer the ſame,and withal thruſt the Spaniards out of the ſtrong caſtle of Guletta, which they had now almoſt forty yeares kept, euer ſince it was by Charles the fift taken from Barbaruſſa in the year 1535. For he wel ſaw it to be a matter of no ſmall moment, vnto whom that ſtrong fortreſſe(ſtanding ſo commodiouſly in the frontiers of Africk)belonged. I There was and ſtil is vpon that coaſt diuers of the Turks aduenturers, who liuing altogether vpon ſpoil,had to that place ſafe recourſe as to a moſt aſſured refuge:and if no booty were to be met with therabout, then would they run out towards Malta, Sardinia, Sicilia, and other Iſlands therabouts; yea oftentimes into Italy and Spaine, and from thence carry away with them great booties both of men and cattel,and whatſoeuer thing els came in their way. For which cauſe many of the Turkes men of war reſorted thither in hope of purchaſe. But after Guletta was poſſeſſed by the Spaniards, they were not only depriued of that ſo commodious an harbor,but many times intercepted euen by them of that place,and by the gallies of Malta:which two places ſerued as two moſt ſure bulwarks againſt the Turks and Moors aduenturers,by whoſe means they many times came ſhort home. For which cauſe the Turks,eſpeci- K ally theſe pyrats (of whom the Turke makes great account, as not his leaſt ſtrength at ſea) wonderfully deſired to haue both thoſe ſtrong places gotten out of the Chriſtians hands. In the caſtle of Guletta was continually a ſtrong garriſon of 1000 Spaniards,who kept them of Tunes in great ſubiection,and oftentimes cut ſhort theſe pyrats and rouers,who much troubled thoſe ſeas. Wherfore the Turkiſh emperor Selymus hauing made great preparation both for ſea and land ſeruice,commanded Sinan,Pial, and VluZales,his chief Baſſa's, & men of great experience,with all ſpeed to paſſe ouer with his fleet into Africke,to beſiege Tunes and Guletta: who when they had put all things in readines according as they had in charge, ſet forward,and with 300 ſail of gallies came before Guletta the 13 day of Iuly:whither alſo reſorted vnto them other of the Turks men of war from Alexandria, Algiers, and other places, in L ſuch number,as that all that coaſt ſeemed to be couered with ſhipping. The Turkes at their firſt arriual laid ſiege vnto the water-tower, wherin were eight hundred ſoldiers wel prouided of all things needful for defence; who valiantly maintained the place,vntil ſuch time as that moſt of them being by the often aſſaults of the enemy ſlain, the reſt by the commandement of the Captain retyred to him into the caſtle. In taking of this tower the Turkes loſt 3000 of their men.

Guletta beſieged.

After that,they began to beſiege the caſtle of Guletta, againſt which they caſt vp diuers mounts, and from thence moſt terribly battered the caſtle; from whence the deadly ſhot was ſent again amongſt them not ſparingly; ſo that in one day 200 great ſhot were reckoned to haue bin ſhot out of the caſtle among the thickeſt of the enemies. But after many furious aſ- M ſaults,too tedious to report,& much harm don on both ſides, the Turks to their great aduan-tage took the Chanel of the lake of Tunes; and fearing leſt ſome reliefe ſhould be ſent to the beſieged, maintained their aſſault day and night without any intermiſſion. Neuertheleſſe certain Companies of Spaniards ſent from the new Caſtle by Serbellio,got into Guletta,after which

which, they in the beſieged caſtle ſallied out, and the twentieth of Auguſt repulſed the Turks with an exceeding great ſlaughter: but the Baſſa's fully reſolued vpon the winning of the place to gage their whole forces, and without ceaſing ſtill bringing on freſh ſoldiers, after they had all the day continued a moſt terrible aſſault, at length about two houres after Sun ſet, they took the caſtle the 23 day of Auguſt, when there was now ſcarcely two hundred ſoldiers left aliue to defend the ſame; who altogether with the other weak people in the caſtle were without mercy cut in pieces. What wealth the Turks found in this caſtle, is hard to ſay; but certain it is, that they had therein great ſtore of victuals, armour, ſhot, and pouder, and foure hundred great pieces of Artillery.

The new caſtle beſieged.

Guletta thus taken, the Turks forthwith laid ſiege to the new caſtle appointed by Don Iohn the yeare before, to haue bin built betwixt Guletta and Tunes, which was not yet altogether finiſhed: wherein the two antient and valiant captains Serbellio and Salazer (left there of purpoſe for the building thereof by Don Iohn) lay with a garriſon of foure thouſand good ſouldiers. The Baſſa's when they gaue the firſt ſummons to the caſtle, the foure & twentieth of Auguſt, required forthwith to haue it deliuered vnto them: to whom Serbellio ſtoutly anſwered, That he had promiſed the king his maſter, to giue him a better account of the place; & being now alſo very old, could not endure the Turks heauy yoke, but would therfore hold it out vnto the laſt man: which both he and Salazar truly performed, not omitting any thing that was by men to be done for defence of the place; & ſallying out, ſomtime the one, and ſomtime the other, made great ſlaughter of the Turks, giuing them alſo repulſe on repulſe when they came to the aſſault. But the great Baſſa's, little feeling, and leſſe regarding the loſſe of men, ſo that thereby they might gaine the place, after many moſt terrible and deſperat aſſaults, at length (namely the thirteenth day of September) when they had with all their force for the ſpace of ſix houres furiouſly aſſaulted the caſtle, and ſlaine moſt of the defendants, at laſt tooke it. Serbellio ſhot in with two bullets, and wiſhing rather to die than to fall into the hand of the enemie, thruſt himſelfe into the midſt of the Turks, there to haue periſhed: but by the haſty comming in of Piall Baſſa both he & Salazer were taken aliue, as for all the reſt that followed them, they were put to the ſword. The Baſſa in his rage ſtruck Serbellio, and the more to grieue him, cauſed his ſon to be cruelly murthered before his face. Neither was this victory by the Turks obtained without bloud, hauing in leſſe than three months ſpace that the ſiege endured, loſt aboue thirty thouſand men.

The notable anſwer of Serbellio.

The new caſtle taken.

Tunes yeilded to the Turks.

Theſe ſtrong holds (the greateſt ſtrength of that kingdom) thus taken, the Turks marched to Tunes, which they eaſily tooke, and afterwards ouerthrew the fortifications therof, becauſe it ſhould no more rebell. Mahomet the yong king, but the yere before placed in that kingdom by Don Iohn, was there taken, and in bonds ſet aboord to be carried with Carrera Captaine of Guletta, priſoners to Conſtantinople: and thus the kingdome of Tunes, with the ſtrong caſtle of Guletta, fell again into the poſſeſſion of the Turks, to the farther trouble of the Chriſtian countries lying ouer againſt it. The proud Baſſa's hauing (as they thought) beſt diſpoſed of al things at Tunes & Guletta departed thence, and with their fleet of 400 saile, came the fourth of October, within ſight of Malta. But vnderſtanding that they of Malta were prouided for their comming, and remembring what diſhonor their moſt magnificent emperor Solyman had not many yeres before there ſuſtained (whereof diuers of them had been eye-witneſſes) they turned thence, and ſailed directly to Conſtantinople.

Selymus dieth.

Shortly after, this great Emperour Selymus ſpent with wine and women, vnto whom he had giuen his greateſt ſtrength, died the ninth of December, in the yeare of our Lord 1574; when he had liued one and fifty yeares, and thereof reigned eight, and lieth buried at Hadrianople. He was but of a meane ſtature, and of an heauy diſpoſition, his face rather ſwollen, than fat, much reſembling a drunkard. Of the Othoman Kings and Emperors he was of leſt valour, and therfore leaſt regarded, altogether giuen to ſenſualitie and pleaſure: and ſo dying, left his empire vnto Amurath his eldeſt ſon, a man of more temperance, but not much greater courage; who neuertheleſſe by his valiant Baſſa's and men of war, did great matters, eſpecially againſt the Perſians, the mortall and daungerous enemies of the Turks, as ſhall be hereafter in this Hiſtory declared.

AMVRATHES TERTIVS, TVRCARVM IMPERATOR SEXTVS: FLORVIT ANo 1574

Non ego fortis eram: Quis tanto nomine dignus?
Ni fortem faciat mens generoſa virum.
Me tumidum fortuna tumens evexit in altum;
Et par fortuna mens mea ſemper erat.
Sic quamvis tenero mihi nil niſi molle placeret: Nominis augendi raptus amore fui.
Emiſique meos ad fortia facta miniſtros:
Per quos ſublatum eſt, nomen in aſtra meum.
Muſtapha, Ferhates, Sinan, & ter maximus Oſman; Terrores orbis, ſuccubuere mihi.
Armenios domui fortes, Medoſque feroces; Et mihi paruerat Regia Tauriſij.
Sed mihi quid prodeſt tantorum parta labore Gloria? Si ſubito maxima quaque ruant?
Et nihil eſt tanti, quod non brevis auferet hora Sic mea cum multis gloria victa iacet.

In Engliſh thus:

The Worthies fame I challenge not:
for who deſerues the ſame, Except the noble Worthies mind deſerue the Worthies fame?
Proud Fortune ſet me vp aloft in higheſt Honors grace; And ſtil my hauty thoughts they were equall vnto my place.
So that although nought pleas'd but that beſt fitted my deſire; Yet to increaſe my fame, I ſtil did more and more aſpire.
And ſent my mighty Worthies out, to manage my great wars; By whoſe known valor my proud name is mounted to the ſtars.
Proud Sinan, Ferrat, Muſtapha (all men of high degree, The terrors of the world ſo wide) were Vaſſals vnto me.
Th'Armenians ſtout I vanquiſhed, and fil'd the Medes with fear: And Regal Tauris ſtately towers at my commandment were.
But what availes my glorie great, got with ſuch Worthies pain, If in the twinkling of an eye it come to nought again?
And nothing is of ſo great ſtate, Which time ſhal not caſt down.
Euen ſo with many others moe, muſt periſh my renown.

THE LIFE OF AMVRATH, THE THIRD OF THAT NAME, SIXTH EMPEROR OF THE TVRKS.

THe death of the late Emperor Selymus was for feare of the inſolent Ianizaries notably concealed by the great Baſſa's, vntill ſuch time as Amurath his eldeſt ſon, then in Aſia, C about 12 dayes after arriued at Conſtantinople, & there receiued into the Seraglio, tooke poſſeſſion of the empire the 25 day of December, ſolemn among vs Chriſtians for the natiuity of our Sauiour Chriſt Ieſus. Hee was about thirty, or as ſome write 27 yeares old when he began to reign, of a manly ſtature, but pale and corpulent, wearing his beard thin and long: in his countenance appeared not the fierce nature of the Othoman Princes, beeing indeed himſelf of a peaceable diſpoſition, a louer of juſtice, and in the manner of his ſuperſtition very zealous. The ryot D and exces grown amongſt the Turkes by his fathers euill example, hee reformed by his owne temperance, and the ſeuere puniſhment of notorious drunkards. Yet is it reported, that hee would oftentimes drink plentifully of Wormwood wine. He was moſt ſubiect to the falling ſicknes, and ſore troubled with the ſtone; more ſpare handed than was for the greatnes of his ſtate; and yeelding more to the counſel of his mother, his wife, & ſiſter, than of his great Baſſa's: which was of many imputed to him for ſimplicitie. At his firſt comming to Conſtantinople, to appeaſe the murmuring of the Ianizaries (grieued to ſee themſelues diſappointed of ſpoiling the Chriſtians & Iews, as they were wont to do in the vacancie of the Empire) he beſide the vſual larges which the Turkiſh Emperours at their firſt entrance into the empire beſtow vpon them, augmented alſo their daily wages, and granted them this priuiledge, That E their ſons as ſoon as they were 20 years old, ſhould be inrolled among the number of the yonger Ianizaries, and be partakers alſo of their immunities: wherby he won their fauors exceedingly. And immediatly to rid himſelf of all competitors, he after the vnnatural manner of the Turkiſh policy, cauſed his fiue brethren, Muſtapha, Solyman, Abdulla, Oſman, and Tzihanger, to be all ſtrangled in his own preſence. The mother of Solyman pierced through with the cruel death of her yong ſon, as a woman ouercome with ſorrow, deſperatly ſtrook her ſelf to the heart with a dagger, and ſo died. At which ſo tragical a ſight it is reported that Amurath let fall ſome tears, as not delighted in ſuch barbarous cruelty, but that the ſtate and maner of his gouernment ſo required.

The deſcription of Amurath.

He pacifies the Ianizaries & augments their priuiledges.

He ſtrangled fiue of his brethren.

A deſperat woman.

In the beginning of his reign he eſtabliſhed diuers wholeſome Lawes, altered the Coine, F and bountifully relieued the poor. And albeit that he was of a mild and peaceable nature, yet becauſe he would not ſeem to degenerate from the Othoman Princes his Progenitors, hee proſecuted his fathers Wars, and by the Tartars called Præcopenſes, in the moneth of October in the year 1575, entred into Raſcia, part of the Polonian Kingdome, where hee burnt and deſtroied 200 noblemens houſes,beſides an infinit number of townes and villages,made very great ſlaughter of the poor country people, and caried away great numbers of cattell and priſoners G bound in thongs made of raw hides. But whilſt they were diuiding the ſpoil with Peter the new Vayuod of Valachia, who had before ſolemnly promiſed to giue the Tartars no paſſage that way,the Polonian Coſſacks,who had lien waiting for their return vpon the riuer Boriſthenes,brake into the Tartars country,and there requited them with like harm,bringing back with them a number of old Captiues, who little expected that their ſo ſudden deliuerance.

The Polonians at this time were at variance among themſelues about the election of their new King; Henry Valoys their late King being the laſt year(after the death of Charles his brother the French King) ſecretly ſtollen from them into France, to take vpon him that Kingdom. H After whoſe departure ſome of the Polonian nobility made choice of Maximilian the Emperor: other ſome no leſſe inclining to the choice of the great Duke of Muſcouy; and ſome vnto others alſo. Wherof Amurath vnderſtanding, and loth that either of thoſe two great princes his enemies ſhould be inueſted and ſtrengthned with that ſo great a kingdom, and ſo neer vnto him; to hinder that their election,and to bring in another of leſſe power,and ſo leſſe dangerous vnto himſelf,euen in the beginning of his reigne wrot vnto the Polonians to that purpoſe,commending vnto them Stephen Bator Vayuod of Tranſylvania for their king, in maner following:

Amurath, god of the earth, Gouernor of the whole World, the Meſſenger of God,and faithfull ſeruant of the great Prophet; Vnto the moſt Honourable Nobility and Counſellors of the Kingdome of Polonia, Greeting. I Amuraths letters to the Nobility of Polonia.

IT is not vnto the world vnknown (moſt honourable and mighty Senators) our noble progenitours to haue of long time and for many years holden good friendſhip and religious Leagues with the Kingdom of Polonia. For which cauſe it hath ſeemed good and reaſonable vnto vs,to put you in mind of this ſo antient a league and bond of friendſhip: for that we underſtand your kingdom to be of late become deſtitute of a King,by the departure of the noble King Henry your crowned King (diſcended of the roiall race of the French Kings) our friend: who for the ſmall regard you had of him ſo great and worthy a Prince, K and for your diſloyalty,is departed out of your kingdom,without purpoſe of returning any more into Polonia. Wherupon,as it is reported vnto vs (but how truly we know not) you paſſing ouer your ſaid crowned King Henry,are about to make choice of a new King, and eſpecially of Maximilian the Emperour,or of the Duke of Muſcouy; both men of running wits,and of vs greatly hated: for why,you may wel know they will be troubleſome and grieuous not vnto euery one of you only, but euen vnto vs alſo. Wherfore beware that you be not deceiued;and take heed that your confederations and leagues canot long by their valor and proweſſe be eſtabliſhed; and withall conſider well the great dangers and loſſes you may thereby fall into, whereof we haue thought good to giue you a taſt; wherfore beware that heauier things befall not your ſtate. We know there are right noble and wiſe men amongſt you,who know better than they how to rule and gouern: and if it pleaſe you not to make choice of any of your own nation,there is not far from you one L Stephen Bator Prince of Tranſiluania,a man of great honor and valor,by whoſe labor and dexterity you may eaſily procure the peace and quiet of your kingdom. Wheras if ye ſhall do otherwiſe,we take to witnes your God,and his ſeruant our great Prophet,to deſtroy all your wealth & goods,which together with your ſelues your wiues and children, ſhall be giuen as a prey vnto our ſoldiers,with the chief men of your cities Cracouia and Leperus. Which for all that we ſay not as any thing at all doubting of your fidelity and conſtancy toward vs. As for the reſt,which it pleaſed vs by word of mouth to haue told vnto you, wee haue giuen charge vnto this our embaſſador and counſellor,vnto whom our deſire is that you giue ful credence.

From Conſtantinople the laſt of September, in the yeare of our Prophet Mahomet 982, and firſt of our reign.

This the great Sultans commendations ſo much preuailed with the Polonians, that notwithſtanding that Maximilian the Emperour was by the Archbiſhop of Gneſna and ſome others choſen King, yet was that his election by the greater part of the nobility reuoked,and both

A both he and the great Duke of Muſcouy being paſſed ouer, the noble princeſſe Anne (of the moſt honorable Iagelionian houſe) choſen Queen of Polonia; yet with this condition, that ſhe ſhould marry Stephen the Vayuod of Tranſyluania, to them by Amurath commended. Who afterward elected King, all the time of his life right worthily gouerned that noble kingdom, not only defending the ſame in ſuch ſtate as hee found it, but alſo notably extending the bounds therof, inlarging it with ſuch territories as he by force of Armes got from his neighbors, eſpecially the Muſcouite. Of this election Amurath would oftentimes afterward boaſt and ſay, That he had giuen the Polonians their King. But of him, and of the league made by him with Amurath, more ſhall be ſaid herafter.

The yeare following great troubles aroſe in Perſia; whereby the flouriſhing ſtate of that B moſt mighty kingdom was ſore ſhaken, and opportunitie giuen for the Turkiſh Emperor to inuade the ſame: which he laying hold vpon, entred into that bloudy war, which to the great quiet of the Chriſtian commonweal, for long time after exerciſed the forces of thoſe moſt puiſſant princes one vpon another. For the better vnderſtanding wherof it ſhal not be amiſſe compendiouſly to ſet down the ſame troubles of the Perſian kingdom, the very ground of the long and mortal war between thoſe two moſt mighty Monarchs.

Old Tamas the Perſian King, ſon to the noble Hyſmael, who with glory had more than fifty years worthily gouerned that large kingdom, and mightily withſtood the often inuaſions of the Turkiſh Emperors, now ſpent with years, died the eleuenth of May in the year 1576, leauing behind him eleuen ſons; namely Mahamet the eldeſt, of an infirmitie in his eies ſirnamed C Codabanda, a man of peaceable and quiet diſpoſition, more delighted with the ſweet pleaſure of a contented life, than the careful honors of ſo great a kingdom. Iſmael the ſecond ſon, of a more fierce and troubleſom nature, ſo much abhorring quietnes, that not regarding the league hardly concluded betwixt his aged father and the Turkiſh Emperor Solyman and Selymus, he would now and then without his fathers knowledge, vpon a youthful heat break out into the frontiers of the Turks Dominions, and there make great ſpoil. For which his doings, although he was both of his father and the people the more regarded, yet was he by his fathers commandement (who ſeemed to miſlike of thoſe his youthfull ſports, tending to the breach of the League) reſtrained of his liberty, and ſent to the caſtle Cahaca, betwixt Tauris & Caſbin, where he remained at the time of his fathers death. Aidere the third ſon, no leſſe ambi- D tious than was his brother Iſmahel, although not altogether of like valour, who was kept by Zalcan, Pyry Mahamet, and other his kinsfolk, all men of great power and authority. The other eight were Mamut, Solyman, Muſtapha, Emangulis, Alichan, Amet, Abrahim, and Iſmahel the yonger.

The old King before his death had by his laſt wil and teſtament ſolemnly appointed Iſmael his ſecond ſon to ſucceed him in his kingdome, as of all his ſons moſt fit to take vpon him ſo great a charge. Which thing Mahamet his elder brother ſeemed not much to diſlike, contenting himſelf with ſuch honors as his father had before beſtowed vpon him.

Iſmael appointed by his Father to ſucceed him in the Perſian kingdome.

Tamas thus dead, Iſmahel was by the Sultans ſent for to Cahaca, to take vpon his fathers kingdom at Caſbin; when in the mean time there aroſe a great tumult in the City, yea euen E in the Kings palace: for Aidere the third brother, who in the time of his fathers greateſt ſicknes had entred the chamber where he lay drawing toward his end, and in his ſight moſt preſumptuouſly ſet the royal Crown vpon his head, to the manifeſting of his ambitious deſires; for which hee was then worthily reprooued: Now after the death of his aged father, carried headlong with the ſame aſpiring humour, and ſupported by Zalchan and other his mighty Fauorits, had ſo effectually dealt with the great lady Periaconcona his eldeſt ſiſter, and the other Sultans counſellors of eſtate, put in truſt to ſee the wil of the dead King put in execution, as that the ſucceſſion could not be any longer kept from him and reſerued for Iſmahel, but by the help of ſome fine ſecret and deceit. This lady Periaconcona (elder than all the yong Princes the ſons of Tamas, her brethren, a woman of great ſpirit and deep conceit) left in great truſt by her F father, ſeeing the proceedings of her brother Aidere, durſt neither openly moue any thing to the Sultans, prejudiciall to his deſignes; nor could ſhe in her heart indure ſo great an injury to be don to her brother Iſmael, appointed by her father to ſucceed him. Wherfore in this perplexity ſhe caſt in her wily head, how to ſatisfie her ambitious brother, how to ſaue Iſmahels right being abſent, the honor of her dead fathers wil & teſtament, and the ſafety of the kingdome, dome. For hauing thorowly debated the matter with the Sultans, ſhe reſolued that Aidere G inueſted in royall apparell, and ſettled in the great gallery, ſhould attend the acclamation of the people, and be there openly enthroniſed as the very elected king. With which vaine ſhew the vnwiſe youth (blinded with ambition) ſuffered himſelfe to be led: and being ſet in his maieſty, verily perſuaded himſelfe, that he ſhould now be honoured both of his friends and foes, as King. But vnto theſe his ſo haſty and proſperous deſignes, the ſucceſſe that ſprung from the ſubtilty of thoſe Counſellors and his diſſembling ſiſter, were nothing conformable: for that ſhe by their aduice tooke order for the gates of the palace to be preſently locked, leauing at euery paſſage a ſure gard, and only one wicket open, ſafely warded with a companie of moſt faithfull and valorous captaines and ſouldiers, wholly deuoted to Tamas and Iſmahel: with ſtreight charge, to ſuffer euery man to enter in, ſauing only the knowne friends of Aidere. In H this ſort did ſhe thinke to haue entertained the young man, vntill ſuch time as Iſmahel ſhould arriue at Cahaca, and ſo put in execution what he thought beſt for the honour of himſelfe, and the generall quiet of the kingdome.

Who joyeth now but Aidere? in conceit a King, repleniſhed with vnwonted joyes, receiuing honor from all men ſauing from his beſt friends. By means wherof perceiuing now the prohibition of them, and mooued alſo with the great ſtir of Zalcan his greateſt fauorit (who diſcouering the deceit, and crying vpon king Aidere, threatned the lady, the Sultans, and the reſt that waited vpon the feigned ſucceſſion, indeed ordained but for the ſcorne and deſpight of the ambitious man) ſtriken with great fear, and full of ſorrow, he withdrew himſelf cloſely amongſt certain women of the court, hoping ſo to find ſome way to eſcape with life. I

In the mean time ſo greatly increaſed the cries and threatnings of the friends and fauourits of Aidere (who now had all of them prepared themſelues for ſome dangerous and pernitious attempt) that the counſellors, with conſent of the Lady his ſiſter, were inforced to take order, that to bereaue this tumultuous and ſeditious people of all their hope and courage, Aidere ſhould be depriued of his life. Wherupon Sahamal the Georgian, vncle to Aidere by the mothers ſide, by the appointment of Periaconcona and the Sultans, after long ſearch they at length found him hidden amongſt the women; and without further delay taking him by the locks, ſtrook his head from his ſhoulders, and in the place where Zalcan and the reſt of his vnfortunat fauorits ſtood crying and threatning, amongſt the thickeſt preiſe of the proud conſpirators flung the had all bloudy, as it were yet breathing for heat; crying aloud vnto them, Behold there your King, enioy him at your pleaſure. At which ſudden and horrible ſpectacle euery K man burned in rage & anger, neither for the preſent wanted there many a raſh head that vainly threatned moſt cruel reuenge. But in the end, when they ſaw the neer ſucceſſion of Iſmahel ineuitable, and the death of Aidere irreuocable, euery man betook himſelf to his own priuate affairs, and ſo at the laſt diuiding themſelues one from another, departed from the palace, and ſcattered themſelues, ſome one way, ſome another, euery man as he thought beſt for his owne ſafety.

Iſmahel ſaluted King.

Shortly after, Iſmael the deſired King arriued at Casbin, where he was of his ſiſter and the Sultans joifully receiued as their lawful and vndoubted ſoueraign, and with great acclamation of the people ſaluted King: who as ſoon as he ſaw himſelf poſſeſſed of the royall ſeat, and L his power now anſwerable to his deſires, he after the maner of the Turkiſh policy moſt vnnaturally cauſed the heads of his eight yonger brethren to be ſtriken off; and withall vſed ſuch diligence, that not only all thoſe which were neer vnto them in bloud and affinitie were bereaued of their liues, but alſo all the fauorits of his late brother Aidere were deſtroied in that publike ſlaughter: ſo that all the ſtreets of Casbin were defiled with bloud, and all the city reſounded with mourning and complaints. Which vnexpected cruelty, altogether vnworthy ſo worthy a thought king, ſo altred the minds of his ſubiects in general, that all their former hopes were now conuerted into new fears, and their ioy into mourning. But much greater and far more lamentable did the miſeries grow as ſoon as it was giuen out, That he would change M the religion of the Perſians (who with great deuotion worſhip their fooliſh prophet Aly) into the ſuperſtition of the Turks, who with no leſſe impiety obſerue & maintain the wicked rites of Ebubekir, Hamer, Oſman, and others, by them ſuppoſed to be the moſt true ſucceſſors of their great Prophet Mahomet. For by meanes of this vncouth noueltie and vnexpected change, and by force of an edict concerning that matter, publiſhed by this new King, many of his

prophane

A prophane prieſts,many of the gouernors of his friendly and ſubiect cities (too much giuen to their former ſuperſtition) were driuen ſome into exile, ſome clapt vp in priſon, ſome had their eies put out(amongſt whom was the Calyph of Casbin)and not a few others in ſundry ſorts depriued of their liues. Yea many Ladies joined in bloud with Iſmael himſelf, & diuers others of his kinsfolk(to whom neither ſex,age,nor innocency could be a ſufficient defence) indured ſundry torments & ſtrange calamities. So that in Perſia was neuer felt greater troubles, or a more dangerous change.

In this ſo great innouation,and among theſe troubles,there went abroad withal a general rumor,not in the cities of Perſia only,but in the regions of the Turks alſo,euen as far as Conſtantinople, That Iſmael with a puiſſant army of ſuch as fauored this new proclaimed vanitie, B was determined [illegible] perſon himſelf to go to Babylon,now called Bagdat, there to receiue the crown of the empire at the hands of him whom he ſhould find to be their great Calyphs ſucceſſor, and in the chief place among their vnclean prieſts : as had Solyman himſelfe the great Emperor of the Turks,and the Perſian kings of antient times. In this world of troubles,when as the fear of further miſeries daily increaſed,rather than any hope of antient quietneſſe ; he was when he leaſt feared,by the help of the aforenamed Lady Periaconcona ſuddenly bereft of his life : but whether ouertaken in ſome of his own amorous practiſes,or poiſoned by his ſaid ſiſter;or that ſhe (as ſome probably conjecture) hauing ſecretly conſpired with Calil Chan, Emir Chan, Pyry Mahamet, Curchi Baſſi (being all at that time men of great account,and as it were preſidents of the kingdom)who diſguiſed in womens apparel,& brought in by her,ſtrangled C him at ſuch time as he had withdrawn himſelf among his paramors,is vncertain. Howſoeuer it was,ſufficeth it that he by the helpe of the ſaid Lady Periaconcona was by vnnaturall death taken out of this world the four and twentieth day of Nouember,in the yeare of Grace 1577 ; to the exceeding joy of all thoſe Nations, who by his death thought themſelues now freed of many great and dangerous troubles : when he had reigned one year ſeuen months and ſix daies.

Iſmael ſuddenly murdered by his ſiſters deuice.

1577.

Iſmael thus taken out of the way, the lady began forthwith to perſuade with the great Sultans, the miniſters of Iſmaels death, that as they had for the generall good of Perſia contriued the death of the late king,ſo now that they would take vpon them the protection of that great kingdom, with the preſeruation of the majeſty and liberty therof, vntill ſuch time as it were D knowne who ſhould worthily ſucceed in that Crowne, which now remained in their hands.
There was at that time many of the greateſt Princes and Gouernors of that kingdom aſſembled at Casbin, there gaping after ſuch mutations of thoſe troubleſom times, as might beſt ſerue their priuate deſignes. Emir Chan burning in ambitious deſires,was in hope by means of a match to be made with a ſiſter of Periaconcona(who was already greatly inclining vnto him) to be exalted to the ſoueraigntie of all Perſia. Mirize Salmas the chiefe Sultan hoped on the other ſide to aduance into the eſtate,either Mahamet Codabanda the eldeſt brother of the dead king, or els Hamze the eldeſt ſon of the ſaid Mahamet,and by beſtowing vpon him his daughter in marriage(as afterwards he did)ſo to increaſe the glory of his houſe. Others there were that thought they ſhould be able to draw Abas Mirize(the middlemoſt ſon of Mahamet) out E of Heri,and to make him King. Neither wanted the infant Tamas his aſpiring friends, whoſe Tutor waited likewiſe for ſome opportunitie to ſettle him in the kingdome,and ſo by means of his greatneſſe to make himſelf greateſt among his fellows. A number of others there were, that ſecretly waited vpon euery occaſion that time ſhould preſent for their preferment. Howbeit in this ſo great varietie of thoughts, the Sultans anſwered the Lady with one conſent, and promiſed her in moſt liberall termes all the protection that their forces could affourd,or their weapons procure ; and yet did euery one of them both in action and word, Clerke-like, diſſemble their ſeuerall imaginations,whereunto their minds were as prone and ready,as their hearts were cunning cloſely to conceale them.

Amurath the Turkiſh Emperor now awakened, firſt at the death of the old renowned Tamas, F and then at the rumor of the deſire Iſmael had to paſſe with an Army to Babylon ; as alſo at the freſh report of the Turkiſh ſuperſtition newly publiſhed in Perſia, and withall throughly inſtructed what harm this late King had done in Perſia, what diſſentions he had raiſed , and how hardly the prouinces of the Empire had endured thoſe calamities ; began forthwith to thinke, that hereby a faire occaſion was offered vnto him to take vp Armes againſt the Perſians,

Amurath intentiue to the ſtirs of Perſia.

Perſians, and matter ſufficient ſuggeſted for him to put in execution the great deſire he had of ſome new conqueſt. For it is an antient cuſtome, which is growne as it were to be a law among the Othoman Kings, That they may not challenge their due honours in their life time, nor their proud monuments after their death, vnleſſe they attempt ſome great and ambitious actions & enterpriſes, and perform ſome exploit conformable to their majeſty. Amurath therfore bent vpon theſe great ſtirs in Perſia, would not direct his mind any other way, or take any other war in hand, vntill he might firſt ſee what iſſue theſe maruellous innouations in Perſia would bring forth: which in the perſon of Mahamet the ſucceeding King, ſeemed to be more pregnant than euer before, and miniſtred vnto Amurath new occaſions of victorious & ſtrange hopes. For as ſoon as Iſmahel was dead, the afore named MiriZe Salmas (in dignity chief man among the Sultans, though in blood & nobility inferior to them all) after many letters diſpatched to and fro, at laſt aſſured Mahamet Codabanda, how with al quietnes of mind, and ſecurity of perſon, he might come & poſſeſſe himſelfe of the kingdom. He was alſo aduertiſed by the ſaid Salmas, of the whole conſpiracy plotted againſt his brother to bring him to his end; and likewiſe made acquainted, how the fraudulent lady, with the Sultans, had capitally conſulted againſt himſelf: and how ſhe, fauouring Emir Chan, and Abas Mirize of Heri her nephew & his ſon, more than became her, did little regard the due and rightful ſucceſſion of him being the eldeſt brother. So Mahamet bearing himſelfe vpon the faith and diligence of Mirize Salmas, and deſiring withall to ſee his eldeſt ſon Hamze Mirize aduanced to ſome ſuch ſoueraign dignity as he ſaw was due to the liuely hope euery man perceiued to be in him, in regard of his vertue and prudence for mannaging the common-wealth and matters of war (wherein alſo he ſhewed himſelf vnto his father jealous and ſuſpitious, leſt ſome other man ſhould vſurp vpon him that honour and authority which ſo properly appertained vnto him) reſolued in the end not to leaue the kingdome in the hands of priuate perſons, nor the lightnes of an vnconſtant woman of ſuſpected modeſty, and a rebellious conſpiratour againſt her own bloud, wherwith ſhe had without any pity or remorſe of conſcience, now twice defiled her ſelfe. And therfore he wrot back againe, That he was minded to take the rightfull ſucceſſion vpon him, and that for the ſame purpoſe he was putting himſelf vpon his journey: with ſtreight charge notwithſtanding, That MiriZe Salmas ſhould before his entrance within the gates of Casbin, preſent him with the miſchieuous head of Periaconcona; a woman (in reſpect of the ſcorne exerciſed againſt her brother Aidere, and of the treacherous death of her other brother Iſmahel, and of the peruerſe imaginations which ſhe had conceiued to cauſe the ſucceſſion to fall into other mens hands, & of the prodigall familiarity which ſhe had with ſome of the Sultans) wel worthy of a thouſand deaths. Secretly did Mirize Salmas put in execution whatſoeuer Mahamet had priuatly enioyned him, ſo that by his meanes he was preſently and ſolemnly proclaimed king of Perſia. And afterwards hauing gathered together many ſquadrons of men wholly deuoted to the bloud & name of Mahamet, the ſame MiriZe Salmas met him on the way, carrying the head of that manlike Virago Periaconcona vpon the point of a lance, with her haire diſperſed, and ſome other vncouth ſights to the terror of the beholders. From which nouelties (one miſchief as it were hudling vpon the neck of another) there ſprung vp diuers inward hatreds, ſundry tumultuous ſeditions, and much ciuill wars: this new king by the inſtigation of Mirize Salmas, ſeeking on one ſide to be reuenged on the Sultans for his brothers death; & they on the other ſide oppoſing themſelues with all their power againſt him, the State of Perſia began to fal into great inconueniences, and of theſe nouelties to reap new loſſes. Sahamal the Georgian fled into his mountain of Brus, fearing the wrath of his new lord. Leuant Ogli likewiſe another of the Lords of Georgia, vnderſtanding of the flight of Sahamal his neighbour, eſtranged himſelfe ſo far from his old loue and antient deuotion towards the Perſian Kings, that he ſeemed now to deſire ſome new innouation. The nations alſo that were neighbours to the Turks, and the people of Media Antropatia (now called Siruan) diſliked of this new king: and in the end it appeared, That Perſia vnder this king, through many mutations, was in ſhort time fallen into moſt notable miſery, and the ſtate thereof more weakened than it had of long time before.

Mahamet reſolueth to take vpon him the Perſian kingdome.

Mahamet proclaimed King of Perſia. The head of Periaconcona preſented to Mahamet on a Launce.

Of all theſe things had Amurath from diuers places intelligence, but more particularly from Vſtreff of Van (a city of Armenia the greater, ſcituat vpon the lake of Actamar) who ſent him moſt perfect information of all the ſtirs in Perſia; Diſcourſing vnto him of the death of Iſmahel, A mahiel, the conſultations of the Sultans, the trecheries & death of Periaconcona, the broils between the King and the Sultans, the nature of the new King (beeing diſeaſed in his eies, little eſteemed of his ſubiects, beſotted in affection toward his ſons) the facilitie to ouerrule the chief gouernors of the Georgians, and the people of Sirvan, euil affected toward the new king; and to be brief, whatſoeuer had in truth ſucceeded in Perſia, and might inflame the minde of the ambitious Sultan, to conuert his forces againſt an enemy of ſmall counſell and much confuſion. Adding thereunto, That neuer was there greater opportunitie to ouercome that King, than now was offered: and therfore wiſhed him, not in any caſe to let ſlip ſo fair an occaſion, as the Othoman Kings had neuer before, for the obtaining of ſo certain and ſo glorious victories.

B Amurath of long time wholly bent to mark the euent of the troubles in Perſia, now ſtirred vp with theſe aduertiſements from Vſtref, ſetled himſelf more deep in his former conceits to proue his forces in ſubduing the Perſian King, the antient enemy of the Othoman Emperors, and his only corriual and odious competitor in the Eaſt. But no one thing did more inflame him therunto, than to thinke, how he ſhould haue to his enemy a King not acquainted with deeds of arms, doting vpon his children, and weakned with the diſſention of his ſubiects: and on the other ſide entring into the conſideration of his own forces, of the infinit number of his men both horſe and foot, of the means he had to find mony; of his Attillery and engins of War, wherein he far ſurpaſſed the Perſians; he did more and more reſolue with himſelfe to take the occaſion that was now offered him to begin the war. For the compaſſing of which C his purpoſe he was greatly fauored by the preſent ſtate of Chriſtendom, at that time beeing wholly in league and amity with him. So not finding any thing contrary to his deſignments, he reſolued at length to confer with the chief Baſſa's, which had the gouernment of his Empire, Whether it were better vpon this occaſion to begin the prepenſed war, or if they thought not this opportunity to be ſo fit, then to lay it aſide, and to conuert his forces and counſel againſt the Commonwealth of Chriſtendom. For ſuch is the barbarous policy wherby this Empire is mannaged, that it is lawfull for them to break any League, be it by neuer ſo many promiſes or ſolemn oaths confirmed, whenſoeuer any enterpriſe is to be attempted for the aduancing therof. So that although this war could not be moued either againſt the Perſians or Chriſtians, without breach of their promiſed faith; yet among the manifold conſultations D that paſſed among the great Baſſa's, there was not any man found that made any account of that defect, but all with one accord without further reſpect, ſought to ſet forward the ambitious deſire of their proud Lord and maſter. At laſt after long conſultation and large diſcourſes, it was at length agreed vpon by the great Baſſa's, Mahomet, Sinan, and Muſtapha, That it would be better and leſſe danger to attempt war againſt the Perſians, than againſt the Chriſtian Princes. Muſtapha amongſt the reſt preferring the valour of the Latines, wherof he had made good trial eſpecially at Famaguſta, before the armies and forces of the Georgians and Perſians. Wherby it is apparant to the world, that neither the zeal of their religion, nor any iniury receiued from the Perſian King, but only the ambitious deſire of Amurath (to ſubdue a kingdome, both in his own conceit and other mens relations euil gouerned, by an effeminat E and ſottiſh King, and through ciuil diſſention brought into great danger) was the firſt prouocation of making this war.

No aſſurance in the Turks Leagues.

Ambition the cauſe of the Perſian war.

Vpon this reſolution there aroſe new conſultations touching the manner therof, and vpon what coaſt they ſhould begin their iourny for the more honourable ſucceſſe therof. Which point Amurath greatly vrged; proteſting before his chief Counſellors, That he would not enter into that war, except he were in great hope to bear away the victory. Some thought it moſt conuenient to ſend the Army to Babylon, and from thence to Syras, formerly called Perſepolis, the chief city of the country of Perſia. Others there were that gaue aduice, that the army ſhould be ſent directly to Tauris, there to erect ſtrong fortreſſes, and to take poſſeſſion of all the country round about it. And there wanted not ſome (as it is reported) that thought it F better to ſend two ſeueral armies for both the forenamed places; and ſo by bringing the enemy into a ſtreit, to inforce him to yeeld to whatſoeuer ſhould be of him required. But Amurath durſt not repoſe ſuch confidence in his forces, as to think that with his battells diuided and ſo weakned, he ſhould be able to conquer that enemy, who had alwaies moſt valiantly fought againſt the monſtrous and puiſſant Armies of his Anceſtors. And therfore firmely reſolued with himſelfe to ſend one only army, and ſo with his vnited forces to ſeek the ouerthrow of the Enemy. G And ſo preferring the ſtrong hope he had conceiued to conquer the country of Sirvan, and the chief cities of Media the great, before the difficulty of making war vpon the coaſt of Scytas, repoſing alſo great hope in the notable help that was promiſed him by the Tartars called Præcopenſes, he confirmed the great Baſſa's his counſellors in the ſame opinion: and withall diſcouered vnto them a matter, which to all of them, but eſpecially to Sinan ſeemed moſt ſtrange; namely, That he was determined, not to goe himſelfe in perſon with his Army, but to ſend one of his worthieſt Captains in his ſtead. The cauſes why he ſo did, were many; but eſpecially, for that he was troubled with the falling ſicknes, and feared greatly (and that not without good cauſe) leſt his ſon Mahomet, being much fauoured of the H people, might peraduenture in his abſence be vntimely aduanced to the Empire. Beſide the dangers which he ſuſpected at the hands of the Chriſtian Potentates. And withal perſuaded it to be vnto himſelf a great honour, to perform thoſe things by his ſeruants, which had formerly in thoſe countries bin vnfortunatly attempted by his moſt noble predeceſſors in their own perſons.

Whilſt they were thus conſulting about the expedition, and the great Baſſa's, Sinan, Muſtapha, aud others, made means to be ſent as the ſoueraign miniſters of their Lords deſignement, he diſpatched away ſundry poſts and light horſmen, with order to the Baſſa's and Gouernors of Van, Babylon, and Erzitum, in the frontiers of his Dominions, That they ſhould by often inrodes ſpoil the Towns and Caſtles of the Perſians, and by all means to do them what harme I they could. Which they were not ſlack to put in execution, and eſpecially Vſtref (or rather Huſreue) Baſſa of Van, who with often incurſions did much miſchief, as wel in the countries that were tributary, as ſubiect to the Perſian King. A forcible preparatiue for greater troubles to enſue.

The war begun in Perſia.

Now in this great preparation for the Perſian war (which for many years after notably exerciſed the greateſt part of the Turks forces, to the great quiet of the Chriſtian Commonwealth) Stephen Bator the late Vayuod of Tranſylvania, but now by the commaundement of Amurath become King of Polonia, in the beginning of his reign, by his Embaſſador the great Lord Iohn of Syenna, entred into a ſtrong league and confederation with the great Turkiſh Sultan Amurath at Conſtantinople. Which for that it ſheweth in what termes that famous K kingdom then and yet ſtandeth with the Turks great Empire, and withall containeth matter well worth the Chriſtian conſideration; it ſhall not be impertinent to our purpoſe (omitting the great and glorious ſtile of that barbarous Monarch, ſeruing to no other end but to ſhew the greatnes of his power) plainly to ſet it down, as it was on his part at the ſame time by him confirmed.

The League betwixt the moſt puiſſant and mighty Princes, Sultan Amurath the Turkiſh Emperor, and Stephen King of Polonia: Agreed vpon and concluded at Conſtantinople, in the yeare of our Sauior Chriſt Ieſu, 1577, and of the Prophet Mahomet 985. L

The league between Amurath and King Stephen.

Stephen

A Stephen King of Polonia, great Duke of Lithuania, Raſsia, Pruſia, Maſſovia, Samogitia, Kiovia, Livonia, and many other countries moe, Prince of the couragious followers of Ieſus, Gouernor of all the affairs of the people and family of the Nazarits, the welcommeſt Cloud of rain, and moſt ſweet Fountaine of glory and vertue; eternall Lord and heir of the felicity and honor of the aforeſaid noble Kingdome of Polonia; vnto whom all the diſtreſſed repair for refuge, wiſhing a moſt happy ſucces and bleſſed end to all his actions: offering vnto vs many religious vowes and eternall praiſes, worthy our perpetuall loue and moſt holy League, and with great deuotion performing theſe and other like honors, as for the diſpatch of his letters to our moſt glorious Court, for the new confirming of the moſt ſacred league and confederation with vs, ſending the honorable Lord Iohn of Syenna (his moſt faithfull Counſellor) his Embaſſadour to our Court; declaring his loue and integrity, and purging himſelf of all the ſuſpition of hoſtility, hath B requeſted the League and confederation to be renued. At whoſe inſtance we haue giuen theſe our Letters, confirming the ſaid League of peace and confederation. Wherin we command, That none of our Counſellors, Beglerbegs, Sanzacks, Generals of our Armies, Captains, or ſeruants, ſhall do, or on my behalf preſume to do any hurt vnto the Kingdom, Countries, Cities, Caſtles, Towns, Iſlands, or whatſoeuer els to the Kingdom of Polonia belonging. And in like maner, That none of the Nobility, Generals, Captaines, or others whoſoeuer belonging to the king of Polonia, ſhall dare to do any harm vnto my Kingdoms, Cities, Caſtles, or Towns confining vpon the Kingdom of Polonia. In brief, my will is, That he being a mortal enemy vnto myne enemies, and a faſt friend vnto my friends, ſhal do no injury or harm vnto any my ſubiects or things whatſoeuer vnto my juriſdiction belonging. So in like maner commanding alſo, That no hurt by any means or for any occaſion, be don by our people, vnto the ſubiects, or whatſoeuer els vnto the iuriſdiction of the C King of Polonia appertaining.

The creatures, Embaſſadors, Meſſengers, and men of whatſoeuer condition els, ſhall on both ſides freely without let or trouble come and go without any harm receiuing, either in their perſons or goods.

It ſhall be lawfull alſo for the King of Polonia's ſubiects to ſeek throughout our Empire, for any the Polonian captiues taken before the time of this league; and the ſame ſo found (if they haue not receiued the Turkiſh religion, but ſtill remain Chriſtians) to redeem without the contradiction of any man.

And that whatſoeuer ſhall be taken and caried away after the confirmation of this League, ſhall be all again freely and without any thing paying, deliuered and reſtored.

That the Merchants on both parts might freely traffique with all kind of merchandiſe in the black and white ſea, as alſo vpon the Main, and ſo paying their vſuall and lawfull cuſtom, to be in nothing wronged or moleſted.

D If any of the Polonian Merchants ſhall die in our dominion, the goods of him ſo dead ſhall not be embeſelled, but kept in ſafety vntill his brethren or other his friends ſhall come with the King of Polonia his letters: vpon the ſhewing wherof, hauing alſo our Letters mandatory, the goods ſhall be forthwith reſtored vnto the dead mans heirs. In which ſort alſo my Merchants ſhall be dealt withall, if any of them ſhall chance to die in the kingdom of Polonia.

If any wrong be don within the limits of myne Empire, vnto any belonging to the kingdom of Polonia, after the date of theſe letters confirming the League; the doer of the wrong ſhall by my commandement be ſought out, and being found out ſhal be puniſhed & the wrong don, without any delay or contradiction be forthwith recompenced. And the like juſtice to be alſo on the behalf of the King of Polonia adminiſtred.

E If any debtor ſhall depart out of myne Empire into the Polonian territory, wherſoeuer he ſhall chance to be found by his Creditor, he ſhall be brought to the Iudge of that place to be examined, and whatſoeuer it ſhall be proued him of right to owe, the Iudge of that place ſhall according to the equity of the cauſe make the Creditor to be ſatisfied.

But if the debtor canot himſelf perſonally be found, no other man ſhall by reaſon of another mans debt be taken, detained, or moleſted: neither ſhall the innocent be troubled for the guilty, in either or both our Kingdoms.

In brief, vpon whatſoeuer conditions and capitulations the league of peace and confederation was in the time of my father, or grandfather of famous memory, made with the kings of Polonia, vpon the ſame conditions and capitulations be it now made alſo.

Whatſoeuer hurt hath hitherto bin don to either part, by reaſon of the diſagreement of the gouernours F and captains, ſhall all be on both parts neglected and forgotten.

Alſo after the time of theſe letters, confirming the league and confederation, Wheras the King of Polonia ſhall in time pay a certain ſum of mony vſed to be paid vnto the Tartars; the Tartar Chan & his ſon

Mirzeliby their Princes ſhall reſtore the ſame again, and not to dare to ſuffer his Armies by any means to hurt the Polonian territories. So that on the part of the Tartars and their armies no harm ſhall be don to the kingdom of Polonia: neither on the part of the Polonians to the territories of the Tartars. And if any harm ſhall by the Tartars be don in the King of Polonia's territories, it ſhall by my commandement be again reſtored. And ſo likewiſe on the part of the Palatine of Moldavia, or the inhabitants of the kingdom of Moldavia, no harm ſhall be don vnto the countries ſubiect vnto the King of Polonia: but if any be done, and certainly known, to be by my commandement again recompenced. G

On the part alſo of the King of Polonia and his ſubiects, whatſoeuer harm ſhall be don vnto the territory or ſubiects of the Moldavian Palatine, or Tartars, the harm ſo don to be recompenced, and the doers therof puniſhed.

Alſo, That all ſuch fugitiues as hauing done any notorious felonies or villanies in Moldavia, and are fled into Polonia, ſhall at my requeſt, or at the requeſt of the Palatine of Moldavia be reſtored, and in no caſe denied. H

That all the Polonian Captains within my dominions, yet profeßing the Chriſtian religion, may by the King of Polonia's ſubiects be redeemed, not paying any more for them than their Lords and maſters paid: euery ſuch maſter of the ſlaue taking his oath, that he coſt him ſo much. But ſuch captiues as haue receiued the Turkiſh faith, to be forthwith ſet at liberty: and ſo the Turks ſlaues in the kingdom of Polonia to bee likewiſe manumiſed.

That our Embaſſadors on both ſides (ſo long as we are in league and amity) may freely come and go, and not be ſtaid in any place; and being willing to meet together, may at their pleaſure ſo do. And being entred into the confines of either part, to be forthwith by ſome good and faithfull guid appointed vnto them conducted vnto the places they are to go vnto. And this to be on both ſides kept. I

No man to dare to hurt or ſtay any merchant, hauing paid his thirtieth part or lawful cuſtom.

If any of our ſubiects ſhall haue any ſuit with any of the king of Polonia's ſubiects, the Iudges ſhal without delay be bound to adminiſter juſtice. All theeues and robbers ſhall be diligently ſought out, and being found, to be ſeuerely puniſhed: and the goods taken away, without impeachment to be reſtored to the right owners, their heirs, or to the King.

The Sanzacks of Siliſtria and Bolograue, the Cuſtomers and Water-Bailiſes, ſhall not ſuffer any man but Merchants and ſuch as are ſent in our ſeruice, to paſſe ouer the riuer Nyeſter; who paßing ouer, if they ſhall bring with them any ſlaue or bondman out of Polonia, he ſhall be ſent back again. The ſhepheards, if they wil tranſport their ſheep into the iuriſdiction of the King of Polonia, ſhall not ſo do without leaue of the Polonian gouernors, before whom they ſhall alſo number their Sheep: of whom if any ſhall be loſt, the Gouernors ſhall cauſe them to be ſought for, and to be reſtored vnto the Shepheards, as alſo to pay for their hay. K

The Zauzij, Ianizaries, or Poſts, ſhall not dare in any time of peace or war to take any horſes from the Polonian merchants, or other the Kings ſubiects comming into our kingdom.

The Palatines of Moldavia, in whatſoeuer condition they haue bin toward the former Kings of Polonia, they ſhall now alſo ſtil ſo be hereafter. The thirtieths and cuſtoms of both parts ſhall continue in their old maner, and not be increaſed. The Polonian kings ſubiects and merchants, as wel Armenians as of any other nation, whenſoeuer they ſhall enter into Moldavia or any other part of our Empire, ſhall not trauel by vncertain aud vnknown, but by the common or highwaies: wherin if they ſhall ſuffer any loſſe or harm, either in their goods or perſons, the doers of ſuch wrongs ſhal be ſought for, and ſeuerely puniſhed. Which merchants ſhall be ſuffered without any moleſtation quietly to come and go, hauing paid their thirtieths: and no merchant to be troubled for anothers debt. L

If any of the Polonian Kings merchants or ſubiects be willing for ready mony to redeem and cary away any ſlaues taken out of the Polonian kingdom, and yet profeßing the Chriſtian religion, the Iudges ſhal in no caſe withſtand them, neither preſume to take them from them, or again to redeem them. But if any ſuch ſlaues haue receiued the Turkiſh Religion, they ſhall not be again demanded by the King of Polonia.

Such ſlaues as haue not receiued the Turkiſh religion, if after a certain ſpace they ſhall be ſet at liberty by their Maſters, and in the letters teſtimoniall of their liberty, it ſhall be declared that they haue receiued the Turkiſh religion; yet ſhall they not by the Iudges be therfore detained. M

In the city of Buruſa, the Polonian merchants hauing paid their vſuall thirtieths, ſhall not be further preſſed with any other vnuſuall paiment.

My will is alſo, That the territories at this preſent in the poſſeßion of the King of Polonia, or hereafter

A to be by him taken from the Muſcouite, or any other the Chriſtian Princes, to be compriſed within this League, and ſo to be royally by him poſſeſſed.

And for the confirmation of the articles and conditions in theſe our letters of confederation contained, I ſwear by the power of the moſt mighty God, and of his moſt holy Prophet, and by the moſt clean and pure ſpirits of all the Prophets, That for all the daies of my life, and ſo long as nothing ſhall on the behalf of the King of Polonia be don contrary to the peace and league, nothing ſhal alſo on my part be don contrary to the ſame. Witneſſe the Almighty, the vpright judge and diſcerner of mens actions.

From Conſtantinople, the year of the holy Prophet Mahomet 985, the 14 of the moneth Ziemaſſi Eumel. And of Chriſt 1577.

B This league betwixt theſe two mighty princes Amurath and king Stephen thus concluded, and after the death of Stephen, by Sigiſmund the third renued; as it was to the Polonian Kingdom for the time commodious, ſo did it as it were with an Adamantine band ſo tie that moſt famous kingdom, as that in the hardeſt diſtreſſes of the Chriſtian commonweal, and moſt indeed concerning it ſelf, it afforded no more help than did the members farther of, which (I rue to ſay it) was none at all. As in the inſuing wars betwixt the Chriſtian Emperor and the Turkiſh Sultans plainly appeared: wherin had it in due time giuen but ſuch reaſonable aid as it might wel haue ſpared, much no doubt might haue bin done for the repreſſing of the common Enemy, and the recouery of the greateſt part of Hungary: but thus bound, ſtood as a dead member, ſeruing to no other vſe more than to the more ſpeedy deſtruction of it ſelfe, C together with the reſt of the ſick body. For what aſſurance it had in that long, but euil aſſured peace, was wel ſeen, in that in the great conſultation of this great ſultan Amurath with his Baſſa's after the Perſian war, for the inuading of Chriſtendom, the Polonians for al this legue ſo ſolemnly confirmed, were nothing the more regarded, but laid in the ſame ballance with the reſt, and preſerued only by the Prouidence that all gouerneth; which leading the Turke againſt the Chriſtian Emperour their neighbour, gaue them that peace they were otherwiſe hardly to haue looked for. Vnto whom for all that (hauing to his endleſſe praiſe maintained a long and moſt chargeable war) they lent little or no help, yet lying themſelues ſtill in the Lions mouth, and like enough to be the next (without Gods great goodnes) of him intended to be deuoured.

D But leauing theſe the heauy conceits of a melancholy mind, and ominous forebodings of that I wiſh not; to return again toward Perſia, Amuraths greateſt care. Among many the ambitious competitors for the mannaging of theſe Turkiſh ſo great deſignes, was the great Baſſa Muſtapha (euen he who in the reign of the late Emperor Selymus conquered Cyprus, carrying thence together with his victory, perpetual infamy for his faithles and cruel dealing with Bragadine the worthy and renowned gouernor of Famaguſta) appointed General of the Turks army into Perſia; and authority giuen him to prouide whatſoeuer he ſhould think needfull for ſo great a war. And commandment giuen vnto the Baſſa's and other Commanders of the greateſt part of the Turkiſh Empire Eaſtward, that they ſhould themſelues with their ſoldiers of all ſorts, bound by their perpetual annuities to go to the War, in the beginning of the E Spring this year 1578, repaire to Erzirum, a City of Cappadocia bordering vpon Armenia, there to attend the commaund of their new General. Who hauing his diſpatch from Conſtantinople, & for faſhion ſake conducted by moſt of the court ouer the ſtreit to Scutari, and from thence paſſing through the countries of Amaſia & Siuas, in the very beginning of ſummer arriued at Erzirum, and there ſtayd vntill ſuch time as his people, victuals, Artillery, and other his neceſſary prouiſion was come thither. From whence he departed for Sirvan, hauing firſt taken a diligent ſuruey of his whole Army, muſtring the ſouldiers of euery Nation by themſelues: namely of the Meſopotamians twelue thouſand, of the Aſſyrians and Babylonians fourteen thouſand, of the Syrians two thouſand, of them of the leſſer Aſia (now comprehended vnder the name of Natolia) ten thouſand, of the Iewes and Philiſtims one thouſand, F and of the Cilicians four thouſand. After whom followed the ſoldiers of Grecia, the glory and hope of all the camp, valiant men, to the number of ten thouſand; and after them the familiar and faithful gard of the General, ten thouſand Ianizaries of Conſtantinople, with harquebuſes vpon their ſhoulders, and ſcimiters by their ſides: of the City alſo of Erzirum and the juriſdiction therof, appeared four thouſand, vnder the enſigne of Beyran Baſſa their general.

Muſtapha choſen Generall of the Turks army.

Muſtapha muſters his Army at Erzirum.

All theſe were ſtipendaries vnto the Turkiſh Emperor; vnto whom other voluntary aduenturers joined themſelues, in number not inferior to the reſt, but better furniſhed, and of greater courage. So that in this general furuey of the Army were found about 110000 men, moſt part horſmen: yet was there not any ſtirred out of Arabia, Egypt, Africa, Hungary, or other places alongſt the ſea coaſts; neither were the prouinces from whence theſe ſouldiers were drawn, left deſtitute or vnfurniſhed of their ordinary gariſons. Beſides this multitude of men Muſtapha brought with him 500 ſmal pieces of Artillery, with many loads of mony for his ſoldiers pay, with further order for the taking vp of more at Aleppo and other places, if his occaſions ſhould ſo require. He cauſed alſo great quantitie of corn to be tranſported by the great ſea called in antient time Pontus Euxinus, to Trapezond, ſo to be conueyed to Erzirum being but four days journy diſtant thence. To be ſhort, hauing taken order for all things he thought neceſſary for the war, he in ſeemly array departed from Erzirum, and in eight days arriued at the ruins of Chars, and in the fruitful country therabout reſted himſelf. But he was there ſurpriſed with ſuch a violent tempeſt of wind and rain, that it rent in ſunder his Tents, and did great harm; by means wherof many fell ſick, and were therby conſtrained to forſake the Army.

Muſtapha cunningly incamps at Chielder.

Hauing ſtaid three daies at Chars, the bounder of the Turkiſh and Perſian Empire, he departed thence with his army, and that euening lodged vnder the mountains of Chielder, ſuppoſed to be part of the hils Periardo; where hearing the Perſians to be in Arms, he thought it beſt for the ſecurity of his Army, ſo to pitch his tents, as that he might wel diſcouer the comming of the Enemy, and not to be aſſaulted at vnawares. And therfore planting himſelfe in the plain, he gaue order that Beyran Baſſa of Erzirum ſhould take poſſeſſion of a certaine hill on the right hand; and Dervis the Baſſa of Caramit ſhould keepe another hill that ſtood on the left hand: and with them Oſman Baſſa, Mahamet Baſſa, Muſtaſſade Baſſa, aduenturers, with many others as wel ſtipendary as voluntary men, ſhould likewiſe pitch their tents vpon the ſame hils, in ſuch ſort, as that they making as it were two wings to the Camp, might diſcouer the comming of euery man, and yet he himſelf being ſhadowed with the two hils, might lye vnperceiued of any.

Mahamet the new king of Perſia, as yet ſcarſly ſetled in his kingdom, ſtirred vp by the fame of theſe motions, reſolued in himſelf to ſtand vpon the defence of his ſtate, and for a time to diſſemble the conceiued hatred which he bare to ſome of the Sultans of Perſia, & Princes of Georgia, and to make ſome apparant ſhew that he was reconciled to them; for that without them he could not promiſe vnto himſelf any form of an army, or defence: wherin (notwithſtanding all the troubled ſtate of his kingdom) he wrought ſo cunningly, that almoſt all the great men of account took vpon them the protection of his ſtate and kingdom. And ſo Tocomac a Sultan, the Chan and gouernor of Reivan, a famous man, wel known to the Turks, and of great reputation among the Perſians, was choſen General of this expedition; with charge, that gathering together the greateſt number of men he could, out of Atropatia, Media the greater, and other places neer vnto the Turks, he ſhould by all means poſſible ſtop their paſſage into Georgia and Media Atropatia. And therupon precepts were ſent out into all parts of the kingdom, That all the Chans, Sultans, and ſoldiers whatſoeuer, ſhould come ready preſt to attend vpon their new General. Many obedient to the kings proclamation, came; but many there were that would not ſtir a foot, for their obſtinacie in the broiles begun, and for the ſuſpition they had of vnlooked for miſchiefs. At whoſe diſobedience the king much grieued: but now there was no remedy, but to make the beſt of the matter, and for the ſafety of his honor to make the beſt reſiſtance they could. So with thoſe few who for the loue of their prince and country were met together in thoſe parts, being not aboue 20000, Tocomac was diſpatcht about his buſines, if haply he might with theſe ſmal forces oppreſſe the enemy in ſome ſtreit and troubleſome paſſage, where the great multitude ſhould rather ſerue to confound themſelues, than to help one another. Theſe 20000 were all horſmen, armed with ſcimiter & bow, with ſome harquebuſiers among, and furniſhed with very fine and wel tempered armour, but aboue all, couragious they were and reſolute, and wel the more, for the valour and proweſſe of their General. So prouided of all things neceſſary, they ſet forward, and keeping the way of Tauris and Genge, they came to the turning of Chars, where they were aduertiſed that the Enemies army was already paſſed.

They

A They were now come within a days journey of Chielder, when they ſent quick and faithful ſcouts to bring them certain newes of the condition and number of the Turks Army. Who came thither at the very time that Muſtapha was incamping his army between the two hills, wherupon the two Baſſa's Beyran and Dervis with their people had already pitcht their tents. Theſe ſcouts diſcouering the Turkiſh hoſt aloft, perſuaded themſelues that there was no other battel than thoſe they ſaw vpon the hils: Wherof with all ſpeed they returned news to Tocomac, who at eaſe had followed theſe his ſcouts afar off. Tocomac thus miſ-informed by his ſcouts of the number of his enemies, held on his way boldly, with purpoſe to aſſault them; and hauing diſcouered their tents vpon the hils, was throughly confirmed in the opinion hee had before conceiued of the number of his enemies, and the ſcouts relation, and with ſo much the B more confidence ſet forward to aſſail them. But Beyran and Dervis, who quickly from the hils perceiued the Perſians comming in the plain, although they knew them to be men of great courage, yet repoſing an aſſured confidence in their Generals battell, with all ſpeed mounted vpon their horſes and ran to meet them. So in the aforeſaid plains vnder Chielder, within one hour after noon was ioyned a moſt bloudy battel, wherin at laſt were ſlain 7 of the Turks Sanzacks, with a great number of ſoldiers, without any apparant loſſe amongſt the Perſians, who fighting cloſe together in a great heat, and al bebloudied, vrged their happy and fortunat victory.

But Muſtapha, who perceiued all that had paſſed, and ſtaid waiting til the fight was at the hoteſt, and the medly at the thickeſt, that ſo the flight of the enemies might breed the C greater diſorder, and now ſeeing that his people could no longer indure the fury of the Enemies rage (euen as if it had lightned and thundred, and as though the earth had ſhaken) with ſuch cries and acclamations as the Turkes vſe in their aſſaults, for the more terror of the enemies; exciting his army, ran as it were headlong vpon his aduerſaries, and ſo renued a moſt terrible battel. The Perſians wonderful courage induring this vnexpected and dreadful aſſault with incredible ſigns of valor, in that little time of day light that was left (for the night began now to approch) continued their manifold ſlaughters, and at laſt being fauored by the darknes of the night, withdrew themſelues with as little loſſe as poſſibly they could. Neither durſt Muſtapha any longer purſue them, but was glad by night to return to his camp. Of the ſucceſſe of this battel the Perſians certified their King; as alſo of the greatnes of the Turkiſh Army with D their further purpoſe for anoying therof. And by the Turks alſo were preſented to Muſtapha (who had already ſent news by poſts to Amurath) 5000 heads, that by their color, countenance and beards bewraied themſelues to be Perſians, and 3000 Perſians aliue. Of this victory Muſtapha greatly rejoiced, and to make it ſeem the greater (ſeeking by all means to conceale his own loſſes, and to raiſe a greater terror by the fame therof amongſt his enemies) cauſed the heads of the 3000 that were brought before him aliue, to be preſently cut from their ſhoulders, and gaue order that of thoſe heads there ſhould be framed a bulwark in thoſe fields, for a moſt horrible and vncoth ſpectacle.

The Perſians defeated.

A Bulwarke made of the heads of the ſlain Perſians.

The ſame day that Muſtapha applied himſelf about this barbarous and cruel worke, there came vnto him certain meſſengers from Manucchiar, the yonger ſon of the Georgian Widow E Dedeſinit (a great prince in that country) who told him, That with his good fauour and leaue, Manucchiar their Lord and maſter was comming to ſalute him, and to offer himſelf vnto him as his obedient and deuoted ſeruant. At which news Muſtapha redoubling his joy, gaue commandment, That all the Baſſa's and captains in the Army, with all ſolemn pomp, with Trumpets, Drums, peals of ordnance, with al other ſignes of munificall and ioyfull entertainment, ſhould go forth to meet the ſaid Manucchiar, and to accompany him to his preſence. Which they did accordingly, and ſo incountring him with all ſignes of honor, conducted him to the great pauilion of Muſtapha, who there cauſed him again to be ſaluted with like triumph. Manucchiar diſmounted from his horſe, and againſt his wil beholding the ſtrange & vncoth pile of heads all pale and filthy to behold, and indeed imagining what the matter meant, yet not- F withſtanding before all other things, hauing don his due reuerence to the great Baſſa, and according to his degree placed himſelf next to his ſide, after he had preſented him with ſuch gifts as his country yeelded, he gaue him to vnderſtand, That for the honour & eſtimation he bare to the Turkiſh valor, he was alwaies deuoted to the houſe of the Othomans; and as he had oftentimes deſired to ſpend his goods and life in their ſeruice, ſo at this preſent time, moued

by his antient deſire, allured by the ſtrange fame of his wonderful and victorious Army, and ſtirred vp by a particular fantaſie, to learn the painfull and hard precepts of the art Militarie, G vnder ſuch a General, commander of other commanders, he offered him all deuotion and ſeruice, more than euer he had don to any hertofore; and himſelf hauing nothing in the World dearer to him, conſecrated his own life to his commandements; deſiring that the ſame might be imployd in the conflicts of war vnder his banners, among warriers and ſoldiers of fame and renown: and therfore beſought him to accept of him in the name of Amurath, whoſe obedient vaſſal he vowed himſelf to remain for euer.

Graciouſly did Muſtapha receiue all this diſcourſe from Manucchiar, and hauing ſhewed him again the pile of heads, together with his battels, armor, and prouiſion of war, told him, That as all thoſe forces were the gift of God, who euer fauored the righteous counſels of the H Othoman Emperors, in ſuch ſort that they lord it ouer all the world, euen to the aſtoniſhment of them that liue in the world at this day; ſo had he for his particular choſen the better part, in comming now to yeeld himſelf, & to ſubmit his obedience vnto his Lord, although it had bin better if he had don it before. And as concerning the deſire he had to be his companion and fellow in theſe warlike affairs, he did very friendly accept of his comming, and promiſed him all good entertainment and aſſured ſafety. And ſo in exchange of the preſents which he brought him, he apparelled him in cloth of gold, honoured him with a batel-axe, and targuet wrought with gold and ammel, and neuer permitted him to go from his pauilion without a train of his ſlaues following him.

A terrible rain and tempeſt.

This Georgian Prince thus ſolemnly entertained, the General gaue order thorow the camp, I That they ſhould the next morning remoue from thoſe mountains: and now euery man was putting himſelf in readines, when as there riſe a moſt terrible tempeſt of wind and rain, mixt with thunder and lightning, which continued with ſuch violence for the ſpace of four dayes together, as if the heauens had bin diſſolued into waters. Wherby it came to paſſe, that out of the dead carkaſſes and heads before mentioned iſſued a moſt horrible ſtink: ſo that therby, and by the foulnes of the weather, with other annoiances alwaies attending vpon ſo great a camp, the whole army was exceedingly troubled, and diuers diſeaſes aroſe among the Turks. But at laſt the weather breaking vp, Muſtapha riſe with his camp and ſet forwards toward Teflis: and being not able by reaſon of the foulnes of the way to paſſe any farther, that day ſtayd in the plains where the lake Chielder Giol ſtandeth, and there refreſhed his ſick and wearied K ſoldiers. Remouing thence, the next day about noon he came to the Caſtle of Archichelech, ſomtime a caſtle of the Georgians, but taken from them by Solyman in his wars againſt Tamas, and euer ſince holden by the Turks. Here Muſtapha ſurueyed his Army, and by diligent account taken, found himſelf to want 40000 of his ſoldiers, wherof ſome were ſlain in the battel, ſome were dead of ſicknes, and many weary of ſo long and perillous a journy, were ſecretly ſtoln out of the camp, and returned to take their reſt at home. From thence the Army remoued, and lodged that night neer the mariſh called of the Turks Peruana Giol, or Lake of ſlaues; and the next day came to Triala, where at this day are to be ſeen the ruins of a great City and of many churches, wherof ſome are yet repaired and maintained by deuout Chriſtians the reliques of thoſe happy and religious forces, that with ſo great and faithful zeal paſt the L the ſeas and mountains through thoſe barbarous nations into the Holy land, men worthy of eternal praiſe. The next day the Turks aſcended the high and craggy mountaine that ſtands vpon Teflis; from the top wherof deſcending the day following, they ſeiſed vpon a Caſtle of the Georgians, called of the Turks Giurgi Chala. Departing thence, and lodging in certain plains, the next day they came neer the riuer that runs by Teflis. But in theſe 4 dayes march from Archichelec, where Muſtapha took view of his army, many of the Turks, who in ſeeking victuals for themſelues and their horſes had ſtragled from the army, were cut off by the Georgian captains, who with a number of their own country ſoldiers ſecretly followed the Turks army, and wel acquainted with all the waies of the country, lay in ambuſh vpon ſuch places as the victualers were to paſſe through, and ſo ſuddenly ſetting vpon them ſpoiled them at once M both of life and goods.

Muſtapha ſurveying his Army, lacks forty thouſand men.

Muſtapha comming to Teflis found that caſtle empty; for that Daut Chan lord therof, hearing of the comming of the Turks, forſook the ſame and betook himſelf to the fields, prouiding better for himſelf in ſo doing, than by ſtaying in the caſtle, to haue bin there taken priſoner.

A ſoner. This caſtle for the conuenient ſcituation thereof Muſtapha cauſed to be repaired and fortified, and planted therin an hundred pieces of artillery, and appointed Mahamet Baſſa Generall Gouernor of that place, with a garriſon of ſix thouſand ſouldiers, which done, he departed for Siruan. At which very time thoſe of Soria, which had brought a thouſand loads of rent corn to the camp from Aleppo, being themſelues in number a thouſand perſons, with 500 others of Omps (in antient time called Hus, the city of the patient Iob) and other places of Soria, men neither of duty bound, nor of themſelues willing to follow the camp, returned homewards towards their owne country: but vpon the way they were ſet vpon by Aleſſandro, Giuſuf, and Dauid (three of the Georgian lords) and all ſlain except ſome few, who by the ſwiftnes of their horſes eſcaped with Naſſardin their Captain.

Aleſſandro ſends Embaſſadors to Muſtapha.

B Now after that Muſtapha had paſſed the diſcent of the ſteep mountaines of Teflis, the next day he incamped in certaine low plains; where the Embaſſadours of Aleſſandro ſyrnamed the Great, ſonne of Leuent, a Georgian Prince, came vnto him and told him, That their Lord was ready, if it ſo pleaſed him, to come vnto him to do him reuerence, and by word of mouth to promiſe him that deuotion he had alwaies in mind born to the Othoman Emperours. With a glad heart and cheerfull countenance did Muſtapha receiue theſe Embaſſadors: and preſently ſent them back, to will their Lord to come, and to tell him, That his friendſhip ſhould be vnto him moſt deer and acceptable. And after their departure, tooke order with all the Commanders of his army, to receiue him with all the ſigns of ioy that might be; which at his comming was accordingly by them performed. Who after he had preſented to the Generall the C rich gifts he had brought with him, he offered his obedience to the Baſſa with moſt liuely ſpeeches he could poſſibly deuiſe, calling Amurath his Lord: ſeeming to take it in euill part, that he paſſed not through his territory, where he ſhould (as he ſaid) haue had plenty of all things for the relief of his army; yet hoping that in his return from Siruan he would take it in his way; wheras he ſhould find him moſt ready to beſtow all that he had in the ſeruice of his lord: telling him moreouer, That although he could not for many vrgent reſpects go with him into Siruan, yet he would alwaies accompany him in mind, and continually pray to the Creator of all things, for his proſperity & moſt happy ſucceſſe. Courteouſly did Muſtapha receiue both his preſents and ſubmiſſion, and in exchange therof beſtowed vpon him certain gifts after the Turkiſh manner, and in magnificall terms gaue him anſwer; promiſing him in his reD turn to paſſe through his country: and ſo diſmiſſed the Perſian Duke with like honour wherewith he was entertained at his comming.

Aleſſandro courteouſly entertained by Muſtapha.

Muſtapha holding on his journy towards Siruan, through mooriſh and troubleſome wayes; in twelue dayes after he departed from Teflis, came into the confines of Siruan, neere to the riuer Canac, and there reſted on this ſide the riuer one day. At which time they of the city of Sechi, bordring vpon the Siruanians and Georgians, foure days journy from Sumachia, came to offer themſelues to Muſtapha, as ſubiects to the Turks. Of whoſe ſubmiſſion the Generall gratiouſly accepted, promiſing to them his aſſured protection.

The Turks army ouerwearied with the continuall trauell of twelue days march, but yet far more afflicted with hunger, not finding in thoſe parts ſo much as one wilde beaſt to aſſuage E their greedy deſire of meat, ſought by all means, euery man for himſelf, to get ſomthing, eſpecially when they vnderſtood their General would paſſe the riuer into a Country vnto them all vnknown, where they were altogether vncertain what to find for their reliefe. So whilſt they were inquiring among themſelues, who was able to conduct them to ſome ſuch place as wher they might ſupply their wants, behold, certain Perſians were taken, who being ſtreitly examined on that point, after much reſiſtance at laſt told them, that not far off, after they had paſſed certain mariſhes, where Canac dischargeth it ſelf into Araxis, they ſhould finde many fields ful of rice and corn in the blade, and a little farther certain fat herds of cattel, ſufficient to relieue the whole army. Of this news was the General certified: who although he greatly doubted the ſubtilty of his enemies, yet to gratifie his ſoldiers, and to make them more willing to F follow him into Sirvan, he licenſed euery man that had a deſire, to go and prouide himſelf victuals, and ſo ſuffered all that would, to go freely. Wherupon there went of themſelues, and were ſent by their Captaines about ten thouſand ſeruile perſons, with Camels, Horſes, and Mules, to fetch away this prouiſion of Corn and Cattell. But the euent anſwered not vnto their deſires. For Tocomac with the other Perſian Captaines, and the reſt of the ſoldiers that were eſcaped from the ouerthrow giuen them in the plains of Chielder, hauing gathered together G the remainder of the army,and recouered ſuch places as they thought ſafe and friendly for them,carefully attended the marching and paſſing of the Turkiſh army. And being certainly informed by them of Reiuan and Georgia, what way they kept, and that of neceſſity they muſt ariue at the banks of Canac,they began to deuiſe how they might in ſome meaſure be reuenged of their former loſſe,and impeach their enemies entrance into Siruan. But wanting rather ſtrength than courage to aſſail the whole army,they thought it beſt to ſtay in ambuſh in ſome fit place,vntil ſome part of the Turkiſh army (allured with the prey of the corn and cattel)ſhould for the relief of their common neceſſities diſcend into thoſe fields. And the rather to draw them on,ſent out diuers men, who as if they had gon about their own buſines, and by chance at vnawares had lighted vpon the Turks camp, reuealed vnto them, as a great H ſecret,what a good prey was hard by them. And ſo withdrawing themſelues out of ſight,priuily awaited the comming of the Turks:when as within the ſpace of three days it ſo fell out, that the aforeſaid ten thouſand forragers arriued at the wiſhed place;where they had no ſooner begun to charge themſelues with the prey, but they were ſurpriſed by the Perſians and all ſlain, ſauing a few,who by haſty flight ſaued themſelues. The noiſe of this hot skirmiſh being heard into the Turkiſh hoaſt,cauſed Muſtapha to imagine that the matter was fallen out euen as indeed it was ; and therfore riſing with his whole army,haſted with all poſſible ſpeed to haue ſuccored the poor people,who were now all ſlain. And albeit he came not in ſo good time as to yeeld them reliefe, yet came he very fitly to reuenge their death vpon the Perſians, ſtaying too long to load themſelues with the ſpoile of their enemies. I

Ten thouſand of the Turks forragers ſlain.

The place from whence the Turks were to haue had the aforeſaid booty, was almoſt in maner of an Iſland,incloſed with the riuers of Araxis and Canac:wherinto Muſtapha entred with his whole power,Deruis Baſſa leading the one wing,as did Beyran Baſſa the other,and he himſelf comming on in the middle with the main battell. The Perſians ſeeing Muſtapha with all his forces haſting toward them, and withall remembring the late ouerthrow by them receiued in the plains of Chielder ; began to bethink themſelues how much better it had bin for them to haue contented themſelues with the late ſlaughter of the forragers, and with ſpeed to haue gone out of that ſtreit, than by ſtaying longer, to be incloſed with the multitude of their enemies,as that they could now no way eſcape without moſt manifeſt perill. In this perplexity diſcourſing among themſelues, whether it were better to fly, or with ſo great diſaduantage K to ioin battell, and ſo rather to die honourably, than to liue with reproach : at laſt they reſolued to reſerue themſelues to the further ſeruice of their Prince & country,deeming it rather a point of wiſdome than of diſhonour,not to aduenture vnto moſt deſperat and aſſured death,ſo many worthy men as might in future time ſtand their country in good ſtead ; yet did they not ſee how by flight wel to eſcape,for that they were in ſuch ſort ſtrain'd within the riuers,as that there was no ground left for them to eſcape by,than that which contrary to their expectation was by the Turks already poſſeſſed. In theſe difficulties euery man began to betake himſelfe to his own priuat conceit and fortune. Tocomac with Emir Chan and other the great commanders of the army,were the firſt that turned their backs,and by the help of their couragious horſes got ouer the riuer of Canac:whoſe example moued many others to attempt L the like,though not with like fortune; for that their horſes being not of ſuch courage,and out of breath,lay many of them drowned in the riuer. Wherwith others being amaſed,as perceiuing ineuitable death in flying, preſent before their eies, and repoſing all their hope euen in diſpaire,ran as it were headlong in a rage and fury vpon their enemies,and in fighting ſhewed vnſpeakable valour:but what was one againſt an hundred ? for there they were alſo all ſlaine, though worthy of immortall fame. Thus was the Perſian army quite diſcomfited in this demie Iſland,being firſt ſtained with the bloud of the enemy, and afterward with the ſlaughter of the neighbor and proper inhabitant:and ſo became the perpetuall ſepulchre of a moſt couragious and warlike people. The Turks in this laſt conflict loſt not aboue 3000 men, beſide the ſlaughter of the 10000 forragers : although Tocomac to make his loſſe to ſeem the more M tollerable,made a report to the King of a great ſlaughter made. The Perſian Captains full of ſorrow for this vnexpected ouerthrow, with the licence of their Generall departed euery man to his ſeuerall gouernment : as Emangali Chan to Gengi, Serap Chan to Naſſiuan, Tocomac himſelfe to Reiuan,and all the reſt to other Cities, to the gouernment whereof they were before

The Perſiãs fly and in flying are many of them drowned in Canac.

fore

A fore by the King appointed, and ſo remained expecting his further pleaſure from Casbin.

Muſtapha was now come to the riuer of Canac, which he was to paſſe ouer into Sirvan. And therfore made ſtreit proclamation through his whole army, That euery man ſhould be in readines againſt the next day to paſſe the riuer. At which proclamation all his people ſuddenly aroſe in a tumult, and with injurious terms euen to his face reproued his folly and inhumanity, propounding vtter danger vnto himſelf, and an vniuerſal confuſion vnto the whole Army: and therfore prayd him to ſurceaſe from proceeding any further, vnles he were minded to caſt them all away. But his reſolute mind was not by their threats or intreaties to be remoued, neither gaue he them other anſwer than this, That ſo had Amurath commanded; and that if all the reſt ſhould ſhew themſelues vnwilling to obey their Soueraigne, he himſelf would not nor could not, but B would be the firſt man to attempt and perform that which they all ſo abhorred and reproued. Valiant ſouldiers (he ſaid) were diſcouered and known not in idleneſſe and eaſe, but in pains taking, and difficult enterpriſes; who neuer ought to be afraid to change this momentary life for euerlaſting honour, or to ſhunne death, if the ſeruice of their Prince ſo required: And for myne own part (ſaid he) I moſt earneſtly requeſt you, that after I haue attempted the paſſage of the riuer, if any thing happen vnto me otherwiſe than wel, yet carry my dead body to the other ſide of the riuer; to the end that if I canot whilſt I yet liue execute the command of my Soueraign, I may yet at leaſt perform the ſame when I am but a ſpeechles and liueles Carcas: foraſmuch as the deſire of my Lord is not in any ſort to be fruſtrated, for making too great account of myne own life.

A reſolute ſpeech of Muſtapha.

Diuers and ſundry murmurings and wiſperings followed vpon this ſpeech of the General: C who notwithſtanding the next morning did firſt of all wade ouer the deep and ſwift Riuer himſelf; after whom preſently followed the Baſſa's with all their ſlaues: by whoſe example the reſt alſo were induced at laſt to do the like, & ſo continued vntil the darknes of the night interrupted their paſſage; by which occaſion more than halfe the Army could not then get ouer. In this paſſage, being with great tumult and diſorder attempted, about 8000 perſons, caried away with the violence of the riuer, were miſerably drowned, with the great outcry of all the hoſt. The like hapned alſo to many mules, camels, and ſumpter horſes; Vpon whoſe backs diuers perſons being mounted, in hope to haue paſſed dry ouer the riuer, were likewiſe headlong onerwhelmed therin. With great complaints and blaſphemous curſings was the whole night ſpent, by them that were yet on this ſide the riuer, whoſe fears were not a little D increaſed by the example of their vnfortunat fellowes before drowned. And like enough it was, ſome peſtilent ſedition to haue inſued thereupon, had there not a ſhallow foord by great chance bin diſcouered, which gaue ſafe paſſage to thoſe that were left. For in that paſſage the people made in following Muſtapha, the grauel in the bottom of the riuer being raiſed & remoued by the heauy hoofs of the cattel, was driuen down the riuer to a place where by great good hap there was alſo a foord; and there gathered together in a heap, had in ſuch ſort raiſed the depth of the chanel, that it made as it were a ſhelf for their commodious paſſage; ſo that the remnant of the Army, cariages, and artillery paſſing ouer the ſame, there was not ſo much as one man that periſhed. So hauing with much difficulty at length got ouer the riuer of Canac, they refreſhed themſelues that day and the next, and there ſtaid vntill the whole Army E was muſtred and again put in order. Remouing thence, the day following they incamped in certain barren champains where was neither corn nor cattel; neither could they perceiue or learn, that in thoſe quarters were any Villages at all. By means whereof the hunger of their beaſts increaſing, they were inforced to giue their horſes and mules leaues and ſtalks of very dry and withered reeds, and ſuch other like things of little or no ſuſtenance at all: & the men themſelues were fain to ſatisfie their hunger with thoſe vtmoſt reliques which they were fain to pick out of ſuch poor victuals as now by corruption were become lothſom to mans nature: and that which was worſe, they ſaw no end of theſe miſeries they were ſo entred into. Notwithſtanding there was now no looking back, but needs on they muſt, and follow the fortune of their leaders, among whom Muſtapha before all the reſt ſet forward on his intended journy.
F He had not long marched, but there was diſcouered good ſtore of ſundry plants, and ſhortly after, a very large plain Countrey all greene and flouriſhing, and garniſhed with many Trees.
By the only ſight whereof euery man was refreſhed with the hope of reliefe, and with more than ordinary pace haſted, vntill they were entred into thoſe Champaignes, which abounded with all kind of Corne and fruits that could be of an hungry man deſired. In this place did euery man ſatisfie his appetite,and forgot in part the forepaſſed calamities. Thorow this fruitful and pleaſant country Muſtapha leading his Army,at laſt arriued at Eres,the chief city G in that coaſt of Sirvan as you trauel from Georgia.

This city of Eres was forſaken of a number of her inhabitants,ſo ſoon as it was known that the Turks were come to Canac;who all followed their great gouernor Samir Chan, who with Ares Chan gouernor of Sumachia , and other the gouernors of Sechi and other places of Sirvan, forſook the cities, and altogether withdrew themſelues into the mountains, as places of more ſurety,attending the euent of theſe ſo great motions. So that as the Turks entred the city without diſturbance,ſo were they with the prey they found therin nothing inriched: for in this common danger euery man had caried away with him the beſt things he had. Here Muſtapha ſtaid with his army 22 days,during which time he erected a fortres in the ſaid City, H wherupon he placed 200 ſmal pieces of artillery,and for the keeping therof appointed Caitas Baſſa with an gariſon of 5000 ſoldiers. In the mean time alſo he commanded Oſman Baſſa (one of the voluntary captains) with 10000 men to poſſeſſe Sumachia,ſomtime the metropolitical city of that prouince, with the title of Viſier and gouernor general of Sirvan. Giuing him further in charge,That in any caſe he ſhould cleer the paſſage to Derbent, and giue preſent aduertiſements to the Tartarians,of his arriual there;whom he ſuppoſed by that time to bee come into thoſe quarters,for that they had before ſo faithfully promiſed vnto Amurath. Oſman comming to Sumachia,preſently ſeiſed vpon the City, and was friendly entertained by thoſe that remained there: whom he likewiſe curteouſly intreated, without doing or ſuffring any outrage to be don vpon them. Of which his curteous vſage they of Derbent vnderſtanding, I ſent preſently to offer their city to him; beſeeching him to receiue it into his protection, and to defend them from the Perſians:vnder whom although they had long liued in ſubjection, yet differed they from them in the ceremonies of their Mahometan ſuperſtition,wherin they better agreed with the Turks.

Muſtapha returnes out of Sirvan.

Muſtapha hauing thus brought the country of Sirvan into the Turkiſh ſubjection,and finiſhed his fortreſſe at Eres,and put all things in ſuch order as hee thought beſt; importuned by the Ianizaries and the people of Grecia and ſomwhat inforced by the ſeaſon of the yeare, which was now far ſpent,departed from Eres , and turned his courſe homeward towards the country of Alexander ſyrnamed the Great, as he had promiſed in his late paſſage to Sirvan.
And hauing trauelled a long iourney, he ſent before him certain Enginiers and pioners to K make a bridge ouer Canac, ſo without danger to paſſe ouer his Army. Hauing paſſed the River, he gaue notice to Sahamal (one of the Lords of Georgia) of his arriuall: who preſently came and yeelded himſelf as Vaſſal to the Turkes; and being entertained of the Baſſa with great pomp,and rewarded after the Turkiſh manner, took his leaue, and ſo returned into his mountain of Brus.

Muſtapha ſetting again forward,and trauelling by night,becauſe he would not loſe the opportunity of the fair weather,by the error of his guids loſt his way,and ſo fell into rough and difficult paſſages,wherby he was inforced to wait and ſtay for day light; which ariſing, did manifeſt vnto them,that they were now entred into the countries of his friend Alexander: and therfore he gaue forthwith proclamation thorow all the army,That no man ſhould vpon pain L of death be ſo hardy to moleſt or diſquiet any of the ſubiects of Alexander, but to haue good reſpect vnto them,and to intreat them with al curteſie. The day following he ſtil trauelled on in the ſame country; when there arriued from Zaghen certain Embaſſadors of Alexanders with great abundance of cattel,corn,fruits,and other relief ſent for a preſent to the Generall; with a ſolemn excuſe that he came not himſelf, becauſe the infirmity of his body would not ſuffer him. Wherwith Muſtapha reſted ſatisfied; and leauing the city Zaghen on the right hand, cauſed the meſſengers of Alexander to guid him the way to Teſlis: which they ſo directly did,that within the ſpace of three daies they conducted him thither with his army,without the feeling any annoiance whatſoeuer. From whence they returned, being wel rewarded for their pains by the Generall Muſtapha. Who now comming to Teſlis, found the gariſon M he had left there for the keeping therof,ſo hardly pinched with famin, that they were glad to eat cats,dogs,ſheep-skins,& ſuch like vnuſual food: for neither durſt they for fear of the Enemy go out of the caſtle to prouide for themſelues; neither if they had ſo don had it any thing auailed,ſuch was the carefulnes of the enemy in keeping of his things. But now by the comming Muſtapha releeues his diſtreſſed gariſon at Teſlis.

A ming of the Generall they were relieued with meat, mony, and plenty of all things. Hauing ſtaied there two daies, he put himſelfe againe vpon his way, and with fire and ſword deſtroied whatſoeuer came in his way in the Champains ſubject to the ſaid city: only the ſepulchres of Simons progenitors (lord of that country) were left vntouched by the Turks fury. The next day they trauelled ouer rough and ragged mountains, full of a thouſand difficulties, which were the more encreaſed by wonderfull great ſnowes that were fallen: by reaſon whereof, many ſouldiers, horſes, camels, and mules periſhed. In which diſtreſſe the army continued two daies; during which time the ſouldiers were fallen into ſuch a diſorder, that forgetting the feare of the enemies country wherein they were, euery man without regard tooke vp his ſeuerall lodging apart, ſome here, ſome there, where they might find either ſome thick buſh or ſome ſmall B cottage, or ſome quiet valley to ſhelter themſelues in from the wind, the ſnow, and the ſtorms. Of which diſorder certaine Georgian Lords vnderſtanding by the ſcouts which from time to time waited vpon the Turks army, joyned themſelues together, and in the night ſecretly approched vnto it, expecting the opportunity of performing ſome notable exploit: and hauing obſerued, That Hoſaine Bey had withdrawne himſelfe with his regiment from the reſt of the army vnder certaine mountains, to defend himſelfe from the ſtorme and wind; they tooke the occaſion preſented, and ſo aſſailing him, ſlew his ſlaues and all his ſquadrons; took a great booty of many loads of mony and apparell, led away with them all his horſes, and whatſoeuer els they could find, and ſcarce gaue him leiſure to ſaue himſelfe, by flying into the tents of Beyran Baſſa. The next morning the Turks remoued, and in the euening came to a caſtle called Chiur-C chala, where they ſtaied a whole day to make prouiſion of victuall: which was attempted by ſending abroad many of their ſlaues into the fields, conducted by them of the caſtle, who were all miſerably cut in pieces by the Georgians. From this place the Turks army departed in great hunger, ouer diuers rough places of the Georgians, where they were oftentimes faine to reſt themſelues; and at laſt came to the confines of Dedeſimi, other called the widowes countrey. In the entrance whereof, they muſt needs paſſe thorow a narrow ſtreight betweene certaine mountaines, where the riuer Araxis windeth it ſelfe with a thouſand turnings in the low vallies: a dangerous place, and ſo narrow, that no more but one man alone could at once paſſe through it. Betweene this ſtreit and a very thicke and hilly wood, they lodged vpon the banke of the ſaid riuer: and from thence they remoued the next morning, and trauelled ouer very D ſteep mountains and rough forreſts, ouer yce and ſnow more harder than marble, and ouer other hanging rocks, in ſuch miſerable ſort, that many camels, mules, and horſes, tumbling downe headlong into the riuer, there miſerably periſhed. Through theſe ruinous crags and diuers other miſeries, they marched all the next day, and after that another day alſo, as miſerable to the army as the former: and ſo at laſt being ſore afflicted with hunger, ſpoiled of the enemy, tormented with the hard ſeaſon of the yeare, and ſcituation of the place, they arriued in the territories that lay vnder Altuncala, or Golden Caſtle, the princely widowes palace, where they had all manner of reliefe after all the miſeries they had endured ſince their departure from Chiurchala, by the ſpace of ſix daies: which if it had bin a faire common trauelled way, might haue bin performed in one only daies iourney.

E The widow, with Alexander her eldeſt ſonne, came downe from the caſtle, and went vnto the pauilion of Muſtapha, offering him diuers Preſents, and promiſing vnto him all faithfull obedience. Whom Muſtapha courteouſly receiued, declaring vnto her what honourable entertainment he had giuen to Manucchiar her yong ſonne there preſent, who had bin with him in all the expedition into Siruan. And for the preſent, diſſembling the priuy diſpleaſure he bare againſt Alexander (whom he thought to haue bin one of them that ſpoiled the Syrians in their returne from the campe) he embraced him courteouſly, and praied her to be content to leaue him alſo there with him: giuing her further to vnderſtand, that he would ſend both her ſonnes to Conſtantinople to Amurath, with letters of credence for their yeelding obedience, for their fauour ſhewed to his army, in giuing it ſo ſecure paſſage, and ſo there hoped and truſty, that F for their good deſerts, they might be of the ſaid great Sultan both honourably entertained and rewarded. The aged Lady, although her minde was hereat therefore troubled, yet outwardly in her countenance ſhewed her ſelfe not diſpleaſed, and ſeemed contentedly to yeeld to what ſhe was of neceſſity conſtrained to graunt: as well for that he was already poſſeſſed of one of her ſons, as alſo for that both her ſelfe and her whole ſtate were now in his power, and as it were at his deuo-deuotion. And therefore leauing both her ſonnes behind her, ſhe returned her ſelfe heauy to her caſtle. G Muſtapha commeth to Erzirum, & diſchargeth his army.

In this place Muſtapha hauing refreſhed his army two daies, departed thence toward Chars, and after many daies trauell at loſt arriued at Erzirum, to the great rejoycing of the whole army, which was there preſently diſcharged by the Generall, without any muſtering at all, and leaue giuen for euery man to returne into his country.

Muſtapha ſetling himſelfe in Erzirum, diſpatched poſts with letters of plentifull aduertiſements to his great lord and maſter, of all things that had paſſed: not forgetting to magnifie his own exploits aboue meaſure. He certified him of the battels he had had with the Perſians, the obedience he had receiued of the Georgians and Siruanians, the mutiny of his own ſoldiers, the fortreſſe he had built at Eres, the garriſons left in that city with Caitas Baſſa, and in Sumachia with Oſman Baſſa: H and in briefe, whatſoeuer elſe had paſſed, and whatſoeuer he had taken from the enemy. Neither did he faile to propound vnto Amurath, what he thought conuenient to be attempted the next yeare, for the ſtrengthening of thoſe places he had already conquered, and for preparing the way for new enterpriſes. And principally he put him in mind of a fortification to be made at Chars, a place very fit for any paſſage into Georgia or Armenia, by ſcituation fruitfull and commodious both for men and cattell. And withall he ſent vnto him the widowes two ſons, Alexander and Manucchiar, the Georgian Princes; certifying him of their ſubmiſſion, and that hee had receiued in their countrey all good entertainement and friendly welcome: and withall declaring his opinion, That Manucchiar was the meeter man for gouernment than his brother Alexander, and the readier to do him ſeruice. Greatly did Amurath I commend the valor and diligence of Muſtapha, and highly pleaſed himſelfe with this conceit, That of theſe beginnings might grow mighty conqueſts, to the enlargement of his Empire, and that by this meanes he ſhould be able to ſurpaſſe the glory of his predeceſſors. And the more his ambitious thoughts were occupied about theſe wars, the leſſe he troubled himſelfe with thinking how to annoy Europe with his forces.

It was not long after the departure of Muſtapha from Eres, but that the Tartarians hauing left the fens of Meotis, and the vnmountable ſhores of the Blacke ſea, and hauing paſſed ouer the rockes vpon Cholchis, and ſurueyed the frozen crags of the mountaine Caucaſus, were now arriued vpon the confines of Siruan, and there attended the commandment of the Turks. Theſe Tartarians being of them that are called Præcopenſes, to the number of thirty thouſand, K conducted by their lord and captain Abdilcherai, a yong man of great valor and fame, and of a comely perſonage, were come according to the faithfull promiſe of Tartar Chan, with a full reſolution to attempt whatſoeuer ſhould be commanded them in the name of Amurath. Now Oſman Baſſa vnderſtanding of their approch, according to the charge before giuen him by Muſtapha the Generall, entited them to enter into Siruan, and by encreaſing of the Turkes forces, to further theſe beginnings of Amuraths glory, and theſe his conqueſts (or more truly to ſay, theſe magnifical & ſambuſt termes of victory.) All which was moſt diligently put in execution by Abdilcherai: who hauing entred the yron gates where Derbent ſtandeth (which by the Turks at this day is called Demir Capi, and ſignifyeth the gates of yron) and ſo from thence paſſing into the country of Siruan, there ſtaied, and thereof gaue aduertiſement to Oſman, as L was by him appointed. Ares Chan late Gouernor of Sumachia, who for feare of the great army of the Turks, had abandoned the city, the chiefe place of his charge, and betaken himſelfe to the ſafegard of the mountains, hearing of the departure of the Turkiſh Generall, reſolued with the other Gouernours of Eres and Sechi (who following his example, had in like manner fled) now to returne againe to their forſaken country, and to make proofe if he could by any meanes take reuenge of the injury done vnto him by the Turks. So paſſing vnder Sumachia, & hauing put to the ſword certaine of Oſmans ſtragling victuallers that were gone out of the city, he encamped with all his people a little from Sumachia, and by good fortune ſurpriſed certaine meſſengers ſent from Abdilcherai the Tartar, to certifie Oſman Baſſa of his arriuall, and to know his pleaſure what he ſhould put in execution. Theſe Tartarians brought before Ares, after M much torture diſcloſed the letters they carried: which the Perſian captaine read, and conſidering the great number of the Tartarians that were come (for the letters made mention of thirty thouſand) he reſolued not to ſtay any longer in thoſe quarters, but preſently raiſed his campe, and retired towards Canac, meaning from thence to certifie the king of thoſe nouelties, and

A vpon the bankes of the ſaid riuer to attend the kings anſwer. The Tartarian captaine comming to Sumachia, was appointed by the Baſſa to paſſe ouer the riuer Canac, into Genge, the countrey of Emangoli Chan, with the ſpoiles thereof to enrich himſelfe, and by all meanes to make his arriuall to the Perſians moſt terrible. With this charge the Barbarian departed, thirſting now for nothing more than for the bloud and ſpoile of the enemy: and with poſting iournies came to Canac, where Ares Chan was yet incamped, whom he vpon the ſudden moſt furiouſly aſſailed, and like a deuouring flame diſcomfited all the hoaſt. And taking him aliue, ſent him to Sumachia to Oſman, who forthwith cauſed him to be hanged by the necke out of a lodging in the ſame ſtatehouſe where he had not long before ſat as Gouernour. The Tartarian after that, ſwimming ouer the riuer, and courſing a little aboue Genge, found Emangoli Chan with his B wife, and all his family, and a great part of the nobility of Genge in a vally hunting the wilde boore; and aſſailing him, put him to flight, took from him his wife, al the ladies, & many ſlaues, and ſlew many of the reſt that were come thither to ſee the ſport: and after that rode on to Genge, which he tooke, and yeelded it wholly to the fury and luſt of his barbarous ſouldiers, who left no maner of inhumane cruelty vnattempted, in ſatisfying their immoderate and barbarous affections. And ſo being loded with the ſpoiles, and weary with the ſlaughter of their enemies, they returned merrily toward Siruan: & paſſing again ouer Canac, came to the higher ſide of Eres into certain low champaigns, enuironed about with hils, & there hauing pitched their tents, without any feare ſetled themſelues to ſleepe and to reſt their wearied bodies.

Emangoli Chan taken, & Genge ſacked by the Tartarians.

In the meane time, and long before theſe actions, were newes come to the Perſian court of C all the Turks proceedings: whereupon the Perſian king hauing gathered new forces, had diſpatched Emir Hamze Mirize his eldeſt ſonne with 12000 ſouldiers to paſſe into Siruan, to ſee what hurt the enemy had done, and to attempt the reuenge of the forepaſſed iniuries; but aboue al things to puniſh the vallany of them of Sechi, and the other cities of Siruan, that not induced with any neceſſity, had ſo voluntarily yeelded themſelues to follow the obedience and religion of the Turks. The Perſian Prince departing from Casbin, accompanied with his mother Begum, who would needs follow her beloued ſon, was on his way towards Siruan, vnder the guiding and gouernment of Mirize Salmas, chiefe of the Sultans; and had now left behind them the countries of Ardouill and Carachch, when he was certified by the aduertiſements come from Ares Chan, of the arriual of Abdilcherai, with his great number of Tartarians; D and was thereby at the firſt ſtrucken into a great quandary, and almoſt out of comfort: yet prickt forward with an honourable deſire of glory and reuenge, hee proſecuted his intended enterpriſe of Siruan, and haſtening his iourney, came to Eres long before the king his father thought he could haue ſo done. This his notable celerity ſerued him to great purpoſe, for that Caitas Baſſa was boldly gone out of the fortreſſe, and went ſpoiling the country, carrying away with him whatſoeuer he met withall, and committing ſuch inſolencies as hungry ſoldiers beyond all honeſty vſe to do in ſtrange and fruitfull countries. But when he was in the midſt of theſe ſpoiles, and leaſt feared the enemy, he was ſuddenly aſſailed by the Prince, and hauing no meanes to eſcape his fury in this extremity, after a fierce and bloudy battell (wherein the Turks although in number few, yet ſhewed many effects of valor) he was there ſlaine with all his ſol- E diers, leauing the fortreſſe, the ſpoiles, and the country committed to his cuſtody, free to the pleaſure of the victor: which the Perſian Prince hauing once againe gotten into his poſſeſſion, tooke away the two hundred pieces of artillery that were left in the fort by Muſtapha, and preſently ſent them to Casbin to his father.

Eres recouered by the Perſians.

The Prince encouraged with ſo happy a beginning, leauing his mother at Eres, followed on his iourney toward Sumachia, but by the way deſcending the hils, he diſcouered where the Tartarians lay incamped. Whereupon he ſtood in great doubt, whether to aduenture vpon ſo mighty an enemy, or to content himſelfe with the victory he had already gotten, and ſo to returne into Perſia: to returne he thought too great a ſhame, and choſe rather to aduenture himſelfe to moſt manifeſt perill. And therefore deſcending the hill, and drawing nigh the enemy, F he perceiued that the army was all laid downe to reſt, and that their horſes were ſome couched, ſome ſtanding, but all vnſadled: whereupon without any ſtay, ſetting ſpurs to his horſe, he pricked forward with all his horſe, and moſt terribly aſſaulted the Tartarians, now buried in their ſpoiles and ſleep; and hauing ſlaine their firſt and ſecond watch, although with ſome loſſe, among the tumultuary ſouldiers he made an vniuerſall confuſion and ſlaughter, putting ſome to flight, killing others, and taking diuers of them captiues. Among whom was their Generall Abdilcherai, who was taken aliue and ſent to the King. G Sumachia beſieged by the Perſian Prince.

Sumachia yeelded vnto the Prince.

After theſe victories, the Perſian prince ſcoured to Sumachia, and compaſſed the city round about, wherein the Turkiſh Baſſa Oſman ſat as Gouernour, to the reproach of Perſia; and there encamping himſelfe, ſent word to Oſman, That if he would yeeld himſelfe, he would let him depart with life and goods: otherwiſe if he would obſtinately hold it out, and not yeeld the city, which he ſo vniuſtly poſſeſſed, he ſhould be conſtrained to ſurrender it by force, and his life withall. Oſman who as then knew nothing of the Tartarians ouerthrow, but ſtill hoped of their returne, thought it beſt to entertaine the Prince with faire words vntill their comming, and therefore gaue him courteous anſwer, That he was very ready to yeeld vp the city: but withall intreated him, that he would ſtay but for three daies, and grant him time to put all things in readineſſe, that ſo he might freely depart, as it had pleaſed him in curteſie to offer. The Prince H glad of ſuch an anſwer, ſuppoſing it to haue proceeded of a ſincere meaning, expected of the Turke the performance therof. But Oſman meaning nothing leſſe, than to commit himſelfe to the faith of his enemy, and ſeeing that the Tartarians whom he looked for, appeared not, he reſolued to ſaue himſelfe by ſecret flight; doubting, as he had good reaſon, that if he ſhould longer ſtay, to be betraied by the inhabitants of the city themſelues: and therefore ſomewhat before the aſſigned term of the three daies appointed for the ſurrendring of the city, he by the help of a dark night, and the couert of the high and rough crags, with great ſilence withdrew himſelfe out of Sumachia, carrying away with him all his ſubſtance, and ſo in ſafety arriued at Derbent. The next morning the inhabitants of Sumachia opened the gates of the city to the I Prince: who ſeeing their infidelity, firſt by giuing of entertainment to Oſman, and now by helping him to eſcape, without giuing him any knowledge therof, did put in execution the effects of his wrath & indignation, which euen at Casbin he had conceiued in his mind againſt them, and with great cruelty did puniſh the miſerable and vnfortunate citiſens, laying their houſes euen with the ground, raſing both the old and new walls of that city, of late ſo deſired a receit for the Turks. But when he was to depart thence, he ſtood in doubt, Whether to go on to Derbent, or to returne to Perſia: the ſtrength of that city, the approch of Winter, and the long journy he was to take homeward, perſuaded him to lay aſide the enterpriſe for Derbent: whervpon he reſolued to returne to Casbin; yet firſt to make his returne by them of Eres and Sechi, and vpon them as vpon rebels to inflict well deſerued puniſhment. So making his preſent K repaire thither, ſpared neither ſex nor age, nor any condition of perſons, but vpon them all poured forth his furious indignation, without exception. Which done, he with his aforeſaid mother Begum, and his army, though ſomewhat diminiſhed, yet victorious and triumphant, returned to Casbin.

Abdilcherai beloued of the Perſian queene.

Young Abdilcherai the Tartarian was kept ſafe in the Kings palace at Casbin, but with ſuch eaſie impriſonment as was agreeable to his calling: which was day by day ſo inlarged, as that he ſeemed not to liue as a priſoner, but rather as a companion of thoſe of the court, & as it were in apparant liberty. By which occaſion hauing inſinuated himſelfe into the loue of Begum the kings wife, he ſpent his time in courting her, and ſhe again in entertaining of him in all ſecret and couert manner. Yet theſe their mutual affections and interchangeable fauors paſſed not ſo L ſecretly, but that in the court and all ouer the city it was a rife report, That the ſhameleſſe lady, prodigall of her honor, had participated both her bed and her ſelfe with the Tartarian priſoner.
Howbeit neither the King nor the Prince knew any thing of it. But the King perceiuing the yong gentleman to be generally commended, valiant, courteous, and of a comely feature, and withall nobly borne (for he gaue it out that he was the brother of Tatar Chan) perſuaded himſelfe, that it would ſtand with the great good of his ſtate, of a captiue to make him his ſon in law, by giuing him his daughter in mariage: wherby he was in good hope there might grow ſuch an amity and vnion between the Tartarian Precopenſes and himſelfe, as that they would from thenceforth not only refuſe to fauor Amurath in thoſe wars, but alſo become enemies to him, and in the fauor of Perſia turne their arms and affections againſt him. Which his deep M and conſiderate purpoſe ſo diſpleaſed the Sultans of Casbin, that they ſought by all means they could poſſibly deuiſe to auert the king from that ſo ſtrange a policy: but all in vaine, for the king being fully reſolued, and now vpon the point to make a concluſion of the mariage: the Sultans entering into the palace with their followers, and finding there the vnfortunate

Tartarian,

A Tartarian, ran him through the body, and cutting off his priuy members, ſlapped them vpon his mouth after a moſt barbarous and filthy manner. It is reported that the Queene was then alſo murdered by them: certaine it is, that the poore lady after that day neuer ſaw the light of the Sun: but whether it was put in execution by the appointment of the king her husband, or that the Sultans did it for the publike intereſt, is not certainely knowne. Vpon theſe murders ſprung vp many troubles, and much ciuil diſſention, threatning the vtter confuſion of the Perſian kingdome, to the ſingular benefit of Amurath. All which tumultuous diſorders the King by bridling his own affections, and the motions of his ſon Emir Hamze Mirize, wel appeaſed, procuring at laſt a perfect vnity, as then moſt neceſſary for the defence of his kingdome.

The Perſian Queene made away.

Oſman Baſſa being in Derbent (the only place of refuge now left for the Turks in Siruan) B ceaſed not with all carefulneſſe to deuiſe what he poſſibly could, for the aſſuring of that country (of late won, and now againe almoſt loſt) vnder the gouernment of Amurath. For the better eſtabliſhing whereof, together with his owne ſafety, he thought it good to enter into friendſhip with old Sahamal the Georgian, lord of the mountaine of Brus. With this man did Oſman practiſe many tokens of good will; and he again interchangeably towards Oſman: whereupon there aroſe great friendſhip betweene them, at leaſtwiſe in outward appearance: whereunto in ſhort time there was added a ſtrait knot of alliance: for that Oſman tooke to wife a daughter of the ſaid Sahamals, the greateſt ſigne of his ſincere loue towards him. Neuertheleſſe ſhortly after Oſman vpon ſome reaſonable conjectures began to ſuſpect (as indeed the truth was) that Sahamal for all the faire ſhew of friendſhip he made towards him, might for all that receiue ſome C ſecret order from the Perſian king, to betray him, and to free the city from the Turks, and ſo to reduce all that prouince vnto the antient deuotion: in which jealous ſuſpition he was fully confirmed by the ſpeeches of his wife, the daughter of Samahal, who rauiſhed with the honor, valor, and riches of her husband, could not conceale any thing that ſhe knew deuiſed againſt him, but frankly told him, That her father being ſecretly reconciled to the Perſian king, held friendſhip with him, and that letters went between them of great matters, and particularly of the affaires of Siruan. Hereupon the Baſſa perſuaded himſelfe, that all the friendſhip of Sahamal was but deep diſſimulation, and the marriage of his daughter nothing but a meane to procure his death. Neuertheles, he made ſhew vnto his wife, as if he had made no ſuch reckoning of it as indeed he did, but kept it in ſtore to his owne ſafety, and the deſtruction of Samahal; D whom for all that he ſtill entertained with all honor and kindneſſe due vnto a moſt louing father in law. But to preuent the malicious purpoſe of Samahal, hauing inuited him according to the cuſtome of a certain ſolemne feaſt, he acquainted certain companies of his moſt truſty and valiant ſouldiers with his determination, enjoyning them, that as ſoone as Sahamal was entred into his court, euen in the very diſmounting from his horſe they ſhould all fall vpon him, cut off his head, and put all his retinue to the ſword. Which his cruell command was by them accordingly at Sahamals comming put in execution, he in lighting from his horſe being ſlaine, and al his followers murdred, when forthwith was ſent forth by Oſman 2000 horſmen to ſpoile and ſacke all the country of the ſaid Georgian Lord, to the great maruell and aſtoniſhment both of far and neere. The Perſian king hearing of theſe news, tooke the matter grieuouſly, as E foreſeeing that the recouery of that country and prouince of Siruan would proue a matter of great difficulty, and fearing greatly that it would ſtill remaine (as indeed it doth) in the poſſeſſion of the Turks. This was the end of the Turks attempts againſt the Perſian in Siruan this yeare 1578, wherein they loſt aboue ſeuenty thouſand men, deuoured partly with the ſword, and partly with famine and the other miſeries of war. And ſo Winter comming on very ſharply, euery man withdrew himſelfe from the field, wholly attending the keeping of that they had already gotten, vntill the comming on of the next Spring.

Amurath aduertiſed by letters from Muſtapha, of all that had hapned in the late expedition againſt the Perſians, vpon theſe proſperous ſucceſſes (which the Baſſa had for the aduancing of his own credit deſcribed to be far greater than indeed they were) began to caſt many deuiſes in F his head, touching ſuch matters as were to be attempted the next yere. And firſt he thought it neceſſary to ſend his forces again into Sriuan, to recouer ſuch places as were firſt conquered by Muſtapha, but afterward againe ſubdued by the Perſian; ſo to eſtabliſh his gouernment in that country. But vpon better conſideration, he ceaſed further to think of that matter, for the great hope he had conceiued of the aid that was promiſed him by Tatar Chan, who had faithfully

The conſultations of Amurath aſſured both him and Oſman, that he would ouerrun that prouince anew, and do great matters in furtherance of the Turks deſignes: all which for all that fell out to be but windy words: yet G in reſpect of this hope he laied Siruan aſide, and committed the defence thereof to the falſe promiſes of the Tartarian, and the valour of Oſman. And placing his ambitious deſires with more haughty thoughts, he began to deuiſe with himſelfe, for ſending his army directly to Tauris, there to erect a fortreſſe; which being ſtrongly fortified and furniſhed with a garriſon of moſt valiant ſoldiers, ſhould neuer be again ſubdued by all the power of Perſia; and by this meanes to keep in ſubjection all thoſe great countries betweene Tauris and Erzirum. Which his conceit being of great weight and importance, was much increaſed by the perſuaſion of others, very inward with him; euery man being almoſt of opinion, That it was an eaſie matter for ſo great an hoaſt in few daies to performe that ſeruice, and to pierce, not only into Tauris, but further to paſſe whitherſoeuer he would eaſily deſire. Yet after he had more deeply con- H ſidered of an enterpriſe of ſo great importance, and with more indifferent judgement compared his own forces with his enemies, he began to find many difficulties and dangers, which in the heat of his ambitious deſires he at the firſt ſaw not: for beſide the length and tediouſneſſe of the journy, he doubted that in ſending his army for Tauris, it might be on the one ſide aſ-ſailed by the Georgians (of whoſe obedience he had as yet no great aſſurance) & on the other ſide by the Perſians, and ſo brought into great danger; which he was alwaies to feare, whenſoeuer he ſhould haue occaſion to ſend new ſupplies vnto the fortreſſe by him intended at Tau-

ris. Whereupon laying aſide all his former conceits, as too eager and perilous, he reſolutely concluded with himſelfe, firſt to make ſure his own borders, and afterwards by little and little to enter into the enemies country, ſtill fortifying in conuenient places as he went; and ſo ſure- I ly, although but ſlowly, to triumph ouer his enemies, rather than by thruſting his army headlong vpon vncertainties, into places ſtrongly fenced both by nature and the power of moſt mighty enemies, to be inforced with ſhame to abandon the enterpriſes ſo haſtily begun.

Muſtapha careful to put in execution Amurath his command.

Of this his reſolution he aduertiſed Muſtapha by writing; giuing him in charge, againſt the next Spring to prouide all ſuch things as ſhould be neceſſary for the building of certain forts vpon the way that leadeth from Erzirum into Georgia: that hauing made thoſe waies ſafe, and brought the people vnder his obedience, he might afterwards attempt greater matters.
Whereupon Muſtapha preſently directed forth precepts to the cities of Aleppo, of Damaſco, Caraemit, & other places of Syria and Meſopotamia, for the taking vp of cunning workmen, K of pioners, and ſuch like, to the number of 20000: and likewiſe wrote to all the countries, out of which he had raiſed his army the laſt yeare, That all their ſoldiers, (yea, and in greater number alſo) ſhould be in readineſſe againſt the next Spring, to returne to the wars. The rumour whereof he cauſed euen to be ſpread as farre as Ægypt. He commanded alſo the taxes and tenths of thoſe countries to be collected, and further, vſed the chambers of Aleppo, and other places, for ſuch maſſes of mony as he thought neceſſary for theſe purpoſes.

Manucchiar turneth Turke.

Alexander conſtant in his Religion.

In this while the two Georgian brethren, Alexander and Manucchiar, ſent (as we haue before ſaid) by Muſtapha to Amurath at Conſtantinople, in doubtful hope expecting the end for which they were both ſent vnto the court, were both examined, and exhorted to embrace the Mahometan religion: whereunto Manucchiar eaſily yeelded. Whereas on the other ſide Alexander L his elder brother could by no allurements or means be induced to conſent to ſo infamous and damnable a change of his religion, although he knew he ſhould therefore be depriued of his ſtate: but proteſting his obedience at all times to Amurath, and his loue to his brother; reque-ſted only, that he might but as a priuat man go and liue in his countrey, there to be buried amongſt his anceſtors. Which his requeſt the Turkiſh Emperor referred to the diſcretion of Manucchiar, to do therin as he ſaw good: who conſented thereunto. Hereupon Manucchiar was circumciſed, and the name of Muſtaffa giuen him, with the title of the Baſſa and Gouernour of Altunchala, and of all his mothers and brothers countries: and being thus created a Turke, had his brother Alexander a Chriſtian, committed vnto him, and ſo both returned into their owne countries. M

Emanguli Chan taketh vpon him the defence of Siruan.

Now in the Perſian court at Caſbin, were many conſultations had for the repreſſing of the inuaſions of the Turks. And among others carefull of thoſe matters, Emanguli Chan Gouernor of Genge, doubting to loſe his honourable gouernment, by reaſon of the late ſacke of his city, and ſpoile of his country by the Tartarian; by thoſe plots that were dayly in contriuing for

A the ſending of men into Siruan to impeach the deſignments of Oſman Baſſa, & if it were poſſible, to driue him out of Derbent, took occaſion to offer to the King, vpon pain of his head to defend Siruan, and not to ſuffer Oſman the Turk to attempt any new fortifications, or further conqueſts in that Prouince. Of which his offer the king accepted, and therupon the gouernment of Genge, & guarding of the country of Siruan againſt the forces of Oſman, was frankly committed vnto him: And commandement giuen to the Gouernours of Tauris, Reiuan, and Naſſiuan, and to diuers other Captaines that were neereſt, to be ready at all times with their power to aſſiſt Emanguli Chan, if it ſhould fortune either the Tartarians or Turks, with any great power to enter into Siruan: which order ſo taken, was thought ſufficient for the ſecurity of that Prouince.

B But how to protect the Georgian Countrey, was thought to be a matter of greater importance, euery man being almoſt of opinion, That ſome great power of the Turks ſhould bee ſent thither, for the more aſſurance of the conqueſt therof already begun, and for the ſuccour of the fortreſſe at Teflis, which muſt needs otherwiſe fal againe into the hands of the Georgians. This matter ſo troubled the Perſian king, as that he ſeemed to haue bent his whole counſels and thoughts therupon: when Simon a Georgian a famous captain (ſomtime priſoner with Iſmahel the late King, at Cahaca, and by the familiaritie he had with him, ſeduced from the Chriſtian faith; for defence whereof he had in the time of King Tamas, choſen to liue depriued of his liberty and ſtate) thinking it now a fit time to obtaine at the Kings hands ſuch help as he had long deſired, for the recouery of his dominion vſurped by Dauid, otherwiſe called C Daut Chan, his yonger brother (who for the obtaining thereof of King Tamas, had voluntarily renounced his Chriſtian religion) offered now vnto the King his faithfull ſeruice, for the defence of that part of the Georgian Country wherein Teflis ſtood (being in right, part of his own inheritance) againſt the Turks: reprouing by way of diſgrace, his younger brother of cowardiſe, and promiſing the performance of great matters in himſelfe, both for the defence of that euill defended country, and further annoying of the enemy. With great content did the Perſian King conſent to the requeſt of Simon, and named him Chan of all that Kingdom which he poſſeſſed before whileſt he was a Chriſtian: and ſent with him Aliculi Chan into Georgia, with fiue thouſand horſemen, and certaine pieces of artillery taken at Eres, when Caietas Baſſa was ſlaine. Simon afterwards comming to Georgia, was ioyfully receiued of his countrymen, D and there preſſed about three thouſand ſoldiers of his owne and of his neighbours; excuſing himſelfe that he was become a Perſian, not becauſe he preferred the Mahometane ſuperſtition before the Chriſtian Religion; but only ſo to be deliuered from his long impriſonment, and by that meanes to maintaine his eſtate. And in this order were the affaires of Georgia aſſured and ſtrengthned in the beſt manner that might then be.

The meeting together of the Turks army at Erzirum.

Now began the Spring to approch, and euery man prepared himſelfe to the diſcontinued trauels of the wars begun: and now were met together at Erzirum, out of all the wonted prouinces, all the Turks forces; with all things neceſſary for the intended war. With this army, in all things equall with the firſt, Muſtapha ſet forward, and in twelue daies came to Chars, not perceiuing in his ſoldiers any ſigne of diſcontentment at all. And foraſmuch as here they E were to ſtay, and to fortifie both with wals and ditches that ruinated City, and that with as great ſpeed as was poſſible; there was no remedy, but that beſide the pioners and enginiers that were brought for that purpoſe, many of the Spaoglani, yea, and of the Ianizaries alſo, muſt be ſet to worke. Whereupon they all ſuddenly in a tumult, began with bitter proteſtations to tell the General, That their ſtipends wherwith it pleaſed the Sultan to fauor them, were not beſtowed vpon them to imploy their forces and vertues in ſuch ſeruile works; but onely with their ſwords and other weapons, to exerciſe that force and hardineſſe for which they were eſteemed worthy of that honour. Whereunto the Generall anſwered in moſt haughty termes, and not yeelding one jot to their inciuility, but vſing all meanes of authority and terrour, brought them to worke ſo much as he deſired. So that within the ſpace of 23 dayes the F towers and wall were erected, the ditches digged, the artillery orderly planted vpon the walls, and the water brought round about it. Many inconueniences hapned in the army while they were buſie in this worke; and namely vpon the 25 day of Auguſt, when they had almoſt euen finiſhed the whole building, the ſouldiers endured a moſt ſudden cold by reaſon of the ſnow that then fell in great abundance.

Chars fortified in 23 daies ſpace.

Snows at Chars in Auguſt.

Chars thus fortified, the Generall reſolued to ſend ſuccors into Georgia to Teſlis; without which it was moſt certaine that the fortreſſe would be yeelded to the Georgians: but in what ſort to relieue it he remained doubtfull. To ſend part of his army with ſome valiant captaine ſeemed dangerous, and to go himſelfe with all his forces, would ſound (as he thought) to his diſcredit with his great Lord and Maſter; whom he had already made beleeue, that he had ſubdued the Georgians, and brought all that prouince to his obedience and deuotion. In this ambiguity, the deſire he had to preſerue his credit with Amurath preuailed: and ſo he made choice of Haſſan Baſſa ſon to Mahomet principall Viſier of the Court, a gallant gentleman, and of great valour, to whom he deliuered betweene eighteene and twenty thouſand ſoldiers; ioyning vnto him one Reſuan Captaine of certaine aduenturers that voluntarily offered themſelues to follow the forces of Haſſan; aſſigning vnto him likewiſe forty thouſand duckats, and many loads of rice, meale, and barley, with other things neceſſary both for diet and war, and ſo ſent him away for Teſlis.

Haſſan Baſſa ſent with twenty thouſand to the ſuccoring of Teſlis.

Haſſan with this charge ſet forward, fully reſolued to put theſe ſuccours into Teſlis, or to loſe all: and at length came to the famous ſtreit of Tomanis, where the ouergrowne woods on the one ſide, and the deep vallies & craggy rocks on the other, would aſtoniſh a right conſtant beholder. When vpon the ſudden, the Perſians & the Georgians, vnder the conduct of Aliculi Chan and Simon, at vnawares ſet vpon the Turks, and ioyned battell with them. For theſe two valiant captains remaining for the moſt part in the borders of Teſlis and Tomanis with 8000 ſoldiers, waiting for ſome opportunity to annoy either of them of the fort of Teſlis, or elſe ſuch as ſhould come to their ſuccors; vnderſtanding by their eſpials, of the comming of Haſſan with this aid, had ſcattered themſelues all alongſt the ſaid ſtreight, in hope there to aſſaile the Turks, and holpen by the aduantage of the place, to driue them headlong into the deep valley, and at once to bereaue them both of their goods and life. But Haſſan carefull of nothing more than how to auoid that danger, choſe rather to make his iourney through the thicke woods, and ſo as he might to eſcape the ambuſh that the enemy might lay for him vpon that ſtreight paſſage. And ſo entring with his army into the wood, which he was to haue left vpon his left hand, to diſcouer what might be plotted againſt him, he was hardly charged by the enemy, and conſtrained to fight with a thouſand windings and turnings in & out, thorow a thouſand crooked paths and doubtful cranks, in a moſt confuſed medly, with great ſlaughter of his men: who not accuſtomed to this kind of fight, nor acquainted with the ſcituation of the place, were in the skirmiſh driuen ſo far, that downe they fell, and being not able to recouer themſelues, were preſently ſlaine. And thus with much ado he at length paſſed the ſtreit of Tomanis. Haſſan deeming himſelfe much diſgraced, by ſuffering his enemies, in number ſo far inferior, to haue don him ſo much harme, and ſo to haue eſcaped his hands; and further, conſidering that in ſuch places ſleights & ſtratagems more auaile than open forces; burning with deſire of reuenge would needs ſtay neere vnto thoſe ſtreits, as if it had beene to refreſh his wearied army, but indeed to try if the Perſians would aduenture againe to trouble him, or no: and appointed Reſuan Baſſa with certain bands of the ſoldiers of Græce, and of his own aduenturers, to lie in ambuſh within the couert of the ſtreight, attentiue to euery ſtir of the enemy. Two daies the Turks army lay thus diuided, and were now reſolued the third day to remoue thence towards Teſlis: when as the Perſian captaines Aliculi Chan and Simon, vainely imagining that this ſtay of the Turks was for feare of the Perſians, fooliſhly returned and gaue a freſh onſet vpon the flanke of Haſſans ſquadrons. Who forthwith raiſed all his ſouldiers, and giuing a ſigne to Reſuan, with all ſpeed compaſſed in his enemies, and ſtreightening them on both ſides, tooke ſome of them aliue, cut in pieces otherſome, and put all the reſt to flight. Among others that were taken aliue, was Aliculi Chan the Perſian Captaine, who ouer raſhly charging vpon the face of Haſſan, fell into his hand. The next day following (being the eleuenth day after Haſſans departure from Chars) he ioyfully arriued at Teſlis, where he found among the poore beſieged Turks many miſeries; whereof ſome were already dead, and ſome yet ſicke: for they were ſo plagued with famine, that they not onely deuoured their horſes, but euen the very skinnes of the ſame horſes, of ſheepe, and of dogs, and in ſuch moſt miſerable wants had paſſed the time: whom Haſſan at his arriuall comforted with gifts and good words; exhorting them to perſiſt conſtant in the ſeruice of their King, whoſe honour (as he ſaid) was neuer more than there to be reſpected. And for as much as the ſouldiers of the Fort did with one voice requeſt Haſſan to

A appoint them a new Gouernour, becauſe they did all miſlike Mahamet Baſſa, who the laſt yeare was left by the Generall in that fort, Haſſan remoued the ſaid Mahamet, and put Amurath Baſſa in his place: and ſo after he had filled vp the places of the dead ſouldiers with a new ſupply, and ſet all things in order, he tooke his leaue, recommending the charge and cuſtody of the fort to their truſt and valor. Haſſan returning from Teflis, and being without any trouble come to the ſtreit of Tomanis, was aduertiſed by his ſcouts, That it was ſtrongly poſſeſſed by the enemy, and ſo ſhut vp with artillery, as that it was not to be paſſed through: for Simon thinking (as indeed it fell out) that Haſſan would returne that way, had ſo belaied that ſtreit, as that the Turks could not without moſt aſſured loſſe paſſe the ſame: which thing much troubled the Baſſa, and filled his head with many conceits, how he might make his iourny ſome other way, B and decline the danger prepared for him. Thus perplexed, and altogether doubtfull what to do, or which way to turne himſelfe, Aliculi Chan the Perſian (who to purchaſe his liberty could haue beene content to haue done any thing) offered Haſſan to ſhew him a ſhort and ſafe cut, whereby he might without danger paſſe with his army out of that troubleſome country; yet couenanting before, that he ſhould promiſe him to ſet him at liberty for his ſo good ſeruice. Which his requeſt the Baſſa did not ſticke in large maner to promiſe, although he afterwards to his great diſhonor performed not the ſame. So bending his iourny on the right hand, he was guided by Aliculi through ſtrange and vncouth waies, out of thoſe woods and dangers, not meeting ſo much as with any one of his enemies. But when the Perſian Duke well hoping for his liberty, put the Turke in minde of his promiſe; he with deep and feigned ſighs C proteſted, That he was right ſorry that he could not performe what he had promiſed to do for him, foraſmuch as it lay not in his power to ſet any man at liberty, that was taken in battell by the ſoldiers of his great lord and ſoueraigne: yet gaue him his faith, that ſo far as his intreaties and fauors with the Generall Muſtapha could preuaile, he would vſe all the moſt earneſt means he could, to procure his liberty and returne to his own country.

Simon deſtroies the rerewarde of Haſſans Army, & taketh from him his treaſure.

Simon the Georgian perceiuing that the Turks were remoued, imagined forthwith, that they had taken this new way: but being afterward certified by his faithfull ſpies, that it was ſo indeed, he ran all headlong, & as it were deſperat, to meet with this ſo happy an army. And al inflamed with rage for this great fortune of the Turks, he fel vpon the taile of the Turkiſh hoſt, which with vnmeaſurable fury he wholly deſtroied, leading away with him all the people, all D the horſes, and all the treaſure of Mahamet Baſſa which he brought from Teflis, and all the treaſure of Haſſan Baſſa likewiſe. As for Aliculi Chan, whom Simon moſt greedily ſought for, he was ſent away in the front of the army, ſo that he was not to be reſcued. Haſſan holding on his way, came to Chars in the ſpace of eight daies after his departure from Teflis, and there preſented vnto Muſtapha the Generall, the Perſian captaine Aliculi, recounting vnto him the danger he had indured, and whatſoeuer els had happed in that expedition. Aliculi the vnfortunate Perſian was by the commandement of Muſtapha carried to Erzirum, and there in the caſtle committed to priſon. Not long after, Muſtapha returned himſelfe alſo to the ſaid city of Erzirum, with his army ſore weakned and diſcontented, which was there preſently by him diſcharged.

Muſtapha returneth to Erzirum, & there diſchargeth his Army.

About the ſame time that theſe things were in doing, Amurath to make a ſafer and more eaE ſie paſſage for his forces into Georgia, ſent Vluzales his Admirall with a great fleet into the Euxine ſea to Mengrelia, called in antient time Cholchis; who entering the famous riuer of Phaſis (now Faſſa) there fortified, and laid ſuch a beginning, that it is now one of the Turks proud Beglerbegſhips, although thoſe fortifications ſhortly after the departure of the Admiral, were for the preſent againe by the Mengrelians demoliſhed. And this was the end of the ſtirres of this yeare 1579.

Of all theſe ſucceſſes Muſtapha afterwards ſent aduertiſements to the court to Amurath, recounting vnto him the fortifying of Chars, the deſerts of Haſſan, as well for the ſuccouring of Teflis, as for the taking of Aliculi the Perſian. And becauſe the ſaid general had the yere before perſuaded Amurath, That the country of Georgia and the people thereof were brought vnder F his obedience, to the end that he ſhould not maruell at ſo many loſſes and ſo many battels, and therby doubt of ſome falſe informations, he declared vnto him, that al theſe troubles were not raiſed by the natural and homebred Georgians, but by two certain captains Aliculi and Simon ſent out of Perſia, who had made all theſe ſtirs: of which one of them now remained with him in priſon, for him to determine of at his pleaſure. With great delight did the Turkiſh Empeapproued all that Muſtapha had written, and by two of the Gentlemen of his chamber ſent to Haſſan a harquebuſe all gilt and ſet full of ſtones, a targuet of gold and pearle, and a rich garment of G cloth of gold, in reward of his good ſeruice; for which he greatly commended him, and withall gaue order, That Aliculi ſhould be kept where he was in the caſtle of Erzirum, in diligent and ſafe cuſtody.

Theſe inuaſions of the Turks much troubled the Perſian King in his court at Casbin, conſidering, that now they had both throughly acquainted themſelues with all the paſſages into Georgia (in the difficulty and roughneſſe whereof conſiſted the chiefe defence of that prouince) as alſo that diuers of the Georgian Princes were more than inclining vnto the Turks ſeruice; ſo that he could not but juſtly feare, that his enemies would in time begin to pierce into the noble cities of Media the greater, yea and peraduenture euen vnto Tauris before any H of the reſt. Which his care of foreine inuaſion was doubled with domeſticall feares; Mirize Salman his chiefe Viſier, and vpon whom he moſt reſted, ſtill filling his head with a jealous ſuſpition, That Abas Mirize his ſon (made gouernor of Heri by Tamas his grandfather) was about in theſe troubles with the Turks to proclaime himſelfe king of Perſia, to the great ignominy of his father, and prejudice of Emir Hamze his eldeſt brother, the worthy and vndoubted heire of that kingdome. This Mirize Salman (according to his longing deſire) had married a daughter of his to the ſaid Emir Hamze, with the conſent of the king his father: but yet not content with that honour, ceaſed not continually with ambitious deuiſes, to ſeeke out meanes how to bring to paſſe, that the Perſian eſtate might wholly remaine to his ſon in law, vndiuided and entire from the participation of his brethren; & therfore little regarding the perils that might I happen from the Turks, and blinded with the deſire of his owne greatneſſe, he went about to turne the King (being a man very credulous and inconſiderat) againſt Abas Mirize; either to take him and commit him to priſon, or at leaſt to bereaue him of all authority and command.

And the better to perſuade the king thereunto, he diſcouered vnto him how little Abas Mirize his ſonne had reſpected him in diuers occaſions; and that in theſe late wars he had not ſo much as ſent forth one man againſt the Turks, but had forbidden ſuch as were of his juriſdiction of Heri, to come to Casbin, at ſuch time as they were ſummoned both by letters and commandement, to haue paſſed with Emir Hamze into Siruan; by reaſon whereof not one of them would ſtir a foot, anſwering, That they were enjoyned ſo to do by Abas Mirize their lord; who had not only cauſed himſelf to be called king of Heri, but had giuen it out, that he meant K to claime the ſucceſſion in the whole kingdome. Theſe complaints much preuailed with the king, both in reſpect of the loue he bare to Emir Hamze his eldeſt ſon, and alſo of the credit he gaue to the Viſier: eſpecially being accompanied with the crafty packing of the ſaid Viſier; who as he was very cunning in ſuch practiſes of himſelfe, ſo did he make them much more effectuall with the effeminate king, by the meanes of diuers great Ladies, and other deuiſes that were to him very familiar and vſuall. Inſomuch that the King carried away with light beleefe, did continually bethinke himſelf how to find opportunity to repreſſe the boldneſſe of his diſobedient ſon: not forgetting for all that, to make ſuch preparation againſt the Turks, as ſhould be ſufficient to ſtay their paſſage to Tauris, if they had any purpoſe ſo to do. But leauing the L Perſian King to his troubled cogitations for a while, let vs againe returne vnto the Turks Generall, the great Baſſa Muſtapha.

Muſtapha diſcharged of his Generalſhip, & called home to Conſtantinople.

He now lying at Erzirum, after many troubles abroad, was ſurpriſed and almoſt ouerwhelmed with vnexpected quarrels at home, many grieuous complaints being made of him to Amurath, whereby he was induced afterwards to take from him his Generalſhip, and to cal him to the Court to giue account of his actions. Which ſeemed not to be done without cauſe, he hauing before raiſed a great diſcontentment in the minde of Amurath, by ſending ſuch a ſtrong power to the ſuccors of Teflis: whereby he conjectured, that the affaires of Georgia were not in ſuch ſecurity as Muſtapha had already informed him they were, and alſo generally offended the minds of the ſoldiers of his army, who all in an vprore, accuſed him of improuidency and M prodigality, for that now this ſecond yeere he had with ſo much ado gathered together ſuch a number of ſoldiers, to the trouble of the whole empire, and infinit charge of their lord, and yet performed nothing worthy the glory of Amurath, or anſwerable to ſo great a charge. Which complaints although they were of ſome moment, yet would the Turkiſh emperor for the great fauours he bare vnto him his antient Tutor, neuer haue conſtrued them ſo hardly againſt him,

A as for the ſame to haue been induced to haue depriued him of his place, if the inueterate enuy of Sinan Baſſa had not miniſtred ſtrength and force to theſe hard accuſations, and ſet (as it were) an edge vpon Amurath to do what he afterwards did.

A compariſon betwixt Sinan Baſſa and Muſtapha, two ancient enemies both to themſelues and the Chriſtian commonweale.

But foraſmuch as the courſe of time, and proceſſe of the preſent hiſtory, bringeth now forth theſe two mighty champions of the Turks together (the enuious competitors the one of the others honors, who liuing many yeares together, haue left the woſull remembrance of their greatneſſe and valor vnto the World, but eſpecially vnto the afflicted ſtate of Chriſtendome, the large wounds by them made, as it were yet bleeding) ſtay with me a while, and without griefe, if thou canſt, behold the liuely counterfeits of two ſo great enemies (who both liued within theſe few yeares, and the later of them died but the other day) as they are by the skilfull hand of the cunning workeman moſt perfectly deſcribed, and thus to be ſeene. Proud Sinan ceaſe to vaunt too much of thy great trophies woon, Or with ſterne looke for to extoll the deeds by thee erſt done:
For why? the Tranſyluanian Prince will take reuenge of thee,
And ſwelling in thy greateſt pride enforce thee for to flee.

R. Knolls.

This Sinan was a deadly enemy to Muſtapha, and in all things thought himſelfe his match. For if Muſtapha had ſubdued Cyprus, he had conquered Tripolis, Guletta, with the kingdome of Tunes in Africke: and if Muſtapha were a man of great courage, and feared for his yeares, Sinan would be his equall both in the one and the other; yea, and did not ſticke to thinke

A think himſelf the better too, for that in the enterpriſe of Giamen in Arabia he performed ſuch an exploit as Muſtapha neuer durſt, nor yet knew how to put in execution, ſo carying away the glory of that famous conqueſt: for which euer after there was between them a continuall heart-burning, one of them enuying at the others glory, and both in word and deed (as occaſions fel out) in all things oppoſing themſelues one againſt another. At laſt happens this opportunity for Sinan; who taking the occaſion of many complainers againſt Muſtapha, cauſed a great number of them to frame their ſupplications to Amurath, which he for his part did in moſt malignant maner inforce and exaggerate againſt his old aduerſary; accuſing him, That this ſecond year he had moſt manifeſtly ſhewed himſelſe to haue gon vnto the Wars not as a worthy General deſirous of noble and honourable enterpriſes, but as a man that would make B merchandiſe of bloud, and of his ſoldiers payes, imploying the moſt liberal prouiſion of corn and money not as the rewards of well-deſeruing men, not to the erecting of ſuch fabrickes as were needful, and might haue bin built therwithal, but onely to his own proper gain, ſo to in-rich himſelf with his peoples loſſes, to the great ſhame of his Lord, and conſuming of the publique treaſure: adding herunto, That if the things don by Muſtapha were well ſearched, it would be found that he had neglected many good opportunities, attempted many things in vain, and not don any good either to the Emperor or his ſoldiers, but only to himſelf. Whom rather than they would follow again as their General, al his people in an vprore ſhewed themſelues ready and willing to aduenture themſelues to any other far greater labour that by their Lord and Soueraign ſhould be commanded them.

Sinan accuſeth Muſtapha to Amurath.

C These and ſuch like complaints, with the hard opinion already conceiued againſt him by Amurath, were the occaſion why he reſolued to put him from his place. Beſides that, he ſuppo-ſed it a thing dangerous to his ſtate, to ſuffer one and the ſelf ſame General any long time to command ouer ſo great armies; deeming it not ſo much for his honor, ſtil to imploy one man, as to ſhew that he had varietie and choice of ſubiects worthy of ſo great a charge. Wherfore being deſirous to find out the truth of that was reported vnto him concerning Muſtapha, hee ſent the chief of his gentlemen porters with fifteen others, to bring him to the court, with his Chancellor and Treaſurer, to ſhew the accounts of ſuch monies as he had receiued, & to giue vp an account of their whole office. Vnto this meſſenger had Amurath deliuered three diuers letters, which he ſhould warily ſhew as occaſion ſerued: one of them was ſo written, of purpoſe D that Muſtapha in the receiuing therof might by the ſame meſſengers be ſtrangled: in the ſecond was the Emperours warrant for the doing of that was to them commanded: and in the third was contained, That Muſtapha ſhould forthwith ſend his Chauncellor and Treaſurer to the court by theſe meſſengers. Muſtapha in the mean time by diuers means, but eſpecially by the guilt of his own conſcience, venting the emperors diſpleaſure toward him, and ſuſpecting (as the truth was) his life to be by thoſe meſſengers ſought after; at ſuch time as the Captain porter came to his camp, found many delaies to put him off, and would not in any caſe be ſpoken withall. But when the meſſenger would endure no longer delay, he was at length admitted to his preſence; hauing a circle appointed for him, out of which he and his companions might not ſtir, or approch neerer vnto him, the Baſſa's gard ſtanding in arms round about him.
E The meſſenger perceiuing the Baſſa's warines, wilily pluckt forth the third letters, touching the ſending of his Chancellor and Treaſurer to the court. Then began the crafty old Baſſa to find many excuſes to haue delaied the matter; but being hardly preſt by the meſſenger, and ſeeing no other remedy, he with much difficulty deliuered them both; couenanting firſt with the meſſenger, to haue their liues ſpared. Who comming to Conſtantinople, were forthwith clapt faſt in the tower called Iadicula, as there to haue bin ſeuerely examined of al the Baſſa's doings. But Muſtapha after long delay comming at length to Conſtantinople the 9 of Aprill the Spring following, and vſing the mighty and potent mediation of diuers great Ladies and other his gracious friends in court, preuailed ſo much in that corrupt gouernment, as that hee was again at length receiued into Amuraths fauour, without any further proceeding againſt F him, his Chancellor or Treaſurer; who by his means were afterwards alſo inlarged & ſet at liberty: yet was he neuer after admitted to thoſe honors which he perſuaded himſelf were of right due vnto him, for his good and faithful ſeruice of long time don to the Othoman Emperours.

Io. Leuncl. in ſuppl. Annal. Turc. p. 79.

Muſtapha reconciled to Amurath.

In this time that Muſtapha was General at Erzirum, Muhamet the Viſier Baſſa was treacherouſly ſlaine at Conſtantinople,after whom ſhortly after died alſo Achmet Baſſa,who ſucceeded in his place : ſo that the ſoueraigne dignity, in honour next vnto the Turkiſh Empe- G rour,was by rightfull ſucceſſion due to Muſtapha the next Baſſa ; but that he was not thought worthy of it by him that might, and of right ought, to haue gratified him therewith, as ſhall be a little hereafter declared, when we haue briefly ſet downe the ſudden and ſtrange death of the ſaid Muhamet the Viſier,worthy in all Hiſtories to be regiſtred,as a mirrour for all ſuch as adminiſter iuſtice in ſo great place, to look vpon.

The ſtrange death of the great Viſier Baſſa Muhamet.

This Baſſa,a man of as great fame as euer was any that had gouernment in the Othoman empire,in the time that he all commanded, had for ſome light cauſes depriued a certain ſouldier of Conſtantinople, of his yearely penſion, which with many labours and dangers he had gotten to maintaine himſelfe ; which penſion, the Baſſa beſtowed vpon another ſouldier, ſo that the other poore ſoule remained in miſery,altogether vnprouided for. Vnto which miſerable H eſtate ſeeing himſelfe now brought,and not guilty to himſelf of any fault worthy ſo great puniſhment,he determined with himſelf to reuenge the iniury with the bloud of that great Baſſa,and to bereaue him of life,that had bereft him of liuing:which becauſe he could not by any fit means put in execution(by reaſon of the guard of ſlaues that keep the perſon of the Viſier, ſo that no man can come neere him that holdeth that high place) except he could by ſome means acquaint himſelf in the Viſiers houſe,and ſo inſinuat himſelf into his acquaintance,he reſolued to take vpon him the rude habit of thoſe religious which the Turks call Deruiſlars, and after their manner to preſent himſelfe euery morning before the Viſier to aske his almes :
and ſo he did,counterfeiting withall a certain kind of folly and lightnes of mind, as do thoſe I Deruiſlars, to make the people beleeue, that they contemne all worldly things, as men rauiſhed only with heauenly cogitations;which yet was by ſome that knew him, thought to haue hapned in him,through the griefe he had conceiued for the loſſe of his ſtipend.Muhamet not only the firſt time,but alſo at all other times that this counterfeit hipocrit came before him, cauſed him to be comforted with his almes,and as it were with a kind of priuat ſtipend,enioined him euery morning to come to him into the Diuano, and there together with others appointed for the ſame purpoſe,to ſay his deuout prayers, and in ſinging praiſes to their wicked Prophet,to intreat God for his ſaluation : for it is a cuſtome of all the noblemen, that at ordinary hours of prayers,all their prieſts aſſemble themſelues in the Diuano,which is made ready for them,and there all together the Infidell wretches do with their vnclean mouths mum- K ble vp their ſuperſtitious praiers,or rather moſt abhominable blaſphemies.By this means did this diſſembling companion ſo inſinuat himſelf into the Viſiers acquaintance,that the coun-terfet foole went in and out of the Diuano at his pleaſure,no man gainſaying either his going in or comming out,but daily ſat in the preſence of the Viſier,& ſo hauing ſaid his payers,and taken his almes,with al reuerence quietly departed. At laſt when the crafty hypocrit thought that the time was come wherin he might moſt fitly execute his purpoſe, hauing vtterly reſolued with himſelfe to die,ſo that he might ſatisfie the deſire he had of reuenge,ſo long couert-ly foſtred in his heart,hauing conueied a very ſharp dagger ſecretly into one of his ſleeues, he went according to his cuſtome,to require his almes, with an aſſured reſolution (when hee had ſaid his praiers,and reached out his hands to receiue his woonted almes) ſpeedily to charge L vpon the Viſier,and with the dagger to ſtrike him to the heart. According to the accuſtomed manner was the counterfeit hypocrit (for who would euer haue ſuſpected ſo long and ſo traiterous a deſignment)admitted into the Diuano,where Muhamet the Viſier ſat in his houſe, to giue publick audience,and after the vſual maner,before any of the ſutors that attended for anſwers and diſpatch of their buſines ſuſpected any ſuch deceit,he was admitted neer to the Vi-ſier,and ſitting right againſt him, according to his old wont poured out thoſe vain deuotions which thoſe hypocritical Barbarians vſe to mumble vp in their praiers:which being finiſhed, whilſt the Viſier ſimply reacheth vnto him his wonted almes, the traiterous villaine in receiuing it,ſuddenly drew out his dagger,and once or twice ſtabbed it into the Viſiers breaſt,out of which ſo deadly wounds guſhed out his bloud and life together. Wherupon the ſtanders M by aſtonied with the ſtrangeneſſe of the act,ran in,but lo,the old hoary Viſier lay all ſoiled in his own bloud,deadly pale,and breathing forth his laſt gaſp.The miſchieuous murderer they preſently laid hands vpon,& bound him faſt:but the rumor of the ſtrange fact did by & by fly to the Emperors ears : who ſuſpecting that ſome of the other great Baſſa's deſiring to mount into

A into that high dignity, had prouoked the traitor to do this deteſtable act, would needs vnderſtand of the traiterous murderer, what occaſion had moued him ſo trecherouſly to kill his Viſier. Who reſolutely anſwered him, That he did it to deliuer the city of Conſtantinople from the tyranny of him, by whom he was vndeſeruedly depriued of his penſion. But when he could get no other anſwer of him, he deliuered him into the hands of the ſlaues of the dead Viſier, who with moſt exquiſit torments put him to death.

Muhamet thus dead, after him ſucceeded Achmetes the next Baſſa, who (as is before ſaid) ſhortly after died alſo, ſo that it was now Muſtapha his courſe to ſucceed in that chief room, for that he was the third in the order of the Baſſa's. But when he had vſed al the means that he poſſibly could, to haue obtained that ſo honorable a place by order due vnto him, yet could he not find B ſo much grace in the ſight of Amurath his great Lord, as to haue it granted him vnder ſeale, although in effect he made him ſit as Viſier, and all matters of ſtate were brought vnto him as chief Vizier; but in his ſtead the ſeale was ſent to Sinan Baſſa, who was now made Generall for the Perſian wars. Which diſgrace not a little diſcontented Muſtapha, fearing leſt ſome other ſtrange accident ſhould in ſhort time light vpon him.

After that Muſtapha was thus diſplaced from his Generalſhip, Amurath nominated Sinan Baſſa to be Generall in his ſtead for this expedition againſt the Perſians, and for the preſeruation of Chars and Teflis, giuing him ſoueraign authority to command, and to ſet in order all ſuch preparations as he ſhould think neceſſary for ſuch enterpriſes as he ſhould thinke good to attempt in his firſt yeare: who although by reaſon of his great fauour, he grew haughty and C glorious, yet did he not foreſlow to diſcourſe throughly with himſelfe vpon all his deſignements: and namely, beſide the ſuccouring of Teflis, he determined to build a fort at Tomanis, to aſſure the paſſage thither from Chars; and withall to attempt all the means he could to induce the Perſian king to ſend Embaſſadours for peace, with ſuch conditions as ſhould be acceptable to Amurath. With theſe and ſuch like diſcourſes did he buſie himſelfe whilſt he was yet making preparation to ſet forwards toward Erzirum.

Sinan Baſſa choſen General for the Perſian warre.

Of all theſe changes and alterations was the Perſian King aduertiſed, as alſo that this new Turkiſh General Sinan was careful, how this long war might by ſome means be appeaſed, and a good peace concluded. Vpon which occaſion, & by the perſuaſion of Leuent Ogli the Georgian, and of Mirize Salmas the Viſier, he was induced to ſend embaſſadors to Conſtantinople, D to demand peace of Amurath. Vpon which reſolution he diſpatched Maxut Chan (of ſome called Maxudes) his Embaſſadour, with direction that he ſhould go to Sinan, and of him to receiue guids to conduct him to Conſtantinople with letters to Amurath, and as much as lay in him to labour for the pacifying of all theſe troubles: and in any caſe to conclude vpon it, ſo that he would be content with Chars and Teflis. With theſe inſtructions the Embaſſador departed, and at length arriued at Chars, and ſo came to Erzirum, and was from thence conducted towards Amaſia. But when he came to Siuas, he found Sinan the Generall there incamped, gathring together his army for the execution of his deſignments: for Sinan vpon the arriual of Muſtapha, departing from Conſtantinople the 25 day of April, was now come ſo far on his way. Of the comming of this Embaſſador, the Turks receiued great ioy, and news thereof E was in poſt ſent by Cicala Baſſa to the Court. The Perſian Embaſſadour informed Sinan of all that he had to treat with Amurath on the behalf of King Mahamet; and laboured earneſtly to perſuade him, of the equity of the cauſe, and of his requeſt: declaring to him, That foraſmuch as both the nations were conioined vnder the law of Mahomet their common Prophet (though there ſeemed ſome ſmal difference not worth thoſe troubles) it were a very inconuenient thing for them to contend among themſelues, and to ſeek the ouerthrow or vtter deſtruction of one another: and that therfore he was in good hope to obtain of Amurath this deſired peace, if he had no other cauſe wherwith he found himſelf agrieued, as in truth he had not. Wherefore he beſought the Generall, that he would with ſafe conuoy conduct him to Amurath, to the end that if it were poſſible, theſe bloudy wars might take end, at the very report wherof, the reſt of F the world reioyced, and ſtood attentiuely waiting to ſee what would be the iſſue thereof.

The Perſian King ſendeth Maxut Chan his Embaſſador to Amurath.

This embaſſador, Sinan entertained after the beſt manner the rudeneſſe of his nature would afford: and thinking that the very fame of his valor, had wrought in the minds of his enemies this reſolution to come to demand peace, granted vnto the Embaſſador a ſure conuoy to conduct him to Conſtantinople, and wrote to Amurath in his letters, all that he thought was fit to be demanded, repreſenting to him what great and important matters (he hoped) might now be obtained. But before he diſmiſſed the ſaid Embaſſador, he aduiſed him not to go to Amurath, without reſolution to offer vnto him ſome great good conditions, and to yeeld vnto him all that countrey which he by force of armes had before conquered: for he knew the mind of Amurath very wel, that he was reſolued in himſelf, not to yeeld ſo much as one hand bredth of that ground which he had woon with the ſword. Which motion of the proud Baſſa ſo troubled the Embaſſadour, that fearing he ſhould not be able to conclude any thing, he ſtood in doubt, whether to proceed on his journy to Conſtantinople, or to return back again into Perſia: but conſidering better what belonged to his duty in ſo weighty a buſines, and hoping to receiue more reaſonable conditions from the mouth of Amurath himſelf, he gaue large words to Sinan, and ſo with a ſafe conuoy departed from Siuas, and by long journies came to Scutari, and ſo paſſing ouer that little ſtreit, the fourth of Auguſt arriued at Conſtantinople.

The preparations of the Perſian king againſt the Turks.

The Perſian King in the mean time, ſtirred vp with the report of the Turks preparations, to cauſe it to be noiſed, that he likewiſe intended ſome important matters, commanded all the Chans and Gouernors of his kingdom, to meet together with all their forces at Tauris, where he himſelfe with the Prince Emir Hamze his ſonne met them. And after many conſultations there had for the repreſſing of the Turkiſh inuaſion (for as yet it was not certainly known what Sinan meant to attempt) he reſolued to ſend ſoldiers into Georgia towards Teflis, whither of neceſſity, ſuccors muſt be ſent by the Turks to them of the fort: and withall, determined alſo to goe himſelfe with all his army from Tauris, to Caracach, a place very commodious and neer, to guard both Tauris and Siruan, being ſcituat euen in the middeſt between the one and the other, and there to expect the remouing of Sinan, whoſe ambitious nature the king knowing, doubted, that he to ſurmount Muſtapha, would attempt ſome greater enterpriſe; yea peraduenture to run euen vpon Tauris. But when it came to the point, that he ſhould ſend ſome of his Captains into Georgia, he made choice of ſuch as had beſt experience of thoſe Countries, and were neereſt vnto them: with whom he ſent Tocomac alſo, and the reſt whoſe ſeruice he had before vſed againſt the Turks; commanding them to ioine their forces with Simon the Georgian, and by all meanes poſſible to annoy the enemie: whom if they ſhould perceiue to bend for Tauris, they ſhould not faile to follow him; to the end they might ioine together with him, and ſo encounter the enemies army. All thoſe Captains were reſolute men, and led with them ten thouſand ſouldiers; which being ioined with them of Georgia, amounted to the number of thirteen thouſand: who arriuing at Genge, gaue knowledge to Simon of their comming, and that in his behalfe they were ready to do great matters.

Now was the Perſian Embaſſador with all due honour receiued at Conſtantinople, where he was honorably entertained by the great Baſſa's of the Court; but eſpecially by Muſtapha, who within two days after ſuddenly died; of a ſurfet taken of eating too much of muske Melons, and immoderat drinking of Zerbet (a kind of pleaſant drink which the Turks vſe made of water and ſugar:) but moſt men thought him to haue poiſoned himſelfe, as fearing the former indignation of Amurath to be again inflamed by the new complaints of the Perſian embaſſador againſt him, for that he in the time of his Generalſhip, had diſhonorably ſuppreſſed certain embaſſages ſent from the Perſian king; which he now fearing to be called in queſtion for, the former ſtorms as yet ſcarſe well appeaſed, made himſelfe now away. After his death it was commonly reported, that if he had longer liued, he ſhould haue been vndoubtedly ſtrangled: which to preuent, he became the worthy executioner of himſelfe, that had moſt vniuſtly cauſed others to be moſt ſhamefully murdred. Which was the more like to be true, and the rather beleeued, for that the infinit wealth he had of long time ſcraped together, was immediatly after his death taken into the Kings treaſuries, ſome ſmal portion thereof being left vnto his nephews: a moſt certain token of Amuraths indignation againſt him. The Perſian embaſſador hauing audience the 7 of Auguſt, with many liuely reaſons & much eloquence, perſuaded the Turkiſh Emperor to deſiſt from the war begun, as contrary to the will & pleaſure of their common Prophet Mohomet: as alſo to the peace, which was ſo roially, & with ſo many capitulations, not long before concluded between Tamas and Solyman his Grandfather; and was not to haue bin broken, and wars raiſed, but vpon ſome great quarrell or injurie don; which the

A Perſians had not at any time offered, but had alwaies wiſhed vnto him all happineſſe, as they had manifeſtly declared, by ſending vnto him an Embaſſage to that purpoſe by Sultan Tamas: wherby he might plainly perceiue the good mind and zeal the Perſian King had for the maintenance of the peace. And although in the ſhort reign of Iſmahel there was a rumour raiſed, That he meant to go vnto Babylonia, and ſome ſuch other like newes; yet that was but a youthfull part, and an effect of that heat which is commonly proper to ſuch as beeing kept long in priſon, canot vſe their liberty with moderation, and had therfore receiued due puniſhment for it, by ſudden and vnexpected death. But as for the King that now is, he did aboue all other embrace amity with his Majeſty, and therfore did moſt earneſtly deſire, that it would pleaſe him to temper his anger conceiued, which had inſenced him to take vp armes againſt B a King ſo much his friend, being of the ſame religion, and better affected towards him than all the reſt of the Nations in the world.

This Embaſſador the Turkiſh Emperor diſmiſſed without any reſolution at all, but only gaue order, That whatſoeuer he had to ſay touching this peace, hee ſhould communicate it with his Viſier. Many were the diſcourſes that hapned; for that the Turks required all thoſe cities and countries which til that time he had conquered with the ſword, or (as their proud maner of phraſe is) wheron his Generals horſe had trod, to be yeelded again vnto him: and the Embaſſador on the other ſide had no warrant from his King to yeeld more than that part of Georgia which is on this ſide the riuer of Araxis. Wherupon the ſaid Embaſſador began to fear leſt he ſhould be ſuſpected for a Spy, and ſo be euil intreated: wherewithall he did finde C himſelf too manifeſtly charged by the hard ſpeech which the Viſier vſed toward him. Being thus doubtfull whereupon to reſolue, perceiuing himſelfe ſtrained to the grant of theſe demands, and receiuing alſo ſome threats withall, he determined with himſelfe to inlarge his ſpeeches with the Viſier in diuers and ſundry particulars, and to giue him good hope that he ſhould be able to perſuade his King to yeeld vp ſo much as Amurath had and did demand.
Herupon was Maxut Chan in friendly maner and without any outrage ſent from Conſtantinople to Chars, and commiſſion giuen to Sinan (then at Chars) That without delay hee ſhould faithfully cauſe the Embaſſador to be conducted to Van, and from thence into Perſia wherſoeuer he did deſire. All which was faithfully performed.

But to return again to Sinan the Generall, who from Sivas had ſent the ſaid Embaſſadour D to Conſtantinople (as is before declared) & being departed thence arriued at Erzirum, where he took a ſuruey of his army and other prouiſion neceſſary for this expedition: and ſo from thence was now come to Chars, from whence he diſpatched the Perſian Embaſſadour, much diſcontented that no other concluſion for peace could be wrought.

Sinan muſters his army.

Maxut Chan at laſt arriuing at the Perſian court, reported vnto the king all that had hapned in this his embaſſage: the ſum wherof was, That Amurath would not condiſcend vnto any condition of peace, vnleſſe the whole countrey of Sirvan were yeelded vnto him, for that hee had once (as he ſaid) conquered the ſame. Neither did he forbear to tel the King the ſuſpition Amurath had conceiued of him, to haue bin a ſpie rather than an Embaſſadour, and of the large promiſes he was fain to make to the Turk, to auoid the manifeſt danger of impriſoment E or death: all which for all that now lay in his Majeſties power to perform or not. The King for the preſent remained well ſatisfied with that which Maxut had don, and in reward of his great trauel and expences gaue him the charge of the Chamber at Tauris, naming him the Chamberlain of that rich and great city. Of which new office (though very honorable and of great importance) he took ſmal pleaſure, for that Emir Chan his antient enemy was chief gouernor of that city, from whom he feared ſome dangerous trechery. Wherfore he appointed his deputy for the execution of the office, and withdrew himſelf from Tauris to Caſſangich a place of his own, there to paſſe away the time vntil it ſhould pleaſe the King otherwiſe to diſpoſe of him. But Emir Chan, who ſtill nouriſhed in his mind the antient hatred hee had conceiued againſt him, tooke this as a moſt fit occaſion to bring him into diſgrace with the F King: certifying him, That Maxut not contented with the preferment it had pleaſed him to beſtow vpon him, had in contempt of his rewards abandoned the city of Tauris, and ſubſtituted in his place a moſt baſe perſon to repreſent the Kings Majeſty, and to manage his Treaſure: and that he abſented himſelf far from that City and the court there, hauing withdrawn himſelf into the confines of Turky, no doubt for ſome miſchieuous intent, either to yeeld himſelf vnto them, or elſe to haue intelligence with them, and was like enough to be guilty to himſelf of the great error he had committed, by offering Siruan vnto the Turkiſh King, and making promiſe of ſuch large conditions, wherby he had obtained ſuch a ſure and ſafe Conuoy to conduct him, when as he had before diſcouered himſelf to be a fauorer of the Turkes, and a traitor to his owne king: and that therfore it were good to make trial of his inclination, and ſo peraduenture to decline ſome great miſchiefe, tending to the danger of the Perſian ſtate. This malicious accuſation ſlily contriued, ſo wrought in the mind of the jealous king, that he commanded Emir Chan ſecretly to apprehend Maxut, and to bring him to the court, and if he could not by other means, then by torture to wreſt from him the truth of all thoſe matters. Glad was Emir to haue his enemy thus put into his hand, and thought it long til he had brought this ſhame vpon Maxut. Who hauing already heard ſome inkling therof, reſolued with himſelf to do any thing, rather than to fall into the power of his fatall enemy. And therfore at ſuch time as fifteen tall fellowes were for that purpoſe ſent vnto him from Emir Chan; who in the kings name ſummoned him to the court; hee without making any ſhew that he took the matter otherwiſe than well, entertained them courteouſly, and made them good cheer: but when he perceiued them to be ouercome with ſleep, which crept vpon them by reaſon of the exceſſe wherwith they had ouercharged themſelues, hee cauſed them to be ſtreitly bound, and with long cords hanged them down into a deep wel, and there ſhut them vp, ſecretly couered. Then gathering together the moſt precious things he had in the houſe, & ſetting his wiues, his children, his brethren, and nephews on horſeback, fled with all his family in the euening, and the next day arriued at Salmas, and was there friendly entertained by the Turkiſh Baſſa, and from thence conueyed to Van, where he was alſo curteouſly welcommed by Cicala Baſſa, and honorably accompanied ſent to Sinan the General; who very glad of his comming, ſent him with all diligence to Conſtantinople to Amurath. And this was in effect the end of the firſt interparlance of peace betwixt the Turks and Perſians.

Maxut Chan flieth to the Turks.

Sinan ſtaied at Chars eight daies, and there again ſurueyed his army and prouiſion; and afterward ſet forward toward Tomanis, with reſolution there to build a fort. But beeing come thither, he could by no means put that his deſignement in execution, by reaſon of the immoderat rain, which continually for eight daies together fel in ſuch abundance, as that neither did the Sun appear, nor the sky clear. Beſide that, Sinan greatly feared leſt the enemy taking the opportunitie of this rain, of the ſtreit, and of the building, ſhould aſſault his army, & finding it in euil plight, and out of order, greatly indanger it. Wherefore caſting off his former determination for fortifying at Tomanis, he remoued thence to cary ſuccors to Teflis: but ſo ſoon as he was riſen with his Army and paſt the ſtreit, Tal-Ogli Captaine of the Ianizaries at Damaſco, and Homar Sanzack of Saffeto, hauing receiued ſecret intelligence, that hard by, a little out of the way, was good ſtore both of corn and cattel, reſolued to go thither to fetch in that booty: and ſo with two thouſand ſoldiers greedy of prey they ſet forward. Now Simon the Georgian and the Perſians following the Turks Army afar off, had diuided his ſouldiers into all ſuch places as where there was either corn or water, or any ſuch thing as might allure the Turkes to ſcatter themſelues from the Campe: and perceiuing theſe hungry Turks careleſly to run headlong to lay hold on this deſired booty, he ſuddenly ſet vpon them & cut them in pieces being diſordered; ſo that of thoſe two thouſand eſcaped but Tal-Ogli the Captaine of the Ianizaries; Homar the aforeſaid Sanzacke and all the reſt beeing left dead vpon the ground.

Sinan holding on his way, in two daies came to Teflis, where preſently calling a Councell of all the chiefe men of his Army, hee tooke order, That euery man ſhould vpon his oath depoſe the truth concerning the greatnes of Teflis: which he did only in reproch of Muſtapha the great Baſſa, who moſt vntruely had informed Amurath, That it was as great and populous as Damaſco: wheras in truth it was not in any reſpect to be compared to that ſo famous a City. After that, he diuided the treaſures and ſuccors he had brought, among the ſoldiers of the Fortreſſe; cheering them vp with good words, & promiſes of great matters. And becauſe the ſoldiers there in gariſon complained greatly againſt the Baſſa their Captain, he cauſed a bill of complaint to be framed againſt him, & finding him guilty, That he had conuerted the ſoldiers pay to his own vſe, he condemned him to the reſtitution therof, and ſo immediatly diſcharging him of his office, placed in his room Guiſuf Bey a Lord of Georgia; who for the an-

A tient enmity betwixt him and Simon had yeelded himſelf to the Turks; and was of them ſo welcommed, that Sinan truſted him with the cuſtody of that fort, which with ſo many dangers had bin maintained vntil that day.

All things thus ſet in order at Teflis, Sinan with his army departed thence, and hauing paſſed the ſtreit of Tomanis, there came vnto him Muſtaffad Baſſa (afterward gouernor of Aleppo) declaring vnto him, That not far off was great ſtore of corn and cattel, and no body but a few Georgians to keep the ſame, and therfore wiſhed him to ſend forth ſome to fetch it in, wherof if it had bin much more his army then ſtood in great need. Sinan was well affected to this Muſtaffad, and therefore the eaſilier induced by him to ſend for the aforeſaid booty. But mooued with the freſh remembrance of that which had happened to Tal Ogli and Homar, hee B gaue order, That to fetch in this prouiſion there ſhould goe out ten thouſand horſemen and their ſeruants, with Muſtaffad as their General. Now ſtood Totomac, Simon, and the other Perſian captaines in ſecret ambuſh, waiting when any of the Turkes ſhould come to fetch in this booty. VVherupon the aforeſaid ſouldiers beeing now come as they deſired, and hauing almoſt charged all their mules and horſes with that which beſt pleaſed them to make choice of, the hidden Perſians all on a ſudden iſſued out of their lurking places among them, & with great ſlaughter put them to flight, and with ſuch fury purſued the victory, that they ſlew of them 7000, carrying away many priſoners aliue, and the mules and horſes laden with the ſtolne booty. Muſtaffad was the firſt that fled, and the firſt that brought the vnhappy news of that ouerthrow to Sinan; which was forthwith confirmed by ſuch as had by ſpeedy flight eſcaped C the fury of the enemy. Wherupon Sinan diſpatched the Baſſa of Caramania with a great power, charging him whereſoeuer he ſhould finde the enemy, to ſet vpon him; and preſently riſing himſelf with his whole army followed the ſaid Baſſa: but all too late; for the Perſians after the aforeſaid victory, without ſtaying had withdrawn themſelues into their ſtrong places, known only to ſuch as were wel acquainted with the difficult paſſages of Georgia: and hauing there diſpoſed of their prey, were now returning to await ſome freſh occaſion of new ſlaughter. But when they deſcried the whole army of the Turkes vpon the riſing of a certain hil, they were afraid to meet them, yea and ſtood in ſome doubt alſo, leſt Sinan ſhould deſcend from the hil and ſo aſſault them. For which cauſe they retyred themſelues again into the ſtrength of the mountains, yet not with ſuch ſpeed, but that the Turks ouertooke ſome D few of them, and ſlew about fifty or threeſcore of them, whoſe heads in ſigne of triumph they carried a good part of the way vpon their ſpeares point, and tooke priſoners about threeſcore and ten more.

Seuē thouſand Turks ſlaine.

At laſt Sinan with all his Army, hauing paſſed theſe dangerous places of Georgia, arriued at Triala, where it was told him, That the Perſian King in perſon himſelfe, being already departed from Tauris, with an exceeding great Army was comming to bid him battel. At which newes he cauſed proclamation to be preſently made thorow all his Army, That euerie man ſhould put himſelfe in readineſſe for the voyage to Tauris, whither he himſelfe meant to goe to meet with the King his enemy. In the mean time (as is reported) hee diſpatched certaine Poſts to the Perſian king then at Catachach, to intreat him to ſend another Embaſſador vnto E Amurath for peace; thinking by that means (as ſome do coniecture) to alter the Kings reſolution for comming to aſſail him, if he had any ſuch meaning. After this proclamation made, he deſcended into the open and large plains of Chielder, where preſently he muſtered his whole army, and gaue it out, That before he would ſet forward toward Tauris, hee would make triall of the readineſſe and nimbleneſſe of his ſoldiers, as if they ſhould preſently join battel with the enemy. VVhich without further delay he put in execution the next morning, formally ranging his whole army in order of battel, and then ſending out ſome few others to ſhew themſelues vpon the top of certain hils, as if they had bin enemies that came to ſeiſe vpon his Army, he cauſed al his artillery to be diſcharged, and commanded euery man to skirmiſh & beſtir himſelfe altogether after the ſame manner as if the enemy had been there preſent before F them: where the thundring of great and ſmall ſhot, the thicke ſtormes of arrowes, with the brightneſſe of the armour and weapons yeelding forth lightnings as if it had bin fiery beams, and the noiſe of Drummes and Trumpets, and other inſtruments of VVarre, with the enſignes of blew and yellow flying in the winde, made ſuch a medley of all things, as if it had bin the turmoile of a very battell indeed. In the end he cauſed the retreit to be ſounded, and then ſetting all his army in order again, made the like ſhew the ſecond time, and ſo the third time alſo. Which was indeed performed with the great ſcorne and deriſion of his ſouldiers, who G deemed it rather childrens play, than any commendation to the proud Baſſa. Theſe counterfeit ſhewes of war thus finiſhed, yet did he not ſet forward toward Tauris, as hee had giuen it out, but loitred eight daies in thoſe plains of Chielder. At which time there arriued out of Perſia one Aider the Aga, as Embaſſador from the King, who was by Sinan with great joy entertained. Diuers were the things by this Embaſſadour propounded, ſuch as had Maxut Chan before: but the concluſion of all was, That the Perſian King would bee content voluntarily to relinquiſh Chars and Teflis, and ſo remain as he did before in amity with Amurath; and ſo deſired Sinan, to conclude a peace with his maſter, if it might be; as for himſelfe, this meſſage don, he was preſently to return into Perſia. For this peace Sinan promiſed to deale with Amurath, ſo that the Perſian King would ſend another Embaſſador to Conſtantinople. Whervpon H the ſaid Aider returned into Perſia, and at Tauris declared to the King, what he had ſeen, what promiſes he had receiued from Sinan, and withal exhorted him to ſend a new Embaſſadour to the Turkiſh Court. After this, when the publique rumor of the comming of the Perſian king was found to be falſe, Sinan in ſtead of going to Tauris, returned to Chars, where he idely ſtaid a whole month, to the general maruelling and murmuring of his whole army, aſtoniſhed to ſee themſelues, to the great charges of the King, and the diſturbance of the whole kingdom, brought forth not for any honorable conqueſt, but as it were only of purpoſe to make a vaine ſhew of war.

Sinan breaks vp his army.

At laſt he departed from Chars, for that Winter was now come on, and the froſt and ſnow I did his army great harm; and ſo comming to Erzirum, there preſently diſmiſſed euery man to go and winter in his owne Countrey, but remained ſtil himſelfe in the ſame City. From whence he by ſpeedy Poſts diligently aduertiſed Amurath of the ſuccours he had left at Teflis, of the loſſes he had receiued from the enemy, of all that which was by Muſtapha miſreported; of the comming of the Perſian Embaſſador vnto him; of the promiſe made vnto him touching a new Embaſſador; and to be ſhort, of all his whole actions. Beſides all this, hee aduertiſed Amurath, That the enterpriſe of Perſia was a very hard, long, and difficult matter, and ſuch a one as needed another manner of preparation than had been as yet appointed for it. And that if he deſired to ſubdue the whole kingdom of Perſia, it was then very neceſſary that he ſhould ſpeak with him at large, and diſcourſe of many particularities, which could not ſo K wel without exceeding tediouſneſſe be declared by writing. After that, he ſent other meſſengers alſo, to ſolicit Amurath for his returne to Conſtantinople; continually telling him, That it was not poſſible to ſignifie by writing, what he purpoſed to report to him by word of mouth for the better accompliſhing of the enterpriſe begun. Nothing did Sinan more abhorre than this War, hauing his mind altogether bent againſt the affaires of the Chriſtians in Europe, and therefore ſought by all means poſſible to diuert thoſe Warres from the Eaſt, into ſome other quarters. At laſt he wrought ſo much, hee entreated ſo much, he writ ſo many Letters, and ſolicited the matter ſo earneſtly, that Amurath was perſuaded to ſend for him to Conſtantinople, as ſoon as euer he was certified of the arriual of the new Embaſſador from Perſia, of whom Sinan had before aduertiſed him. For he was reſolued either to grow to a peace with L the ſaid Embaſſador, if he came with honourable canditions; or if he came not, or that after his comming they could not agree vpon the peace, then to put in execution thoſe conceits wherof he muſt needs in particular talk with Sinan by word of mouth. At length the promiſed Embaſſador called Ebrahim Chan, a man of great eloquence, and highly honoured in Perſia, came to Sinan; wherof Sinan gaue preſent intelligence to Amurath, beſeeching him again to permit him to come to Conſtantinople. Which Amurath then granted. Wherupon Sinan forthwith returned to the Court, where he attended the vniuerſall gouernment of the whole Empire. At his firſt comming to the preſence of Amurath (wherein hee diſcourſed not with him of any thing but of the comming of the Perſian Embaſſadour) the conditions were ſet down which they were to require for the reducing of the Capitulations of this peace vnto M good end. After which agreement the Embaſſador being now come, and moſt magnificently receiued at Conſtantinople, had audience. At which time he with much glorious ſpeech labored to perſuade Amurath, That his king earneſtly deſired a reconciliation, and to joyne his forces with his againſt the Enemies of the Mahometane Religion; and for that very purpoſe

A poſe, he was now eſpecially come thither: which his good purpoſe, if it were anſwered with like zeale on his part, there would therof enſue the greateſt vnity and friendſhip that euer was between any Mahometan Princes. Whereunto Amurath gaue him no other anſwer, but that he ſhould therof talke with his Viſier, and with him intreat of all matters concerning the peace: and ſo he was by Amurath entertained and diſmiſſed both at one time.

Amurath circumciſeth his eldeſt ſon Mahomet.

Now had Amurath called to Conſtantinople his eldeſt ſon Mahomet (who afterward ſucceeded him in the Empire) being then about ſixteen yeres old, to circumciſe him, according to the cuſtome of the Turks; following therein the inueterate Law of the Hebrews: Vnto which ſolemnitie many Chriſtian Princes were ſolemnly inuited; who accordingly ſent thither their Embaſſadors with great gifts and Preſents, in token of peace & confederacy, namely B Rodulphus the Emperour, Henry, the third the French King, Stephen King of Polonia; the State of Venice, the King of Perſia, the Moore Kings of Morocco and Fez, the Princes of Moldauia, Valachia, and others. With al triumph and ioy was the circumciſion of this yong Prince ſolemniſed by the ſpace of forty days and forty nights, in the great market place of Conſtantinople; where all the Embaſſadours aforeſaid had their ſcaffolds prepared and furniſhed according to their degrees and States, & receiued ſuch entertainment as might be ſhewed at ſuch a kind of barbarous ſpectacle: Only the Perſian embaſſador, who had alſo his ſcaffold ſeuerall to himſelf, but not regarded as the reſt, reioiced not at theſe feaſts and triumphs: for among ſundry other wrongs and ſcorn done by the commandement of Amurath vnto the Perſian nation (as by hanging vp certaine counterfeit pictures of Perſians made of laths and C ſticks, and then burning them, and in many ſcornfull ſorts abuſing them) the Turke, for the great diſpleaſure he had conceiued for the harm done to Oſman Baſſa and the Turks in Siruan much about that time, and for the diſdain he had taken againſt Ebraim Chan (as one not condiſcending to the conditions of peace which he expected, nor yeelding to any more than the other Embaſſador had done before, ſeeming to haue come as a Spie to mark the Turkiſh affaires, or to mocke Amurath, rather than to put in execution any good matter to pacifie the minds of the two mighty Princes) commanded the ſtanding before appointed for him, in diſgrace of him to be caſt down, and himſelfe and all his followers to be ſhut vp as cloſe priſoners in the houſe of Mahamet Baſſa at Conſtantinople; where he was ſo ſtreightly kept, that though an hundred of his followers there died of the plague, which ſhortly after began to D wax hot in the city, yet could he not obtain ſo much fauor as to be remoued into ſome other place, but there was inforced to tarry it out, vntill that afterward order was taken, he ſhould be carried thence as priſoner to Erzirum. To end theſe ſolemnities, Mahomet the yong Prince was circumciſed, not publiquely, but in his fathers chamber, by Mechmet one of the inferiour Baſſaes, ſomtime the Emperor Solymans Barber.

Io. Leunc. Sup. Annal. Turc. pag. 82.

Now whilſt Sinan as great Viſier ſat commanding in Conſtantinople, the garriſons of Chars and Teflis (kept in by the enemie, and hauing receiued none other reliefe than a little which Sinan before his departure from Erzirum, had by good hap cauſed to bee ſecretly conueyed vnto them) were thought to be driuen to great wants. Which thing Sinan right well knew, and fearing leſt thoſe two places which had with ſo much ado been both gained and E maintained, ſhould for want of new ſuccours fall againe into the hand of the enemy: he both boldly and freely counſelled Amurath to ſend a new garriſon to Van, for the ſafety of the countrey thereabouts, and then vnder the conduct of ſome valiant captaine, to ſend ſuccours to Teflis: Vpon which point Amurath asked Sinan his opinion, and willed him to bethinke himſelfe of ſome fit man. Hereupon Sinan propounded diuers vnto him, but none of them pleaſed him; for why, he was before reſolued, in deſpight of Sinan and of his counſel, to beſtow this charge vpon Mahamet Baſſa nephew to Muſtapha the late Baſſa, and for his ſake hated of Sinan. This Baſſa Mahamet he ſent to Erzirum, with the title of the Baſſa of that Prouince, honouring him withall with the name of Generall of the army for Teflis. And preſently gaue commandement to Huſſan the Baſſa of Caraemit, to Muſtaffa ſometime called Manucchiar the F Georgian, to all the Sanzacks, the Curdi, and the ſoldiers of Erzirum, that they ſhould reſort to the ſtandard of Mahamet their Generall, and ſo to follow him to Teflis. Whereupon there aſſembled together out of all the ſaid places about fiue and twenty thouſand ſouldiers, with all things neceſſarie for the reliefe of the diſtreſſed garriſon which was in Teflis. Commandement was alſo giuen to the Baſſaes of Aleppo and Maras, to repaire to Van with all their ſouldiers,and there to abide till Winter: which they accordingly did,not moleſted not troubled by any enemy. G

In the end of Auguſt, Mahamet Baſſa departed from Erzirum, with the Baſſa of Caraemit, and all his army, carrying with him mony, corn, and all other things needfull for the reliefe of Teflis, and in eight dayes came to Chats, and from thence to Archelec, not troubled by any. At Archelec he found Muſtaffa (otherwiſe called Manucchiar) the Georgian, with all his ſouldiers, whom the Generall moſt ioyfully entertained, and honoured him with gifts, and withal admoniſhed him to continue his obedience to Amurath, and to conduct him with his army the ſhorteſt and ſafeſt way to Teflis: for that ſome were of opinion, that it were beſt to goe by Tomanis; and ſome other, by the way of Muſtaffa his countrey: wherin Muſtaffa did readily reſolue him, that the eaſieſt and ſhorteſt way lay through his owne country, being alſo in his opinion the ſafeſt. This counſell of Muſtaffa pleaſed Mahomet greatly, ſo that he made choice H of him to be the guid of his army, repoſing himſelfe wholly vpon his good direction: and ſo departed thence towards Teflis, paſſing through Altunchala and Carachala, both belonging to the ſaid Georgian, abounding with all things neceſſary for the ſuſtenance of man, neither were they euer diſturbed by any enemy. Hauing paſſed Muſtaffa his countrey, they came to a friendly Caſtle called Gori, from whence they diſcouered in certain fields a great army of the Georgians mingled with Perſians, but apparelled after the manner of Georgia: theſe were thoſe captains of Perſia, ſent from the Perſian King (as in other yeres before) to aid the Georgians; who ſecretly conioyned with Simon Chan the Georgian, had changed their apparell, becauſe the treaty of peace ſhould not be diſturbed, and their King acounted vniuſt of his word; I who vnder a colour of a treaty of peace, whiles Amurath attended nothing elſe but to ſuccour and defend his conquered countries, without purpoſe to annoy any other places, went about to procure the deſtruction of the Turks. Theſe then as ſoon as they ſaw the Turkiſh army, and perceiued that they alſo themſelues were by them deſcried, ſent Heraulds vnto them with haughty words of defiance, and to offer them battel. With great griefe of mind did the Baſſa receiue this proud defiance: but hauing no other purpoſe but to bring his ſuccors ſafe to Teflis, he diſmiſſed the Heraulds, and ſtudied by all means he could to ſhun battell. That euening he was fauoured in his purpoſe by the great and continuall rain which then fell, and ſerued for a reaſonable excuſe of his delay: but the next day prouing faire, and the Sunne ſhining bright, both the armies marched in ſight one of the other all day, vntill about four houres and K an halfe before night; at which time the Turks arriued neere to a riuer that ſeparated the one army from the other. There the Baſſa fell in conſultation with Muſtaffa, whether they ſhould paſſe ouer the riuer before night, or ſtay on that ſide they were till the next morning. In which caſe Muſtaffa aduiſed him to ſtay, as fearing leſt the enemy ſhould ſet vpon the army diſordered in paſſing the riuer, and ſo annoy them. Notwithſtanding the General diſliked this aduice of Muſtaffa, hauing taken a ſtrong conceit euen vpon the firſt diſcouery of the enemie, that there was ſome intelligence and compact betwixt Muſtapha and the Perſians, and that to that end he had maliciouſly perſuaded him to come that way, and not by the way of Tomanis: and therfore the Baſſa thinking, that if there were any ſuch plot laid between Muſtaffa and the enemie, to ſet it in ſome confuſion, would not in any caſe follow the counſell of the L ſuſpected Georgian, to ſtay that night; but commanded, that with the greateſt ſpeed that might be, all his ſouldiers with their treaſure and corn ſhould paſſe ouer the riuer, to the end that before night he might on the other ſide of the riuer incamp his army in ſome good place, to the ſcorn and deriſion of his enemies. Mahamet his lieutenant, a bold young man & an hardy, was the firſt that ventured ouer, and after him the carriages of money and of corn, and then the whole army, with ſuch ſpeed, that ſome of the confuſed multitude were drowned in the paſſage, being rather troden downe with the horſes and camels, than brought to their deaths, either by the depth of the channell, or ſwiftneſſe of the riuer.

As ſoone as the Georgians perceiued that the Turks had paſſed the riuer, without ſtaying vntil they might ſettle themſelues in any good order, they in great haſt & fury ran vpon them, M and preſently aſſailed them, whiles they were yet all in confuſion and out of order: by reaſon whereof the Turks, although they turned their faces vpon their enemie, and made ſome good reſiſtance, yet in ſhort time you might haue ſeen the banks of the riuer in many places ſtained with the Turkiſh bloud, and many carkaſes of the Turks here & there ſcattered, without any

A apparant loſſe among the Georgians and Perſians. Amongſt them that fell in this ſlaughter, were a number of Sanzacks, of the Curdi, and Meſopotamians: which the reſt perceiuing, and by the ouerthrow of their owne, coniecturing the loſſe of others, turned their backes and fled; the like did the remnant of the Meſopotamians, and after them at laſt the whole army: whom the Georgians preſſed ſo ſore in their flight, that many of the Turks ſeeing no other way to eſcape, caſt themſelues into the riuer, and ſo (though hardly) eſcaped with their liues. Great was the ſhame, great was the confuſion, but greateſt was the loſſe they receiued, for that in the heat of the battel the Kings money and corn was taken by the Georgians and Perſians, euery man ſauing only ſo much for himſelfe as he could ſecretly hide vpon his owne body, or conuey by the means of ſome truſty ſlaue, which by the help of their ſwift horſes was preſerued rather by fortune than by valour.

The Turks diſcomfited, & the treaſure and corne taken by the Georgians and Perſians.

B The Turks thus diſcomfited and ſpoiled of their reliefe, the next morning gathered themſelues together againe, one with another curſing the Heauens, the King, and their aduerſe fortune: ſome of them alſo threatning the Georgian Renegate Muſtaffa, as though all this miſchiefe had hapned through his trecherie and ſecret intelligence with the enemie. Notwithſtanding, when they found that they had ſtill remaining ſo much money and other eaſements as might ſuffice to comfort the afflicted minds of the ſoldiers beſieged in the fort, they reſolued to hold on their way towards Teſlis; and in their journy vſed ſuch ſpeed, that the day following they arriued there in the euening. But when they of the Fort ſaw their friends whom they had ſo long expected, arriued in ſuch bad ſort, and ſo euill furniſhed, they were aſtonied and wonderfully grieued at this common loſſe, and all in a confuſion proteſted to Mahamet, C That they would abandon the place, if they had not forthwith neceſſarie prouiſion made for them. But the Generall after he had with large promiſes mitigated their firſt furies and inſolencies, preſently in the morning cauſed a Diuano or counſell to be called in the caſtle, where hauing gathered together all the chiefe men in his army, he ſpake vnto them in this manner:

Mahamet with his diſcomfited army commeth to Teſlis.

The Oration of Mahamet Baſſa in the caſtle of Teſlis.

Foraſmuch as it hath pleaſed God, that ſo great and important an occaſion of victorie which was offered vnto vs for the honour and glory of euery one of vs, is now fallen out ſo vnfortunately, that it hath not only not miniſtred vnto vs any matter of triumphing ouer our enemies as we ſhould haue done, but rather hath made them (I know not how) to carry away from vs both the triumph, and alſo our armor, our horſes, our ſlaues, and our ſpoiles; yea and (the remembrance whereof doth moſt grieuouſly trouble and afflict me) D our Sultans money, and our publique munition and forces ſolemnly deliuered to our conduct, is now become a booty and a prey vnto them: that the honour which might haue made euery one of vs famous among noble and valorous ſoldiers, is now fallen from our forheads, and to our great detriment doth adorn the heads of ſtrangers, or rather of our enemies: and that notwithſtanding all this, we are now come to thoſe couragi-ous ſoldiers, which with their great valor haue defended this Fort euen in the midſt of their enemies weapons and treacheries; and to whom we ſhould yeeld that aid and reliefe which the vertue of euery one of their minds doth deſerue, and which King Amurath had put into our hands to bring hither vnto them; there is now no remedie, but to reſolue vpon ſome good means, that we fall not wholly into the vtter diſgrace of our Lord and King; and that is, To maintain theſe ſouldiers in the cuſtody and defence of this Fort: and though it had bin with all our wants, and all our owne diſhonours, to comfort theſe that haue ſo long time E looked for vs, and ſo well deſerued all manner of reliefe. We cannot excuſe our ſelues, that our enemies were better than we either in number or inſtruments of war; for both in the one and the other we were far beyond them: neither yet can we ſay, that they ſet vpon vs by night, or at vnawares; for when we ſaw their number, their weapons, their horſes, and finally their approach, and their manner of aſſault, yet we would needs paſſe ouer the riuer, and ioyn battell with them. Which we now know hath fallen out very lamentable vnto vs, becauſe we were more ready to take our flight, than to endure the fight; and to vſe our feet, than to occupie our hands. And therfore it is very requiſit, as well to ſatisfie the rigor of juſtice, as to performe the duty of ſoldiers, that we ſuffer not our Lord and King to loſe his mony, which he truſted into our hands, and which we haue loſt, not by greater ſtrength nor by any trecherous ſtratagem of our enemies, but by our own too too important feare, and too baſe a regard of our liues, before which, it was the duty of euery one of F vs to haue preferd the care of honor. For if by fighting and couragious ſuſtaining the aſſaults of our enemies, though they had bin ſtronger, and better armed than we, this misfortune had hapned vnto vs, and that we could in any ſort haue repreſented to the King and the world an honorable and bloudy battell, wee ſhould not now haue any need to ſeek means how to repay this loſſe, and to tranſport the thing that violently was taken from vs by ſuch as were more mighty than our ſelues, and theſe honourable ſouldiers ſhould more eaſily haue digeſted with vs this lamentable calamity. But we haue loſt that mony, and in very deed hauing as it were willingly beſtowed it vpon the Georgians and Perſians, to redeeme our liues, and to ſaue vs from their fury, are bound to repay it, or elſe for euer hereafter to be challenged by the King as lawfull debtors vnto him for it. And therefore my good friends and companions, if you will take a good courſe, let euery one of vs without further conſultation, put his hand into his priuat purſe (if he haue not fooliſhly caſt that into the hands of the rauonaus enemy) and with our own money let vs ſuccour the neceſſitie of theſe men, and haue regard to the honour of our King. So ſhall we make our flight leſſe blame-worthie, wee ſhall iuſtifie our actions more honeſtly, and that which is of greateſt importance, wee ſhall better pacifie the wrath of Amurath, which he might moſt iuſtly conceiue againſt vs. I my ſelfe before you all am moſt ready to diſburſe foure thouſand duckats towards it: if it ſhall pleaſe you all to follow me accordingly, we ſhall deliuer theſe ſouldiers from their great neceſſitie, and acquite our ſelues from the intricate bonds of moſt tronbleſome diſpleaſures.

The Turks out of their owne priuat purſes relieue the Gariſon of Teſlis.

There might a man haue ſeene a thouſand countenances changed a thouſand manner of waies; for one ſoftly whiſpered many a curſe and ſhame vpon the King, vpon Mahomet, yea and vpon God himſelf; another denied to disburſe any thing; another determined priuily to ſteal away; and ſome ſaid one thing, and ſome another: but in the end euery man was induced to follow the example of Mahamet; and thereupon hauing made a purſe according to euery mans ability, there was collected thirty thouſand Duckats among them. And preſently after, word was ſent to Leuent Ogli at Zaghen, to ſend thither grain, muttons, and other neceſſary prouiſion, that they might the better continue the defence of the Fort.

Two dayes onely ſtayed Mahamet in Teflis, and hauing changed ſuch ſouldiers as deſired to be diſmiſſed, and alſo appointed Homar Baſſa Gouernour of Teflis, in ſtead of Giuſuf that there gouerned before, he departed. But before his departure conſultation was had, Whether they ſhould keep the way of Tomanis, or the way they came through the countrey of Muſtaffa the Georgian: and in the end they reſolued to keep the way of Tomanis, and thereupon order was taken that they ſhould all paſſe the riuer. The Curdi were the firſt that went ouer, and had alreadie pitched their Tents vpon the farther ſide of the water; when the Generall began to reuoke his former order, and ſent them word, That they ſhould returne, becauſe he was now determined to goe backe the ſame way he came. At which meſſage the Sanzackes were in a rage, and in plain termes ſent him anſwer, That theſe mutabilities beſeemed not them, being men accuſtomed to warre, but to be rather childrens play, than manly reſolution; and that for their parts they were minded not to change their journy, but would go on the ſame way they had begun: and ſo forwards they went (ſay the General what he could) and by the way of Tomanis arriued at Chars long before Mahamet; who was much grieued at this their ſo great diſobedience: but ſeeing no other remedy, he with the Baſſa of Caraemit and Muſtaffa the Georgian, put themſelues on their journey, euen by the ſame way they came to Teflis. At laſt Mahamet arriued at Altunchala, the chiefe Caſtle of Muſtaffa the Georgian, and burning with the deſire of reuenge of thoſe loſſes, (which he thought himſelf to haue receiued by the treacherie of Muſtaffa) or, as ſome thought, ſeeking by this meanes to make Amurath beleeue, that in truth all the forepaſſed miſchiefes had hapned not through their cowardiſe, but through the treacherous and malitious deuices of the Georgian, and ſo to make their receiued loſſes ſeem more pardonable: he deuiſed with himſelfe how to finde out ſuch a plot, as that Muſtaffa might vpon the ſudden be taken away, as guilty of ſo foule a treaſon. And that he had deuiſed, was in this ſort: To call a Councell into his owne Pauilion, as if hee had receiued ſome commandement from the Court; and hauing cauſed Muſtaffa to come into that roome, whileſt the ſaid counterfeit commandment ſhould be in reading, to cauſe his lieutenant with thoſe chief of his band that ſtood about him, to fall vpon him and preſently to cut off his head. This pretended Councell was accordingly called; wherein ſate the Baſſa himſelfe, and with him the Baſſa of Caraemit, certaine Sanzackes ſubiect to the Iuriſdiction of Erzirum, the Capagi Baſſa or chiefe Gentleman Vſher, and the Generals lieutenant, with whom hee had vpon their ſolemne oaths for ſecrecie, communicated his intended deceit. The Georgian Muſtaffa was alſo called accordingly: who

A both becauſe he was loued of moe than one, and had alſo vſed all diligent circumſpection, but eſpecially hauing heard in the army ſome priuy whiſperings of ſuch a matter, knew full wel of all that was deuiſed againſt him, and therfore prouided alſo for his own defence. But as touching his going to the Councel, he thought he might not deny ſo to do, leſt by his abſence he might ſeem guilty of the fault, wherof he was (peraduenture not without cauſe) ſuſpected; and therby to leaue his cities for a prey to the enemy, now in the heart of his Country. And therfore reſoluing to go, he deuiſed how ſo to do with moſt ſafety; and ſo, as if need ſhould be, he might be able to turn the miſchief intended againſt him, vpon the head of the General himſelf. And therfore hauing choſen out fifty of his moſt faithful and reſolute ſoldiers, he commanded them to follow him to the Councel appointed in the Generals pauilion; B and being come thither, to ſtay there ready and attentiue at his firſt and one only cal, ſuddenly and forcibly to thruſt into the pauilion with their weapons, and rather than any wrong ſhould be don vnto him, to ſhew their valor againſt the Turks, without exception of any perſon whatſoeuer. Theſe men by nature enemies to the Turks, vnderſtanding well his meaning, ſetled themſelues vpon the execution, and taking vnto them ſome other alſo of their faithfull and truſty friends, followed him euen to the pauilion of Mahamet: where Muſtaffa entring the place of counſel, deſired of the General to know what his pleaſure was. Who preſently cauſed the counterfeit commandement to be read; wherunto Muſtaffa gaue an attentiue ear. But when the other Baſſa's and Sanzacks began to ſit down (contrary to the manner of the Turks, who whenſoeuer any commandement from the Emperor is in reading, vſe alwaies to ſtand vp C and not to ſit down vntil it be ful read) the Georgian took his leaue, promiſing to be euer ready to perform not only that order of the Kings, but alſo whatſoeuer els he ſhould command. And being about to depart, the Capigi Baſſi or great Vſher of Mahamet came vnto him, and plucking him by the ſleeue, would haue forced him to ſit down. Then Muſtaffa crying aloud drew his ſword, wherwith he ſtrook Mahamets lieutenant, that was right againſt him; and hauing with his left hand wrought the roll from his pate, with his right hand ſuddenly (to the great aſtoniſhment of all that were there preſent) at one only blow parted his head, his necke, and his breſt in twain euen to his very ſtomack; ſo that he died (a ſtrange ſpectacle to behold) being thus cut in ſunder, with his cleft head and two ſhoulders hanging down vpon their ſeueral ſides. After this firſt he redoubled his ſecond ſtroke, aiming at the head of the Baſſa of D Caraemit: but it being defended with the wrythen rolls of the turbant, it ſlipped down by his ear; yet ſo, that with a piece of the ſaid turbant it carried his ear quite away, with a little alſo of the fleſh of his cheek: and all inraged, eagerly aſſailed Mahamet Baſſa the General (who now all in confuſion was riſen vp in the tumult) and wounded him with fiue mortal wounds, which were yet afterward by cunning hand healed, when they had brought him euen to deaths door. At the cry of this Georgian al his people ruſht in together vpon whoſe confuſed tumult, and the fear that Muſtaffa through his fury had ſtrook into the Turks, the camp was preſently raiſed, and euery man with all ſpeed departing thence, put himſelfe on his way toward Chars; whither alſo were brought the two wounded Baſſa's, and the reſt that were il handled & much ſcared with theſe ſudden and vncoth ſtirs.

Muſtaffa notably reuenged vpon Mahamet

E Of all this treachery intended againſt him, Muſtaffa ſent preſent information to the Turkiſh Emperor, finding himſelf greatly agrieued at the falſe ſuſpition that Mahamet had vniuſtly conceiued againſt him, to his great diſhonor: and wrought ſo cunningly, that Amurath in token of his good liking and contentment, ſent him both cloth of gold, and a battel-ax all gilt. Mahamet on the other ſide intermedling here and there with all the art he poſſibly could deuiſe, all hateful and iniurious termes, ſent large aduertiſements of all the misfortunes that had hapned, and aggrauated to the King, both the treacheries of Muſtaffa, and alſo the ſlender ſecurity of thoſe waies and countries.

As ſoon as Amurath vnderſtood the calamity of his ſouldiers, the loſſe of his money, the great diſhonour of his people, and the apparant danger wherin the fort of Teflis ſtood, when F it was like to be abandoned; all inflamed with rage and anger he called vnto him the Baſſa's of his court (among whom ſate as chief the proud and hauty Sinan) and rated them al exceedingly; reprouing their lewd counſel, and recounting the loſſes that he had from time to time receiued, as if they had hapned through their defaults. And eſpecially Sinan, as the principall occaſion of all theſe miſchiefs: who like an improuident fool (as he ſaid) would needs relin-quiſh the charge of his army, and like a king ſit idle at Conſtantinople, ſtanding as it were at ſome publique triumph, to behold and heare the miſeries and miſfortunes of others, hauing G before in the time that Muſtapha was General, vainly boaſted, with the like power that he had, to fetch the Perſian king out of Casbin, and to deliuer him in bonds to Amurath; but had indeed performed nothing worth the remembrance. Sinan could do no leſſe but make anſwer to the wrathful King, yet not with ſuch mildneſſe and modeſty as he ſhould in ſuch a caſe peraduenture haue done, but in proud and peremptory manner, without any reuerence or regard told him plainly, That as the laſt year a little before his return to Conſtantinople, ſuccours had bin conueied to Teflis without any loſſe or trouble (as in truth they were) euen ſo had they bin this year alſo, if he had put his aduice in execution, as much as he deſpiſed and contemned it; for he did then giue him to vnderſtand, That Mahamet-Baſſa could not be a fit man H for ſo great a charge; and that it was neceſſary to haue choſen in his room ſome other Captain of valor and diſcretion. But ſeeing he would needs make choice of the ſame vnfit man, he was not now to blame any other for this errour, but only himſelfe. As for his comming to Conſtantinople, it was a thing long before thought moſt needful, not only for his aduice, how the matter of peace might be brought to ſome good pas, but alſo becauſe if that treaty came not to the deſired iſſue, then he had to talk with him how he might compas the ouerthrow of his enemy: which thing as yet he had no fit time to declare vnto him, but was now ready to reueal it, if it were ſo his pleaſure. Wonderfully was Amurath grieued with this ſullen anſwer, when he conſidered that a ſlaue of his own ſhould ſo arrogantly and manifeſtly reproue him of folly and improuidence. Notwithſtanding being deſirous to know of him what that ſecret I and important matter was, which he had to reueal vnto him for the eaſie compaſſing of his commenced enterpriſe; he diſſembled his diſcontentment conceiued againſt him, and commanded him to diſcloſe thoſe his deuices which he had to vtter. Sinan in brief, of all his aduices propounded theſe two things: firſt his counſel was, not to proceed in this war as hitherto they had don, by ſeeking with forts and fortreſſes to hold and keep the enemies countries; for that their treaſures were not able to yeeld ſuch ſtore of money as were ſufficient to maintain ſo many and ſo great garriſons; contrary to the opinion of Muſtapha (of late dead) who with great pertinacy had perſuaded that dangerous, chargeable, and difficult manner of War.

His ſecond aduice was, That the true means to bring this war to wiſhed end, conſiſted eſpecially in the reſolution of Amurath himſelf, who if he would go in perſon, & againſt ſo great K a king oppoſe the perſon of a king, then might he moſt aſſuredly promiſe to himſelf all ſpeedy and honorable victory, for that at the only name of his comming the Perſians would eaſily come to any agreement; or if not, he might then proceed in his wars, and ſo obtain moſt glorious conqueſts. This his aduice ſo little pleaſed the effeminat king, that in ſtead of the great opinion which he before held of him, he now conceiued an enuious affection againſt him: & a further ſuſpition (foſtred by the great ladies of the court, eſpecially Amuraths mother) That Sinan had thus counſelled the king, himſelf to go in perſon, not for any good could come of it, but only that ſo he might finde meanes for the prince his ſon to make himſelf king, and to driue out his father. Which ſuſpition was in ſuch ſort nouriſhed in Amuraths mind, eſpecially being aſſured of the great affection which the prince caried toward Sinan, and he alſo toward L him, that he reſolued to rid him out of his ſight, and ſo depriuing him of all charge preſently baniſhed him the court, & out of Conſtantinople to Demotica a city of Thrace; from whence he afterwards by moſt humble ſupplication obtained to be remoued to Marmara a little beyond Selymbria. And into his place of Viſierſhip was preferred Sciaus Baſſa, who had maried Amuraths ſiſter; an Hungarian born, a goodly perſonage, and of honorable iudgement, but aboue all men a ſeller of juſtice and preferments, and yet a great friend to the peace with the Chriſtian princes, which Sinan had alwaies moſt wickedly maligned.

Sciaus Baſſa made Viſier in Sinans place.

1582.

The Perſian Captaines in the mean time, with their ſpoyles and diuers of the enemies Enſignes, were with great ioy and triumph receiued at home in Perſia. But when the diſcord that fell out between Mahamet Baſſa and Muſtaffa the Georgian was alſo reported, the former M ioy was redoubled; euery man in generall being of opinion, That theſe diſcords might bee great impediments vnto the Turks further attempts into Perſia; which it was much feared they would the next year attempt, to the great danger of Naſſivan & Tauris. Vpon which occaſions the Perſian king perceiuing he could not haue a fitter opportunity to imploy himſelf againſt

Mahomet the Perſian King reſolueth to go to Heri againſt his ſonne Abas Mirize.

A againſt Abas Mirize his ſon (then with him in diſgrace) determined with himſelf to leaue the matters on this ſide of his kingdom in their preſent ſtate, and to march toward Heri. Wherunto he was earneſtly ſolicited by his eldeſt ſon Emir Hamze Mirize, but eſpecially by Mirize Salmas his Viſier. Vpon which reſolution, committing the defence of Reiuan, Naſſiuan, and that ſide of his kingdom to Emir Chan gouernor of Tauris; hee ſet forward himſelf with his army towards Casbin, and ſo marching thorow diuers prouinces, arriued at length at Saſuar, being on that ſide the chief of all the cities ſubiect to the juriſdiction of Heri: which city he took by force, & without delay cauſed the gouernor therof to be beheaded, although he aledged a thouſand excuſes for himſelf, and obiected a thouſand accuſations more againſt the ſeditious Viſier. The King after this departing thence, and hauing alſo put to death certaine B captains and Sultans, that were accuſed by the Viſier to be confederats in the rebellion of his ſon, he arriued at laſt at the deſired city of Heri. Very ſtrong is this City by ſcituation, compaſſed about with a good wall, and watered with deep chanels of running ſprings, conueyed into it by Tamerlane their founder or reſtorer. Beſides that, there were in it many valiant captains, enemies to Mirize Salmas, ready to lay down their liues in defence of themſelues and of Abas their Lord; ſo that the winning therof could not but proue both long and difficult. So ſoon as the King approched the city, he felt in himſelf many troubled paſſions ariſing of grief and pitty; it grieued him to think that he ſhould beget ſo graceles a ſon, who in ſtead of maintaining his ſtate and honour, ſhould ſeek his ruin and deſtruction. It grieued him alſo to remember the bloud of his ſubjects, before ſpilt vpon ſo ſtrange an occaſion; and ſcarſly durſt C he enter into the cogitation, thenceforth to ſhed any more of the bloud of his people. Neuertheles being ſtil more and more ſolicited by his Viſier, he attempted to vnderſtand the mind of his ſon, and if it might be poſſible, to get him into his hands. But while the king trauelling with theſe thoughts lay with his army before Heri, Abas Mirize in the mean time writ diuers letters to his father and his brother; wherin he beſought them, That they would make known vnto him the occaſion of this their ſtir: for if deſire of rule had mooued them to ſeek the depriuation of him, being their ſon and brother, from the honor he lawfully poſſeſſed, & which his father himſelf procured for him of his grandfather Tamas, they ought to abandon their imagination, for that he was alwaies ready to ſpend his wealth and his bloud, together with his eſtate, in their ſeruice, and acknowledge his father to be his good father and King. But if D they were not induced herunto for this cauſe, but by a deſire they had to reuenge ſome treſpaſſes that he had committed, to the preiudice of the crown of Perſia, or his fathers honor, he was moſt ready to ſubmit himſelf to any amends, and with all reaſon to yeeld vnto them the kingdom, yea the whole world, and euen his own life, the rather to ſatisfie their minds with a more ful contentation. With twice or thrice reading ouer, were theſe affectionat letters conſidered and digeſted; and at laſt, both the father and brother perceiuing in them ſuch liberality of words, and ouercome with pitty, or if not with pitty, yet with great admiration and contentment, they determined to put the matter in practiſe; and moderating their deſire of reuenge, to attempt to reduce the yong mans mind to ſome good paſſe. Wherupon they wrot back vnto him, That no greedy deſire to vſurp his gouernment had induced them to make ſo E great a voyage, to trouble ſo much people, and to ſhed ſuch abundance of bloud; but only his diſobedience and preſumption, in that he had cauſed himſelf to be called the King of Perſia, and had not ſent ſo much as one captain to aid them in the late wars againſt the Turks. Glad was Abas the yong prince, when he vnderſtood the accuſations that were laid againſt him; hoping to make it manifeſt before all men, how the King and his brother were miſ informed in theſe particularities: and therfore incontinently did write back vnto them, That if they would faithfully promiſe him, honorably and without any outrage to receiue his Embaſſadours, hee would ſend them ſuch euident matter, and ſo cleer information touching thoſe his accuſations, as that they ſhould not onely plainely perceiue that there was neuer any ſuch kinde of thought in him, but alſo that he had alwaies deſired and labored the contrary; & would moreouer F open vnto them ſuch matter, as in reſpect of other men, and not of himſelf, might cauſe their comming to proue profitable & commodious to all the kingdom of Perſia. Which his requeſt they both ſolemnly promiſed faithfully to performe, beeing very deſirous to vnderſtand what thoſe ſtrange nouelties ſhould be. Whereupon Abas Mirize ſent vnto them two of his chief counſellors, men of great account and reuerence both for their years and wiſdom, Mahomet commeth to Heri.

Abas Mirize by his Embaſſadors purged of treaſon.

The Embaſſadors of Abas accuſe Mirize Salmas the Viſier.

with full inſtructions, who after many ſpeeches, in the end ſwearing (according to their Cuſtome) by the Creator that ſpread out the aire, that founded the earth vpon the deeps, that adorned the heauen with ſtars, that poured abroad the water, that made the water; and briefly, of nothing, brought forth all things, ſwearing by the head of Ali, and by the religion of their Prophet Mahomet, that ſuch peruerſe thoughts neuer entred into the head of Abas Mirize: they alledged many teſtimonies and manifeſt proofes, that moſt loyally in all due time, as well when he was aduanced to the kingdome of Perſia, as alſo in his battels againſt the Turks, his ſon had alwaies cauſed deuout prayers and ſupplications to be made to God for his proſperitie; neither euer deſired to heare any other but happy and fortunat ſucceſſe of him. They brought with them 10000 and 1000 precepts and loyall letters, which the young man had cauſed to be written, as occaſions required to the Gouernours that were his ſubiects, for the gouernment of the State, wherin he neuer named himſelfe king of Perſia, but only, Your King and Gouernor of Heri. They prayed the king alſo, to cauſe a diligent proceſſe to be framed againſt his ſon; and if there ſhould be found in him any ſign or ſhadow of ſo wicked a ſuſpition, then to take from him his eſtate and liberty; offring themſelues to remaine as hoſtages for him. But when all this ſhould be done, and Abas found altogether free from theſe vniuſt accuſations, then (falling euen to the earth and kiſſing it) they beſought him, and as it were coniured him, not to leaue the matter thus imperfect, to the preiudice of his bloud; but returning to his counſellor, to take information likewiſe, vpon what mind and conſideration he had aduiſed the King, to take vpon him this vnorderly and dangerous voyage; where no doubt hee ſhould find nothing in him but malignant, ambitious, and wicked affections; and ſuch as euen deſerued, that with his bloud there ſhould be reuenged all the bloud of thoſe, which till that hour had bin brought to their vnworthy & vndeſerued deaths. And foraſmuch as nothing remained, wherof the Viſier had informed the king againſt his ſon, but the commandement that was giuen by Abas Mirize to the Gouernours vnder him, That they ſhould not go to the wars againſt the Turks: they confeſſed in truth, that ſuch an order was taken, but not to that wicked and traiterous end and purpoſe as was reported to the king by his great counſellor, but onely in reſpect of an inuaſion iuſtly feared in thoſe quarters by the Tartarian Ieſſelbas; who by diuers inrodes had alreadie don great harm in the country about Heri, and put young Abas and his counſellors in ſuch a feare, that they durſt not diſfurniſh their Cities of their guards and forces: and therfore had commanded the ſaid Gouernours, not to go to war againſt the Turks, but to ſtay and expect further direction. And that all this was by writing ſignified vnto the Viſier himſelfe: which he of a malicious mind had concealed, only to try, if in theſe common troubles he could bring to paſſe, that Abas Mirize and the king might be taken away, & Emir Hamze ſucceed in his place, and ſo he himſelf remain the Superintendent of his ſon in law, and Moderator of that ſo famous kingdom. Of which ſo treacherous a purpoſe, they (for all that) thought Emir Hamze the young Prince altogether ignorant (knowing his honourable diſpoſition and loue towards his owne kindred) but imputed it only to the immoderat and ambitious deſire of the wicked traitor Mirize Salmas.

Of theſe graue ſpeeches of the Embaſſadors, Mahamet the father (by nature credulous) began to make great conſtruction; and deeply to conſider of their ſo earneſt and important requeſts; which ſeemed vnto him ſo vpright and equall, as that he could not chuſe but hearken vnto the ſame. And therefore calling vnto him the Gouernors, the Captaines, the Iudges, and Treaſurers of all the cities that were ſubiect to Heri: he demanded of them, how and in what ſort they eſteemed of Abas Mirize, and in what degree of honour he deſired to be eſteemed of them: and of them all receiued one anſwer, That they held him for their Lord & lieutenant to the king of Caſbin, and that himſelfe had alwaies deſired to be ſo taken and thought of: for proofe whereof, euery one of them brought in diuers letters, precepts, and orders; wherein he neuer cauſed himſelf to be honored with any other title, but only, Your king of Heri. He demanded further, Whether any ſuch warres were attempted by the Tartarian Ieſſelbas or not: whereof he receiued a large and ſolemne information, that ſo it was, to the great detriment of all thoſe territories. And thus the king was throughly perſuaded of the innocencie of his ſon; who before was noted vnto him by his Viſier, to be an obſtinat Rebel. Vpon which occaſion only, although he might iuſtly haue put him to death, as author of ſo great troubles & bloodſhed; yet becauſe he would be better inform'd of the truth of the accuſations laid againſt him by

A by the Embaſſadours, he reſolued to make a curious & diligent inquiſition thereof: and therfore firſt of all in great ſecrecie he examined Emir Aamze his eldeſt ſonne, wherefore he had aduiſed this journy againſt his brother Hbas, whom he had found guiltles of all thoſe crimes that were obiected againſt him? Whereunto the Prince anſwered, That he had no other certaintie of the pretended euill behauiour of his brother, but only that which proceeded from the great credit that he alwaies gaue to his father in law Mirize Salmas, to whom as to a chief Counſellor, his father in law, and protector of the Kingdome, he had alwaies yeelded aſſured credence: and ſo diſcharged the whole tempeſts of all thoſe miſchiefes vpon the Viſier. Touching whom the King made diligent inquiſition, as well among thoſe of the Court, as of the army; and therby found him guilty of all that the Embaſſadors of Heri had accuſed him: and B that being alwaies acquainted with the true occaſions which reſtrained the Gouernours of Heri (ſubiect to Abas Mirize) from going to the war againſt the Turks, he had moſt maliciouſly concealed the ſame, of purpoſe to hatch ſuch a ſtrange and dangerous diſcontentment, as had wrought the vnworthy death of many great men, and almoſt defiled the hands of the father with the innocent bloud of his guiltleſſe ſon. For which ſo foule a treaſon the falſe Viſier was worthily condemned to die, and his wily head by commandment of the King, ſtrucke from his carkaſſe. Iuſtly rewarded, with the ſame puniſhment which he vniuſtly ſought to haue conuerted vpon others; and with his own deſtruction pacified the diſſention and battels that were riſen between the two Princes. And ſo the two brethren being reconciled together, and the ſon to the father; after that Abas had again promiſed his wiſhed obedience (which he C afterwards moſt dutifully performed) King Mahamet returned with the Prince towards Caſbin: where by reaſon of new and vnexpected motions of the Turks, he had now been long looked for and deſired.

Mirize Salmas beheaded for treaſon.

Amurath through the rough ſpeeches of Sinan, was more and more ſetled in his purpoſe for the continuing of the Perſian warre; accounting it ſo much the more to his owne glory, as it ſhould in happy ſucceſſe fall out contrary to the opinion of many: and therupon began to bethinke himſelfe, whom he might chuſe for his Generall, to whom he might commit ſo great a charge. Among the Baſſa's of the court there was one Ferat, a man of ripe yeres, but yet fierce of courage, tough of opinion, in counſell as hardy as might beſeeme his age, ready for all ſudden & ſtrange aduentures, but aboue all, a vaſſall moſt deuoted to the king: of this man, at laſt D he was reſolued to make choice to haue the leading of his army: and therefore calling him apart, declared vnto him what he had in himſelf purpoſed; incouraging him to take the charge vpon him, with a firm reſolution to perform all things anſwerable to ſo worthy an enterpriſe, with the opinion he had conceiued of his valor. Very willing did Ferat accept of this new office; and thought himſelf (as indeed he was) highly fauored by the King: and thereupon made him a large promiſe, to imploy his ſtrength, his wit, and vttermoſt deuoire, to put in execution whatſoeuer ſhould be offered vnto him, either by occaſion, or by his royall commandement.

Ferat Baſſa choſen Generall in Sinans place

At firſt Amurath had no other purpoſe to imploy him any further, but only to aſſure the paſſage to Teflis, and ſo into all Georgia; and to haue deſtroied the countrey of Muſtaffa the Georgian, who had ſo audaciouſly iniured the lieutenant of Amurath, and put his whole army E in confuſion: but being certainly aduertiſed of the troubles in Perſia between the king & his ſonne, he changed his purpoſe, and commanded Ferat to imploy all his forces to erect a fortreſſe at Reiuan, a place belonging to Tocomac, and to aſſure the paſſage from Chars to Reiuan; for ſo they ſhould be reuenged of many harms they had receiued by him, and lay open the way to the city of Tauris, to the great glory of Amurath. As for Muſtaffa the Georgian, although he had well deſerued to be chaſtiſed for his raſh attempt againſt Mahamet Baſſa, being then his Generall, yet he willed Ferat to diſſemble his euill opinion of him; and (if it were poſſible) ſo to work, as to vſe him as an inſtrument to conuey treaſure and ſuccors to Teflis: for by this means the paſſage being made ſafe, all Georgia would without any moe fortreſſes be ſubdued, and then the next yeare they might attempt the enterpriſe for Tauris.

F Highly did Ferat commend the deuices of Amurath his Lord, and ſhewed himſelfe ready for any attempt. And ſo the time being come wherin it behoued them to ſet on foot their important deſignements, in the beginning of the yeare, 1583, commandements were ſent out to al the cities of the empire, which were wont to make their appearance at theſe wars, that vpon freſh ſummons they ſhould be ready to return againſt the Perſians; and to put in execution that ſhould be injoined them by their new General. The fame whereof flew as far as Siria, Iury, Paleſtine, Meſopotamia, Babylon, to Balſara, to Sivas, to Maras, to all Bithynia, Capadocia, Cilicia, Armenia; yea & beyond Conſtantinople to the borders of Hungary and Græce, and in brief, to all the regions that were wont to come to this war: all which ſent their captains and ſoldiers accordingly. And ſo at laſt General Ferat departing from Conſtantinople, & paſſing ouer to Scutari, by the way of Amaſia and Sivas came to Erzirum, where he took a view of all his armor & prouiſion; and from thence in eight days ariued at Chars, conducted by the Perſian fugitiue Maxut Chan; and from Chars ſet himſelf on his way toward Reivan. Three days before he came to Reivan, of certain ruins of an old caſtle which the Turks cal Aggia Chalaſi (or the caſtle of Strangers) he erected a new fortres, and left in it a Gariſon of 400 ſouldiers, with a Sanzack and certain pieces of Ordnance; and then went to Reivan. This country is diſtant from Tauris eight or nine days journy; betweene which two places is ſcituat Naſſivan, Chiulfal, Marant and Sofian; all inriched with goodly gardens and pleaſant greens. But in the way are many craggy mountains to be climed, and ſundry hard paſſages either for Army or traueller.

Generall Ferat departeth from Conſtantinople

He buildeth a great fort at Reivan.

Here then did Ferat incamp himſelf with his Army, and taking aduice of his chiefe Captains, where he ſhould build the fort, they all with one conſent aduiſed him to ſeiſe vpon the houſes and gardens of Tocomac, and there to fortifie. Which he accordingly did, incloſing the gardens with ſtrong walls and deep Ditches round about, wherinto he conueyed water from a certain riuer, that comming down from the mountains ran into Araxis. Which worke he performed with ſuch expedition, that within the ſpace of 15 days the fortres was finiſhed, being in circuit ſeuen hundred and fifty yards. It grieued Tocomac exceedingly, thus to loſe his country and dwelling, and ſo much the more, for that it hapned ſo ſuddenly, and as it were vnlooked for. He himſelf, as ſoon as he vnderſtood that the Turkiſh army was comming vnto that coaſt, hauing withdrawn himſelf and his men of War out of the City he could not keep, ſought by all means to be reuenged, if not altogether, yet in ſome part, of this ſo great an injury: and therfore he writ to the king at Chorazan, to Emir Chan at Tauris, to Simon in Georgia; he gathered ſoldiers out of the villages, and vſed all his poſſible indeauor to inable himſelf to anoy the enemies army. But from none of theſe places could he receiue any helpe; the King being ſo far off in wars againſt his ſon, the Georgian being buſied, by hindring any reliefe to be brought to the beſieged in Teflis: as for Emir Chan (who by ſolemn promiſe vnto the King before his departure to Heri, had vndertaken the defence of that ſide of the kingdome againſt the Turks) he either would not or could not ſtir, nor ſent ſo much as one ſouldier, hauing (as ſome ſuppoſed) ſecret intelligence with General Ferat, not to diſturb him in this his Worke. So Tocomac deſtitute of all other help, and not able to do much himſelf againſt ſo mighty an enemy; yet ceaſed not to lay ſuch priuy ambuſhes for the Turks as he could, killing of them ſomtime 100, ſomtime 150, and ſomtimes moe, as they fell into his danger. And to eaſe his ſtomack againſt Emir Chan (who ſitting ſtil at Tauris as it were to behold his miſerie, would not ſo much as ſhake a ſword againſt theſe ſpoiling Turks) he ſpared not to diſpatch certain horſmen in haſt to the king at Chorazan, and by eloquent letters to amplifie the cowardiſe of Emir Chan; intermedling withall ſome cauſes of ſuſpition that he had intelligence with the Turkiſh General.

Ferat hauing thus built this new fort at Reivan, as Amurath had commanded, and furniſhed it with artillery and all other things needful for defence therof, appointed Sinan Baſſa (the ſon of Cicala Baſſa a Renegat of Genoa, whom Selymus the late Emperour in the flour of his youth created Aga or Captain of the Ianizaries) with a garriſon of 8000 ſoldiers to keep the ſame. And ſo departing thence by the way of Aggia Chalaſi, in ten days arriued with his Army at Chars.

Ferat had not long ſtayd at Chars, but ſtrange news were brought thither, That Muſtaffa the Georgian (to whom Amurath had ſent thirty thouſand ducats by two of his Capigi and two of his Chiaus, to haue by him bin conueyed to Teflis for the relief of them in the Fort) was reuolted from the Turkiſh obedience, and being now become a Rebel, had left that fortreſſe in moſt manifeſt danger to yeeld, if by ſome other means it were not relieued. Which ſtrange nouelties exceedingly troubled the General; who to know the certaintie therof, called before him all ſuch as were the meſſengers of this misfortune. By whom he was certainly informed, That Muſtaffa, the two Capigi, and the Chiaus, hauing put themſelues vpon their way toward Teflis with the treaſure, garded with a conuoy of 500 of his ſoldiers, in the mid way had met with his couſin Simon the Georgian, by whom he was perſuaded to return to his antient faith and religion (which he had to the great peril of his ſoul ſo prophanely abandoned) and to ſhake off the ſeruice of Amurath, which would yeeld him no other recompence than an hateful and infamous captiuitie, and in the end ſome fraudulent and treacherous death. And that his perſuaſions had ſo preuailed with Muſtaffa, that he cauſed the two Capigi and the Chiaus to be apprehended and preſently beheaded, and diuiding the treaſure with his ſaid couſin, had with him and his other kinſmen vowed a ſolemne and perpetual confederacie: and ſo hauing withdrawn themſelues to their wonted paſſages, lay there in wait for ſuch ſuccours as ſhould by the Turks be brought to Teflis.

When Ferat vnderſtood theſe and ſuch other particularities, he all in a fury ſwore, that he would not return to Erzirum til he had put all the Country of Muſtaffa to fire and ſword. Yet firſt he thought it needfull to relieue Teflis, which otherwiſe would be in danger to yeeld to the enemy: and for that purpoſe made choice of Haſſan Baſſa, who in the laſt year of the Generalſhip of Muſtapha had moſt couragiouſly conueied the like ſuccors, and taken Aliculi Chan. Vnto him therfore did the Generall aſſigne forty thouſand Ducats, with other prouiſion neceſſary for that ſeruice; and for the more ſecurity appointed him fifteen thouſand of the moſt choice and valiant ſouldiers of his whole Army, to conduct the ſame. In ten dayes ſpace Haſſan Baſſa went and came from Teflis, hauing in his journey to and fro had many skirmiſhes with the Georgians, wherin he loſt ſome few of his men, without any further loſſe worth remembrance.

After this, the General ſent one Reſuan Baſſa with ſix thouſand ſouldiers to ſpoil the Country of Muſtaffa the Georgian the late Renegate, but now become a Rebel to the Turk. Which Reſuan without any long ſtay ouer-ran all his territory, burnt his towns, and committed moſt vncouth outrages, which extended euen vnto the inſencible trees, and caried away with him many captiue ſouls, with much Corn and Cattell, like a raging tempeſt deſtroying whatſoeuer came in his way. Now was the General alſo retyred to Ardachan, whither came Reſuan to meet him with his aforeſaid booty. But becauſe they had now performed what they before intended, and the approch of Winter perſuaded their return, they remoued from Ardachan, and by the way of Olti retyred to Erzirum; from whence all the ſouldiers were licenſed to depart to their ſeueral places of abode, and a memorial ſent to Amurath, of all the actions had bin performed, and eſpecially of the good ſeruice don by Haſſan Baſſa: Who for the ſame was now once again honored by the King with cloath of gold, a battel-ax and Targuet all gilt.

Ferat breaketh vp his Army.

About this time one Podolovius a gentleman of Polonia, ſent by Stephen king of Polonia to Conſtantinople, by the leaue of Amurath to buy certain horſes in Anatolia; returning homeward with 24 goodly horſes which he had bought, was notwithſtanding the great Turks Paſſe by his commandement ſtaid vpon the way, all his men (in number 34) ſlain, except one boy, who getting into a Wood eſcaped; and Podolovius his head ſtruck off. The horſes brought back to Conſtantinople, were by the appointment of Amurath, ſome beſtowed into his owne ſtables, and the reſt giuen amongſt the Baſſa's, oftentimes pointed at with the fingers of the Turks, in deriſion of the King of Polonia. This injurie Amurath commanded to be don in reuenge of an outrage don by the Polonian Coſſacks againſt the Turks: whereof news was but euen then brought to the court.

The 29 of Nouember, An. 1583, died Hana Chadam, the widow of the late Emperor Selymus the ſecond, and Amuraths mother, who lieth buried by her husband Selymus, and his fiue ſons, ſtrangled by their brother Amurath.

All the reſt of this year 1583 Ferat ſpent at Erzirum, and afterwards ſent out his ordinarie commandements to all the accuſtomed cities, to ſummon the ſoldiers againſt the next ſpring in the year 1584, gathering together a greater number of pioners and enginiers than euer had bin gathered in theſe Wars heretofore: and withall gaue it out, That he would go to Naſſivan, and there do great matters. At which report the Perſians were much moued, and began gan to caſt many things in their heads about it:but aboue al others the King, who vnderſtanding at Casbin of all that had before hapned at Reivan, and of the new preparations of the Turks,began to fear that they would this year paſſe to Tauris,or at leaſtwiſe (as was reported) to Naſſivan,and in thoſe places build new fortreſſes,to the great danger of the Perſian empire. And therfore retaining ſtil ſuch forces as he brought with him from Heri, and commanding as many moe as he could out of all the cities that were ſubiect vnto him, to follow him vnto Tauris,he arriued there with his army not long after the ariual of Ferat Baſſa at Erzirum. This vnexpected comming of the Perſian King with ſo great an army to Tauris, filled the World with expectation of great matters to haue bin don by him againſt the Turks: inſomuch that Ferat the general,before he would proceed any further,thought it good to aduertiſe Amurath of the matter:declaring vnto him,that his deſire was to go to Naſſivan, and there to build a fortreſſe,according to his commandement,and ſo to lay open a paſſage to Tauris. But hauing certain intelligence,that the Perſian king was come to Tauris with a huge army,and ful reſolution to incounter him; he thought it his duty not to put in execution his aforeſaid determination,without his expres commandment. To whom Amurath preſently wrot back,that the matter ſo ſtanding,he ſhould not go to Naſſivan,but only imploy his forces to aſſure the paſſages to Tomanis and Lori,that ſo the fort of Teflis might the year following be relieued by ſome ſmall band,without ſending any great army for the conueying of ſuccors thither. This new commandement of his Lord Ferat kept ſecret to himſelf, cauſing the rumor of his going to Naſſivan to be more and more increaſed; of purpoſe to nouriſh the opinion that the Perſians had before conceiued of his comming thither: and ſo deluding them, with leſſe danger to build the forts he had intended, for the quieting of thoſe moſt dangerous paſſages of Lori and Tomanis.

Vpon this reſolution Ferat hauing gathered together his people,with all things neceſſary for his purpoſe,remoued with his army from Erzirum towards Chars,where he ſtaid ten days to take a new ſuruey both of his ſouldiers and prouiſion. And ſo departing thence,ſet forward toward Lori; ſending before him Haſſan Baſſa with fiue thouſand light horſemen to ſcour the Country euen to Tomanis, and to learn what he poſſibly could of the enemies purpoſes,and of the ſtate of Georgia. Which thing Haſſan dutifully performed,ſpeedily ſcouring ouer all the woods,and diſcloſing all the paſſages from thence to Lori, and ſo to Tomanis,not meeting with any vpon whom to aſſay his valour:only certain Robbers vpon the highway,whom he cauſed to be ſlain,as men altogether ignorant of the Georgian and Perſian affairs,and their heads to be ſet vpon the tops of their launces; and ſo returned again to Lori, Where hauing ſtayd one day he met with the Generall, to whom he recounted all that had hapned in that excurſion. Ferat being come to Lori,there incamped his Army. This place did ſomtime belong to Simon the Georgian,wel ſtrengthned with an high caſtle, compaſſed about with very deep Ditches,and a thick Wall almoſt a mile in circuit, but was then ſomewhat weakned with time. It is diſtant from Teflis about two daies journy of a Cariers pace. Vpon this Caſtle Ferat ſeiſed,and hauing repaired the Walls, and ſtrengthned the breaches, he placed therin Ali Baſſa of Greece, with ſeuen thouſand ſouldiers for the defence therof, and planted vpon the Walls two hundred ſmall pieces of Ordnance. And ſo when he had ſet all things there in good order, he departed thence with his Army towards Tomanis, hauing before commanded Ali Baſſa at ſome conuenient time to fortifie Saitan Chalaſi (a Caſtle about ten miles diſtant from Lori) and therin to place a conuenient garriſon of ſouldiers and Artillery.

Ferat builds a fort vpon the ſtreit.

Four daies were they going from Lori to Tomanis, being ordinarily but one daies worke from the one place to the other:but now the General would needs ſo make it,to take the ſpoil of thoſe rich fields,abounding with corn,cattel, and fruit, and to leaue to the country people a lamentable remembrance of his being there. At laſt being come to Tomanis,(in times paſt a Caſtle of Symons, but by reaſon of theſe Wars by him then abandoned) he began to conſult with the other Captains, how and where the Fort ſhould be erected for the aſſurance of that country. But after many diſcourſes,it was at laſt concluded not to fortifie in that caſtle,as being too far from the ſtreit,to make that dangerous paſſage ſafe & ſecure,but to go a little farther, and to build a Fortreſſe vpon the very mouth of the ſtreit. So the Army marching forward a few miles,at the very entrance of the narrow paſſage found the ruins of another caſtle, and

A and neer therunto ſtaid themſelues. This ſteep headlong caſtle was ſo compaſſed round about with a thicke wood, which hindred all diſcouery afar off, that it was not conuenient to ſound ſuch a caſtle there, from whence their Ordnance could neither auaile them to whom the defence thereof ſhould bee committed, neither indamage thoſe that ſhould come to offend it. And therefore the Generall commanded, that euery man with all his endeauors ſhould lay to his hand for the cutting down of that thicke wood, and making way through thicke and thin, to lay it for an open champaign, that was before the receptacle of a thouſand dangerous treacheries. In very ſhort ſpace were the trees laid along on the ground, the place made lightſome and open, and a very commodious ſcituation prepared for the foundation of a caſtle. The plot of the old ruined Caſtle was compaſſed about with a wall of a thouſand and ſeuen hundred B yards, and in the midſt therof was erected a ſtrong Keep, ſundry lodgings and chambers builded, and 200 pieces of Ordnance diſtributed vpon the new wals. After that, the Generall ſent Reſuan Baſſa and the Baſſa of Caraemit, with 20000 of his moſt choice ſouldiers, to conuey ſuccors to Teflis: who marching cloſely together in the direct way, in one day arriued at the ſaid Fort; wherein they beſtowed their ſupplies, and changing the Gouernor thereof, ſubſtituted in his room one Bagli, being then vpon this occaſion only called a Baſſa. Whileſt Reſuan yet lay thus incamped vnder Teflis, Daut Chan the brother of Simon, who in the beginning of theſe wars, at the comming of Muſtapha the Turks Generall into Georgia, had fled out of Teflis, came now with all his family, and offered himſelfe as a ſubiect and deuoted vaſſall to the Turkiſh Emperour: whom Reſuan entertained with great promiſes and large aſſurances of all C good ſucceſſe, according to his deſire.

In the meane while newes were brought to Simon, That General Ferat ſtaying at ths ſtreits of Tomanis with his army, had ſent Reſuan Baſſa with a far leſſe number than indeed he had, to ſuccor Teflis: Vpon which report he tooke courage to encounter Reſuan, and to giue him battell. Vpon which reſolution without further delay, being accompanied but with 4000 Georgians, partly ſubiects of his owne, and partly of Manucchiars, he with all ſpeed poſſible went againſt Reſuan. But whileſt Simon was going thitherwards, Generall Ferat fearing the worſt, had already by chance diſpatched away the two Baſſa's of Caramania and Maras, with 10000 ſoldiers, to the end that ioyning themſelues with the ſoldiers of Reſuan, they ſhould at all aduentures be ſo much the ſtronger. Now Simon going reſolutely on, found Reſuan incamped D with 6000 ſoldiers only, at the foot of an hill, on the backe ſide whereof lay all the reſt of the army; and preſently gaue a charge vpon him: when the ſoldiers behind the hill being aware of his comming, were ready all at once with their weapons to receiue him. Who now perceiuing his error, repented himſelf to haue ſo raſhly aſſaulted his enemies, ſeeing now no other remedie but to be vtterly vndone. But ſeeing that he had now ſo far ingaged himſelfe, as that hee could not by flight but increaſe his grief, and make the iſſue more lamentable; with theſe few ſouldiers which he had, he endured the fury of the great army of Reſuan, ſo that on both ſides there was ioyned a moſt cruell battell: wherein the ſtrange and vnuſuall valour of thoſe few Chriſtians was much to be wondred at: yet in the end the huge number of the Turkiſh ſwords and ſpeares ſo preuailed vpon that ſmall number of the Georgians, as that they were brought E to great extremitie: yea Simon himſelfe hauing his horſe ſlaine vnder him, fel downe headlong to the ground, and in his fal was very neer to haue bin taken priſoner, as was his lieutenant and many other his followers, had he not been relieued by an vnexpected and maruellous chance: for whiles the battell was euen at the greateſt heat betweene them, Reſuan diſcouered the two Baſſaes of Caramania and Maras, who (as is before ſaid) were newly ſent by General Ferat to ſuccour him; but both by the ſaid Reſuan, and alſo by the reſt of his army, were indeed thought to be Perſians: whereupon they were incontinently ſurpriſed with a ſudden feare, inſomuch that they now became very doubtfull of the victory, whereof they thought themſelues before aſſured. In this ſuſpence and doubtfulneſſe of mind the battell was alſo intermitted, and the victory by the ſight of thoſe their friends diſturbed: whereby the Georgians, F and eſpecially Simon, whoſe eſtate was almoſt deſperate, tooke the opportunitie to eſcape and ſaue themſelues; leauing behind them moſt ſure ſignes of their valour among the Turks, of whom many remained there ſlaine, many wounded. and many filled with great maruell and vnexpected feare. Thus eſcaped poore Simon with the remainder of his followers into his knowne places of refuge, there to bewaile the death and captiuitie of his ſubiects. But Reſuan after after he had diſcouered the Baſſa's approching toward him, to be his known friends and confederats, fretted in himſelf exceedingly, that Simon had ſo eſcaped his hands: yet holding on G his way to Tomanis, he arriued there in great triumph, drawing the ſtandards of Simon al along the ground, and cauſing many of the Georgians heads to be caried vpon his ſoldiers launces, to the great ioy of General Ferat, to whom he deliuered all the priſoners taken in the battell, and wicked Daut Chan, who hauing in times paſt renounced his firſt faith, was become a Perſian; and now again deſpiſing the vain ſuperſtition of the Perſians, had yeelded himſelf to the vanity of the Turks, and made himſelf a voluntary ſlaue to Amurath.

Now was the year ſo far ſpent, that euery man began to fear the winters approch; and therfore the General determined to remoue thence, and to withdraw himſelf into places of more ſafety. And ſo hauing ſet all things in order in the new fort, he appointed Haſſan to be Baſſa H of Tomanis, and left with him 8000 ſelect ſoldiers, choſen out of all the army, for the defence of that fort and the country therabout. Deeply had Ferat laid vp the outrage committed by Muſtaffa the Georgian (being now returned to his old name of Manucchiar) in taking away the Kings treaſure, and killing the two Capigi and the Chiaus; and therfore reſolued with himſelf, not to return to Chars or Erzirum, vnles he had firſt paſſed into the Country of the ſayd Georgian, and in moſt cruel maner reuenged thoſe notable injuries before receiued. In three daies he arriued at Triala, and there incamped: but lying there, ſuch an vnwonted dearth and ſcarcity of all things poſſeſſed the Army, but eſpecially of victuals, that euery fiue buſhels and a half of wheat was ſold at fiue hundred Ducats, to the vniuerſal calamitie of the whole Army. I

From this place the General was minded to go on forward toward the country of Manucchiar; but whilſt he was vpon the raiſing of his tents, one Veis Baſſa of Aleppo came vnto him and told him, that it was not good now to ſpend the time in wandring about thoſe countries, for that there were three very great enemies confederat together, to make this enterpriſe very difficult, and almoſt impoſſible and deſperat: one was the ſeaſon of the year, being now ful of ſnows, froſt and tempeſt: another was the want and ſcarſnes of all things neceſſary, eſpecially of victuals: the third was the people of Georgia, who by a common vniting of themſelues together, and peraduenture aided by the Perſians, might work ſome notable miſchief againſt the army. This ſpeech of Veis ſo much offended the Generall, that he moſt ſharpely rebuked him, and with bitter terms reproued him; telling him flatly, that he well perceiued that K he was brought vp among mountains and villages, and of a villein (as he was) vpon ſome ſuperfluitie of grace, or fooliſh importunity, aduanced to the honour of a Baſſa, and that therefore he ſhould not haue preſumed ſo much as to thinke it lawfull for him, ſo impudently and malapertly to come and giue him ſuch aduertiſements; whereas it had bin his duty rather to haue held his peace, and to haue hearkened to the commandements of his betters and ſuperiours, yeelding himſelfe obedient and deuoted with all his power to performe the ſame. With this rebuke the Generall paſſed on to Archelech, burning and in a maner deſtroying the country before him, though indeed it was in amity and confederation with the Turks. But the inhabitants of Archelech vpon the comming of the Turks had abandoned the city, and for feare withdrawn themſelues into the mountains. In Archelech Ferat incamped, and ſtaied the ſpace L of foure daies among the rocky crags, and in a barren ſoile yeelding neceſſary ſuſtenance neither for man nor beaſt; ſo that euery man there endured vnſpeakeable miſeries: yet for the ſpace of foure daies the ſouldiers with patience endured this ſo great a calamity. But in the end, the fall of an huge ſnow being added to theſe extremities, did ſo greatly increaſe their griefes, that all the Ianizaries and Spaoglans of Conſtantinople aroſe in a tumult, and comming before Ferat, in deſpightfull and contemptuous manner with very haughty and reſolute termes ſaid vnto him:

And how long ſhall we endure this thy tedious and inſolent gouernment? Where is the due commiſeration that thou oughteſt to beare toward the Vaſſales of thy Soueraigne, thou ruſticall and vnreaſonable Captaine? Doſt thou thinke haply, that we keep our Harlots as thou doſt vnder thy ſumptuous pauilions, all fat and in good plight, with delicate viands, whilſt others liue in miſerie? Doeſt thou beleeue that we haue as thou haſt, our dainty ſugars, ſpices, and conſerues, whereby to reſtore vs, in the common calamitie of others? And that we haue at command meat and pretious wines, which thou mingleſt with thy cleere and pleaſant water, partly prouided for thee by the art of the cunning M

A Doctors, and partly brought to thee from far places? From this day forward it will be no longer endured that ſo much people ſhould continue in this famin, afflicted with nakednes and many other inconueniences: and therfore get thy ſelf vp and return toward ErZirum; otherwiſe we ſhall be inforced to do that which will breed more diſpleaſure vnto thee than to any man liuing.

The General in a great agony preſently called a Councel, wherin it was concluded, That they ſhould all ſend their ſtrong ſumpter horſes to Ardachan, and the reſt to follow him into Manucchiars Countrey, whither he had appointed to go only to make an inrode, and with the ſpoil and booty of that country to refreſh the minds of his ſoldiers, afflicted with the miſeries both paſt and preſent. This commandment of the Generals they all readily obeyed, as well B becauſe he promiſed them a ſpeedy voyage, as alſo for that euery man deſired the ſack of Altunchala, with other the territories of Manucchiar. So Ferat holding on his journy thorow certain low vallies between the high & craggy mountains, continually accompanied with great famin and ſcarſity, at length brought his army to Cliſca, a place belonging to Manucchiar, but as then for fear of the Turks quite abandoned and forſaken by the inhabitants, who with their wiues and children, and all the beſt ſtuffe they had, were fled into remote and ſafe places, vntil the fury of the enemy was ouerpaſt. In the fields neer to this place (abounding with corn and cattel, and plenty of fruit) the General refreſhed his whole army; and hoping that al the ſoldiers would like it wel to ſtay a while in that ſuch eaſe, determined with himſelf to erect a fort in that place: and with this reſolution gaue commandment to Reſuan Baſſa to go vp to the C tower, and in the top therof to ſet vp an Enſigne, with a proclamation and publique report, That he would in the name of Amurath there erect a fort, & fortifie it as he had don the other forts before. Reſuan accompanied with Amurath the Baſſa of Caramania, according to the commandement of the general, in the top of the tower ſet vp an enſigne or two, which ſo ſoon as the ſoldiers had eſpied, the forenamed Ianizaries and Spaoglans thinking themſelues too much abuſed by the General, ariſing again al in an vprore, repleniſhed with fury and indignation, ran vp in a rage to take down the enſignes that were ſet vp vpon the tower; and taking them in their hands, rapt the ſaid Reſuan once or twice about the pate, diſcharging withal many iniurious and deſpightful words vpon him, and ſharply rebuked him. And then returning to the General (who was now come thither himſelf to countenance the action of Reſuan) with D geſtures ful of deſpight, contempt and diſdain, reuiling him with many ſhameful and ſcorneful terms, they proteſted vnto him,

That they were not come to the wars to exerciſe the occupation of Maſons and daubers, and to bee emploied in ſuch vile and diſhonorable offices; but only to manage their weapons, and therby to demerit their ordinary wages, and to purchaſe to themſelues glory and renown at the Kings hand. And therfore if he loued his head, and would not ſee thoſe arms turned againſt himſelf, which hitherto had bin the reuengers of the enemies injuries, he ſhould reſolue with himſelf to leaue theſe new buildings and vnſeaſonable deſignements, and giuing place to the contrary ſeaſons of the yeare, to haue due care of their common deſires and neceſsity.

Whilſt they were yet thus expoſtulating the matter with him, one more bold than the reſt, and more forgetful of his duty, did not ſtick to aſſault the Generall, and to threaten him to wreak his fury vpon him: which in that tumult had haply bin don, had not the Baſſa of Caramania lent the General his own horſe, and ſo conducted him to his pauilion. Yet was hee neuertheles ſtil purſued by the tumultuous ſouldiers, and again ſharply accuſed for the ſtay that he made there, and for not reſoluing preſently to remoue thence: and at laſt after many reprochful ſpeeches, ſaid expreſly, That if he did not the next morning remoue out of thoſe quarters, without all fail he ſhould loſe his life for it. For all that, Ferat diſdaining to yeeld to them that ſhould of duty haue bin ready and obedient at euery beck of his, and ſeeking by F all means (notwithſtanding all this ſtir) to ſtay there ſo long time as ſhould bee ſufficient to build a fort, that would ſo much offend Manucchiar; anſwered them again, down for any ſeruice of his King. But if they had no care to ſerue their Soueraign in this new building, they might go their waies: as for himſelf he was reſolutely minded to obey his Lord in whatſoeuer he had G commanded him; for the honor of whom euery one of them ought to think their liues very well beſtowed.

Vpon this anſwer there followed diuers railings and curſings againſt the King, againſt the General, and againſt them all: and in this confuſed tumult euery man betook himſelfe to his weapon; in euery corner was heard grumlings and whiſperings ful of wrath and indignation, ſo that there was a great fear of ſome dangerous euent, but greater was the ſuſpition of the generals life. And now euery man had withdrawn himſelf to the garding of ſuch things as hee eſteemed moſt; when ſuddenly and in a trice you might haue ſeen the pauilions of the Baſſa's & captains fal down flat to the ground, all the cords therof being cut in ſunder by the wrathful ſoldiers; and as it were in a moment, all the muttons and other cattel the Generall & H Baſſa's led with them for their ordinary vſe, were ſeiſed vpon by the ſame ſoldiers, & garded with all diligence poſſible. And ſo far was it off, that any man durſt challenge or reuenge this their inſolencie, that they themſelues turning afreſh vpon their General, being now in a maze and deadly fear, began now the third time to threaten him, That if he did not forthwith remoue from thoſe countries, and turn his journy toward Erzirum, thoſe vallies & fields ſhould without all fail become the ſepulchres of the Baſſa's, and thoſe hils retain the eternall memory of ſo bloudy a day.

Ferat in danger to be ſlain by the ſoldiers.

With a little liberality might the Generall haue don with his people whatſoeuer hee had liſted, but being loth to gratifie them in any thing, he was inforced to performe their proud and arrogant demands, and to his great ſhame to obey them, whom with right vſage he might I haue made obedient to himſelf: and therfore to auoid their deſpightful threats, to his exceeding great reproch, he was glad to yeeld to them, in remouing out of thoſe quarters. The firſt day he arriued at Ardachan, with the great trouble of all his ſouldiers: for wheras the journy was wont to be two days work ordinarily, as wel in reſpect of the length of the way, as the difficulty of the paſſage, the General would now needs haue it don in one, the rather thereby to grieue his ſoldiers. But of this his wilfulnes he receiued euen the ſame day the iuſt reward; for that the chariots wherin his women rid were conueyed away, together with the Eunuchs their keepers. Some ſay by the Georgians that lay in wait for ſuch a prey: others ſay by the Ianizaries, who the more to diſhonor their Generall wrought him this iniury. K

Great was the reproch that Ferat receiued in the Army, but far greater at Conſtantinople, when theſe news were there known. But there was no remedy, he muſt now perforce indure it, and diſcontented as he was, to keep on his way towards Erzirum. In Ardachan he took a ſuruey of his Army, and there gaue his ſouldiers leaue to depart: himſelf afterwards arriuing at Erzirum, hated of all his ſouldiers, envied by his Captains, derided for the loſſe of his Women, and fallen into diſgrace with euery man. No leſſe than the reſt was the Turkiſh Emperor diſcontented with him alſo; firſt, for that he had don nothing worth ſpeaking of, in reuenge of the ſhameful iniury don by Manucchiar the Georgian, and yet ſo mightily diſcontented his ſoldiers. Secondly, for that without any care he had ſuffered Aliculi Chan the Perſian priſoner to eſcape away, about whoſe flight it was thought he could not chuſe but haue ſome L intelligence. For Ferat, after he was by new order from the Court, to diuert his journey from Naſſiuan, to the ſtreits and narrow paſſages of Georgia; being deſirous to be throughly informed of thoſe dangerous waies, in this ſecond year when he remoued from Erzirum, tooke Aliculi Chan out of priſon, of purpoſe to vſe him as his guid in thoſe dangerous ſtreits, and therfore carried him vnder a gard (whatſoeuer it was afterwards) of his moſt faithful vaſſals; ſtill intreating him wel, and taking ſuch order as that he wanted nothing. At laſt being come to the ſtreits of Tomanis in Georgia, where the caſtle (as it is before ſaid) was erected, he from thence ſecretly eſcaped into Perſia. The manner of his eſcape is diuerſly reported. Some ſay that Ferat in diſcharge of his promiſe, for his good direction had gratified him with his liberty. Others ſay, That Ferat corrupted with mony, gaue him opportunitie to eſcape. Some M others (with more probability) That his eſcape was made neither for mony, nor diſcharge of promiſe, but by the only vigilancie of Aliculi himſelf, and the ſleepines of his Keepers. And that watching the opportunitie of the night (a friend to all eſcapes) he ſtarted away. Howſo-euer

A euer it was, in fine he was deliuered from his long captiuity, to the diſcredit of Ferat, and returned into Perſia, to performe ſuch enterpriſes againſt the Turks, as ſhall be hereafter declared.

General Ferat (before his departure out of Georgia) had commanded Aly the Baſſa of Græcia (whom he left, as is before declared, in the new caſtle of Lori) to fortifie a certaine caſtle called Saitan Chas (in our language, The caſtle of the Deuill) which he with great diligence performed, and left therein fifty pieces of artillery, and a thouſand ſoldiers vnder the charge of a Sanzacke: and ſo quieted the paſſages from fort to fort, as that all the waies from Reiuan to Chars, and from Chars to Teflis, were made eaſie and ſafe; and all the meanes taken away whereby the enemy might be able to plot any new treachery vpon thoſe paſſages: which was B no ſmall peece of good ſeruice.

The dangerous paſſage from Reiuan to Teſlis ſecured vnto the Turks.

The Perſian King in the meane time lying at Tauris with his army, vnderſtanding that the Turks had changed their purpoſe from Naſſiuan to Georgia, ſo that there was no further need to imploy his army againſt them for the defence of Tauris or Naſſiuan; at laſt reſolued with himſelfe to licence his ſoldiers to depart, and to apply himſelfe to more priuate reuenges. For calling Emir Chan vnto him, whom he had left Gouernor of Tauris, and Generall for that part of his kingdome; he required of him the occaſion, why he had not performed the great promiſes which he had made to him before his departure to Heri, nor done his endeauour to hinder the Turks Fabrick at Reiuan: and why he went not out with other ſoldiers appointed for that purpoſe, and namely, with the Turcomans (as he had promiſed) to reuenge ſo great an injury, C and in beſt maner he could, to haue indamaged the Turkiſh forces? Sundry excuſes did Emir Chan alledge for the colouring of his manifeſt default, but none ſufficient to cleare him of the crimes objected againſt him by the king and the Sultans: wherefore he was by the King adjudged to haue his eies burnt out with an hot yron; and ſo depriued of his ſight, to be deſpoiled of all his goods and ſhut vp in cloſe priſon. Which heauy doome was without further delay accordingly put in execution: whereof within the ſpace of a few moneths, the wicked Chan (but yet a famous ſoldier) miſerably died in priſon. Whoſe death ſo highly offended the Turcoman nation (who had him alwaies in great eſtimation) that they abſolutely denied their defences for the crowne of Perſia: and the more, when they heard that the King had beſtowed the roome of Emir Chan vpon Aliculi; who although he had in many reſpects deſerued all preferments, D yet for that he was an antient enemy to certain Turcoman captains, they would not in any wiſe endure that he ſhould be exalted to ſo great an honour. And therefore they waxed more diſdainefull and ill affected towards the King, whereby the Perſian forces became the more weakened and diuided.

Emir Chan hauing his eies put out, dieth miſerably in priſon.

The Turks notwithſtanding the league yet in force betwixt Amurath and Rodolph the Chriſtian Emperor then reigning, did many times make incurſions into the vpper part of Hungary, burning the country villages, and carrying away the people into captiuity: but in their return, they were oftentimes cut off by the Emperors ſoldiers and ſlaine. Which being reported at Conſtantinople, much moued the Turkiſh tyrant: but when he vnderſtood that his men had without any cauſe made thoſe inrodes into the territory of the Chriſtians, and ſo receiued E the foreſaid loſſes, he was againe appeaſed, and in the beginning of this yeare 1584, renewed the league betwixt him and the Emperor for eight yeares more.

Ferat from Erzirum aduertiſed Amurath of all that had hapned in his late expedition; deſiring him to command what he would haue taken in hand the next Spring. But beſides this information from him, there wanted not many others which did the like alſo, although in another manner: declaring vnto the king (and that in an odious ſort) the whole proceedings of Ferat, the eſcape of Aliculi Chan, the ſhameful loſſe of his women, his quarrels with the Ianizaries, his falling out with Veis Baſſa, a man well regarded of Amurath himſelfe, the diſorders of his whole camp for his want of diſcretion; and to be ſhort, the particularities of al ſuch actions as had not altogether ſo honorably bin by him performed that yeare: cauſes of themſelues ſuffi- F cient to induce the king to remoue the ſaid Ferat from his Generalſhip. To which occaſions, were alſo added ſundry other ſecret reſpects: for euer ſince the laſt departure of Ferat from Erzirum, Amurath had ſtill in his head, the next yeare following to attempt the enterpriſe of Tauris, and thereby to ſtir vp through the World a famous report of his conqueſt correſpondent to his greatneſſe. Now among the captaines whom he eſteemed to be worthy men, to whom he might with truſt commit this ſo great an enterpriſe, he bethought himſelfe of Oſman G Baſſa, left at Sumachia in Siruan by Generall Muſtapha in the firſt yeare of this war: who hauing in that prouince remained euer ſince, had without any helpe of the Tartarians, by his owne induſtry and valor, to the great contentment of Amurath, brought that large country into a reaſonable obedience to the Turkiſh Empire: and that which moſt of all pleaſed the Turkiſh Emperour, had in a country ſo far diſtant, maintained his army, wherewith he had done all this without any expences at all to his king; hauing now a good while leuied his ſouldiers ſtipends vpon the lands and territories of that region, and ſtill exerciſed a kind of gouernment and ſoueraignty ouer thoſe places. Of all which his good proceedings, he had cauſed intelligence from time to time to be ſent vnto the court: by which means, and other fauorers which he had about the King, there was foſtered in the minde of Amurath a wonderfull good opinion of him; ſo that now without delay he reſolued to ſend for him to Conſtantinople; and for H that purpoſe, before Ferat was arriued at Erzirum, he had diſpatched certain Capigi & Chiaus to call this famous warriour vnto him: yet wanted there not ſome (and thoſe not of the meaneſt ſort) that went about to hinder both his comming to the court, & alſo theſe diſignements of ſo great importance. For Sciaus the chiefe Viſier (who rather for the comelineſſe of his perſon and alliance with the king, than for any other his vertues, was mounted to that high roome) did greatly feare, leſt Oſman whoſe courſe it was to ſit next vnto him in the order of the greateſt Baſſaes, partly for his experience in matters of war, and partly for the good affection the king did beare vnto him, ſhould at his comming to Conſtantinople perſwade the king to what he liſted, and ſo peraduenture take from him the chiefeſt office, & get into his hands the whole gouernment of the empire, whereby ſo great wealth was to be gained. Wherefore to rid himſelfe I of theſe feares, he caſt about by all means to keep him from comming to the court; but becauſe that to attempt the ſame openly, might proue a matter both difficult and dangerous, he thought it better to make triall of a more commodious and ſecret meanes. This Sciaus in conſiderttion of many gifts beſtowed vpon him by Mahamet the Cuman-Tartar king, had many times excuſed him to Amurath of diuers accuſations which Oſman by his letters had laid to his charge; For not aiding him in the ſubduing of Siruan, as he was both by promiſe and duty bound: and for all his ouerſights alledged ſuch reaſons in his behalfe, as if they did not altogether perſuade Amurath to be kinde vnto him, yet at the leaſt not to carry a mind of reuenge againſt him: and had ſo far proceeded in countenancing this Tartarian king, that there was betwixt K them confirmed an interchangeable amity and mutuall confederacy. Him Sciaus imagined to find willing and ready by al means poſſible, to hinder the comming of Oſman his enemy to the Court, if he were but made acquainted with the matter. And therefore Sciaus, as ſoone as he vnderſtood the certain reſolution of Amurath, to call Oſman to the court, ſecretly wrote to the Tartar king, who lay incamped neer to the hauen of Caffa vpon the Fens of Meotis; certifying him, That Oſman was to come to the court; and that therefore it were good for him to call to mind, how great an eneny he had beene to him, and how much he had endeauoured by letters to Amurath, to turne all his hatred and diſpleaſure againſt him: and withall, That if he was able to doe ſo much by letters, as if Sciaus had not defended him with very reaſonable excuſes, the King had executed his wrathfull indignation vpon him to his great danger; hee L ſhould then imagine with himſelfe, what Oſman ſhould be able to do, when he ſhould come in perſon to the preſence of Amurath, and without any mediator, betweene themſelues determine of all matters what they ſhould thinke conuenient. Theſe, and peraduenture worſe Letters which Sciaus wrote to the Tartar, miniſtred matter enough vnto him to reſolue to do what he might, not to ſuffer ſo pernitious an enemy of his to arriue at Conſtantinople: and eſpecially perceiuing that Sciaus, in whoſe breaſt he repoſed all his hope and all his protection, did ſo greatly feare his comming. Wherefore to rid himſelfe of that feare, he commanded twelue thouſand ſoldiers, that changing their weapons and apparell, they ſhould goe and lie in wait for Oſman in the borders betweene Cholchis, and Iberia, towards the Tartarian Nomades, by which way he was to come; and ſo making an aſſault vpon him, to bereaue him of his life. M Hoping that ſuch an outrage once done, could not, or would not, be imputed to his procurement, but rather to the Tartar Nomades, or to the Mengrellians, or to the Georgians, or to the Muſcouites, or to the robbers by the high way; and to be ſhort, rather to any body elſe, than to him. This commandement of the Tartar King, was accordingly by the ſouldiers put in

The Tartar King ſendeth 12000 Tartars to lie in wait for to kill Oſman.

A in practiſe: who without further ſtay joyned themſelues together, and ſo rode towards the place appointed.

And now were the meſſengers ſent from Amurath, come to Oſman, who preſently put himſelfe on his way towards Conſtantinople, hauing left behind him at Derbent and Sumachia, two Baſſaes, thought to be the moſt ſufficient men in Seruania: hauing alſo appointed very good orders in the ſame, and an aſſured eſtabliſhment of all thoſe countries and places which Muſtapha had firſt ſubdued, and he himſelfe had afterwards maintained vnder the obedience of Amurath. He had alſo prouided for the ſafety of his own perſon, in paſſing thoſe troubleſome and dangerous paſſages through which he was to trauell, by chuſing out foure thouſand ſouldiers which he had tried in diuers battels, and brought vp vnder his owne diſcipline; through B whoſe valor, he doubted not ſafely to paſſe through the treacheries of the Albanians, and the populous ſquadrons as well of the Tartarians as of the Mengrellians.

Thus departed he from Derbent, and coaſting along the rocks of Caucaſus (that at al times of the yeare are all white and hoary with continuall ſnowes) leauing on his left hand Media, Iberia, and Colchis; and on the right hand, the famous riuer of Tanais and Volga, euen at his firſt entrance vnto the ſhores of the Euxine ſea, he was by the aboue named twelue thouſand Tartarians, being apparelled like theeues that lie vpon thoſe waies, ſuddenly aſſailed & fought withall. But like as a huge rocke lying open to tempeſt and waues, ſtanding faſt and vnmoueable in it ſelfe, reſiſteth the thundrings and ruſhings of the great and fearefull billowes: ſo ſtood Oſman faſt & firme, and couragiouſly ſuſtained this treacherous aſſault, turning the bold C countenances of his reſolute ſouldiers, againſt the rebellious multitude of thoſe traiterous ſquadrons: who, as is their manner in the beginning, vſed great force, but finding ſo ſtout reſiſtance in thoſe few, whom they had thought with their only lookes and ſhoutings to haue put to flight, they began at length to quaile. Which Oſman quickly perceiuing, couragiouſly forced vpon them, and in a very ſhort ſpace, and with a very ſmall loſſe of his own, put thoſe Tartarians to flight, killing a number of them, and alſo taking many of them priſoners: by whom Oſman was afterwards informed (as the truth was) that their king for feare that he had conceiceiued, leſt when he came to Conſtantinople he would procure his deſtruction from Amurath, had ſent this army to ſeeke his death. Of which treaſon Oſman cauſed a perfect proceſſe to be made, together with the depoſitions of the Tartarian priſoners, which he ſent the ſhorteſt way D he could deuiſe to Amurath at Conſtantinople, with letters declaring all that had paſſed, inflaming him to reuenge ſo dangerous an injury and ſo wicked a practiſe. Amurath receiuing theſe aduertiſements from Oſman, according to the neceſſity of the matter, tooke order that Vluzales his Admirall with certain gallies well appointed, ſhould paſſe ouer to Caffa to fetch Oſman; and withall to carry with him Iſlan, a brother of the Tartar kings, commanding Oſman by letters, that he ſhould (to the terror of others) put to death the treacherous king, and place his brother in his roome.

Oſman aſſaulted by twelue thouſand Tartars.

Oſman ouercommeth the Tartars.

This Tartar King was one of thoſe mighty Princes, who baſely yeelding to the Othoman power, led vnder them a moſt vile and troubleſome life, as their tributaries and vaſſals, alwaies at command: whoſe yonger brother Iſlan (preſuming of the ſufficiency of himſelfe and the fa-E uor of the people) going to Conſtantinople, became a ſutor to the Turkiſh Emperor, to haue his eldeſt brother thruſt out of his kingdome, as a man for his euill gouernment hated of his ſubjects, and to be placed himſelfe in his roome. Which his ſuit was ſo croſſed by the Embaſſadors of the king his brother (who ſpared for no coſt in the behalfe of their maſter) that the ambitious youth was ſent from the Turks court to Iconium, and there clapt faſt vp in priſon: where apparelled like an Eremit, he led his life altogether conformable to his miſery, with ſuch a kind of externall innocency, as if he had beene void of all hope or ambitious deſire of a kingdom, but rather like a forlorn and vnhappy wretch with vain affliction & impious deuotion to prepare himſelfe to a laudable and honorable death. But whilſt he thus liued, ſequeſtred from all wordly cogitations, vpon the diſcouery of the king his brothers rebellion, he was in F more than poſt haſt ſent for to Conſtantinople, and put into the gallies bound for Caffa, with letters to Oſman of the tenour aforeſaid. Now in the meane time Oſman had by cunning means got into his hands this Tartar king, being as is reported betraied by his owne counſellours, corrupted by the Turks gold: whom with his two ſonnes Oſman vpon the receit of the aforeſaid letters from Amurath, cauſed to be preſently ſtrangled with a bowſtring, and Iſlan his yonger brother be ſaluted king in his place, yet as vaſſall to Amurath. This ſhamefull death, the vſuall reward of the Turkiſh friendſhip, was thought juſtly to haue hapned vnto this Tartar G king, for that he long before, ſupported by Amurath, had moſt vnnaturally depoſed his aged father from that kingdome, juſt reuenge now proſecuting his ſo great diſloyalty.

Amurath demandeth Oſmans opinion concerning the enterpriſe of Tauris.

Oſmans reſolution.

Oſman embarked himſelfe in the forenamed gallies at the Port of Caffa, paſſing ouer the Euxine ſea, and entering into the Thracian Boſphorus, arriued at Conſtantinople, where he was receiued with great pompe and ſingular ſignificatons of good loue. But with moſt euident and expreſſe kinds of joy was he ſaluted by Amurath himſelfe, when by his owne ſpeach and preſence he declared vnto him euery particularitie of the matters that had hapned in his long and important voiage, and in liuely maner repreſented vnto him the perils & trauels that he had paſſed, and the conqueſts that he had made in Siruan. After all which diſcourſes Amurath H who longed after nothing more, than to ſee the Perſian king ſomewhat bridled, and the famous city of Tauris brought vnder his owne ſubjection, began to enter into conference with Oſman about that enterpriſe, and in the end would needs know throughly of him, what iſſue he could promiſe him of this his deſire; and in what ſort by his aduice and counſell the forces ſhould be imploied, and the armies diſpoſed for the ſubduing of that city, which ouer all the nations of the world was ſo famous, and ſo great an honour to the Perſian kingdome. To all which demands his anſwer and reſolution was, That foraſmuch as the matters of Georgia were now well ſetled, the trecherous paſſages by the new built forts aſſured, and the prouince of Siruan vnder his obedience eſtabliſhed, there was now no cauſe why he ſhould any longer foreſlow ſo famous an enterpriſe, but by the conqueſt of Tauris, and erecting of a fort in that proud city, to bring a terrour vpon all Perſia, and to raiſe a glorious renowne of ſo mighty a I conqueſt among the Nations of Europe: for the accompliſhment whereof, he thought that either the ſame army, or at the moſt a very little greater would ſuffice, ſo that it were raiſed of the beſt and choiſeſt ſouldiers.

Oſman Baſſa made chiefe Viſier & Generall of the army.

By reaſon of one of the letters which Sciaus Baſſa had written to the late Tartar king, and by the inſtigation of the yong Sultan Mahomets mother (jealous of the neere alliance of the great Baſſa with her husband, as prejudiciall and dangerous to her ſonne) Amurath had in the open Diuano depriued the ſaid Sciaus from the office of the chiefe Viſier, and hardly pardoning him his life, at the interceſſion of his wife, being his ſiſter, had baniſhed him the Court, ſo that he liued afterwards about Calcedon, vpon the borders of Aſia, not far from Conſtantinople, in a K cloſe palace he had there built for his owne pleaſure: in whoſe roome he appointed Oſman to be chiefe Viſier; and to honour him the more, nominated him the Generall of his army againſt the Perſians. Such power hath Vertue, that euen from the very ſcum of the raſcall ſort, and out of the ruſticall rout of mountain peaſants (which notwithſtanding cannot be truly juſtified of this Oſman, his father being Beglerbeg of Damaſco, and his mother, the daughter of the Beglerbeg of Babylon) it doth oftentimes in the courſe of this variable world draw diuers men into Princes courts, and aduance them to the higheſt dignities. Truth it is, that from a priuat ſouldier, though well born, he by ſundry degrees grew vp to the higheſt honor of that ſo great an Empire, and was at one inſtant created the chiefe Counſellor and Generall of the Othoman forces. Great was the joy that Oſman conceiued hereat; & great was the deſire he had to make L himſelfe worthy of ſo honorable fauors; and the greater confidence he perceiued that Amurath had repoſed in him, the more eagerly was he ſpurred on to doe any thing poſſible whereby he might ſhew himſelfe to haue deſerued the ſame. And therefore aduiſing with himſelfe, that foraſmuch as the greatneſſe of the enterpriſe required a greater army, than was leuied in former yeares, ſo was it neceſſary alſo for him the ſooner to ſend out his aduertiſements into all his ſubject prouinces, and by his own example to ſtir vp the other captaines and ſouldiers euen in the Winter (though it were as yet ſomewhat troubleſome) to paſſe ouer to Scutari, and from thence to Angori, to Amaſia, to Siuas; and there in thoſe territories to driue out the time, vntill his ſouldiers which were ſummoned, were all gathered together. And becauſe vpon this his great ſpeed it might peraduenture fall out, that the enemy miſdoubting his purpoſe M for Tauris, might prouide a greater army than they would otherwiſe, he cauſed it to be giuen out, That he muſt goe for Naſſiuan; to the end, that the Perſians ſo beguiled, ſhould not regard the gathering of ſo mighty an Army as they would haue done if they ſhould haue heard of the Turks comming to Tauris: and ſo the generall couſening rumor flew, not onely through

A through all the cities ſubiect to the Turks, but into the countries of the Perſians alſo: who notwithſtanding being very iealous of the city of Tauris, and fearing that the matter would fall out as indeed afterward it did, ceaſed not to make moſt curious and diligent inquiry about it. And although the diſgrace offered to his Embaſſador at Conſtantinople, diſſuaded him from ſending any other for treaty of peace: yet to ſpy out the ſecrets of the Turks, and to vnderſtand the certainty of their purpoſe for Naſſiuan or Tauris, he ſent diuers meſſengers to Oſman, as if he had meant to feele his mind touching a peace; but in very deed for nothing els but to ſound his deſignements: which for all that, he could not with all the cunning he could vſe poſſibly diſcouer, but ſtill remained doubtfull as at the firſt, the Fame ſtill running for Naſſiuan.

B In the beginning of this yeare, now growing towards an end, Amurath ſent one Muſtapha, one of the meaneſt of his Chiaus, vnto Stephen king of Polonia, to excuſe the death of Podolonius (ſo ſhamefully murthered as is before declared) as if the ſame had hapned by the inſolency of certaine ſoldiers, and not by his commandement: who the better to colour the matter, had brought with him two baſe fellowes, as authors of that outrage, for the King to take reuenge vpon; but were indeed no ſuch men as they were pretended to be, but rather (as it was thought) men before condemned for ſome other fact worthy of death, and now ſent thither to ſerue that purpoſe: for whom the Chiaus (in proud and threatning maner in the name of his Maſter) required to haue preſent reſtitution made of all ſuch goods as the Polonian Coſſackes had not long before taken from the Turks, and the captaine of the ſaid Coſſackes to be deliuered alſo C vnto him, to be carried to Amurath: and ſo hardly vrged the matter, that (notwithſtanding the vnworthy death of Podolonius and his followers, and the taking away of his horſes) all the goods taken by the Coſſackes were forthwith reſtored: which the Chiaus almoſt in triumphant manner preſented vnto Amurath at Conſtantinople.

This Summer alſo, Amurath diſporting himſelfe with his Mutes, was almoſt dead. Theſe Mutes are luſty ſtrong fellows, depriued of their ſpeech; who neuertheleſſe by certaine ſignes can both aptly expreſſe their own conceits, and vnderſtand the meaning of others: theſe men for their ſecrecy are the cruell miniſters of the Turkiſh tyrants moſt horrible commands; and therfore of them had in great regard. With theſe Mutes mounted vpon faire and fat, but heauy and vnready horſes, was Amurath, vpon a light and ready horſe, ſporting himſelfe (as the maner D of the Turkiſh Emperors is) riding ſometime about one, ſometime about another, and ſtriking now the horſe, now the man, at his pleaſure; when ſuddenly he was taken with a fit of the falling ſickeneſſe his old diſeaſe, and ſo falling from his horſe, was taken vp for dead; inſomuch, that the Ianizaries ſuppoſing him to haue been indeed dead, after their wonted manner fell to the ſpoiling of the Chriſtians and Iews, and were proceeding to further outrages, had not their Aga or captain to reſtraine their inſolency, to the terror of the reſt, hanged vp one of them taken in the manner, and certain others in the habit of Ianizaries. Neuertheleſſe, Amurath ſhortly after recouered againe, and to appeaſe that rumor of his death, openly vpon their Sabbath, (which is the Friday) rid from his palace to the temple of Sophia; where I with many others ſaw him (ſaith Leunclauius) his countenance yet all pale and diſcoloured.

Io. Leunc. ſup. Annal. Turcicorum, pag. 91.

A moſt barbarous outrage committed by Petrus Emus a Venetian.

E This yeare alſo hapned ſuch a chance as had like to haue raiſed new warres betwixt the Turks and the Venetians: which, foraſmuch as it is worth the reporting, I thought it not good in ſilence to paſſe ouer. The widow of Ramadan Baſſa, late Gouernor of Tripolis in Barbary, with her ſonne, her family, and a great number of ſlaues of both ſorts, being about to depart from Tripolis to Conſtantinople, had rigged vp a faire gally for the tranſporting of her ſelfe and her ſubſtance, reported to be worth eight hundred thouſand duckats: vpon which galley for her more ſafety, ſhe had ioyned two others as conſorts. Thus embarked, ſhe came to the mouth of the Adriaticke; where ſailing by Corfu, ſhe was by force of tempeſt driuen into the gulfe of the Adriaticke. At which time one Petrus Emus, one of the Venetian Senatours, with certaine gallies, had the charge for the keeping of that ſea againſt pyrats, and all other ene- F mies whatſoeuer. He hearing of the Turks comming into the gulfe, without delay ſet vpon them, and being too ſtrong for them, tooke them all: and hauing them now in his power, exerciſed moſt barbarous cruelty, as well vpon the women as the men: for hauing ſlain the men, in number two hundred and fifty, and the ſonne of Ramadan in his mothers lap, he cauſed the women, being before rauiſhed, to haue their breaſts cut off, and afterwards to be caſt ouer boord into the ſea, being in number about forty. The brother of Emus chancing vpon a beautiful virgin, was by her moſt earneſtly intreated to haue ſpared her honor; and the rather, for that (as G ſhe ſaid) ſhe was a Chriſtian, taken about 12 years before in Cyprus, ſince which time ſhe had liued in moſt miſerable captiuity among the Turks, and being now fallen by good hap into the hands of a noble Venetian, was in good hope to be ſet at liberty inuiolated. Which ſhee moſt humbly beſought him for the loue of God to doe, and not to imbrue his hands in her guiltles bloud, or to diſhonor himſelf by forcing her. But all ſhe could ſay preuailed nothing with the cruel and vnbridled youth; who after he had at his pleaſure abuſed her, caſt her with the reſt into the ſea. It is thought that Emus ſuffered this ſo great an outrage (and ſo far vnbeſeeming the honor of the Venetians) to be don, to the intent that none ſhould be left aliue to bewray the greatnes of the booty, or the villany there committed. Which was neuertheleſſe (God ſo appointing it) reuealed by one of the Turks, who ſaued by a Surgeon of Crete that H knew him, and afterwards comming to Conſtantinople, openly declared the ſame. With the odious report wherof, the Turks were ſo inraged, that in euery corner of the city a man might haue heard them threatning vnto the Venetians moſt cruell reuenge: yea, they had much ado to hold their hands from the Bilo or gouernor of the Venetian merchants in Conſtantinople and to forbear to ſpit in his face as he went in the ſtreets. At that time was one Iohan. Franciſcus Maurocenus (or as they commonly call him Moreſin) Bilo at Conſtantinople: who vnderſtanding that Amurath in his rage was about to ſend one of the great gentlemen of his court, whom the Turks call Zauſij (the great Turks vſual Embaſſadors) to Venice about that matter, found means to haue him ſtaid at Conſtantinople, and another of leſſe authority ſent to I expoſtulate the matter with the Senat, and in the name of Amurath to require to haue the offendor puniſhed, and the gallies with the ſlaues and goods reſtored; ſo ſhould the League betwixt him and them continue firm; wheras otherwiſe hee ſhould be conſtrained by force of arms to reuenge the wrongs done to his ſubjects. This meſſage being by the ſaid meſſenger deliuered at Venice, the Senators after diligent examination of the matter, returned this anſwer, That the widow of Ramadan with her family comming to Zacynthus an Iſland of theirs, was there honorably entertained, and preſented with certain curteous preſents: but departing thence and comming to Cephalenia another of their Iſlands, her people running on land, contrary to the conditions of the league, made ſpoil of whatſoeuer they could light vpon, ſparing neither man nor beaſt. Of which inſolencie their Prouidetor vnderſtanding, and making after K them, found them in arms within the gulf; & comming neer vnto them, were neither by them ſaluted, as the maner is at ſea, neither was any top ſail ſtrook, in token that the command of that ſea belonged to the Venetians; all which they ought by the League to haue done. For which their outrages and proud contempt their Prouidetor had taken ſuch ſharpe reuenge.

Neuertheleſſe they promiſed in that caſe to do what beſeemed them in reaſon and iuſtice to do, for the ſatisfying of his deſire. With which ſo reaſonable an anſwer Amurath ſeemed to be wel contented; but being indeed loth to intangle himſelf with Wars againſt that mighty State at ſea, his wars againſt the Perſians being not as yet finiſhed. Yet ſhortly after, Emus was for his diſhonourable and cruell dealing with the Lady and her family, worthily condemned and beheaded, and the gallies with all the goods and ſlaues reſtored. This great woman had L in thoſe gallies four hundred Chriſtian ſlaues, all which vpon the taking of the gallies were, as the manner is, ſet at liberty, for whom the Venetians made reſtitution of as many other of the Turks.

The villany diſcouered.

Amurath ſendeth a meſſenger to Venice, to expoſtulate the iniury don vnto his ſubjects.

Io. Leunc. ſup. Annal. Turcicorum, pag 92.

Ramadan Baſſa the husband of the aforeſaid great Lady was gouernor of Tripolis in Barbary, and of the country therabouts: who hauing wars with one of the barbarous Kings of the Moors, went out againſt him with all his forces; wherin were certain companies of Ianizaries ſent by Amurath from Conſtantinople. Now in this country, as in many other places of Affrick, are great and deſart ſands, ouer which whoſoeuer is to paſſe, muſt prouide himſelf both of victuals and skilful guids, without which they are not without great danger to bee paſſed.
Ramadan with his Army vnprouided both of the one and the other, hauing entred theſe Deſarts, M was at length brought to that caſe, that hee could neither goe forward, neither without loſſe of his men returne. Yet at length he retyred and got home, but not without the loſſe of ſome of his people, and the manifeſt danger of his whole Army: for which his improuidence the Ianizaries fel into ſuch a rage, that not reſpecting the honor of the man, or regarding the diſpleaſure of their ſoueraigne, they fell vpon him and ſlew him. At which their inſolency if Amurath did winke, and paſſe it ouer vnpuniſhed, let no man maruell: for why, the antient obedience of thoſe martial men is not now as it was in former times, when they were with a more ſeuere diſcipline gouerned; but now growne proud and inſolent (as the manner of men is liuing in continuall pay) with weapons in their hands doubt not to do whatſoeuer ſeemeth vnto themſelues beſt, be it neuer ſo foule or vnreaſonable. Which although it be in many places of this Hiſtory to be ſeene; yet for the more manifeſtation thereof, I thought it not amiſſe here brefely to ſet downe an example or two of their notorious inſolencie.

Not many yeares before, the Ianizaries in Cyprus with like inſolency ſlew Achmetes Baſſa gouernor of that Iſland: pretending for the color of ſo foule a fact, that he had defrauded them of their pay, and oppreſſed them of the country with intollerable exactions. Amurath highly offended with this their diſloyalty in killing their General, whom they had neuer before complained of; thought it much to concerne the majeſty of himſelfe, and the repreſſing of the like inſolency in others, not to ſuffer it to go vnpuniſhed: and for that purpoſe ſent another new gouernor into Cyprus, with ten gallies furniſhed as well with other neceſſary prouiſion, as with ſuch a conuenient number of ſoldiers as might ſuffice to chaſtiſe the inſolency of the chief offendors. This new gouernor arriued in Cyprus, diſſembling the ſecret commandement he had for the executing of the tranſgreſſors; by certaine truſty men gaue it out among the Ianizaries, That Amurath was ſo far from being angry with the death of Achmetes, as that he thought him worthily ſlaine by the Ianizaries, for defrauding them of their wages, and oppreſſing of his other ſubjects. Which report the new Gouernor had of purpoſe giuen out, to put them in ſecurity, and without further trouble to bring them into his danger. Hereupon the Ianizaries cheerefully and with all due reuerence receiued their new Gouernor: but ſhortly after to be ſure, they by an vnexpected guile when as nothing was leſſe feared, compaſſed in all the new come ſoldiers, and ſlew them euery mothers ſonne; and not ſo contented, ſeiſed alſo vpon the gallies that brought them. Which ſecond outrage, though Amurath tooke in euill part, as ſeeing his majeſty therein contemned, yet was he content to paſſe it ouer, being loth to adde domeſticall troubles to the great wars he had in hand with the Perſian.

Achmetes Baſſa Gouernour of Cyprus, ſlain by the Ianizaries.

Another inſolency of the Ianizaries.

But to end this matter with the opinion of one of their owne greateſt Baſſaes, concerning theſe maſterfull men. It fortuned that whileſt Busbequius (Embaſſador for Ferdinand the Emperor, vnto Solyman) lay in the Turks campe, at ſuch time as Solyman in perſon himſelfe was gon ouer the ſtreit in Aſia, to countenance his eldeſt ſon Selymus againſt his younger brother Bajazet, That vpon a light quarrell (though heauily taken) betweene the followers of the ſaid Embaſſador, and certain Ianizaries waſhing themſelues at the ſea ſide, the Embaſſador for the quieting thereof was glad to vſe the helpe of Ruſtan the great Baſſa, Solyman his ſon in law: who vnderſtanding the matter, by a meſſenger ſent of purpoſe aduiſed the Embaſſador to cut off all occaſion of contention with thoſe moſt naughty fellowes: asking him further, if he knew not that it was now the time of war, in which time they ſo reigned, as that Solyman himſelf was not able to rule them, but ſtood in feare of them. Which ſpeech fell not raſhly from Ruſtan, a man right well acquainted with his Lord and maſters griefe: for that moſt notable prince feared nothing more, than leſt ſome ſecret and dangerous treaſon ſhould lie hidden among the Ianizaries, which breaking out vpon the ſudden, might worke his finall deſtruction: whereof he needed not to ſeeke for any further example, than to his grandfather Bajazet. For, as true it is, That great are the commodities of a perpetuall army of a Princes owne; ſo are the incommodities alſo not ſmall, if they be not carefully met withall: but eſpecially for that the Prince is euer in doubt of rebellion; and that it is ſtill in the power of thoſe armed ſouldiers, at their pleaſure to tranſlate the kingdome to whom they liſt. Whereof there haue bin many great examples, although there are many waies for the remedying of the ſame.

Busbeq. Legationis Turcicę Epiſt. 3.

1585 But now that we haue by occaſion of the occurrents of that time a little ſtept out of the way, let vs return again vnto the wars of Perſia, the chiefe object of Amuraths hauty deſignes. Now according to the commandements gon out thorow all the cities of the Empire, the ſouldiers of all ſorts began to flocke together: and all thoſe that were either deſirous to be eſtabliſhed in their former charges and gouernments, or ambitiouſly ſought to be now promoted, repaired to Oſman, as vnto a king, and the ſoueraigne moderator of the Turkiſh empire, preſenting him very large and liberall gifts, wherby he gathered together a huge heape of infinit treaſure: and ſo entertaining them with all affable curteſie,and promiſing both rewards and honors to ſuch as would follow him in his purpoſed expedition,he leuied a wonderfull great number both of men and monies. And now was the time come that called him away to go towards Erzirum, where he was greatly expected of his huge army there aſſembled together. And notwithſtanding the great dearth of victuall that commonly reineth in thoſe quarters,yet thither he muſt, where he arriued about the latter end of the moneth of Iuly, in the yeare 1585 : and there taking a view of his whole army,and of all the prouiſion neceſſary for ſo important and famous an enterpriſe,he dayly labored to haſten his departure. In this city of Erzirum were met together all the ſoldiers of the prouinces that were wont to ſend helpe, but yet in greater number than euer was gathered by any Generall before : for that euery man forſooke his owne priuate buſineſſe, and vpon aſſured hopes of new rewards and vnwonted honours, were all induced to follow the fame of this their new Viſier and General:only the people of Ægypt and Damaſco were buſied with other more priuat quarrels at home,wherof becauſe they were both of great importance, and alſo fell out at this very inſtant (leauing Oſman with his army for a while at Erzirum) I will in as few words as I may make a briefe rehearſall.

Haſſan Baſſa the Queenes Eunuch ſent to Caire to gouerne there.

Amurath had heretofore taken Haſſan Baſſa the Eunuch out of the Seraglio,from the charge he had there to ſerue in the Queenes Court,and at her inſtance ſent him as Baſſa to Caire the great city of Ægypt. Which great office,beſide the honour belonging vnto it,is alſo beneficial to them whoſe good hap it is to be aduanced thereunto : the riches,the multitude of people inhabiting therein being ſo great,that it ſeemeth not to be one city,but rather to containe within the large circuit thereof many cities. This man being exceeding couetous,and therfore deſirous to handle the matter in ſuch ſort, as that he ſhould little need to ſeeke for any more ſuch grants at the Kings hands ; ſought by all manner of means to oppreſſe the whole nation, and by all importunities to wring and extort from them rewards and bribes,without regard of honeſty or reaſon. By which his ſiniſter and corrupt dealing hee had now made himſelfe ſo odious and intollerable to the people in generall, that they in great number, and many times, began to goe to Conſtantinople, and with humble petitions to requeſt the King to take from them ſuch a cruel and vnjuſt Gouernor : ſo that generally in the Court there was no talke but of the villanies and miſchiefes that were reported of the couetous Eunuch. At laſt Amurath ſeeing theſe publique exclamations went dayly ſo far,as that he could not for ſhame let them go any further without due puniſhment, he reſolued with himſelfe to call him to the Court: and hauing ſent vnto him certain meſſengers, admoniſhed him ſundry times to returne home. But the Eunuch loth to leaue ſo fit an occaſion to enrich himſelfe, did ſtill delay his returne, alledging diuers feigned excuſes for his longer ſtay. Which thing when Amurath vnderſtood, thinking himſelfe thereby deluded,he determined to prouide for ſo great a diſorder, and by puniſhing of the miſchieuous Eunuch,to ſatisfie in ſome part the diſcontented minds of his oppreſſed ſubjects in Caire.

Ebrain Baſſa in ſpeech to marry Amurath his daughter.

There ſat at that time among the chiefe Baſſa's of the Court,one Ebrain(or as ſome cal him, Ibrahim) by nation a Sclauonian,a young man of the age of 23 yeares, or thereabouts, of very faire conditions, and of a reaſonable judgement ; vpon whom Amurath himſelfe had determined to beſtow his owne daughter to wife, and ſo to make him his ſon in law. And therefore being now minded to remoue the Eunuch from his office, and to ſatisfie the city ; and being alſo willing withall to giue means for his ſaid ſonne in law to enrich himſelfe,he reſolued to ſend him as general Syndic & ſoueraigne Iudge into Ægypt,giuing him in particular charge, to remember how wickedly his predeceſſor had dealt before him. And ſo this new Baſſa took his journy towards Ægypt,although there ran before him a great rumor of his comming, and of the great authority wherewith he was ſent. At which report, as the Ægyptians reſted content and joyfull,ſo the Eunuch waxed very ſad and ſorrowfull : perſuading himſelfe, that this alteration could not but engender ſome ſtrange iſſue and effect againſt him. Whereupon adviſing himſelfe to prouide better for his owne affaires and the ſafety of his life ; he reſolued not to ſtay the comming of the new Gouernour ; but departing out of Ægypt, hee with great care and circumſpection for feare of meeting with Ebrain, trauelled towards Conſtantinople in hope to appeaſe the Kings wrath, or at leaſt by mediation of bribes, and by the interceſſion of the Queene, to finde him more fauourable than hee ſhould finde Ebrain, who without doubt would not haue ſpared any extremity or cruelty, to haue bereft him both of his goods

A goods and life together. Amurath aduertiſed from Ebrain, of the ſudden flight of the Eunuch Baſſa out of Ægypt, & hearing withall, that he kept not the high way from Caire to Conſtantinople, began to feare, leſt when he came into Soria, he ſhould fly into Perſia to the King, and ſo worke him double and treble damage; as one that had already gathered a huge treaſure, and hauing long liued in the Court, knew the moſt ſecret affaires thereof, and had learned all the priuy deuices and faſhions of the Seraglio. Whereupon he with all diligence diſpatched his Imbrahur Baſſi (whom we call Maſter of his horſe) with forty of his Capigi (all Gentlemen Vſhers, and officers of moſt ſecret and neereſt roomes about him) with charge and commandement, that if they met him they ſhould bring him to the court, vſing all the aid and aſſiſtance of his people that might be requiſit: and for that purpoſe deliuered vnto him very effectuall B and large letters, after the beſt manner of the Court. This meſſenger with his appointed train departed, and without any extraordinary inquiry, found the Eunuch in Soria, incamped in the plaines neere vnto the city now called Aman, but in times paſt Apamea, the principall city of that country. As ſoone as the Eunuch vnderſtood of the comming of the Imbrahur himſelfe, he gaue order to his guard of ſlaues, which in great number with ſpeares and arcubuſes did ordinarily kept his pauilion, that they ſhould not grant entrance into his tent to any, but only vnto the Imbrahur himſelfe, and if need were, by force to keepe the reſt of the Capigi from comming in. Which order was in very good time giuen; for as ſoone as the kings officer had diſcouered the tents of the fugitiue Baſſa, in all haſt he ran towards the ſame, and ſeeking out the greateſt among them, went preſently thither, to haue entred with all his followers: but the C ſlaues being in armor, oppoſed themſelues againſt them, and permitting only the Imbrahur to enter in, entertained the reſt of his traine without. The Imbrahur being come in, read vnto him the commandement which he had from the King to bring him to the court, and moſt inſtantly moued him, that without any further reſiſtance, he would quietly go with him. To whom the wary Eunuch anſwered, Behold, how without any calling of the King, or conducting by you, I come of my ſelfe, well aſſured to finde not only pardon and pitty, but alſo fauour and grace in the ſight of my Lord, whoſe vpright and milde nature the wicked treacheries of my falſe accuſers cannot abuſe, to the prejudice of me an innocent. And ſo without more ado they went all to Conſtantinople: the Eunuch ſtill ſtanding vpon his guard.

The warineſſe of the crafty Eunuch.

The politike and crafty Eunuch had in this meane time diſpatched diuers poſts with letters D to the Sultan ladies, certifying them of his comming, & principally beſeeching the queen to protect him, and to appeaſe the kings wrathfull indignation that haply he might haue conceiued againſt him: and ſo at length they arriued at Scutari. As ſoone as Amurath vnderſtood of his comming thither, he cauſed all the treaſure which hee had gathered to be taken from him, with all the reſt of his priuat ſubſtance, and the wretch himſelfe to be clapt in priſon in the Iadicula or ſeuen towers. Where after he had languiſhed many daies, ſtill fearing ſome deadly blow, he at length receiued from the Queene, an vnexpected, but moſt welcome aduertiſement, That he ſhould be of good cheare and quiet himſelfe, for that his wealth had already ſaued his life, and that ſhe hoped in ſhort time to procure him alſo his liberty. Which indeed ſhe brought to paſſe; for ſhe her ſelfe made earneſt petition to Amurath her husband, E that foraſmuch as he had bereft her Eunuch of all his goods, he would yet at laſt deliuer him out of priſon, and reſtore him vnto her againe. Which requeſt of the Queenes was granted accordingly, and the Eunuch enlarged: but the treaſure that he had ſo vnjuſtly ſcraped together in Ægypt, that remained ſtill among the gold and other jewels of the Kings.

The Eunuch caſt in priſon at Conſtantinople, and his euill gotten goods confiſcated.

But Ebrain Baſſa with his new commiſſion now arriued in Ægypt, had in ſhort ſpace by far more ſiniſter means than had the Eunuch before him, ſcrapt together ſuch an infinit heap of riches, as was able only of it ſelfe to make him worthy of his promiſed wife, and therfore he was called home to the court, to accompliſh the intended mariage. With this commandment to returne to Conſtantinople, he receiued alſo in charge, to make his journey through the people of Druſia, and ſuch as he ſhould find loyal, to confirme them in their due obedience, & to make F them pay their antient duties; but ſuch as he ſhould find ſtubborne and diſobedient he ſhould quite root them out and deſtroy them. This commandement Ebrain preſently put in execution, and hauing packed vp together all the riches he had gathered in the time of his gouernment, and raiſed good ſtore of ſoldiers in that prouince, he tooke with him thirteen Sanzackes, that were ordinarily accuſtomed to ſit as aſſiſtants vnder the gouernment of the Baſſa in the ruling of the populous territories of Caire, and ſo ſet forwards towards Gaza, paſſing G ouer thoſe vaſt and huge wilderneſſes of ſand that lie betweene Caire and Gaza. From Gaza, ioyning the Sanzacke thereof with him, he went to Ieruſalem; and from thence, cauſing the Sanzacke there alſo to follow his traine, he turned by Saffetta, by Lezium, by Naplos (called in times paſt Samaria) ſtill taking with him the Sanzacks of all thoſe places, and at laſt turned himſelfe towards Damaſco: ſo that before he ioyned with the band of Damaſco, he had gotten together eighteene Sanzacks, with all their ſquadrons of ſouldiers and ſlaues. Beſides theſe, he had alſo his own priuat Court, which was wonderfull populous, and two hundred Ianizaries of Conſtantinople, whom Amurath would needs haue him to take with him at his departure from the Court, ſo that he had in his army almoſt twelue thouſand horſemen. From Damaſco, Veis the Baſſa was come as far as Ieruſalem to meet him, with all the ſouldiers vnder H his gouernment, in number about two thouſand perſons. Beſides that, there came vnto him by the way of Sidon, the Aga of the Ianizaries of Cyprus, with all the band of that deſolate and deſtroied Iſland: which captaine with his ſoldiers was tranſported ouer into the maine, in thoſe gallies that by the Kings appointment were ſent to fetch Ebrain: who now ſtrengthned with all theſe ſouldiers, had purpoſed the vtter ruine of the diſobedient Druſians, and the raiſing of his own glory by triumphing ouer them.

The Druſian people what they are.

The Countrey which the Druſians inhabit.

Fiue chiefe Rulers or Gouernors among the Druſians.

Theſe Druſians, againſt whom theſe great preparations were now made by this new Captaine, and of whom the Turkiſh Emperor is ſo ſuſpitious and doubtfull, are ſuppoſed to be by diſcent Frenchmen, the relikes of thoſe that with great deuotion did in times paſt fight thoſe memorable and Chriſtian battels in Iury, and recouered the holy city: but being afterwards I brought low, partly by the plague, and partly by the fury of the Barbarians, mingled their ſeed with the circumciſed nation, and ſo together with their authority & command, loſt alſo their firſt faith and religion: yet ſo, that they grew into an hatred of the Turkiſh ſuperſtition, & abhorring the circumciſion of the Iewes, betooke themſelues to a new Prophet of their own called Iſman, whoſe doctrine they follow. The right Druſians liue vncircumciſed, neither do they forbeare wine, as do the Turks: they make it lawfull among them (moſt vnlawfully) to marry with their own daughters: the Turkiſh gouernment they haue ſought by all means to eſchue, and notwithſtanding all the endeuors and attempts of the Turkiſh tyrants, but eſpecially of Selymus the ſecond, yet haue they alwaies bin ſubject to their own naturall Princes, and would neuer admit any captain or gouernor of the Turks within the countries which they poſſeſſed. K They are a people very warlike, ſtout, reſolute, and religious obſeruers of their own ſuperſtition: in battel they vſe the arcubuſe & ſcimitar, yet ſome of them at this day do ſerue with lances and darts: they are apparelled after the manner of the Eaſterne people, with a turbant on their heads, & breeches they neuer weare, but in ſtead therof they couer thoſe parts with their coat; which reacheth down to their knees, buttoning it vp before: their feeding is groſſe, and of mountaine meats: they inhabit all the countrie that is inuironed within the confines of Ioppa, aboue Cæſarea & Paleſtina, and within the riuers of Orantes & Iordan, ſtretching it ſelf euen to the plaine of Damaſco, neere to the hils that compaſſe it about vpon the coaſt of mount Libanus. They were all in times paſt good friends & confederats, ſo that they were greatly eſteemed: but noow being at variance through greedineſſe and couetouſneſſe, they were diuided L among themſelues, one ſeeking the deſtruction of another. At this time they were gouerned by fiue chiefe captains or gouernors: one of them was called Ebne-Man, and of the Turks Man-Ogli; another Serafadin; the third Mahamet Ebne-Manſur; the fourth Ebne-Frec; and the fifth Ali-Ebne-Carſus, by the Turks called Ali-Carſus-Ogli. Vnder theſe (who indeed carry the title and authority of an Emir, that is to ſay, King or Chiefe) there are diuers their lieutenants or deputies whom they call their Macademi or agents. Ebne Man or Man-Ogli inhabited the mountains and fields that are contained vnder the iuriſdictions of Cæſarea, of Ptolemaida, of Tyrus, and of Sidon, and had his reſidence for moſt part vpon the hill, in a town called Andera; he was very mighty in men & armour, and ſince the time that by treachery his father was murthered by Muſtapha then Baſſa of Damaſco, alwaies a deadly enemy to the name of the Turkes. M Ebne-Frec, Ebne-Carſus, and Ebne-Manſur were alwaies great friends; but now eſpecially at the comming of Ebrain Baſſa they ſhewed themſelues more ſtreightly confederated together. Serafadin and Man-Ogli were euer oppoſite againſt them: ſo that the one ſide procuring the ouerthrow of the other, they loſt their ſtrength, and left no meanes to defend themſelues againſt the Turks, who had long lien in wait for their liberty. Now as ſoone as the news came among them, That Ebrain being departed from Caire, was comming into Soria to ſubdue them; the three confederates aboue named reſolued among themſelues to goe and meet this great Baſſa, and to ſubmit themſelues vnto him, of purpoſe to turne all the intended miſchiefe vpon Serafadin and Man. Ogli their enemies. And ſo hauing packed vp great ſtore of money, cloath of ſilke, cloath of woollen, and cloath of gold, with many loads of ſilkes, and other things of exceeding value, euery of the three being accompanied, one with ſome two thouſand, another with ſome three thouſand men, they put themſelues vpon their journey towards Ebrain, and met him at Ieruſalem, where he was already arriued. This their comming Ebrain tooke in wonderfull good part, and courteouſly accepted thoſe their rich and great preſents which they brought him; and by the offers of their fidelity, and the grieuous accuſations they made againſt the other two Druſian lords their enemies, began to conceiue great hope of his intended enterpriſe: for why, he ſaw that nothing could more eaſily compaſſe their ouerthrow, than this their diſcord. Being thus accompanied, he came by the way of Damaſco, to the champaigne of Bocca, and there incamped. This was in the month of Iuly this yeare 4585. The whole army that was with Ebrain, reckoning alſo the ſoldiers of the three Druſian lords, was about the number of twenty thouſand horſemen ſtrong. In this place there came people out of all quarters thereabouts, with preſents to honour the Baſſa; to whom he likewiſe yeelded ſuch ſmall fauors as his couetous nature could afford them.

Three of the Druſian lords met Ebrain at Ieruſalem with rich preſents, & a great traine of men.

From this place alſo Ebrain preſently ſent letters to Serafadin and Ebneman, whereby he inuited them to come vnto him, to acknowledge their obedience vnto the Sultan: for that otherwiſe they might aſſure themſelues to be in ſhort time depriued both of their eſtates and liues. For all that, Man Ogli would not by any meanes come in. But Serafadin being poore both in wealth and forces, reſolued to come, in hope by rich preſents to purchaſe his attonement with the great Baſſa. And therefore hauing packed vp together diuers loads of ſilke, great ſtore of money, and many cloaths of good value and beauty, and alſo attended vpon with diuers of his ſubjects, he arriued at laſt at the pauilion of Ebrain, with theſe his rich preſents, which were there readily receiued, and he himſelfe with great attention heard: whoſe ſpeech in effect tended to no other thing, but only to perſuade the Baſſa, That he had alwaies beene a deuoted vaſſall vnto Amurath, and that he had carried a continuall deſire to be imployed in any his ſeruice; and that now being led by the ſame affection, and aſſured of his fauour, by the friendly and courteous offers made him in his letters, he was come to ſhew himſelfe vnto him to be the ſame man, and ſo profered him whatſoeuer lay in his ſlender power to performe. Whereunto Ebrain made no anſwer at all; but onely asked him the cauſe why he liued continually in diſcord and brawles with the three Emirs (who alſo ſat at that time in the ſame pauilion.) Whereunto Serafadin anſwered, That it was not long of him, who as one deſirous of peace, had not at any time taken vp armes, but in the juſt defence of himſelfe, againſt the injuries of thoſe his enemies, who becauſe they were more mighty than he, ſought continually to oppreſſe him. Hereat the three conſpirators aroſe, and with their grim looks bewraying their inward hatred, falſely charged him to haue beene euer the author of thoſe brawles: adding moreouer, That his inſolency was at that time growne ſo great, as that no ſtrange veſſell durſt for feare of him arriue at the ports of Sydon, Tyrus, or Berito; nor any merchant or merchandiſe paſſe ouer the plaines; but that thoſe countries, as though they were a prey and ſpoile to the theeues of Arabia, were generally ſhunned of all trauellers both by ſea and land, to the great hinderance of the Sultans cuſtomes. Serafadin would hereunto haue gladly replied, but preuented by Ebrain, and ſurcharged with many injurious words, was committed to the cuſtody of the two hundred Ianizaries of Conſtantinople. And ſo being by them brought into a rotten tent that was appointed for him, was euery night from thence forward put in the ſtocks faſt chained, and continually guarded with a truſty gard of the ſame Ianizaries. In the meane time came the anſwere of Man-Ogli, who wrote backe vnto the great Baſſa Ebrain as followeth:

Serafadin commeth with preſents to Ebrain.

To the Lords of Lord, Soueraigne aboue the Great Ones, the mighty, the noble Captaine couſin to the grand Lord, and the worthieſt among the elect of the Prophet Mahomet, the noble and famous Lord Ebraim Baſſa, God giue good ſucceſſe to his haughty enterpriſes, and proſperity in all his honour. I wiſh (euen

A letter of Man Oglies, to Ebrain Baſſa.

(euen as thou doeſt louingly inuite and exhort me) that I might come before thee, and follow thee, and ſerue thee alwaies in any occaſion that it may happen thee to ſtand in need of my helpe. For I know that thou wouldeſt reſt aſſured of the reuerence that I beare towards thy Lord, and of the moſt feruent deſire wherein I liue to ſerue him, and to imploy both my life and my ſubſtance in his ſeruice: whereof I haue alſo giuen ſome teſtimony, though but ſmall, in the managing of his cuſtomes that I haue receiued: wherein I haue alwaies ſo carried my ſelfe, as that I am not his debter of one aſper: a thing I wis that Ebne Manſur (who is now with thee) hath not done. For although by his comming to meet thee euen as far as Ieruſalem, he would make a ſhew of his fidelity, yet doth hee vſurpe more than two hundred thouſand duckats of the Kings, which he doth moſt vnjuſtly detaine from him of his cuſtomes. But my hard fortune will not grant me the fauour that I may come vnto thee: for there are at thus time preſent with thee three of mine enemies, who (I know well) being not contented to haue alwaies diſquieted and troubled my eſtate, doe now ſeeke to bring me into ſo great hatred with thy heart, that if thou haddeſt me in thy hands, thou wouldeſt without any conſideration bereaue me of my life. And I am aſſured, that this ſending for me importeth no other thing but only a deſire thou haſt to impriſon me, and ſo to kill me: for I know how much thou art giuen to great enterpriſes. Beſides this, my comming is alſo hindered by mine antient oath that I tooke: when as being yet but a childe, I ſaw mine owne father ſo villanouſly betraied by the murthering ſword of Muſtapha, being at that time the Baſſa of Damaſco, who vnder the colour of vnfeigned friendſhip, got him into his hand, and traiterouſly ſtrucke off his head. For in truth I carry the image of my fathers reuerend head, all pale, and yet as it were breathing, imprinted in my minde, which oftentimes preſenteth it ſelfe vnto me, as well ſleeping in the darkeneſſe of the night, as alſo waking in the light of the day; and talking with me, calleth to my remembrance the infidelity of the murthering Tyrant, and exhorteth me to keep my ſelfe aloofe from the hands of the mighty. And therefore I neither can nor may obey thy requeſts, and in that reſpect it grieueth me that I ſhall ſeeme diſobedient vnto thee, being in any other action and in all my cogitations wholly addicted to doe any ſeruice not only to thee, who art moſt worthy to be reuerenced of far greater perſons than I am, but alſo to euery the leaſt vaſſals of Amurath. Thou wilt pardon me I hope, and thou ſhalt well perceiue, that if there be any thing neere me that may be acceptable vnto thee, all that I haue whatſoeuer, though in reſpect of thy ſelfe it may ſeeme vile and baſe, yet is it thine, and is now reſerued wholly for thee, and not for me. Farewell; and command me, and hold me excuſed vpon theſe juſt cauſes which thou heareſt, for my being ſo backeward in comming to honour thee, as my duty requireth.

The poore and the leaſt among the ſlaues of the grand Lord,

The Sonne of Man.

Ebrain burneth 24 Townes of Man Oglies.

Ebrain perceiuing by this letter the reſolution of Man-Ogly, reſolued alſo in himſelfe to go vpon him with all his army, and either by force or ſleight to get him into his hands; or at leaſt to draw from him ſo many arcubuſes, and as great gifts and tributes as poſſibly he might: and therefore riſing with his campe, and turning himſelfe toward the country of Man-Ogli, he burned and deſtroied foure and twenty of his townes, and ſo mounting vp certaine rockes of Libanus, vpon the top of a large hill (that ſtandeth ouer Andara and other places belonging to Man-Ogli) he incamped himſelfe. But whiles the army was thus marching forward, Veis Baſſa of Damaſco with a great part of his people, and his ſonne the Sanzacke of Ieruſalem, with his ſoldiers likewiſe, to the number of fifteen hundred perſons, hauing ſeparated themſelues from the reſt of the army in manner of a rereward; as they were buſie in raiſing their tents, vpon the ſudden were furiouſly aſſaulted by a great band of Druſians of the faction of Man-Ogli, and diſcomfited. Which victory the Druſians ſo proſecuted, that they became lords of the pauilions, the wealth and armour of the Turks: and leading away with them their horſes and their carriages, put to the ſword fiue hundred perſons, and ſcarce gaue any leiſure of eſcape either to the Baſſa the father, or the Sanzacke his ſonne, who fled ſtreight to Ieruſalem, and neuer returned againe to Ebrain; but Veis his father ſtill followed the army with thoſe few which he had left, and was thought worthy of all men to be pittied.

Veis Baſſa and his ſon diſcomfited by the Druſians.

Vpon the hill aforeſaid, Ebrain continued twenty foure daies together, with abundance of all things neceſſary for victual: during which time he attended nothing els, but to try all deuiſes how he might draw mony and preſents from Man-Ogli, or how he might traine him into his hands. For the compaſſing wherof he diſpatched one Gomeda (Ebne-Manſuri Agent) vnto Man-Ogli being in Andrea, to tel him, That foraſmuch as he would not giue credit to the promiſe that was made him, nor aduenture himſelfe into the hand of his friend; he ſhould ſend him all the arcubuſes he had; for that the Sultans pleaſure was, that his people that went not to the wars in his ſeruice, ſhould not be furniſhed with ſo great ſtore of weapons, to the danger of their neighbors, and of the ſubiects themſelues. With great griefe of mind did Man-Ogli behold the meſſenger, as the man whom he well knew to be the agent of his deadly Enemy: yet in regard of him that ſent him, he forbare to doe him injury, or to giue him any reproch; telling him, That all his people and weapons were diſperſed abroad ouer his territory; ſo that he could not tel what arcubuſes to ſend him: with which cold anſwer Gomeda returned. Which thing when Ali Baſſa of Aleppo vnderſtood, he offered the Generall to goe himſelfe vnto him, and that to ſome better purpoſe. Many reaſons did Ali Baſſa vſe to perſuade the wary Druſian to come and yeeld his obedience to Ebrain, ſwearing that no harm ſhould bee don vnto him, and withall promiſing him great and honorable fauors. But neuer could he remoue the reſolute and prouident mind of Man Ogli, or win him to yeeld himſelfe into ſuch a mans hands whom he thought to be ſo murderous: yet at laſt with much ado, he ſo far preuailed with the Druſian Lord, that in ſigne of the reuerence he did bear toward the Generall, and his obedience towards Amurath, he was content to ſend a preſent to Ebrain. And therupon he gaue him 320 arcubuſes, 20 packs of Andarine ſilks, and fifty thouſand ducats to carry to the Baſſa for a gift, and to reconcile him vnto him. For the better effecting wherof hee ſent his own mother vnto the great Baſſa, who in the behalf of her ſonne performed a very worthy meſſage, excuſing him as wel in reſpect of his enemies that ſate there ſo neer vnto him, as alſo in regard of the oath which he had ſolemnly ſworn, That for the treachery of Muſtapha, hee would neuer commit himſelf into the hands of a Turk: and therefore beſought him to accept of the gifts that were ſent him, and withall a mind and heart moſt ready to ſerue and obey the King in all occaſions; and that he would hold him excuſed, for that his excuſes were but iuſt reaſonable. Wherunto the Turk replied, That although ſhe had found ſo foul a fault in Muſtapha (who vnder the aſſurance of his promiſe and fidelity had betraied her huſband) yet for all that ſhe ought not to fear any ſuch infamous or wicked act at his hands, who ſtood vpon his honour, and the word of a ſouldier. And ſo by oath proteſting all faithfull and conſtant friendſhip towards him; in token of his ſincere meaning, he caſt a white vail about her neck, and put another vpon himſelf, and the third he gaue her in her hands: Willing her to report vnto her ſon the othes he had made, and to carry that vail, and bring him with her; proteſting no otherwiſe to intreat him than as a friend and a brother. The peaceable old woman went away accordingly, but ſhee neither could nor would go about to alter the purpoſe of her ſon, but returned to Ebrain ſuch an anſwer as did not greatly pleaſe him. After which time hee ſought more than euer before to get the wary Druſian into his hands, or at leaſt, without regard of ſhame, to draw from him moe preſents and weapons. And therfore once again he ſent the crafty Gomeda, to exhort him, vpon faith and promiſe giuen, to come vnto him: but for all the craft and lying ſpeeches that the treacherous meſſenger could cunningly vſe, he could obtain nothing of the Druſian lord but good words only: yet at laſt after much fineneſſe, he preuailed ſo much, as that Man-Ogli was contented by him to ſend another preſent to Ebrain; with an expreſſe condition notwithſtanding, That hee ſhould cauſe Ebrain to depart out of thoſe quarters, and that he ſhould not himſelf return any more to requeſt any thing further of him. Which he very largely promiſed, only deſiring him to ſend a good number of Arcubuſes, therby to content the Baſſa fully: ſo he gaue him fifty thouſand ducats more, and foure hundred and fourſcore arcubuſes, with a thouſand goats, a hundred and fifty Camels, an hundred and fifty Buffles, a thouſand oxen, and two hundred weathers. With this rich Preſent came Gomeda to Ebrain, declaring vnto him, that this he had got from him vpon promiſe that he ſhould not moleſt the Druſian any more. For which promiſe ſo made, Ebrain ſharply reprooued Gomeda, and threatened to make him know what it was to take vpon him ſo dangerous a liberty: and for the greater deſpight both to the one & the other, Ebrahim would needs haue Gomeda himſelfe to returne again with the like meſſage to trouble the Druſian. Wherefore although he went in great feare of ſome miſchiefe by the hands of Man-Ogli, yet was there no remedy, but needs he muſt follow the commaund of him, in whoſe power it was to take from him both his honor and his life, and therfore on he went. But as ſoon as Man-Ogli ſaw Gomeda, thinking as the truth was, that he came again about his wonted requeſts, hee was at the very ſight of him ſo far mooued, as that he was euen at the point to haue thrown a dart at him, and ſo to haue diſpatched him, had not the regard of more dangerous effects ſtaid his fury: yet ſpared he not with ignominious words and deadly threats to diſburthen his choler. Notwithſtanding Gomeda could doe no leſſe than accompliſh the effect of his fraudulent deſires, and ſo wrought with him, that he drew from him foure burdens of Arcubuſes more, ten ſwords, ten gilt daggers, certain ſiluer belts, ten packes of ſilke, and ſome few pence. Cauſing him withall to proteſt vnto him; Neuer to ſuffer himſelf to be perſuaded to come again; for if he did, he threatned to kill him, happen after what would of it. With great ioy and triumph did Ebrain receiue this preſent, and thinking now with himſelf that he had gotten a ſufficient booty from him, he determined to riſe with his army, and to ſacke all the reſt of Man-Oglies country. Which he performed accordingly, and being conducted by Emir-Ebne-Frec, burned Andrea, the place of Man-Ogli his reſidence; and in two daies burnt and deſtroied 19 of his towns, with vnſpeakable cruelty committing all things to fire and ſword. After all this ſacking and raſing, Ebrain ſent diuers meſſengers to Man-Ogli, to try whether he would be yet perſuaded to come to him. But nothing could mooue the reſolute Druſian to commit himſelf into his hands, but rather increaſed his conſtancie to auoid a moſt certaine death. Now the great Baſſa ſtil thirſting after bloud and reuenge; vnderſtanding by a ſpy, That the Captain of Andrea (being one of the factors of Man-Ogli) with 350 ſouldiers was got vp to a certain hil, into a place of great ſecuritie, he ſent Emir-Ebne-Frec to intice him, and to tell him, That ſeeing his Lord Man-Ogli would not come and yeeld himſelfe, he ſhould come to him; which if he would doe, he would aſſuredly in deſpight of Man-Ogli make him a Sanzacke of ſome place he moſt deſired. The ambitious and vnheedy Macademo ſuffered himſelfe to bee eaſily perſuaded, and being accompanied with his 350 followers, went with the ſaid Ebne-frec and came at laſt to the pauilion of Ebrain, hauing firſt cauſed his aforeſaid men to ſtay behind in a valley two or three miles off. But Ebrain would not ſo much as ſee the Macademo, although both in reſpect of the nimblenes of his perſon, and alſo the fierceneſſe of his lookes, he was worthy to be looked vpon; but commanded him to keep in a ſeueral place from Serafadin, and in the mean time deuiſed, how hee might with the leaſt loſſe of his owne men, put to death thoſe three hundred and fifty, the Macademo's followers: which was by training them by means of the ſaid Ebne-frec, into a certaine Vineyard, and ſo hauing brought them into a ſtreit, ſuddenly to ſet vpon them and kill them. Which was accordingly performed; for being by the treacherous Emir brought into the place appointed for their ſlaughter, fearing nothing leſſe, they were ſuddenly incloſed by the Turks Sanzacks or Ianizaries, and ſlaine euery mothers ſon. This maſſacre thus finiſhed, Ebrain commanded the Macademo to be brought before him, and without delay to be ſtript and flaied quick. Who being come, ſtoutly vpbraided Ebrain with his promiſe and his oath: and among other ſpeeches which he vttered whilſt they ſtripped him, ſaid, Cut me off my members, and firſt putting them into the priuities of that infamous Ebrains wife, put them afterwards into the mouth of himſelf: for ſo I trow he will be contented and ſatisfied with my fleſh. And to them that were the executioners of his painful death, hee ſaid, It is your great good fortune indeed, that with ſuch violence, and needleſſe deformity you are now able to ſpill my bloud, and to take my life from me: wheras none of you all had bin able, or once durſt, man to man, to haue drawn one drop of it from me, no nor to haue endured my countenance. But go too, proceed in your wicked & vnſatiable deſire of my bloud, and fulfill the cruell command of your Viſier: for in the end there will alſo light vpon you the iuſt reward of this ſo villanous a fact. With theſe and other ſuch like ſpeeches the miſerable wretch was ſtripped, and three great gaſhes made on his backe, where they began to flea him: he in the mean time not ceaſing to blaſpheme their religion, and to curſe their King and their falſe prophet alſo. But the barbarous ſoldiers proceeding in their cruel action, made other-like gaſhes vpon his breaſt and ſtomack; and ſo drawing the skinne downward, could not bring it to his nauel, before he was with the extremity of the pain dead. After this, Ebrain cauſed the followers of Serafadin (in number about an hundred and fifty) to be cruelly ſlain, and all his country to be moſt miſerably waſted, he himſelf ſtill remaining in chaines.

Man-Ogli his lieutenant inticed to come to Ebrain, is ſlain quicke.

Whilſt the fire and ſword thus raged in the Druſian Country, Ebrain by ſpeedy poſts ſent

A to Sidon, where his gallies lay at rode, commanded, That diſbarking 4000 ſouldiers, they ſhould ſack all thoſe countries alongſt the ſea coaſt, euen as far as Cæſaria in Paleſtine, ſparing neither age nor ſex, of what condition ſoeuer. Which his cruel command was preſently put in execution, and three thouſand ſoules brought away captiues, great booties made of much rich merchandiſe, many towns burnt, ſundry caſtles raſed & layd euen with the ground; and to be ſhort, all the whole countrey both of Serafadin and Man-Ogli layd vtterly waſte and deſolate.

Ebrain was now in readineſſe to depart for Conſtantinople, where hee was by Amurath expected, as wel for his gold, as the accompliſhment of the mariage. But bethinking himſelf, that whatſoeuer he had hitherto don, would bee accounted little or nothing, vnles hee proui-B ded in ſome ſort for the quieting of thoſe people vnder the Turkiſh obedience, he determined to nominat one of the three Druſian Emirs that came to him to Ieruſalem, to be Baſſa of all thoſe regions. And becauſe Emir Aly Ebne-Carſus was the richeſt and moſt obedient of them all, he thought good to commit that charge vnto him, and honored him with that dignity, yet not without a bribe, but for the price of an hundred thouſand ducats. Wherfore he apparel-led him in cloath of gold, gaue him a horſmans mace and a ſword all gilt, and deliuered vnto him the Kings commiſſion, cauſing him withal to ſwear faith and obedience to Amurath. And ſo hauing (at leaſt in ſhew) ſet in order the affairs of thoſe mountaines, which an hundred of the Turks great Captaines had in former time vainely attempted, hee returned to Damaſco, where he ſtaied twelue daies, by ſhamefull ſhifts extorting money from diuers perſons. At C laſt hauing no more to do in thoſe parts, he turned himſelf towards Gazir and Baruto, places vnder the gouernment of Ebne-Manſur, where he arriued with all his army, and found the Gal-lies which he left in the port of Sidon, now in the hauen of Baruto, as he had before commanded. Now vpon a certain hil aboue Baruto, neer vnto the ſea, Ebrain had pitched his own tent only and no other; and hauing ſent all the reſt of his beſt and goodly things which he meant to carry with him to Conſtantinople, aboord the gallies, ſhrouded himſelfe onely vnder that narrow and baſe tent. Thither he called Ebne-Manſur, and in pleaſant manner told him, That now it was time for him to make paiment of the debt of an hundred and threeſcore thouſand ducats, which he owght the King his Lord for the cuſtom of Tripoli and Baruto; for that he could not longer ſtay in thoſe quarters, but was to return to Conſtantinople, which hee knew D not how to do, vnleſſe he caried with him the diſcharge of that debt. Wherunto Ebne-Manſur made anſwer, that it would not be long before his Macademo's would come with his monies, and that then he would without further delay make paiment. Which thing Ebrain well knew to be but an excuſe, and therfore determined with himſelf to thruſt him into the gallies: and becauſe he could not carry the mony vnto the King, yet at the leaſt to bring him his debtor.
But foraſmuch as he doubted to put this his determination openly in execution, for feare of ſome inſurrection among the people, as well for that he was within the territories of the ſaid Ebne-Manſur, as for that he ſaw him to be greatly beloued and fauoured of the other two Dru-ſian Lords, Ebne-Frec and Ebne-Carſus; he therefore thought it better policie, by concealing this his purpoſe, to ſhew him in his outward actions all good countenance, and by ſecret and E ſubtil means to take him priſoner. Wherupon hee deceitfully told him, That foraſmuch as he was to ſtay there about his buſineſſe that night, and was reſolued the next day to make a road into the Country of Man-Ogli; he therfore praied him to do him the fauour to be his guid; and for that purpoſe when he ſhould ſend for him at midnight, that he would come vnto him very ſecretly, becauſe he was minded to depart without any ſtirre, only with fiue hundred men in his company. The Druſian Lord verily beleeued the matter, that ſo it was, and withall was in good hope, by that means to find ſome way to eſcape his hands. Wherupon being called vp at midnight, he readily went to the tent of Ebrain, who preſently charged him (whom all men thought he had eſpecially affected) with many abhominable and foul terms, cauſing a chain to be caſt about his neck and his arms, and ſo faſt bound to be caried into the F Gallies. And yet not ſo contented, took the ſpoil of all his Country, whereby there was leuied ſuch a prey as was maruellous to behold: for beſides mony (wherof there was a very huge ſum) the ſtore of cloaths of ſilk and gold was ſuch, and ſo great, as might better beſeem ſome great Prince, than ſuch a mountaine ruſtical Lord as he was. When the Baſſa had conueyed all this into his Gallies, hee ſailed to Tripoli, where hee found Serafadin in the cuſtody of Veis Baſſa and Ali Baſſa; and hauing ſtaid there ſome few daies, wherin he committed ſundry villanous and abhominable outrages, hee cauſed the ſaid Serafadin to be put into the Gallies, with all his ſilks and other wealth, and ſo departed for Conſtantinople. Where at ſuch time as he entred into the chanel of the city, accompanied with 24 gallies, he was incountred and receiued by a wonderful number of his friends and fauourits, and ſaluted with an honourable peal of artillery out of the Seraglio. Iohn Thomas Minadoi, the beſt reporter of this hiſtory, as alſo of the late wars betwixt the Turks and the Perſians, being then at Conſtantinople, & hauing (as he reporteth of himſelfe) good means to ſee the bountifull & the beautiful preſents which the ſpoiling and rauenous Baſſa gaue the Turkiſh King; reporteth the ſum thereof to haue bin a million of gold, beſides the yearly reuenue of Cair, amounting to 600000 ducats, with 60 horſes moſt richly garniſhed, of ſingular beauty, but eſpecially of the Arabian race, a liue Elephant, and a liue Giraffle (which is a beaſt like a Camel and a Panther) two great crocodiles dead, a Chair of maſſie gold richly ſet with pretious ſtones, a Casket alſo beſet with pretious ſtones and gold, many packs of moſt fine cloathes, woollen and ſilkes, certaine other cloaths with fringe of gold & ſiluer, and the Barbarian cut-worke, moſt fine linnen of Alexandria, and all the arcubuſes taken from the Druſians: beſides ſundry rich preſents giuen by the proud Baſſa to the great Ladies of the court, reported by Leunclavius to haue bin worth two hundred thouſand Sultanines.

But now foraſmuch as we haue before made mention of the Sanzack of Ieruſalem and his flight, it ſhall not be altogether impertinent to our hiſtory (though ſomwhat out of time) to declare in few words what paſt between him and the Arabians of Paleſtine a little before the comming of Ebrain the great Baſſa into thoſe quarters: by which little the deſirous Reader may eaſily perceiue the woful and troubleſome ſtate of that ſomtime moſt bleſſed and fruitful, but now moſt miſerable and barren land of Iury, and of thoſe places in holy writ ſo much renowned.

Troubles in the land of Iury.

In the confines of Sodom, and in the places that lie not only betwixt the lake Aſphaltites and Damaſco, but alſo in the plains and in the vallies of Iericho and of Samaria, and in other places about Bethlehem, Emaus, Bethany, Bethſage, Capharnaum, Nazareth, Leuir, Bethſaida, Naplos, and other Townes of name thereabouts, there do haunt and liue certain Arabian captains, who ſpreading themſelues euen as far as Rama and Ioppa, ouer-run at their pleaſure al the countries there round about, and continually commit grieuous outrages, as wel againſt the ſaid Cities, as alſo vpon the goods and wealth not only of the inhabitants there, but alſo of ſtrangers: yea, and their inſolencie oftentimes groweth ſo great, that they dare to aſſault the fenced cities; beſides the ſpoiling of Trauellers, that by reaſon of their buſineſſe haue occaſion to paſſe from one city to another. They are good horſmen, but they vſe no armour; their horſes are very ſwift to run, and ſpare of diet, and are themſelues bold and aduenturous theeues. Theſe Arabians hauing had intelligence, that the aforeſaid ambitious youth, appointed Sanzack of Ieruſalem, was in mind to raiſe all the Sanzacks thereabout, and joining himſelf with them and his father the Baſſa of Damaſco, to reſtrain their inſolent liberty, & to work their deſtruction; reſolued with themſelues not to ſtay vntill hee and his Confederates were ready, but rather by ſundry inuaſions vpon him, euen vnto the gates of Ieruſalem, to prouoke him to come out into the field. And the rather to induce him ſo to do, they compacted with a certaine Subbaſſi of Bethlehem their friend, to incourage and animate the Sanzacke therunto, by promiſing him good ſucces and proſperous euents. The ambitious yong man, ſeduced with the glorious perſuaſions of the falſe Subbaſſi (of whom hee made good reckoning) and prouoked by their inſolencies, reſolued, as they had wiſhed, to iſſue out of the city into the open field; and therupon hauing armed an hundred of his Vaſſals, and raiſed all the horſmen that were vnder his gouernment, to the number of ſix hundred, he made a rode toward Iericho, ſending before defiance vnto them. Againſt whom the Arabians came accordingly, and with their arrows and Indian canes ouerwhelming his arcubuſes, as if it had bin a raging floud, wrought him great wo: when as in the very nick, the battel yet being at the hoteſt, the traiterous Subbaſſi fled towards Bethlehem, and left the ſouldiers of Ieruſalem in the hands of the Arabians, who put moſt part of them to the edge of the ſword, and ſcarcely gaue liberty to the Sanzacke to ſaue himſelfe by flight. The Sanzack certainly informed of this fraud of the diſſembling Subbaſſi, to be reuenged vpon him, began alſo in like manner to diſſemble with

A with him, feining that he would once more try his forces againſt the ſame Arabians; and ſo vſed the matter, that the Subbaſſi arming himſelfe, came vnto him without any ſuſpition of the miſchief intended againſt him. But as ſoon as he was come the Sanzacke tooke him, and preſently cauſed him in moſt cruel maner to be ſlain quick.

The Subbaſſi of Beiblem ſlaine quicke.

Thus hauing paſſed ouer the troubles that ſtayed the people of Egypt and Damaſco, and the countries therabout, from reſorting to Oſman the Turks great Generall at Erzirum, let vs again return thither where we left him, taking a view of the preparations againſt the Perſian, and proſecute thoſe affaires, which of all others moſt exerciſed the forces of the two mightieſt Mahometan Monarchs; and with the expectation therof filled the World from the Eaſt to the Weſt.

B The ſtreit commandement of Amurath, together with the fame and reputation of Oſman the General, had drawn together ſuch a world of people of all ſorts to Erzirum, as that it ſeemed not the power of one king alone, but rather the vnited forces of many kings. Wherfore Oſman perceiuing that he had gathered together too great a number of people, and too huge an Army, and that it might ſo fall out that hee might want victualls for ſo many (neither ſo greatly fearing his enemies forces, as that he needed to lead ſo populous an Army againſt them) determined to diſcharge a great number of ſuch as he thought moſt weake, and leaſt able to endure trauel: ſo that out of this great multitude he drew about 40000 perſons, who liberally according to euery mans ability redeeming the ordinary perils of the wars, returned home to their own dwellings. And ſo in Oſmans army remained 180000 perſons or therabout.

The number of Oſmans army.

C With this multitude the General departed from Erzirum about the 11 of Auguſt this yeare 1585, towards Tauris, continuing for all that the ſpeech for Naſſivan. But he had ſcarce marched two daies, when diuers ſoldiers of Grecia and Conſtantinople preſenting themſelues before him, vpbraided him with great improuidencie, telling him, That they began already to feel the want of victual, by wanting the ſame day their ordinary allowance of Corne for their horſes: ſo that if in the beginning, and as it were in the entrance of ſo long a iourney, they felt ſuch want, they could not tell with what iudgement or diſcretion he meant to lead ſo great a company ſo far as Naſſivan, nor by what cunning conceit he had preſumed to ſuſtain ſo great an army in the ſeruice of their Lord. Oſman quietly heard their complaints, and preſently prouided for them, by cauſing ſuch ſtore of barly to be diſtributed among them, as they deſired; D and ſeuerely puniſhed the officers who had the charge for allowance of corn who moſt couetouſly began to make merchandiſe of the common prouiſion, by conuerting it to their owne priuat vſes. And hauing thus quieted their troubled minds he proceeded on his iourny, & by the way of Haſſan Chalaſſi and Chars, arriued vpon the Chalderan plains, famous for the memorable battels there fought between Selymus and Hyſmael. In theſe plains he took a general review of his Army, wherein he wanted a number, that by reaſon of ſicknes beeing not able to continue the iourny, were inforced to ſtay behind, ſome in one place, ſome in another. Remouing thence, he took his way not to Naſſivan, as he had ſtil hitherto giuen it out he would, but now directly to Tauris. Which ſo ſudden an alteration of the iourny, ſo ſoon as the ſouldiers of Grecia and Conſtantinople heard, they fel into a great rage; and comming againe before E the General, reuiled with him in this ſort to his face:

And what are we, thou villain, thou Turk, thou dolt, whom thou handleſt in this ſort? We are not thy Oxen, nor ſheepe of the mountains, for the leading of whom thou thinkeſt thou art come out: neither can we brooke theſe thy lies and deceits. If thou haſt publiquely profeſſed to lead vs to Naſſiuan, and by thy ſpeech haſt trained vs from the fartheſt bounds of Grecia, to what end now, after thou haſt wearied vs ſo much, doſt thou deceiue vs with ſuch vanities, and prolong our iourney, & ſet before vs ſuch ſtrange and importunate dangers as our minds neuer once thought on? But if this was thy firſt purpoſe and intent, and that now, not fooliſhly or by chance, but vpon premeditation and good aduice thou changeſt thy election, why didſt thou diſmiſſe ſo many ſouldiers as might haue made the army more terrible and ſtronger for the en- F terpriſe of Tauris? Doſt thou thinke that by ſuffering others to redeeme their liberties, ſo to increaſe thy riches, thou ſhalt ſet our liues to ſale, and make vs ſlaues to the Perſians?

The ſoldiers inſolent ſpeech to Oſman.

At theſe proud ſpeeches the General was exceedingly troubled, ſeeing his good meaning, and the erneſt deſire hee had to aduance the maieſty & glory of his king, taken in ſo euil part, and thoſe his beſt ſoldiers ſo highly offended. And although hee could indeed haue readily G vſed the ſharpeſt and hardeſt prouiſions and remedies for it, that in ſuch occaſions are ordinarily applied; yet vpon good aduice he forbare ſo to doe, and in ſtead of rigor and puniſhment reſolued to work by more eaſie means. Wherupon cauſing many of the captains and chiefe men among thoſe ſeditious ſoldiers to come before him, he firſt perſuaded them,

That the former ſpeech for Naſsiuan was not raiſed at all by him, nor that he was minded at that time to go for Tauris; but all that was don, he had don to fulfill the commandement of the Sultan, who had charged him ſo to do, to the end to leſſen the Perſian preparations, which they would haue vndoubtedly made farre greater, if the ſpeech had bin giuen out at firſt for Tauris. Which his princely care for their ſafety, they for their parts ought willingly to further, for that in ſo doing they ſhould ſtill preſerue that great opinion which both the King and the world had conceiued of their valor and fidelity. Neither needed they to H fear, that the ſoldiers which were diſmiſſed might weaken the Army; for that they themſelues were not only ſufficient to pierce into Tauris, and to open the way vpon the enemy, but to daunt them euen with their looks: and that thoſe which were diſcharged, had but purged the hoſt of all cowardiſe, and left nothing in it but vertue and courage.

By this mild anſwer of the General the tumultuous ſoldiers were ſufficiently pacified; but much better apaied & contented they were, as ſoon as he put his hand to the common purſe, and beſtowed among them a ſmall quantity of monies; for by this his kind vſage al their ſtomacks were ouercome, and they themſelues became ſo willing and ſo couragious, that now they durſt venture not to Tauris only, but to Caſbin, yea euen to the fartheſt parts of all the Perſian kingdom. I

These important outrages thus appeaſed, the General turned himſelf with all his army towards Coy, a City ſcituat beyond Van, in the midſt betweene Tauris and the Martian Mere, where he refreſhed his Army with all things he could deſire. From Coy hee paſſed to Marant, a city ſubiect to the Perſians, plentiful alſo of all things needful both for man and beaſt. From thence he leaned down toward Soffian, a fruitful place ſubiect alſo to the Perſians: from whence he began to diſcouer Tauris. Great was the ioy of the whole camp, and now the mutinous ſoldiers of Græce and Conſtantinople could highly commend the aduice of the General, or rather of Amurath himſelf, in giuing out the rumor of Naſſivan for Tauris, as the only means wherby they were come in quiet ſo far; the Perſians being wholly occupied (as they ſuppoſed) about Naſſivan. Inſomuch that euery man beeing waxen couragious, and replenished with ioy, without any feare at all began proudly to plot vnto themſelues nothing but K ſackings, pillings, taking of priſoners, rauiſhments, robberies, and all thoſe inſolent and outragious actions that vſe raſhly to proceed from the greedy affections of thoſe barbarous Victors. Eſpecially they of the Vauward, who being deſirous of booty, and to diſcouer the enemies Countrey, deſcended downe toward certaine pleaſant gardens full of all ſorts of trees, ſprings, and fruits; where hauing ſatisfied their appetites, they withdrew themſelues to a certain little riuer, neer to a bridge called The bridge of ſalt water, and there ſtayd at pleaſure, attending the comming of the army. But while they were thus injoying the water, the fruits, the ſhade, the green graſſe, and other delights of the place, the Perſian Prince Emir Hamze, King Mahamets eldeſt ſon, who with ten thouſand good ſoldiers had cloſely couched himſelf, L watching ſtil when ſome of the enemies bands ſhould come downe to thoſe reſting places, ſuddenly ſet vpon them with ſuch ſpeed, courage, and fury, that as if it had been a lightning, and in a maner without any reſiſtance, he ouer-ran all thoſe Turkes and diſperſed them, putting to the ſword about ſeuen thouſand of them. And ſo leading away with him many priſoners, horſes, ſlaues, with ſundry enſignes and Turkiſh drums, he withdrew himſelfe backe toward his blinde father, who lay then incamped about twelue miles from Tauris, with 60000 ſoldiers or therabouts. Aliculi Chan gouernor of Tauris being left in the city with 4000 ſoldiers only. A greater army than this, not exceeding the number of threeſcore and four thouſand, was not the Perſian King able to levy: the principal occaſion whereof was the death of Emir Chan, for which the Turcoman Nation beeing waxen rebellious and diſobedient, would M not by any means be brought to defend that city, wherof Aliculi Chan their capital Enemie was now Gouernour. And from Gheilan and Heri there came not ſo much as one ſouldior to relieue the neceſſities of Perſia. So that with theſe ſmall forces (in compariſon of the Enemies) the Perſian King had no ſtomacke to meet the Turkiſh Army in plaine battell, but

The Turks diſcouer Tauris.

The Perſians ouer-run the vauward of the Turkes Army.

A ſought how he might with as little loſſe to himſelf as poſſibly he could, make trial of his forces, and by all politique means to weaken and anoy his ſtrong enemy.

Oſman vnderſtanding of this diſcomfiture of his vauward, forthwith diſpatched Sinan Baſſa the ſon of Cicala, and Mahomet the Baſſa of Caraemit, with 14000 ſouldiers to purſue the victorious prince: who in their purſuit vſed ſuch expedition, that at length they ouertook him in the way toward his fathers camp. But as ſoon as the prince ſaw the Turks ſo neer him, that without a dangerous and ſhameful flight he could not auoid the battell, couragiouſly he turned his face, and ioyned with them a moſt bloudy conflict: which being begun two houres before night, was moſt fiercely maintained vntil the darknes of the night bereauing them of the vſe of their weapons, inforced both the one ſide and the other to retyre. Which was don with B the notable loſſe of the Turks, who in this ſecond conflict (as it was commonly reported) loſt 6000 men, and had as was thought ſuffred a generall ſlaughter, had not the night interrupted ſo vncoth an action, wel worthy a thouſand day-lights. So that hitherto the Turks ſuſtained the loſſe of more than ten thouſand ſouldiers, and yet had ſcarce diſcouered or ſeen the City which they ſo greedily longed after.

A bloud conflict betwixt the Turks and Perſians.

The next morning the Turks camp remoued and came within two miles of Tauris, where they incamped. But whilſt they were ſetting vp their tents, Alicoli Chan iſſuing out of the city with all his gariſon and ſuch of the city as were fit to bear Armes, ſet vpon the face of the vauward, being now remoued, and with many cunning turnings and windings ſo charged them, that with great loſſe he forced them to retyre euen vnto the main battel, where after hee had C eſpied the great artillery, he without hurt withdrew himſelf again to the city. The confuſion of the Turks in this skirmiſh was notable, for in a very ſmall time the vauward was diſordred, and almoſt 3000 ſlain. But Alicoli not ſo contented, in the ſhutting in of the euening ſallied out of the city the ſecond time, and ſwiftly running along that ſide of the army which lay toward Tauris, ſlew the Baſſa of Maras, and did great harm in that quarter. Which don, without any ſtaying he fled to the Kings camp, and forſook the defence of that ſorrowful city which he could not hold. Neuertheles the Tauriſians, as many of them as remained in the City, gathered themſelues to the gates of the City, well armed, prepared to make a bloudy entrance for the Turks whenſoeuer they ſhould come. All the night was ſpent in watching, without reſt on either ſide, and yet nothing attempted. But vpon breake of day, a great multitude of D the ſeruile ſort of the Turks, and of the common raſcall rout, without any order from their captains, armed with corſlets, ſpears and ſwords, went to the city with reſolution to haue ſacked it, and ſo to haue inriched themſelues with the ſpoil and pillage of that wealthy city. But when they came to the garded gates, they found there contrary to their expectation, a terrible reſcue, and were inforced there to ioyn a hard and mortal battel, ſo that the wals, the entrance, yea all the ground thereabouts was bathed with bloud, and as it were couered with weapons and dead carkaſſes. And yet for all that, though the Perſians ſtood faſt and firm at the ariuall of this ſeruile rout, at the laſt they were conſtrained to yeeld the entrance, being ouercome by the multitude of them that out of the camp flowed in vpon them like a flood, and retyring into the city now aſſaulted and inuaded on euery ſide, they fortified themſelues in their houſes E vnder the ground, and in the corners and winding turnings of the ſtreets, from whence with their arrows and ſome few arcubuſes they did the Turks that entred great harm, yet were they not able to kil and deſtroy ſo many of their enemies, but that at the laſt they were too mighty for them, and wrought many grieuous miſchiefs in that woful city. And ſo a great number of this raſcall people that remained aliue, returned to the Turkiſh Campe, carrying with them too manifeſt tokens of the poor oppreſſed city: wherein the miſerable women and impotent ſoule ſtood embracing and ſtraining the doors and poſts of their houſes, and kiſſing their natiue ſoil, with prayers, mournings, and complaints bewailing their preſent miſeries, and yet feared worſe to come. Oſman the Generall now made acquainted with theſe calamities, cauſed a proclamation to be publiſhed, That no man ſhould be ſo hardy as to moleſt the Tauri- F ſians; and in the mean time went himſelf about the city, viewing throughly the ſcituation of it, and ſurueying the place wherein hee might both incampe himſelfe ſafely, and with better foundation and greater ſecurity erect a caſtle or Fort, for the more aſſurance of that conquered country.

The deſcription of Tauris.

ſpian ſea, and is ſubiect to winds, cold, and ſnow, yet of a very wholſom air, abounding with al things neceſſary for mans life, and wonderfull rich with perpetual concourſe of merchandiſe G brought thither out of the Eaſt to be conueyed vnto the Weſt; and alſo of others brought out of theſe Weſtern parts, to be diſperſed into the Eaſt. It is very populous, ſo that it feeds almoſt 200000 perſons; but yet open to the fury of euery Army, without walls, and vnforti-fied. The buildings (after the manner of thoſe of the Eaſt) are of burnt clay, rather low than high. For all things it carrieth the name, and was the place of the Perſian Kings reſidence, vntill ſuch time as that the late King Tamas remooued his ſeat further into his kingdome to Casbin. Neuertheleſſe both before and ſince, although it had beene ſundry times moleſted by the inrodes and fury of the Turkiſh Emperors, yet was it ſtill held in great eſtimation and renown.

Of this city Oſman Baſſa hauing taken diligent view, cauſed his Tents to be pitched on the H South ſide therof, where was a ſpacious garden all flouriſhing and beutiful, repleniſhe with ſundry kinds of trees and ſweet ſmelling plants, and a thouſand fountains and brooks deriued from a pretty riuer, which with his pleaſant ſtream diuided the garden from the city of Tauris, and was of ſo great beauty, that for the delicacie therof is was by the country inhabitants called Sechis Genet, that is to ſay, the eight Paradiſes; and was in times paſt the ſtanding houſe of their Kings, whileſt they kept their reſidence in this City: and after they had withdrawne their ſeat from thence to Casbin, became the habitation and place of abode for the gouernors of Tauris. Of theſe gardens and places Oſman made choice to build his caſtle in, whereof he gaue the model himſelf, & commanded that all the whole circuit of thoſe pleaſant greens I ſhould be inuironed with wals, and trenches digged round about them, to conuey the water from the aforeſaid riuer. Which was accordingly don with the greateſt care that might bee poſſible; the foundation of the imbattelled wals layd, the ditches digged fourteen foot broad and a mans height in depth; and in the ſpace of 36 daies the whole work fully finiſhed, great ſtore of Artillery mounted vpon the walls, and diuers baths, lodgings, and ſuch other houſes neceſſarie for the Turkes vſes, built within the Caſtle. The firſt day of this building Oſman fell ſick of a feauer with a bloudy flix alſo; which haply was the cauſe both of the ſlowneſſe of the building, and of many other loſſes which afterwards happened, as ſhall be in due time declared.

The caſtle of Tauris built in 36 days.

Fiue daies after the building of the caſtle was begun, news was brought into the Turkiſh K camp, That eight Ianizaries and diuers Spaoglans were ſeen ſtrangled in a bath within the city of Tauris. Wherupon the Zaini, Spahini, and Ianizaries came preſently to the general, declaring vnto him, That although he had with too much clemencie giuen order, That none ſhould hurt or moleſt the Tauriſians, and that according to his pleaſure, euery man had vſed modeſty towards them, and obedience to him, yet the Tauriſians themſelues had moſt audaciouſly ſtrangled in one of their baths, eight Ianizaries and certain Spaoglans: which iniury and inſolencie they ſaid in their iudgment was not to be ſuffered. This outrage ſo moued the General, that without any further delay he commanded the City to be ſacked, leauing it wholly to the pleaſure of his ſoldiers; who forthwith ſo vſed the matter, not as if they would haue reuenged an injury, but forthwith haue brought an vtter deſtruction vpon the whole Ci- L ty. Euery place was filled with ſlaughter, rauiſhment, rapine and murther; virgins were defloured, men children defiled with horrible and vnſpeakable ſins; younglings ſnatcht out of their parents arms, houſes laid euen with the ground and burnt, riches and money caried away, and in brief, all things ruinated and waſted. Neither were theſe miſchiefs committed once only, but the ſecond followed worſe than the firſt, and the third vpon that worſe than the ſecond.
So that it was a miſerie almoſt inexplicable to behold that city, ſo populous, ſo rich, ſomtime the court and palace of the Perſian Kings, and honour of that empire, now ſubiect to the fury of the Turks, plunged in calamitie and vtter deſtruction.

The miſery of the Tauriſians.

The wofull aduertiſement hereof ſore troubled the Perſian King, but the yong prince his ſonne much more; who moued with the paſſions of moſt inward grief, diſdain, and deſpaire, M and deſiring nothing more than reuenge, reſolued to attempt any thing, whereby to requite ſo great a wrong. In which reſolution hauing confirmed his army, he commanded fiue hundred of his horſmen to preſent themſelues euen to the very ſight of the enemies tents, as it were to dare them to battel. Which thing they performed accordingly, and made a gallant ſhew

A of themſelues. At the diſcouery wherof the Turks imagining that the Perſians were come in great number to aſſail the army, order was giuen by the ſick Generall, That Cicala Baſſa and Mahamet the Baſſa of Caraemit, with the people of Grecia and all their owne forces, ſhould go to incounter the enemy. Who preſently with their enſignes diſplaied (vnder which there ſtood about 34000 ſtrong, beſides a number of ſeruile people, yet men exerciſed in labours and perils, in all wel neer 40000) ſet forward. Now the 500 Perſians with a maruellous cunning kind of skirmiſhing dallied with the Turkiſh ſouldiers, and drew them forward for the ſpace of eight miles and more: and being brought ſo far on, and now ſorewearied with the skirmiſh, were luſtily aſſailed by the Perſian Prince, who with part of his army, to the number of about 20000 perſons, couragiouſly ſet vpon the two Baſſa's, and joined with them the B deadlieſt and cruelleſt battel that euer was written of. Wherin the Perſians hauing giuen a perillous onſet, and don great harm, it was thought that they would haue contented themſelues with ſo lucky an incounter, and ſo haue retired. Which the Turks minding to preuent, and not to return without a notable victory, hardly preſſed vpon them, hoping in the end to put them to flight, and ſo to giue them a bloudy and deadly ouerthrow. But the Perſians hauing quietly and with great aſſurance for a reaſonable ſpace indured the charge, at laſt as if they had bin freſh men made head vpon them afreſh, and began a moſt terrible battell anew, wherin the Baſſa of Caraemit aboue named was put to flight, and being wholly diſmaied and diſcomfited, fled back again to the camp, carrying with him the moſt manifeſt tokens of the vnhappy iſſue of the battel. Cicala the other Baſſa notwithſtanding valiantly and with great C cunning ſtil ſuſtained the fury of the Perſians, laboring by all means to incourage his ſouldiers, and to haue reſtored the battel: but when he had don what he might, ouercome at laſt by greater valor, he was inforced to betake himſelf to flight alſo; and ſo altogether diſcomfited, came to the camp without any enſigne, hauing left behind him 8000 of his ſoldiers dead vpon the ground.

Eight thouſand Turkes ſlain.

The Perſian Prince incouraged with this ſo fortunat a victory, by ſpeedy heraulds ſent to the ſick Viſier (whom he thought notwithſtanding to haue bin in health) and gaue him to vnderſtand, That if he were willing to fight, he was ready for him, and in what ſort ſoeuer it pleaſed him to accept of battel, to make him good account of his valor, and to cauſe him to know, not only that Amurath his maſter had moſt vniuſtly raiſed this war, but alſo that it had beene D good for himſelf not to haue taken the ſame in hand. Of this offer Oſman accepted: but being not able himſelf to anſwer the prince in perſon hand to hand, by reaſon of his ſicknes, which euery hour mortally increaſed, he ſent out all his captains with his army to dare him battel.

The prince lay ten miles or therabouts diſtant from the camp of Oſman, toward whom the Turks ſet forward in this manner: The main battel was guided by the Baſſa of Caraemit and Cicala Baſſa, with all the ſouldiers of Aſſyria and Babylon: The left wing was led by the Baſſa of Natolia, with the band of Grecia; and the right wing was conducted by Amurath Baſſa of Caramania, with the people of Soria; to the number of threeſcore thouſand, beſides thoſe that were left behind at Tauris, with the truſty gard of the Ianizaries, and the Artillery, for the ſafegard of the ſick Viſier. In this order they confronted the Perſian prince, who was E himſelf in the midſt of his army, with all his people in very good order, hauing on the one ſide the ſoldiers of Perſia and Hircania, and on the other them of Parthia and Antropatia, in all to the number of forty thouſand. The Turks feared nothing more, than that the Perſians fetching a great compaſſe about, ſhould with all celerity and fury ſet vpon their Tents, and the riches they had layd vp together in their pauilions: and therfore at euery motion of theirs they continually feared this ſudden out-rode. Whereof they had ſo much care, that retyring themſelues as much as they might, and feigning as if they had giuen place to the Perſians, it wanted not much, but that they had brought them euen within the iuſt leuel and mark of their Artillery. Which the Perſians perceiuing, without any further dallying hardly began to aſſaile the maine body of the battell. The Prince himſelfe beeing entred amongſt the F ſouldiers of the Baſſa of Caraemit (who as Generall ſuſtained the place of Oſman) and preſſing into the middeſt of the battell, diſpatched euery man that came in his way, and hauing ſingled out the Baſſa from the reſt, ſmote off his head, and gaue it to one of his followers to carry vpon the top of his Launce. The which being openly deſcried, brought a great terrour vpon the Turks,

The Baſſa of Caraemit ſlain, and his head cut off.

Turks, and exceedingly incouraged the Perſians; who imbrued with the bloud of their Enemies, and intermingling themſelues more and more amongſt them, made of them a moſt confuſed and generall ſlaughter; wherein beſide the Baſſa before named, there died the Baſſa of Trabſzonda, the Sanzack of Bruſia, with fiue other Sanzacks, and as it was commonly reported, 20000 Turks more. It hapned Amurath Baſſa of Caramania to bee there taken priſoner, with diuers other common ſoldiers. But night comming now on, & the Perſians being come ſomwhat too nigh the Turkiſh artillery, they gaue ouer the fight & retyred themſelues back to the place where the King lay incamped with the reſt of his army.

But now were diuers daies ſpent, wherin the new fortres at Tauris (as we haue before ſayd) was fully finiſhed; when the ſoldiers of Grecia & Conſtantinople, wearied to ſee their friends and fellows thus ſlain before their faces, and hauing alſo ſafely layd vp in their owne cuſtody ſuch preys and booties as they had gotten in the ſack of the City, reſolued with themſelues to procure their own departure; and ſo much the rather, for that the Winter was now faſt comming on. And foraſmuch as the Generall was through the immoderate flux of bloud brought weak, and in deſpair of life, and quite abandoned of all hope by his phyſitians, and therfore not to be ſpoke withall; they were faine by the mouth of ſuch as were their truſty friends about him, to repreſent vnto him the neceſſity of their returne, and withall, after many reuerend intreaties, cauſed it alſo to be ſignified vnto him, That if hee ſtood obſtinate, and would needs ſtay dallying out the time, in thoſe dangerous places where no need was, they ſhould be inforced to withdraw themſelues, and to forſake him. Oſman, who had now nothing els to do in thoſe countries, but only to leaue ſome conuenient garriſon in the new fortres at Tauris, liberally promiſed to ſatisfie their requeſts, by departing thence the next morning. So calling vnto him Giaffer the Eunuch Baſſa of Tripolis, a man of a crafty and cruel nature, hee made him gouernor and keeper of the new built fortres at Tauris. And the more to encourage him to take that charge vpon him, he gaue him freely for the ſpace of three whole yeares not only the office & authority, but alſo the rents and reuenue of the Baſſa of Caraemit, lately ſlain by the Perſian Prince, and withall honored him with the title of a Baſſa of the court; ſo that after hee had finiſhed his three yeares office of Caraemit, hee was then to goe and ſit among the ſoueraign ſeats of the Baſſa's of the port. The Baſſa ſeeing ſo fair and ſo nigh a way for him to mount to thoſe high honors (greater than which there is none in the Turkiſh empire) readily accepted the offer, & diſpatching his lieutenant to Caraemit, to gouern thoſe countries in his abſence, with a hundred of his own followers; ſetled himſelf in the ſayd Fort with a garriſon of 12000 ſoldiers, furniſhed with all neceſſary prouiſion vntil the next ſpring. The General hauing thus ſet all things in order, and carefully prouided for the ſafety of the Fortreſſe, departed according to his promiſe, and the ſame morning (which was the 87 day after his departure from Erzirum) came vnto a place called Sancazan, ſeuen miles diſtant from Tauris.

Giaffer vpon Oſmans departure made Gouernor of Tauris.

The Turks were now vpon the point of their incamping, in a confuſed diſorder and burley-burly; when thoſe that were hindermoſt in the army heard the neying of horſes, and the noiſe of drums and trumpets, as if it had bin the comming of an Army. Which when the whole Camp vnderſtood, they ran all headlong and diſordered as they were, to the reſcue, on that ſide where the noiſe of the horſes and warlike inſtruments was heard. But whilſt the Turkes were thus intentiuely buſied on that ſide to expect the comming of the enemy, the Perſian Prince without any ſigne or token of battell, with 28000 horſemen was ready vpon them on the other ſide: Who hauing diſcouered their Camels and other Carriages, wherupon their booty, their ſpoiles, and their riches were laden, which they had taken at Tauris, beſide much of their prouiſion of victuals for the ſuſtenance of the Army, he turned vpon them, and with a prouident and ſafe conuoy had taken for a prey eighteen thouſand of the Camels and Mules well loden with the ſame booties and victuals; which the Prince ſent preſently away with ſix thouſand of his ſouldiers: and he himſelf with his two and twenty thouſand Perſians entred into the Turks army, who now to withſtand his aſſault, had on that ſide alſo made head againſt him. A gallant thing it was, and terrible withall, to ſee what a mortall battel was made, what ſingular proweſſe ſhewed euen preſently in the forefront of the battell; for in a moment you might haue ſeen the tents and pauilions turned vpſide down, and their incamping Lodgings reple-

A repleniſhed with dead carkaſſes and bloud,victorious death raging and reigning in euery corner. The Turks themſelues were aſtoniſhed and maruelled, to ſee their enemies (ſo few in number,and intermingled among ſo populous an army of warlike people) more like fatal miniſters of death,than mortal men,to brandiſh their ſwords ouer them as if it had been lightning,and to make ſo generall a ſlaughter;& do to this day with great admiration recount the valor and prowe ſſe of the Perſians. But they al now doubting leſt the enemy in his fury ſhould forcibly haue entred the very lodgings of the ſick Viſier,it was commanded (not by himſelf, for he lay now at the laſt gaſp;but by him who that time commanded in his name) That the artillery ſhould ſpeedily be vnbarred and diſcharged ; which in that medly and confuſion of both armies,without any exception or diſtinction of perſons, ouerthrew both friends & foes, B and did more harm perhaps among the Turks themſelues,than among the Perſians:for at the firſt thundring noiſe therof the prince with all ſpeed retyred;after whom preſently followed al the reſt:ſo that the Turks which remained behind, were more anoyed with the deadly ſhot than were the Perſians,who flying away could not feel the damage, but that the Turkes muſt firſt be wel payd for their labor. The Turks purſuing the flying Perſians,made ſhew as if they would gladly haue ouertaken them ; but night comming on,they feared to proceed any farther than they might without danger returne. In this battel of Sancazan were ſlaine 20000 Turks,without any notable loſſe of the Perſians.

20000 Turks ſlain.

Among the reſt,in the ſame place died the Viſier Oſman, General of the late dreadfull, but now deſolat army,not by the hand of the enemy,but conſumed with the vehemencie of an A- C gue and flux of bloud. Whoſe death notwithſtanding was kept ſecret from the whole Army, euery man verily thinking,that it was but only the continuance of his ſickneſſe, becauſe the chariots wherein he lay were ſtill kept cloſe; and in his name Cicala Baſſa (for ſo he had commanded in his wil) gaue out anſwers and commandements to the whole army. Neuertheleſſe it was diſcloſed to the Perſians by means of three yong men,who in the life of Oſman hauing charge of his jewels and treaſure,were with the beſt thereof and the faireſt of his horſes fled to the Perſian King,to whom they reuealed the Generals death. The Perſians (who before had thought it not poſſible for ſo great cowardiſe and diſhonorable kind of fighting & ordering an army to haue proceeded from the vertue and valor of Oſman,of whoſe worth they had too manifeſt a trial and experience in times paſt) now vnderſtanding of his death,were therby D incouraged to attempt the vtter ouerthrow of the Turkiſh remnant, and ſo to giue them an honorable farwel. Wherupon the Perſian Prince with 14000 men followed the Turks, who had now raiſed their camp,and were remoued to a certain riuer of ſalt water,not far from Sancazan,where the prince cauſed a few tents to be pitched,about four or fiue miles diſtant from the Turks camp,the aforeſaid brook running in the midſt between the two armies. Now the Prince had purpoſed to aſſail the Turks in the morning,whilſt they were loding their carriages,hoping in that confuſion to haue wrought them ſome notable miſchiefe : which his deſignement was reuealed to the Turks by one of his ſpies whom they had caught;and therfore did neither riſe ſo early in the morning as their maner was,nor load their ſtuffe vntil ſuch time as they were all armed,and on horſe-back ready to receiue their enemies. By which their wa- E ry and vnuſual manner of riſing the Perſians perceiued that their purpoſe was by ſome means diſcouered. And yet conſidering,that if they ſhould loſe this occaſion,they ſhould finde no other good opportunity to anoy them before the next ſpring,they vtterly reſolued to aduenture the aſſault:and hauing obſerued that the enemies Artillery was on the right ſide of the army,they in the ſight of euery man began to enter on the left : but the Turkes preſently ſo vncouered and vnbarred their artillery againſt the aſſailants,as was to their great loſſe & danger. Howbeit they were ſo nimble and ſo quick to ſhroud themſelues vnder the enemies Army,and to auoid the miſchieuous tempeſt,that being come very neere the Turkes ſquadrons, they muſt needs join battel with them. The Perſians had purpoſed before,as ſoon as they ſaw the Turks begin to ſtir,to retyre,and ſo to draw them on into a very filthy and deepe mariſh; F which being then dry,was not feared or doubted of any, but only by thoſe that were acquainted therwith,or born therabouts. Which their policie the rebel Maxut Chan, and with him Daut Chan (as being well acquainted with thoſe places) perceiuing, gaue notice therof unto Cicala Baſſa,who preſently cauſed a great compaſſing wing to be made, commaunding them to ſet vpon the Perſians,and to charge them home:which was forthwith put in execution, ſo that their forefront opened it ſelf with very large and ſpacious wings vpon the Prince. Who no ſooner ſaw this their vnwonted order of comming on, but by and by he perceiued that his purpoſe was diſcouered: and therupon without any ſtay he began to retyre, calling his people after him: which could not ſo ſuddenly be don, but that 3000 of them remained behinde, all miſerably ſtifled, ouertrodden in the mire; with very little loſſe to the Turks. And this onely battel, of fiue that were fought vnder Tauris and in thoſe quarters, was leſſe hurtfull to the Turks than to the Perſians.

The Turks army diſcharged at Van.

The Prince returned to the King his fathers camp, recounting vnto him the whole action, together with the departure of the enemy. And ſo the Turks came to Salmas, where the death of the General was publiſhed. From Salmas they went afterwards to Van, where they tooke a ſuruey of their army, and found wanting therin about eighty fiue thouſand perſons, or as ſome ſay more. At Van all the ſoldiers were diſmiſſed; and Cicala from thence gaue notice to Amurath at Conſtantinople, of all that had hapned. Where firſt was publiſhed the death of Oſman the General (for whom were made many ſignes of great ſorrow) and together with his death were blazed the bloudy and mortal actions that were in that expedition performed: ſo that the whole city ſeemed to be greatly diſcomforted, and in many places were heard much ſecret railing vpon the king, many curſes of this war, and inſolent maledictions of theſe manifold miſchiefs. After that, was diſperſed the great fame of the new fortres erected at Tauris, of the ſacking of the city, and of all the loſſe that had hapned therin; and a general edict publiſhed in the Kings name, That through all the Cities of his Empire they ſhould make ſolemn feaſts, with other expreſſe tokens of ioy and reioycing: Which was accordingly done both in Conſtantinople and other places. There was alſo word ſent to the Embaſſadours of Hungary, of France, of Venice, and of other Countries, That they ſhould do the like: but they all with one accord anſwered, That it was neuer the cuſtom of Embaſſadors to make any ſuch ſignes of rejoicing, but onely when the King himſelfe in perſon returned from any the like victories.

In the mean time conſultation was held at Van, for the ſending of ſuccours to Teflis in Georgia. Vnto which important ſeruice Daut Chan to deſerue ſome reward at the hands of Amurath, offered himſelf: Vnto whom Cicala Baſſa deliuered thirty thouſand Cecchini to be conueyed to the fort at Teflis. Which piece of ſeruice the Renegat performed, and without any trouble relieued the ſouldiers in the fort. Which was ſo well accepted of Amurath, that he for the ſame good ſeruice honored him with the dignity of the Baſſa of Maras. Maxut Chan alſo the other Perſian Rebel, that guided the Turkiſh Army to Reivan, and afterward to Tauris, was in like manner by the ſame Amurath honoured with the great rich office of the Baſſa of Aleppo.

The miſeries the Turkiſh army indured in this expedition for Tauris, beſide the loſſes before rehearſed, were wonderfull: for as the Sanzack of Aman (a city of Soria in antient time called Apamea) preſent in all this action, reporteth in a letter which he wrot vnto Ali Baſſa of Aleppo, There was ſuch a dearth in the Turkes Army, that they were inforced to giue their camels bisket and rice, and when that failed they gaue them pack-ſaddles to eat, and after that pieces of wood beaten into pouder, and at laſt the very earth: which dearth indured vntil they arriued at Van. And at Tauris whilſt the fortres was in building they were of neceſſity conſtrained to giue their horſes their dung in very dry pouder. By reaſon whereof there followed a grieuous mortality of horſes, camels, mules, and men; and the ſtink that grew of this mortality was ſo great, that euery man was faine to carry a piece of a ſtrong ſmelling Onion vnder his noſe, to auoid the heauineſſe therof.

The fort ſo lately built in the royal city of Tauris exceedingly grieued the Perſians in generall, but eſpecially the King and the prince his ſon: to let it alone they reckoned it too great a ſhame; and how to demoliſh it they wel knew not, finding themſelues not only deſtitute of artillery, but alſo of ſuch ſufficient ſtrength as was requiſit for performance of ſo great an enterpriſe: yet prickt on with the deſire of glory, & the neceſſity of the cauſe, they determined euen in the depth of Winter to gather new forces, and with trenches of earth to approch the ditch, and to try if they could aduance a countermure as high as their wals, & ſo to attaine to the conqueſt therof. But in the gathering of their men they diſcouered new difficulties; for, to hire any ſouldiors either from Heri or Gheilan, was denied them by Abas and Amet Chan;

A and their Turcoman nation,which might haue bin the readieſt and the neereſt at ſuch a need, for the late death of Emir Chan,and for the ſucceſſion of Aliculi, were growne very contumatious: ſo that neither the King,nor the Prince, nor the Preſidents and Gouernours of that kingdome,could tell which way to turne themſelues. At laſt for the common ſafety,they determined to draw the Turcomans to a reconciliation,hoping that by promiſing them any honeſt ſatisfaction for the wrong wherewith they challenged themſelues grieued for the death of their captain, they would become more tractable to do them ſeruice in their common neceſſities. Wherupon the king ſent kind letters to the heads and captains of thoſe nations,and principally to Mahamet Chan,and to Caliſe the Sultan,declaring plainly vnto them the perils of his ſtate, and of the liberty of the whole kingdome,with the confidence he had in their valor: and that B therefore forgetting all that was paſt,as done not in ſhame or ſcorne of their nation, but only for zeale and loue to the kingdome,they would demand ſuch ſatisfaction as they deſired, and that he would be ready to agree to any iuſt requeſt they ſhould make. To which letters they readily anſwered, that they would come vnto him, to put in execution whatſoeuer he ſhould for the common neceſſity or honour of his State command. Now they had craftily amongſt themſelues already concluded not to ſuffer any other to ſit in the room of Emir Chan their late Gouernor,but only young Tamas the kings third ſon. Which concluſion they had plotted to themſelues,with a reſolution in the end,to cauſe him to be accepted for king at Casbin,in deſpight of the King himſelfe and of the Prince Hamze: nothing regarding, that by this action far greater troubles would ariſe in Perſia than euer were yet heard of; but only being wholly C bent to reuenge the death of one only Emir Chan. With this malitious and fraudulent reſolution,they to the number of ten thouſand(vnder the conduct of two captains,Mahamet and Caliſe) went to the king,in all reuerence offering themſelues with all readineſſe to be emploied in the enterpriſe whereunto they were called. The old credulous King, not ſuſpecting any miſchiefe plotted by theſe ſecret rebels,was greatly comforted at their comming: and although by ſome of his Sultans that had felt ſome inckling of this conſpiracy,he was aduiſed to deale circumſpectly and warily with them,and not commit any matter of importance to their truſt; yet did he thinke euery houre a thouſand vntill he had offered them ſatisfaction: promiſing them,that what captain ſoeuer they would deſire in the room of Emir Chan, if it were poſſible, they ſhould haue him. Wherunto the diſſembling Mahamet Chan made anſwer,That their D deſire aboue all things was to do him pleaſure and ſeruice; not doubting but he would appoint them ſuch a chieftain,as ſhould be valorous,noble,and acceptable vnto them. The king could ſtay no longer, but franckly declared vnto them,That to aſſure them of his good will, and to giue them an hoſtage in pawn thereof,he had made choice of young Tamas his ſon,to ſucceed in the roome of Emir Chan their late Gouernor. As ſoone as Mahamat Chan heard this reſolution of the king,who beſide all expectation, voluntary of himſelfe yeelded them the means to put in execution what they had maliciouſly before contriued againſt the peace and liberty of the kingdome: he became more iocond than he was wont to be, and outwardly ſhewed himſelfe ready for whatſoeuer the king ſhould command him; and in the names of the reſt,yeelded alſo large promiſes of fidelity and obedience, ſo that the matter might be performed for which E he had now giuen his word.

Ten thouſand Turcomans offer their ſeruice vnto the Perſian King.

The king,who deſired nothing more than to ſee the fort of Tauris raſed(which could hardly be done without the helpe of thoſe Turcomans) contrary to the aduiſe of the wiſeſt of the Sultans,and of the Prince,ſecretly,and as it were by ſtealth, gaue his yong ſon Tamas into the hands of Mahamet,as chiefe of all the Turcomans. Who to nouriſh the good opinion and credulity of the king,and to ſecure the prince and the Sultans,gaue a luſty beginning by the help of his followers,with trenches and rampiers to approch the fort. Neither was there any great time ſpent therein; for they had now almoſt made their trenches and mounts euen with the enemies wall,and the ditch it ſelfe was almoſt filled vp with earth,ſo that there wanted but little more labour to begin the deſired aſſault: when contrary to all mens expectation, the falſe F and wicked traitor Mahamet Chan with all his Turcomans, leading away with them the childe Tamas,departed in the night time,and vpon a ſudden, from ſo noble and honourable an enterpriſe:and blinded with deſire to put in execution his ill hatched purpoſe, couertly & without any noiſe remoued from the beſieged wals,and put himſelfe on his way towards Casbin: ſtill tearming Tamas by the name of the King of Perſia, and ſundry wayes abuſing and mocking the the poore old king and the prince. This ſo ſudden and ſo dangerous a rebellion, whereby not G only ſo honourable and ſo neceſſary an enterpriſe was to be abandoned, bnt the whole ſtate of the kingdome like to be indangered,exceedingly grieued all good men,but moſt of all the old King and the Prince his ſon:who no leſſe carefull of his rightfull ſucceſſion, than was the aged king of his preſent eſtate,both now hazarded by this rebellion;wholly inſenced with griefe and anguiſh of mind,began to caſt a thouſand deuices in his troubled head,what courſe to take,and what to reſolue vpon. To abandon the ſiege it grieued him aboue meaſure,and to ſuffer ſo pernicious a rebellion to go forward,ſeemed too dangerous for the ſtate of Perſia:and to prouide for both theſe miſchiefes at once,was altogether impoſſible. In theſe huge waues of contrary thoughts,he reſolued at laſt to turne himſelfe againſt the Turcomans,and to ſuppreſſe that rebellion, as moſt dangerous to the State. And ſo with twelue thouſand ſoldiers, and a part alſo H of the kings ordinary guard, all couragious and hardy men, he followed after the rebellious Turcomans;and marching directly toward Casbin,he ouertooke them at a place called Caliſteza, a daies journy on this ſide Casbin,and there joyned battell with them. Wherein many of them being ſorry for that they had done, would not ſo much as draw their ſwords againſt the Prince: many others fled alſo away for feare, ſo that he eaſily obtained a wiſhed victory ouer them. The ſeditious Mahamet Chan was taken priſoner;and by the Princes commandement preſently beheaded: ſo was alſo Caliſe the Sultan,and diuers other captains of this peſtilent conſpiracy. Yong Tamas was alſo taken,& by the direction of the Prince ſent to the caſtle of Cabaca. Fiue thouſand Turcomans of the late followers of the rebel Mahamet,fled out of the battell towards Babylon by the way of Siras, and yeelded themſelues to Solyman Baſſa of I that city; who afterwards repenting themſelues of their folly, ſought to returne againe into the fauor of their king,but all in vaine: ſo that being become rebels to the one, and ſuſpected to the other,they did at one time loſe their country,their liberty, their honor, and the fauor of all men as well friends as foes. The Prince after this victory held on his way to Gasbin, and there ſtaying,laboured to gather the diſperſed Turcomans,eſpecially thoſe that (moued with the honeſty of the cauſe)would not beare armes in ſo vnjuſt an action;intending afterwards to returne to Tauris, to attend the beſieging and conqueſt of the fort. This was the end of this dangerous rebellion, the chiefe cauſe that Tauris was not againe recouered out of the hands of the Turks,to the great weakening of the Perſian kingdome.

The Turcomans diſcomfited, & Mahamat Chan and Caliſe the Sultan beheaded.

Giaffer Baſſa ſendeth to Cicala Baſſa for aid.

Now Giaffer the Eunuch Baſſa Gouernour of the Caſtle of Tauris, fearing leſt the Perſian K Prince would with a greater army again return to the ſiege; perceiuing himſelfe to wax euery day weaker and weaker, by reaſon that many of his men ſecretly fled from him, beſide them that periſhed with ſickeneſſe,and others ſlain in aduenturing too boldly to go abroad to ſeeke for victuals;ſent oduertiſement thereof to Cicala Baſſa at Van: ſignifying further vnto him by writing, That if the Prince ſhould again return to aſſault the fort,he ſhould of neceſſity be enforced to yeeld it:and that therefore as he tendred the honor of his Sultan, he would be carefull to ſend him ſuccour,whereby he might be able to maintaine the fort: adding moreouer, That now it was moſt eaſily to be done, becauſe there were no forces of the enemies in thoſe quarters,ſauing onely a few which remained about the King, lying 12 miles off from Tauris.
Cicala moued with the importance of the enterpriſe propounded,and withall deſirous to gaine L ſome credit of glory and renowne with his king,entertained the aduices of Giaffer,and getting him to horſe with a traine of three thouſand harquebuſiers and good ſtore of munition,ſet forward toward Tauris. The Perſian king aduertiſed therof,ſent out ſpies to learn what way they held,meaning to meet them and to ſet vpon them: but theſe ſpies comming neere to Salmas, were apprehended by the forerunners of Cicala, and being put to torture, reuealed at laſt,how that their king was in atms,and on his way towards Sancazan. At which news Cicala was greatly aſtonied,as well for the danger whereinto the forces and munition which he had with him were likely to fall,as alſo for that by any loſſe which his troups ſhould ſuſtaine in this expedition, the city of Van(being indeed the greater and moſt noble frontier town in all thoſe countries) muſt needs be in hazard to be loſt, hauing left in it but his lieutenant with a very few M ſoldiers. Whereupon he determined to relinquiſh this dangerous enterpriſe,and to withdraw himſelfe backe to the defence and preſeruation of the city committed to his truſt and gouernment.
But although theſe expected and deſired ſuccours were not conueyed to Tauris as was intended,yet had Giaffer as good fortune as he could wiſh: for the preparations of the

A Prince were ſo long and troubleſome, and his returne ſo much prolonged, that there was time enough yeelded vnto the Turks great Generall now newly choſen (as by and by ſhall be declared) to go with a ſtrong army into thoſe quarters, and ſo to preſerue all that which the only expedition and celerity of the enemy might haue put in great hazard, and almoſt haue brought to a deſperat caſe.

In the mean time, Amurath the Turkiſh Emperor was greatly troubled at Conſtantinople in making choice a new Generall: on the one ſide, Oſman Baſſa hauing by his laſt will left Sinan Cicala to be his ſucceſſor, as a man of approued valor; and the many dangers he had run thorow in the late ſeruice about Tauris, with the great fauours he had in the Court, did not a little encline the King to his election: on the other ſide, he heard of a publike rumor ſpread amongſt B the ſoldiers, that they could by no meanes endure to be commanded by ſo young a captaine; and that ſome in plaine termes ſhould ſay, That they would not obey him: Which cauſed Amurath to doubt, that ſome dangerous diſcord might thereof enſue in the army, if he ſhould proceed to make choice of him. Then there was alſo Ferat Baſſa, the ſame man which had already ſuſtained that charge before Oſman, who now very ambitiouſly ſought againe for this honour, hauing of late performed ſome good ſeruice to the good liking of the King. Of any other to make better choice he had none, ſo that he ſtood in great doubt what to do. In the end, becauſe he was in good time to prouide for his affaires, he made choice of Ferat Baſſa, the ſame man whom he had before made proofe of: a man of great fidelity, of an honourable carriage, and already experienced in the leading and commanding of ſuch an army; to whom he C granted the ordinary authority, to mannage at his pleaſure ſuch affaires of the empire as concerned his journey. Vpon this reſolution, generall precepts were ſent out to all cities within the kingdome, to the Baſſaes & other Gouernors, with ſpeciall commandement, that all their ſoldiers, together with their taxes, tenths, munitions, victuals, armor, artificers, and to be ſhort, all their neceſſary furniture and prouiſion ſhould be ready and in order, vpon the firſt warning ſhould be ſent them the next Spring. Great prouiſion of money was made, and in Soria (beſides the ordinary ſum that is beſtowed vpon the yearely pay of ſouldiers in Reiuan, Erzirum, Lori, Tomanis, Teſlis, and Chars, which ſwallow vp all the reuenue of that country, and of the city of Tripoli, amounting to the ſum of ſix hundred thouſand duckats) there was taken vp in in preſt of priuat merchants in the city of Aleppo only, the ſum of threeſcore thouſand D Cecchini, to be repaied vnto them with the firſt monies that ſhould be receiued by the officers of his cuſtome houſes. A matter that moued an extraordinary grudging among the people, for that it ſeemed to euery man a very ſtrange and intollerable exaction, beſide ſo many grieuances laied vpon them, for corne, for carriages, for pioners, and for workemen, to endure this burden alſo of lending their mony, without hope of reſtitution thereof: yea, and indeed euery man did greatly wonder how they were thus ill aduiſed, to make it knowne to the Chriſtian Princes what ſcarcity and want of mony they had. The Generall had alſo with him foure hundred pieces of artillery, and did beſide ſo worke the matter, as that Maxut Chan (who was appointed Baſſa of Aleppo) was granted vnto him to be the guide of his army, as he had been of Oſmans; and that Cicala Baſſa of Van (ſcarce his good friend) was remoued from thence and ſent E farther off out of his way as Baſſa to Babylon.

The returne of Soria ſix hundred thouſand duckats.

And thus hauing put all things in readineſſe, he departed from Conſtantinople in the month of Aprill, in the yeare 1586; and paſſing ouer the ſtreit into Aſia, came to Siuas ſomething later than he ſhould haue done, being hindered partly by the Plague which then raged exceedingly in Conſtantinople, and partly by other occaſions incident to ſuch actions. At Siuas he ſtaied ſo long for the comming together of his army, and in muſtering men, that it was the later end of Iuly before he departed thence; ſtaying indeed the longer at Siuas, by reaſon of the exceeding dearth and want of victuals at Erzitum: which dearth was alſo ſo great in Aleppo, that a Venice buſhell of wheat was ſold for twelue Cecchini.

Ferat departeth from Conſtantinople, and commeth to Siuas.

Ferat yet making his abode at Siuas, but ready to depart, was aduertiſed by certaine Poſts F ſent from Giaffer the Baſſa of Tauris, how that the Perſian Prince was hourely expected with a great army, and that if he did foreſlow to ſend ſuccours, and to preuent the comming of the Prince, and ſo giue him time & leiſure to aſſault the caſtle, he doubted greatly how he ſhould be able to hold the ſame. Vpon which aduertiſement Ferat preſently remoued, and ſo haſted his journey, that about the beginning of Auguſt he was at Erzirum: and ſtill hearing more and more of the Princes comming, ſtaied not there, but haſted to Van: where hauing gathered together all his ſouldiers, and taken a new ſuruey of his army, he departed thence, and being preſently come into the open and large champaignes, to make prooſe of the readineſſe of his ſoldiers, he marſhalled them in ſuch ſort as if he ſhould forthwith haue ioyned battell with the enemy, and ſo in ſeemely order marched on.

The Turkiſh Generall continually feared, leſt the Perſians ſhould come vpon him with ſome ſudden aſſault: beſides that, The conſtant report of the princes comming to Tauris with his army, much increaſed his troubled thoughts. But on the other ſide, he repoſed great confidence in the conſpiracy that was now plotted againſt the life of the Prince, with the priuity of Aliculi Chan the protector and champion of Abas Mirize of Heri: who vnder colour of accompanying the Prince to aſſiſt his forces, had reſolutely concluded with himſelfe, and abſolutely promiſed Abas (hauing alſo giuen intelligence therof to the Turkiſh General) to rid the Prince Hamze of his life; or at leaſt (which he thought might more eaſily be brought to paſſe) in the ſundry reuolutions and variable changes of the battell, at ſome time or other to make him fall into the hands of Ferat, and ſo to ſettle his lord and maſter Abas in his eſtate. Vpon theſe trecheries Ferat grounding himſelfe, began with greater confidence to diſpoſe his deſignements, and ſomewhat leſſe to feare the fame of the huge preparations of Perſia againſt him. Which preparations in truth, as by moſt wicked deuiſes and malitious conſpiracies they were turned quite contrary from that end whereunto the Prince Hamze had continually appointed them; ſo if they had bin emploied with ſuch faith and fidelity as ſo righteous a cauſe required, without all doubt the writers of our time ſhould haue had matter enough in this 86 yeare to ſhew and repreſent vnto the World ſuch accidents as ſhould be nothing inferior to thoſe of the yeare before going. But foraſmuch as rebellion and diſcord, the two infernall miniſters of the diuell, haue for the vtter vndoing & ouerthrow of the glory of the Perſia, continually fauored the Turks army, no maruell it is that the Perſian nation cannot vaunt of any reuenge taken for the indignities offered them by their enemies; and that our Writers cannot chuſe but write of the true and vndoubted victories of the Turks, and the bare ſhadows of the Perſian exploits; which notwithſtanding many Chriſtians vainly beleeue, becauſe they moſt earneſtly deſire them to be true, although they do ſee to the contrary, by the manifeſt proſpering and euident conqueſts which the Turks haue in diuers their States and countries.

The glory of the Perſian kingdome ouerthrowne by rebellion and diſcord.

The Perſian Prince about the later end of Iuly arriued at Tauris with the greateſt part of his army, where he (contrary to the opinion of all men) ſtaid not, for what cauſe is vncertaine. But vnderſtanding that Zeinel Baſſa of Salmas, by nation a Curdo, lay encamped before the city, who of a Perſian was become a Turke, and had done great harme againſt the State of Perſia; he determined ſuddenly to ſet vpon him, and to chaſtiſe him for his rebellion. According to which reſolution, being accompanied with twelue thouſand ſouldiers, he rode to Salmas, where finding Zeinel with all his people encamped as he had beene before informed, he gaue him the aſſault. Zeinel more ready to fly than to fight, and his ſoldiers as ready as he, fled preſently, and fell before the Perſians, ſo that the Baſſa himſelfe with a few others had much adoe to eſcape and ſaue themſelues in the cloſeſt corners thereabouts, leauing the city committed to his charge, for a prey vnto the angry enemy: who entering into the ſame, ſacked and ſpoiled it, exerciſing thereon all ſuch cruelty, as partly the naturall deſires of ſouldiers vſe to practiſe, and partly ſuch as the Turks themſelues ſhewed vnto them in that miſerable and moſt lamentable ſacking of Tauris the laſt yeare. The like ſpoiles did the Perſian army in all thoſe quarters round about, and ſo would haue peraduenture returned to Tauris, but that certaine ſpies arriued vpon them with aduertiſement, That the Baſſa of Reiuan being iſſued out of his fortreſſe with fiſten hundred harquebuſiers, had committed the like outrages in the villages and fields thereabouts, as the Prince had done about Salmas. With which newes the Prince was greatly moued; and immediatly riſing with his army, and marching towards Reiuan, not far from the city encountered the Baſſa: who diſcouering the enemies forces afar off, began in great diſorder to fly and retire into his fort, leauing the greateſt part of his ſoldiers (making not ſo much ſpeed in flight as himſelfe) to the fury of the Prince, who put them all to the ſword, and did what harme he poſſibly could in all the places thereabouts.

At the very ſame time great troubles aroſe in the Druſian country: for Man-Ogli the valiant Druſian (of whom we haue before ſpoken) in reuenge of the iniuries done vnto him and his people

A ple by Ebrain Baſſa, and by a valiant kinde of reſtitution to recompence himſelfe of all thoſe bribes and preſents which by ſo many ſhifts and ſubtilties were by the couetous Baſſa wrung from him (as is before declared) had now taken vp armes, and hauing waſted and ſacked all the territory of Ebne-Manſur and of his other enemies who had yeelded their obedience vnto the Turks, without let forced all that country with ſudden inuaſions and inrodes, euen very neere vnto the cities of Balbecke and Tripoli, and did there exceeding harme. For redreſſe whereof, Amurath was glad to diſpatch away from the court Ali Baſſa borne at Aleppo, with the title of the Baſſa of Damaſco, and with authority to muſter freſh ſouldiers, and ſo wholly to attend the vtter ſubuerſion of Man-Ogli. But comming thither, he found all againe quiet, ſo that his preſence in that country ſerued rather for a reconciliation and peace making amongſt them, B than for the proſecuting of any further warre; which at that time was moſt neceſſary for the Turks to be auoided, as well for want of mony in the common treaſury, as for the exceeding ſcarcity of victuals.

Now the Perſian Prince hauing made an end of the outrodes and ſpoiles before mentioned, retired himſelfe to Tauris, and ſo towards his fathers campe, where the reſt of his army was now arriued, to the number of about forty thouſand: of whom the Prince diſpatched away the ſoldiers of Heri to the number of eight thouſand, vnder the conduct of the traiterous Aliculi Chan their Generall: and part alſo of the Turcomans, vnder the leading of Emanguli Chan; with ſpeciall charge, That they ſhould by the way in places of moſt aduantage, meet and receiue the enemies army; and in thoſe narrow and troubleſome paſſages to do them what miſ- C chiefe they poſſible could. Which the Prince thus appointed, thinking by this means to weaken the enemies forces, and ſo at their arriuall at Tauris, to come vpon them with all his power, and ſo vtterly to deſtroy them.

Both theſe captains departed accordingly, making ſhew that they would with all affection accompliſh the commandement of their Prince; yet neuer was there heard any ſeruice of moment put in execution by them: for Aliculi ful of treaſon, after their departure began to alledge many forced reaſons & excuſes, Why they ſhould ſurceaſe from meeting with the Turks; and Emanguli as yet vtterly ignorant of the wicked purpoſes and miſchieuous trechery of Aliculi, ſuffered himſelfe to be miſſe-led by him alſo. By the delaies and negligence of theſe two Perſian captains, the Turkiſh General took leiſure without any loſſe or hinderance at all, to arriue D at Tauris, and to put the deſired ſuccors into the fort: at what time the Perſian prince by good hap had got knowledge of the trechery of Aliculi, and of the deſignements which many of the Sultans had lately contriued, for the betraying of him aliue into the hands of the Turkiſh Generall. Of which ſuſpition he being greatly afraid, durſt not only not truſt himſelfe to performe thoſe battels that he had before determined to haue performed; but quite abandoning this noble and honorable enterpriſe, wholly emploied all his care and ſtudy for the ſafety of his own perſon, and ſo left the triumph of the matter in the power of the Turks. And thus thoſe great hopes and expectations which the Perſians had conceiued of great exploits to haue bin done againſt the enemy, did not only proue vain and come to no good iſſue; but contrariwiſe by this diſcouery were conuerted into moſt ſtrange diſturbances, and all Perſia ther- E by endured ſundry alterations and reuolutions of moſt important conſequencies. For both Aliculi Chan and his complices were purſued by the Prince, as rebels and traitors: and alſo Abas Mirize of Heri was manifeſtly diſcouered for a wicked and trecherous contriuer of his brothers death: whereby the common miſchiefes were encreaſed more than euer they were before, and the publike calamities yeelded greater hopes vnto the Turks than they had euer before conceiued in all the courſe of theſe wars.

Aliculi and Emanguli Chan performe nothing againſt the Turks, as was by the Prince expected.

Ferat putteth ſuccours into the fort at Tauris.

When Ferat had thus relieued them in the caſtle of Tauris, leauing for the cuſtody thereof Giaffer the Baſſa with his former companies, hee returned towards Erzirum: hauing firſt cauſed a fort to be erected at Curchiue Tauris, a place neere vnto Tauris; another at Coy; and the third at Cum: in euery one of which forts he left a conuenient number of ſouldiers, with F all things neceſſary and ſufficient for their maintenance, and defence of the places they were to keepe. He ſent alſo ſuccors to the fort at Teflis in Georgia, which they had long expected, and now moſt ioyfully receiued. But the Perſian Prince hauing hunted Aliculi Chan out of the quarters of Tauris, thought himſelfe now wholly deliuered from the great feare of treaſon and rebellion, wherein he of late liued: and therefore in as great haſt as he could, put himſelfe on his journey towards Genge: in which place hauing gathered together a good number of ſouldiers, he determined to remoue thence, to intercept the ſuccors that were by the Turks to be brought to Teflis. Now he had alwaies found Emanguli Chan to be both faithfull and wiſe, and in him he repoſed an aſſured confidence to performe any enterpriſe that he had in hand, and communicated with him euery deuice that he had conceiued in theſe wars. And therefore he made head and joyned with him; and lodging moſt familiarly in his city, he ſtaid there for the ſetting in order and diſpoſing of his aforeſaid deſignements, being very deſirous not to let ſuch an opportunity to ouerſlip, without ſignification vnto the World of ſome notable nouelty, which might be correſpondent to the fame that of matters paſſed and performed the yeare before, was now ſpread and publiſhed abroad ouer all the World. But when he was euen at the very faireſt to haue put this his deſire in execution, and leaſt of all feared any trechery or treaſon, vpon a ſudden in the night time as he ſlept vpon a pallet he was miſerably ſtrucken through the body, by an Eunuch of his that attended vpon him: and ſo the moſt reſplendent and bright luſtre that euer ſhined in Perſia, was vtterly extinguiſhed. What was the occaſion thereof, and who procured his death, diuers and ſundry are the opinions of men. Some thinke, that his brother Abas Mirize of Heri, who had before conſpired to haue had him betraied into the hands of the Turkiſh Generall, had now by force of money and gifts enduced the wicked Eunuch thereunto. Others deemed it not to haue beene done without the priuity of his father, as more deſirous to prefer Abas Mirize his other ſon vnto the kingdome. Diuers others do diuerſly reaſon of the matter: ſo that to affirme of a certainty, that thus or thus the death of ſo worthy a Prince was procured, were great raſhneſſe: and therefore we leaue it, with the further proceſſe of the Perſian State, vnto the further diſcouery of time, the antient mother of Truth.

The Perſian prince ſlain by one of his Eunuchs.

Notwithſtanding the league betwixt the Chriſtian Emperour Rodolph the ſecond and Amurath the great Turke, many ſharp ſkirmiſhes oftentimes fell out betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks vpon the frontiers of their territories and dominions, eſpecially in Hungary, Croatia, and Stiria: as now in the later end of this yeare 1586 in the month of December, the Turks, after their inſolent manner making an inrode into the borders of Croatia, receiued a notable ouerthrow by the Chriſtians being in number much fewer: where amongſt others, the Baſſa of Boſna with his brother was ſlaine; whoſe head with certaine priſoners was ſent to Vienna to Erneſtus Archduke of Auſtria, the Emperors brother. This Baſſa of Boſna and his brother, ſlaine in this conflict (as we haue ſaid) are reported to haue beene the ſons of Muhamet the late great Viſier, by one of the daughters of Selymus the ſecond, Amurath his ſiſter. For diuers yeres following, Amurath did no great matter worth the remembrance, contenting himſelfe (as it ſhould ſeeme) with that he had already got from the Perſians; and holding his league in ſome reaſonable ſort with the Chriſtians: yet not ſo, but that many a bloudy broile, tending at laſt euen to the breach of the league, paſſed betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians; which for the continuation of the Hiſtory we will briefely ſet downe, as they are vnto vs by the Writers of our time reported.

The Caſtle of Koppan in Hungary ſurpriſed by the Chriſtians.

In February the yeare following, which was the yeare 1587, the Chriſtians prouoked by the often outrages of the Turks, ſetting vpon the caſtle of Koppan, not far from the lake of Balaton, being then frozen, by good fortune ſurpriſed it. There were at that time in the caſtle three of the Turks Sanzackes, and about a thouſand Turks, of whom an hundred and ninety of the better ſort, with ſeuenty women, beſides diuers of the meaner ſort, fell into the hands of the Chriſtians; the reſt ſauing themſelues by flight, or by creeping into ſecret corners: an hundred horſes for ſeruice were there taken alſo, and ſo much booty as was eſteemed to be worth forty thouſand duckats. Of the three Sanzackes that were there preſent, Alis Sanzacke of Koppan was taken, and brought firſt to Vienna, and afterward preſented to the Emperor: Another of them ſtanding vpon his defence in a vault vnder ground, was there ſmothered: the third eſcaped by flight, but was afterwards the ſame yeare taken with diuers others, as ſhall be forthwith declared.

The eight of Auguſt following, foure of the Turks great Commanders in Hungary, viz. the Baſſa of Ziget, the Sanzackes of Mohas, of Quinque Eccleſiæ, and the new Sanzacke of Koppan, with fiue thouſand ſouldiers brake into the borders of the Chriſtians, and in moſt cruell manner deſtroyed ſeuenteene countrey villages about Limbach: carrying away with them all the miſerable countrey people, with the ſpoile of the countrey. Whereof George County Serinus (ſonne to that moſt valiant County Nicholas Serinus ſlaine at Ziget) commander of the garriſon of Caniſia, vnderſtanding, with as much ſpeed as was poſſible raiſed ſuch forces as he was able out of his territory betwixt the riuers of Dranus and Mura, and calling vnto his aid the County Nadaſti, the Lord Bathianius, and ſome other valiant Captaines that had the charge of thoſe frontiers; with ſuch diligence tooke the ſtreits and paſſages whereby the Turks muſt needs returne among the mariſhes, that the Turks comming backe again that way with a very rich prey and many priſoners, being in the breake of the day hardly charged by thoſe moſt expert and reſolute ſouldiers, in thoſe ſtreit and troubleſome paſſages about a mile from Caniſia, were at length diſcomfited and put to flight with ſuch a miſerable ſlaughter, that many of them yeelded vp their ſcimitars, pittifully crying for mercy; other ſome fled backe into the woods and forreſts; and many running headlong into the mariſhes, there periſhed, or ſticking faſt in the deepe mud, cried together for mercy and helpe of their enemies. In this conflict Muhamet the Sanzacke of Quinque-Eccleſiæ (ſon to Haly Baſſa ſlaine in the battell of Lepanto) was taken priſoner. Sinan Beg Sanzacke of Mohaz, thinking to eſcape through the mariſh, ſtucke faſt with his horſe, and was ſhot through the head with a ſmall ſhot and there died. The Baſſa of Ziget, with Chaſan the new Sanzacke of Koppan, ſeeing all deſperat and loſt, fled betimes out of the battell: but he of Koppan wandering vp and downe in the woods, was the next night after the battell with others taken: the Baſſa of Ziget almoſt ſpent with hunger and griefe of minde, eſcaped on foot ſeuen daies after to Breſenza. There were taken of the Turks a thouſand three hundred, of whom many died afterwards of their wounds. In this battell there were ſlain of the Turks, with them that periſhed in the mariſhes and woods, about 2000, and of the Turks horſes were taken aboue 1500. All the prey before taken by the Turks, with the miſerable captiues was againe recouered. The number of them that performed this notable ſeruice, was in all but fifteen hundred foot & fiue hundred horſe, of whom there was but eleuen ſlaine, but moſt of the reſt wounded. Foure hundred heads of the ſlaine Turks were (after the manner of thoſe bordering ſouldiers) carried for ſhew to Caniſia, with fiue hundred priſoners. The Chriſtian ſouldiers with the helpe of the countrey people, ceaſed not for certaine daies to hunt after the Turkes that were fled into the woods, as after wilde beaſts, of whom they found a great number: diuers others alſo ſeeing no meanes to eſcape, came forth of their lurking places and yeelded themſelues.

Amurath vnderſtanding of all theſe troubles that had ſo happened, commanded Aly the Baſſa of Buda to be ſtrangled, for that he had broken the league, and not reſtrained the inſolency of the Sanzackes, whom he might haue commanded: and in his ſtead placed Sinan Baſſa, whom before in diſgrace, hee had now at the requeſt of his wife againe receiued into fauour, and reſtored to his former dignity. About this time alſo Sigiſmund (the King of Sweden his ſonne) now after the death of King Stephen choſen King of Polonia, and Maximilian the Emperours brother rejected; euen in the beginning of his reigne ſought to renew the league which Stephen his predeceſſor and other the Polonian Kings had before made with Amurath and his predeceſſors the Turkiſh Sultans. And to that purpoſe writ vnto him as followeth:

Aly Baſſa of Buda ſtrangled by the commandement of Amurath.

Sinan Baſſa againe receiued into fauour.

Sigiſmund the third, King of Polonia, vnto Amurath the third, Emperor of the Turks, ſendeth greeting.

THe Almighty long keepe and preſerue your Majeſty in health and honour. Moſt Mighty Prince, our beſt beloued friend and neighbour, after that we by the grace and goodneſſe of God were choſen to gouerne the kingdome of Polonia, and the Embaſſadours of that kingdome had ſignified ſo much vnto vs; we prouiding vs of neceſſaries, came to Danske the eighteenth of October, from whence we ſent Iohn Zamogil our Secretary, to giue your Majeſty to vnderſtand of this our comming. For being told by the Polonian Embaſſadors, That we were choſen vnto the gouernment of that kingdome, vpon condition, That according vnto the cuſtome of our predeceſſors the Polonian Kings, we ſhould keepe loue and friendſhip with the moſt Excellent * Muſſulman Emperors; we promiſe vnto your Soueraigne Majeſty, That we are willing with the like or greater zeale and deuotion, to continue that amity and friendſhip with your moſt excellent Majeſty and the Othoman Emperors your Succeſſors. For confirmation whereof ſo ſoone Sigiſmund the Polonian King his letter vnto Amurath.

* The Turks deſire to be called Muſſulmen, which in their language ſignifieth a true beleeuer.

as we ſhall come vnto Cracouia the regall city of Polonia, and there be crowned, we will forthwith ſend our great Embaſſador vnto your Majeſty. In the meane time we moſt earneſtly requeſt your Majeſty, that our kingdome may on your Majeſties behalfe reſt in ſafety and peace: which we perſuade our ſelues you will eaſily grant. So wiſhing vnto you all health and happineſſe, we bid you farewell. From Danske the eighteenth of October, in the yeare 1587, and of our reigne the firſt.

Vnto which the Kings requeſt and letters, Amurath not long after returned this anſwer in writing:

Amurath the third, Emperour of the Turks; vnto Sigiſmund King of Polonia, greeting.

Amurath his anſwer vnto the letters of Sigiſmund.

I Take it well, and as a token of your loue, that your Embaſſador Iohn Samogil came with your letters vnto our moſt high and glorious Court, the refuge of diſtreſſed Princes: wherein you haue giuen vs to vnderſtand, how that in ſtead of the moſt excellent and famous King Stephen, of worthy memory, late King of Polonia; you, diſcended of the ſame noble ſtocke and race of the Polonian Kings, are by the free election of the whole State of the famous kingdome of Polonia and the great Kingdome of Lithuania, choſen King of Polonia: and being ſent for by lawfull Embaſſadors, by the fauour and goodneſſe of God, to be come vnto the city of Danske, and from thence to be about to go vnto Cracouia, the chiefe city of the kingdome of Polonia. And when you are there arriued, to ſend your Embaſſador vnto our moſt high and glorious Court, to confirme, preſerue, and eſtabliſh the league and amity commodious and neceſſary for both our Kingdomes, honoured and kept by your antient predeceſſors, with our grandfathers and great grandfathers; yea, and that with greater zeale and deuotion than any your noble Anceſtors. And therefore your Embaſſadour in your name requeſteth, That no inuaſion on our behalfe be made into the borders of the Kingdome of Polonia, or any harme there done: and that the moſt noble Tartar Prince Isban Gerai, (whom God bleſſe) ſhould be warned, that he neither make nor ſuffer any incurſion to be made into the confines of the Kingdome of Polonia. All which things in your letters contained, with the reſt which your Embaſſadour hath by word of mouth deliuered, are with ſpeed orderly by vs conceiued. Know you therefore, our moſt ſtately and magnificent Court to be alwaies open vnto ſuch as reſort thereunto, and that from thence neuer man had repulſe, neither ſhall hereafter haue: wherefore it beſeemeth you, as ſoone as theſe our letters ſhall be brought vnto you, to open your eies, and to beware that nothing be on your part done againſt the Majeſty of our Court, and the league; and that our peace and amity be neither in much or little diſturbed, but as beſt beſeemeth, well and ſincerely kept: and ſo perſuade your ſelfe it ſhall be on our part alſo be moſt inuiolately obſerued. Our Letters are alſo directed vnto the moſt excellent Tartar Prince Isban Gerai (whom God bleſſe) ſtreitly charging and commanding him, not to make or ſuffer any incurſion to be made into the borders of Polonia. In briefe, the league and amity ſhall be on our part religiouſly kept: and whoſoeuer ſhall preſume to do any harme vnto the kingdome or confines of Polonia, ſhall therefore without faile receiue from vs due puniſhment. So on your part alſo it is requiſite that the ſame be done, and that in declaration of your loue, you forget not oftentimes to intimate vnto our moſt high and glorious Court, ſuch certaine occurrents and newes as ſhall happen in thoſe parts: which ſhall be vnto vs a ſigne of your ſincere loue and friendſhip. So know you and giue credit vnto this our ſeale. From Conſtantinople.

Neither was King Sigiſmund vnmindefull of this his promiſe before made for the ſending of his Embaſſador; but being poſſeſſed of the Polonian kingdome, ſent Chriſtopher Dziercius (his ſecretary) Embaſſador vnto Amurath, for the confirming of the league: which hee hath euer ſince ſo firmely kept with the Turke, that he could neuer by any entreaty of the Emperor, or of the Princes Electors, or others, or in reſpect of the common danger, be drawne into the fellowſhip of this long and religious war, ſo hardly maintained by the Emperor and ſome few other Chriſtian Princes his confederats; firſt againſt Amurath whileſt he liued, and euer ſince againſt Mahomet his ſon, which now reigneth; the iſſue whereof, God grant it proue not as well vnto the Polonians as others farther off, in fine lamentable.

The yeare following, Ferat (yet the Turks Generall in Perſia) tooke the city of Genge, being before for feare of the Turks quite abandoned & forſaken by the Inhabitants; who yet vpon his faith giuen for their ſafety, returned againe, yeelding to pay vnto the Turke a yerely tribute

A but of fiue thouſand ducats. But when he would haue gon farther into the enemies country, hauing part of his army cut off by the way, he was by his mutinous ſouldiers foulely entreated, wounded and enforced to retire. Cicala Baſſa alſo paſſing ouer the riuer Euphrates, had in thoſe quarters diuers bloudy skirmiſhes with the Perſians, ſometime carrying away the better, and ſometime the worſe, as the fortune of the field ſerued. Vntill at length Amurath himſelfe no leſſe weary than his people of that long and chargeable war, and the Perſian King alſo inclining to peace; he by the perſuaſion of Sinan Baſſa (but lately before receiued into fauour) was now contented to be entreated to hearken vnto the ſame: moued thereunto as well by reaſon of new troubles then in other places ariſing, as for the great famine and plague then raging in Conſtantinople. And conſidering withall what a great Territory he had won from B the Perſians, and how neceſſary it was for him by peace to confirme himſelfe in thoſe his new conqueſts, and by the building of certaine ſtrong forts for the ſuccour of one another, and by the placing of the Timariots therein, to aſſure the ſame vnto him: all which without peace he could not poſſibly do, as the old Baſſa right wiſely told him. For which reaſon he yeelded to peace; and ſo Embaſſadours paſſing to and fro, a peace was at length agreed vpon betwixt theſe two great Mahometan Princes: the Turke couenanting to keepe vnto him ſelfe the places he had already gained; namely, Tauris, Genge, Siruan, and Chars, with all the profits thereof ariſing, for the maintenance of his garriſons and Timariots there. Whereof it was thought new ſtirres would eftſoones ariſe; the Turks growne inſolent of their late victories, being not able to content them ſelues with the conditions of the league; and the Perſians not C willing to liue in continuall feare of the Turks, eſpecially ſeeing themſelues to be dayly by them more and more oppreſſed; and withall doubting leſt the Turks after they had taken faſt footing in thoſe new conquered Countries, and ſo growne ſtrong, and gotten better knowledge of the paſſages, ſhould (after their ambitious manner) ſeeke to poſſeſſe them ſelues of the reſt; not keeping the couenants agreed vpon betwixt them, nor at all regarding the capitulations of the league. Which was neuertheleſſe (as we ſaid) on both ſides for the ſpace of ten yeres orderly confirmed with all due circumſtances and ceremonies, in like occurrents by the great Potentats of the World vſed: and for the more aſſurance thereof, one of the Perſian Kings ſons, or as ſome others ſay, one of his nephews, giuen vnto the Turke in hoſtage, as Amurath required.

The Ianizaries in a tumult at Conſtantinople.

D These long wars thus ended, ſhortly after a great ſedition was raiſed at Conſtantinople by the ſouldiers of the court, which returning out of Perſia, with great inſolency demanded their pay. For the ſatisfying of whom, by the conſent of the great Sultan himſelfe, the value of the coine was inhaunſed, and a new kinde of ſubſidie for leuying of mony impoſed vpon the ſubjects in generall, none excepted; who ſtanding vpon their antient liberties and priuiledges, refuſed to pay it, eſpecially the Ianizaries and other ſoldiers of the court. Wherefore their Aga or captaine was commanded to appeaſe them, and to perſuade them to pay the demanded tribute: in attempting whereof he was in danger to haue been ſlaine by the inſolent Ianizaries; and yet neuertheleſſe for preuailing no more with them, was in diſpleaſure thruſt out of his office, and another placed in his roome that ſhould haue married Amuraths daughter; of whom E for all that, the Ianizaries would not accept in any caſe, but threw ſtones at him, and threatned to kill him. The next night a great fire aroſe in the city; for the quenching whereof, the Ianizaries were commanded (as their duty was) to put to their helping hands: which they not only moſt obſtinately refuſed to do, but alſo kept backe others that brought water for the quenching thereof, and together with the other ſoldiers of the court, did what they might to make it burne the faſter. With the rage of this fire were conſumed ſeuen of their Temples, 25 great Innes, fifteene thouſand houſes, with many warehouſes and ſhops. To appeaſe this dangerous ſtirre, and to preuent further miſchiefe, commandement was giuen to the Beglerbeg of Grecia and Dauid Paſſy a Iew (the firſt authors of this new impoſition) that they ſhould either gather the aforeſaid tribute by them deuiſed, and pay the ſoldiers, or by ſome other meanes to F giue them contentment. But here began the Prieſts publikely to diſſuade the people from paiment of this new tribute, or any other ſuch like; perſuading them in any caſe to defend their antient liberties and cuſtomes: wherupon the churches were by the Prieſts ſhut vp, publique praiers for the health of the Sultan intermitted, the Baſſa's houſes aſſaulted, and all the city on a new hurley burley. For the appeaſing whereof Amurath was glad to yeeld vnto the Great harme done by fire in Conſtantinople.

Ianizaries, to pay the ſouldiers out of his owne treaſure, to reuoke his mandates giuen out for the exaction of the new tribute, and to deliuer the two perſuaders thereof to the pleaſure of the Ianizaries; who drew them vp and downe the ſtreets at horſes tailes, and afterwards cutting off their heads, in ſcorne toſſed them from hand to hand one to another, as if they had bin tenniſe balls.

Sinan Baſſa of Buda inuadeth the vpper part of Hungary.

About the latter end of September, Sinan Baſſa of Buda, hauing with the aſſiſtance of the Sanzackes about Fille, raiſed an army of eleuen thouſand ſoldiers, with purpoſe to haue ſpoiled all the vpper part of Hungary, came the ſixth of October before the caſtle of Putnoc, and gaue thereunto ſummons: but finding them in the Caſtle better prouided and more reſolute than he had before ſuppoſed, he departed thence, and paſſing the riuer Schayo, came to Sixo, a towne of about fiue hundred houſes, which after a ſore battery he tooke, and burnt it downe to the ground. In the meane time Claudius Ruſſell Generall for the wars in that part of Hungary, hauing aſſembled his forces, came vpon him, and after a hard fight put him to the worſe, when he had ſlain of his Turks about two thouſand fiue hundred, beſides three hundred other drowned in the riuer Schayo. Shortly after, the Christians in like manner breaking into the frontiers of the Turks, tooke from them the caſtles of Blaueſtein, Geſtes, with ſome other ſmall forts thereabouts in the vpper part of Hungary.

Sinan ouerthrowne.

Sinan for that he had contrary to the league, and without the commandement of Amurath, ſo vnfortunatly attempted war in Hungary, was the next yeare in great diſpleaſure ſent for to Conſtantinople, and Ferat Baſſa of Boſna (late General of the Turks army againſt the Perſians, and now but newly come home) placed in his roome at Buda.

Amurath before not ignorant of the great preparation that Philip the King of Spaine had made, and of the inuincible Armado (as it was termed) by him ſet forth for the inuaſion of England (the fame whereof had of long before filled a great part of the World) as alſo of the euill ſucceſſe thereof the laſt yeare, viz 1588; and of the purpoſe her Majeſty of England had for the troubling of his rich trade, eſpecially vnto the Weſt-Indies, and for the relieuing of Don Anthonio, by him driuen out of Portugall: wrot vnto her about this time concerning thoſe and ſuch like matters as had beene moued by her Agent, as followeth:

Nicholaus Reuſnerius Epiſt. Turcic. lib. 12. pag. 42.

Amuraths Letters vnto the Queen of England.

Amurath the third, Emperor of the Turks, vnto Elizabeth Queene of England, France, and Ireland, greeting.

Moſt honourable Matrone of the Chriſtian Religion, Mirror of chaſtity, adorned with the brightneſſe of ſoueraignty and power amongſt the moſt chaſte women of the people which ſerue Ieſu, Miſtris of great kingdomes, reputed of greateſt Majeſty and praiſe among the Nazarites, Elizabeth Queene of England, to whom we wiſh a moſt happy and proſperous reigne. You ſhall vnderſtand by our high and Imperiall letters directed vnto you, how that your Orator reſiant in our ſtately and magnificent Court, hath preſented vnto the throne of our Majeſty a certaine writing, wherein he hath certified vs, how that about foure yeares ago you haue made wars vpon the King of Spaine, for the abating and breaking of his forces, wherewith he threatned all other Chriſtian Princes, and purpoſeth to make himſelfe the ſole Monarch both of them and all the World beſide. As alſo how that the ſame King of Spaine hath by force taken from Don Anthonio (lawfully created King of Portugall) his kingdome: and that your intention is, that his ſhips which go and come into the Indies, may from henceforth be imbarred and ſtrayed from that nauigation: wherein are yearely brought into Spaine, pretious ſtones, ſpices, gold, and ſiluer, eſteemed worth many millions, wherewith the aforeſaid King as with a great treaſure enriched, hath meanes to moleſt and trouble all other Chriſtian Princes: which if he ſhall ſtill proceed to do, he will make himſelfe dayly ſtronger and ſtronger, and ſuch an one as may not eaſily be weakened. After that, your aforeſaid Orator requeſted our Highneſſe, in the beginning of the next Spring to ſend out our Imperiall fleet againſt him, being aſſured that the King of Spaine could not be able eaſily to withſtand it, for that he had now already receiued a great ouerthrow by your fleet: and being ſcarce able to withſtand you alone, if he ſhould be on diuers parts inuaded, muſt needs be ouercome, to the great benefit of all the Chriſtian Princes, as alſo of our Imperiall ſtate. Beſides this, that whereas the aforeſaid Don Anthonio is by force driuen out and depriued of his kingdome, that we (to the imitation of our noble Progenitours of happy memory, whoſe graues the Almighty lighten) ſhould alſo giue the aid and ſuccour of our magnificent ſtate, as did they, vnto all ſuch as had recourſe vnto their high Courts and palaces for reliefe. In brieſe, all theſe things, with many

A others which your aforeſaid Orator hath at large declared vnto our Imperiall throne, we haue well vnderſtood and laid them vp in our deepe remembrance. But foraſmuch as we for many yeares paſt haue made wars in Perſia, with a full reſolution and intent vtterly to conquer and ſubdue the kingdome of that accurſed Perſian heretike, and to joyne the ſame vnto our antient dominions; and now by the grace of God, and helpe of our great Prophet, are vpon the point of the ſatisfying of our deſire: that once done, due prouiſion ſhall be aſsigned vnto all ſuch things as you haue of vs requeſted or deſired. Wherefore if you ſhall ſincerely and purely continue the bond of amity and friendſhip with our high Court, you ſhall not find more ſecure refuge or ſafer harbour of good will or loue. So at length all things ſhall go well and according to your hearts deſire in your wars with Spaine, vnder the ſhadow of our happy throne. And for as much as the King of Spaine hath by fraud and deceit got whatſoeuer he holdeth, without doubt theſe deceitfull deceiuers B ſhall by the power of God in ſhort time be diſpatched and taken out of the way. In the meane time we exhort you not to loſe any opportunity or time, but to be alwaies vigilant, and according to the conuentions betwixt vs, fauourable vnto our friends, and vnto our enemies a foe. And giue notice here to our high Court, of all the new wars which you ſhall vnderſtand of concerning the ſaid King of Spaine, for the behoofe both of your ſelfe and vs. To be briefe, your Embaſſador after he had with all care and diligence diſpatched his Embaſſage, and here left in his place one Edward Bardon his Deputy and Agent, now by our leaue maketh his returne towards your kingdome, being for the good and faithfull ſeruice he there did, worthy to be of you eſteemed, honoured, and before others promoted: who when he hath obtained of you all thoſe his deſerued honours and preferments, let him or ſome other principall Embaſſador without delay be appointed to our Imperiall Court, to continue this office of legation. This we thought good to haue you C *certified of vnder our moſt honourable Seale, whereunto you may giue vndoubted credence. From our Imperiall palace at Conſtantinople, the fifteenth of this bleſſed moneth * Ramazan 1589.*

 September.*

Yet for all theſe faire ſhewes, it may ſeeme vnto him that looketh more neere into the ſtate of the Turkiſh affaires at thoſe times, and that which hath enſued ſince, that Amurath glad of the diſcord of theſe two ſo great Chriſtian Princes, and not well aſſured of his new conqueſts in Perſia, had no great mind to the inuaſion of Spaine, as too far from the ſtrength of his Empire, an enterpriſe not to be ſo eaſily managed by ſea, as were the wars he ſhortly after vndertooke againſt the Chriſtian Emperor Rodolph by land: wherwith for all that (God be thanked) he found his hands full all the remainder of his life, as did his ſonne Mahomet that reigned D after him.

The Polonian Coſſacks inuade the Tartarians and Turks.

About this time alſo the Polonian borderers (whom they call Coſſackes) a rough and warlike kinde of people, after their wonted manner making an inrode vpon the Turks and Tartarians, vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed Koſlaw a port towne within a daies journey of Caffa, where they had the ſpoile of many rich warehouſes of the Turks merchants, and the rifling of certain ſhips lying there in harbor; and hauing taken their pleaſure, burnt the reſt, and ſo with a great booty returned to their lurking places. With which injury the Tartars prouoked, and ſet on by the Turks, to the number of forty thouſand brake into Podolia and the prouinces neere vnto Polonia, and reſting in no place, but burning the country before them, ſlew the poore country people without mercy, and making hauocke of all that they light vpon, beſides the ſpoile, E carried away with them many thouſands of moſt miſerable captiues: the greateſt part whereof for all that, the Polonians reſcued, with the notable ſlaughter of the enemy, ſurpriſed in their returne. Whereupon ſuch vnkindneſſe riſe between the Turkiſh Emperor and Sigiſmund the Polonian King, that it was thought it would haue broken out into open wars, had not the Polonian by his Embaſſadors and the mediation of the Queene of England, wiſely appeaſed the angry Turke, and ſo againe renewed his league.

The reaſons wherewith the Viſier Baſſa's perſuade Amurath to make war.

Amurath now at peace with the World, from which he by nature abhorred not, and ſitting idle and melancholy at home, was perſuaded by the Baſſa's his Counſellors, to take ſome new war in hand: for that great empires (as they ſaid) could not without the continuall vſe of armes long ſtand or continue: as appeared by the Roman ſtate, which ſo long as it was at wars with F Carthage, or their great Captaines and Commanders occupied in armes againſt their neighbour Princes, ſtill remained triumphant, and commanded ouer a great part of the World; but giuing it ſelfe to eaſe and pleaſure, and the martial men not after their wonted manner imploied, it in ſhort time by ciuill diſcord fell, and of the Miſtreſſe of the World, became it ſelfe a prey euen vnto the baſeſt nations. Which old Cato in his great wiſedom foreſeeing, cried out in the Senat, That the ſouldiers and men of warre were to be kept ſtill buſied in armes far from home, for that in ſo doing, all ſhould go well with the State, and the glory thereof increaſe. G Whereunto the Othoman Emperours, his noble progenitors, hauing reſpect, propounded not peace as the end of their wars (as do other weake Princes hauing their owne forces in diſtruſt) but as inuincible conquerors, ſtill ſowed wars vpon wars, making one victory the beginning of another: whereby they not onely brought that their Empire vnto that greatneſſe it was now of, but by ſuch continuall imploiment made their ſouldiers more couragious and ready, and alſo kept them from rebellions and tumults; whereunto in time of peace, and liuing at eaſe, theſe martiall men are moſt commonly inclined, learning (as all others do) by doing nothing, to do that is euill and naught. Euery thing (as they ſaid) was by the ſame means to be maintained, whereby it was at the firſt increaſed; and that therefore great Empires, as they were by H wars begun and augmented, ſo were they by continuall wars alſo to be from time to time eſtabliſhed; whereas otherwiſe the ſouldiers liuing in peace, and forgetting their martiall proweſſe, would for moſt part grow cowardly, as giuing themſelues ouer to the loue of their owne dwellings, of their wiues, and of their children, and other pleaſures; or elſe conuerting their ſtudies to Merchandiſe, or other profitable trades, would in time forget the vſe of armes, and be thereunto againe hardly drawne: vnto the great weakening of his ſtrength both by ſea and land, and the diminiſhing of the number of his great commanders and expert captains, not to be had without the continual vſe of war. With theſe and ſuch like reaſons, the great Baſſa's of the Court perſuaded Amurath, That he muſt of neceſſity take ſome new expedition in hand, and not to ſuffer his valiant ſouldiers, but now lately returned out of Perſia, to grow lazie or I inſolent for lacke of imploiment. Which they did not ſo much for the loue of their Prince, or zeale vnto the State, as for their owne particular profit; eſpecially the two old Baſſa's Sinan and Ferat, the enuious competitors the one of the others honour: who although they both, much and almoſt all commanded both in peace and war, yet was their honours greater, and their profit far more, in commanding of the Turks great armies abroad, than in ſitting in the Diuano at home: vnto which no leſſe honourable than profitable preferment they both with like ambition aſpired, accompanied with the hot deſires of their great and many fauorites both at home and elſewhere. Theſe perſuaſions well pleaſed Amurath; who although hee were himſelfe no ſouldier, yet was he deſirous of new conqueſts, and to increaſe his name: accounting it no leſſe honour vnto himſelfe, by his ſeruants at his appointment to performe great K things, than it was vnto his Anceſtors to do that they did themſelues in perſon. But in this ſo ſerious a matter, and of ſo great conſequence, Amurath at the firſt could not tell what beſt to reſolue vpon; not for that he was not deſirous of warres, but becauſe as yet he certainely knew not againſt whom he might with greateſt profit and leaſt difficulty & danger conuert his forces: vpon which point his Counſellors agreed not, but for diuers reaſons were of diuers opinions. Which foraſmuch as they containe matters of greateſt importance of all things then in the World don, but eſpecially concerning the profit of the Chriſtian commonweale, I ſhall not thinke it vnworth my labour, to ſet them downe in ſuch order as I finde them credibly reported; hauing moreouer in them many letters and moſt weighty matters not yet come to all mens knowledge: as alſo opening the deuiſes of the Turkiſh Tyrant againſt the Chriſtian L Princes; a motiue not only for them to joyne in counſell together how to withſtand him, but for the common Chriſtian Commonweales ſake to forget and forgiue all their priuat diſplea-ſures, and with their vnited forces and power honourably and couragiouſly to make war vpon him, and ſo at length by the mercy of God to ouerthrow him, together with his tyrannicall Empire, the greateſt terror of our time.

The cauſes why Amurath would not ſuddenly reſolue vpon war.

Eight ſeuerall opinions of the Viſier Baſſaes, concerning the war to be taken in hand.

The great Baſſa's concerning the intended war were of eight ſundry opinions: whereof the firſt was, That the wars againſt the Perſian ſhould be renewed: the ſecond, for the inuaſion of the King of Morocco and Fes: the third, for war to be taken in hand againſt the king of Spain: the fourth for the beſieging againe of Malta: the fift was, to ſet vpon the Venetians: the ſixt, for the inuading of ſome part of Italy: the ſeuenth, for the King of Polonia: the eighth and M laſt was, for warre to be made vpon the Emperour and the kingdome of Hungary. With all the which aforeſaid Princes, except the Spaniard, although the Turke were then in league, and could not with all or any of them make warre, without the notable breach of his faith and honour: yet was that neuer made queſtion or ſcruple of, but onely. Which might beſt ſtand

A ſtand with the profit of his ſtate for him to ſet vpon. His barbarous law allowing him that liberty, for the more aſſuring of his ſtate, and inlarging of his empire, to break all faith & promiſe, eſpecially with the Chriſtians, not more in any thing to be pittied, than in repoſing any credit or confidence in the faith of ſuch a miſcreant.

The firſt opinion and reaſons to haue the Perſia wars renued.

The reaſons the great Baſſa's alledged for the renuing of the Perſian war, were, for that the Perſian King was of himſelfe like to break the league ſo lately with him concluded, ſo ſoone as he ſhould know the Turks intangled in any other war, moued thereunto as well for the recouery of his country, to his great diſhonor loſt, as alſo in reuenge of ſo many and ſo great injuries to him of late don by the Turkiſh Emperors. Beſide that, the Chriſtian princes would perſuade him and prick him forward therunto; eſpecially the Spaniard, who for the neernes of India might without his great charge procure him ſo to do, and alſo conueniently furniſh B him with great Ordnance and Cannoniers, which it was wel known he of late did. The countries alſo but lately conquered, were not yet, as they ſaid, in quietnes or ſafety, and the fortreſſes therin but of late built, together with the garriſons therin, to be in great danger, being for the length of the way, and difficultie of the paſſage, not to be ſtill ſpeedily relieued: inſomuch that if the Perſians did them no other harm, but only to forrage and waſt the countrey about them, they ſhould bring the inhabitants into ſuch diſtres, as that thoſe new conquered countries were again by the defendants to be forſaken, or elſe they muſt themſelues with hunger periſh. True glory, they ſaid, conſiſted not ſo much in conquering, as in the vſe of the conqueſt, and the proſecution of the happy victory: And that therfore Amurath ſhould take heed C that he prouoked not the wrath and indignation of the great Prophet Mahomet againſt him; who hauing by his good fauour and guid obtained mo victories than any his predeceſſors, againſt the enemies of his religion, ought as a religious and deuout prince ſeuerely to reuenge the wrong by them done both to God and man. Vnto which religious Warre Vibeg Han the Tartar King, as alſo the Prince of Gheilan, offered their ready help. As for the euent of the victory, now as good as in his hand, he was to iudge by the ſucces of his former Wars. Neither that he need to fear the Perſian horſemen, although they vſed Arabian horſes, beeing by his men many times ſhamefully put to flight: or yet to doubt leſt the Georgians in fauor of the Perſians ſhould take vp arms, for that many of them were already vnder his obeiſance, and ſubiect to the Baſſa of Teflis and other his commanders; the reſt were his vaſſals, or els ſuch D as following the fortune of their princes Simon & Alexander, ſought after no greater matter, but contenting themſelues with their own countrey, although but ſmall, thought themſelues wel if they might keep and defend the ſame, by nature and ſcituation ſo ſtrong, as that there is ſcarce any way vnto it, by reaſon of the high and broken mountains, the thick woods, and ſtreit paſſages.

The ſecond opinion, for war with the King of Morocco.

The ſecond opinion which was deliuered, was for the tranſportation of his Wars into Africk againſt the King of Morocco, commonly called the Seriphe; and that for theſe cauſes moſt: It would be a great ſhame and reproch (as they ſaid) vnto the Othoman Empire, that it was not yet able to ſubdue thoſe Moores and people of Africke, in number but few. Neither was it leſſe ſhame or diſhonour to the Othoman Emperours to haue ſo ſmall a territory in A- E frica, being the third part of the world, which by reaſon of the neereneſſe vnto Italy, had a long time held wars with the Romans. Beſides that, Algiers and Tunes could neuer be ſafely kept by the Turks: neither that the ſubiects and pyrats which inhabited thoſe Cities, would euer be content or at quiet, vntil they had again got that kingdome into their hands. The promontory of Aguero, and port of Larace (two ports without the ſtreits) were, as they ſaid, to be taken, as places very commodious for the Turks friends, ſeeking in thoſe ſeas after booty; and for the ſecuring of their trade. And although the Seriphe were himſelfe a Mahometan, and held his kingdom as a Tributary vnto the Othoman Empire, yet had hee ſecret intelligence with the Spaniard and the Knights of Malta, whereby they not long ſince had vpon the ſudden almoſt ſurpriſed Tripolis, he in the mean time as it were winking thereat. And that al- F though the Spaniard poſſeſſed in Africke, Maraſchebir, Oran, Pegnon, Tanger, Arzilla, Mazaga, Ceute or Sepes, places whereby he might help and aſſiſt the Moors; yet might his forces and attempts by a ſtrong fleet be eaſily hindered, and Spaine it ſelfe infeſted. Beſides that, The Spaniards had yet in ſuch freſh remembrance the loſſe of Tunes and Guletta (places by them thought inexpugnable, and yet by Sinan Baſſa to his immortall praiſe taken) as that they would not for the Moors ſake eaſily ſeem to attempt any great thing againſt the victorious Turks. G

The third opinion, touching the conqueſt of Malta.

The third opinion was concerning the war to be made againſt them of Malta, which was by a ſtrong fleet to be performed; for that the gallies of Malta did daily great hurt as wel to the Turks merchants, as vnto ſuch as for deuotions ſake trauelled by ſea to Mecha. And that therefore the war was thither to be transferred, not only for religions ſake, and to aſſecure the paſſage thither from the incurſions of the Malteſes, but in reuenge of the old & late iniuries by them don; and eſpecially to blot out the infamy and diſgrace which the great Sultan Solyman had incurred, at ſuch time as he had in vain beſieged that Iſland, and to requite the loſſe by him there ſuſtained. Beſide that, they alſo alledged the common complaints of the ſubiects, for that there were many which pittiouſly lamented the miſery and calamitie, ſome of H their friends, ſome their kinsfolk, whom they knew to liue in moſt woful ſeruitude with thoſe Knights, and whom they moſt earneſtly deſired to haue now ſet at liberty: Complaining his ſubiects to haue bin ſo far from ſuffering any ſuch things from thoſe Knights in the time of his anceſtors, as that contrariwiſe they themſelues were by them driuen out of the Iſland of Rhodes, the ſtrongeſt bulwark of the Chriſtian commonweal toward the Eaſt. Beeing moreouer worthy alſo to be chaſtiſed, for that they had holpen the rebellious Moors with all kind of munition, and had themſelues attempted to haue ſurpriſed Modon.

The fourth opinion, for war to be made againſt the Spaniard, and the reaſons why.

In the fourth place were they which were of opinion, That it were beſt for him to make war vpon the king of Spain. Theſe men alledged it to be impoſſible for the Turkiſh empire to attaine to the monarchy of the whole world (wherunto all the Turks actions and deuiſes I were alwaies as at a certain mark directed) except the Spaniard his great ſtrength and power were firſt weakned, wherin he ſeemed to ſurpaſſe all other the Chriſtian kings and princes: and that there was no fear leſt he ſhould beſiege Algiers, which hee knew to be now much better fortified than it was in the time of the Emperor Charles the fift. And that although the Spaniards without ceaſing beſought their king for the vndertaking of that expedition, by reaſon of the new loſſes and harmes which they daily receiued from the Pyrats of Africk, yet would he not hearken vnto their requeſt, for fear of the danger imminent both to himſelf & his ſubiects from the enemies fleet, which he ſhould in ſo doing draw into the Spaniſh ſeas: neither would the Spaniſh gallies eaſily come into the Turks countries in the Eaſt, for being too far from their own country, which for moſt part ſtood in need of their help. And that the king of K Spain was with the multitude of his buſines and other his vrgent affairs ſtill ſo hindred, that he could not ſuddenly put in execution what his Councell for the Wars ſhould decree: As alſo how much it was to be gathered by that which hapned not long ſince at Preuesa & Nauarinum, that the Spaniard ſhunned the Othoman forces: and alſo how warily the king dealt in all his affairs, leſt at length againſt his will he ſhould be inforced to enter into warres with the Turk, was moſt manifeſt, as was to be ſeen when as of late about the end of the Perſian war, he refuſed to aid the Perſian King, whom hee might haue holpen, and was ſo before wont to doe. And in caſe that he would ſtand vpon his gard, and by force ſeek to repel force, yet ſhould he ſcarſe haue ſo much ſtrength, as (beſide thoſe wars which he now maketh in diuers places) to be able to vndertake alſo a new war, and to find ſo many ſouldiers, and ſo much coin, & other L things neceſſary for ſo great a war. It ſtood him in hand (they ſaid) to defend the low countries, and to recouer againe the prouinces there loſt, which of themſelues wonderfull ſtrong, both by reaſon of the ſea and the multitude of the Riuers, were alſo with wonderfull courage and pertinacy defended by the inhabitants, for their liberty and religions ſake. Whereunto the Engliſh (at deadly hatred with the Spaniard) might many waies giue great help, if they ſhould inuade Portugal, or with their ſhips lie in wait for his Indian fleet, or make incurſions into other his kingdoms, as they did not long ſince at the Groin and Cades, places moſt fit to trouble Spain, and to hinder his traffique into the Indies or other places. Beſide that, hee was at that time ſo intangled with his wars in France, as that he could ſcarce finde how to diſpatch himſelfe thereof, without the loſſe of his honor and credit. And admit he ſhould make M peace with the aforeſaid Princes, in ſuch ſort that he ſhould not from thenceforth from them receiue any harme; yet were other meanes to bee ſought and taken in hand for his further diſturbance, as by troubling his rich Trade for Spices and other merchandiſe, whereof hee reapeth great profit, as alſo if need were, by driuing his ſhips out of the Perſian gulfe by the help

A of thoſe gallies which ſtill lie at rode at Poſſidium, which we now cal Suez. And that the fortreſſes and ſtrong holds he there poſſeſſeth, were to be ſet vpon, and if it might be taken from him; as was once attempted againſt the Portugals at Diu and Ormuz. The like wherof Alphonſus Albuquercius (the king of Portugals Viceroy in India) attempted, when as with his light horſmen running thorow that country, he thought vpon the ſudden to haue ſpoiled Mecha, and to haue robbed the ſepulchre of Mahomet, as had hapned vnder the empire of the Sultans, and as Trajan the Emperor had long ſince in like maner attempted to rage and ſpoile. Thoſe places which he poſſeſſed in Africk were (as they ſaid) to be ſet vpon, and the coaſt of Spain toward the Mediterranian to be infeſted? ſo at length to gratifie the Moors his ſubiects, who ſtil inſtantly requeſted the ſame, that ſo they might more ſafely trafique and trauell; and that B ſo the Moors might at length be deliuered from the imperious commaund of the Spaniards. Of which exploit Sultan Selymus lately before dead, was in his life time well perſuaded; but might now at this time be much more commodiouſly don, for that the Mooriſh Nation was now greatly increaſed, and much oppreſſed by the Spaniards, and hauing got great wealth by trade of merchandiſe, euen by nature or Religion had conceiued a mortall hatred againſt the Spaniards: wherunto might not a little auaile the ports in Africke, whereinto the Turks fleet might at all times in ſafety retyre. And in briefe, that which was of greateſt importance for the better ſucces of this war, the French King and the Queen of England had of their own accord promiſed the continuation of their wars, & that the French King ſhould inuade Nauar, and by force of arms recouer the right he pretended to that kingdom: whilſt in the mean time C the Queen of England ſhould not only trouble him in the Weſt Indies, and other places of the Ocean toward the North and Weſt, but might alſo ſtir vp new broils in the kingdome of Portugal, where moſt of the people with great impatience did bear the proud commaund of the Spaniard; as perſuaded (and that truly) all their proſperity and quietnes to haue bin loſt together with their laſt king their true and lawfull ſoueraign. For he at peace with the kings of France and England, exceedingly thereby inriched his ſubiects by trafique; whereas ſince they fel into the hands of the Spaniard, they daily complain of their new loſſes and dangers, by reaſon of his perpetual wars. Moreouer, That there was to bee found great ſtore of exiled Spaniards diſperſed here and there, which being male-content, and weary of the Spaniſh gouernment, were fled not only out of Portugall, but euen out of Aragon and other parts of his D kingdom: which now liuing in France, England, and Conſtantinople, both ſecretly & openly offered great helps: the like wherof many of the Moors alſo promiſed. All which together ſeemed to promiſe a moſt eaſie expedition and certain victory, if any ſhould vpon the ſudden inuade Spain, for that there was almoſt no vſe of arms, the inhabitants at home ſeldom times exerciſing themſelues therin; neither in places needful hauing any ordinary gariſons, and but few horſes fit for ſeruice. And that in fine it was to be conſidered, Spain to be greatly bared of men which knew how valiantly and couragiouſly to mannage Armes, by the often choice they make of them, which were almoſt daily tranſported into the Indies, Italy, and the Low-Countries. Wherby the ſtrength of his Countrey muſt needs bee exceedingly impaired: ſo that if he ſhould be inuaded with any ſtrong and mighty Army, they might ſeem hardly able E to be holpen and defended by their owne people, but ſhould need the helpe and aid of other neer Prouinces that were ſubiect to his kingdom. Which if they ſhould be either letted, or ſtay to come in good time, they ſhould then leaue ſo much the more eaſie victory vnto their Enemies.

The third opinion for inuading the Venetians, and the reaſons why.

In the fifth place were they which went about to perſuade Amurath to breake his league with the Venetians, vſing reaſons rather probable than true, although they might ſeeme leſſe doubtfull to the Turkes, for that men eaſily and willingly beleeue ſuch things as they themſelues deſire. Theſe men went about to proue no expedition to bee leſſe difficult than this, as iudging of things preſent by the euent of former wars paſſed; wherin the Turks had alwaies taken ſomthing from the Venetians; who to redeem their peace were diuers waies inforced to F ſatisfie the Turks. That the Venetian Commonweal was afraid of the Turks, and abhorred war, was manifeſt, they ſaid, in that, that in all actions it had propounded vnto it ſelf peace, as the end thereof; and after the manner of their anceſtors, neuer entred into wars, but enforced thereunto; and would haply vpon the firſt denouncing of Wars, willingly part with certain places, for feare of greater harme, or to bee vtterly ouercome, as it appeared they did in the yeelding vp of Cyprus. The power and force therof was not ſo great, as that it could alone G ſtand againſt the great Sultan:and to confederat it ſelf with others would require no ſmal delay,for the great and many difficulties which commonly vſed to ariſe in making of Leagues; not being now ſo conjoined with the Spaniard as in times paſt, of whoſe aid it being of late deſtitute,was conſtrained to make a hard peace with Selymus:and if ſo be the Spaniard would needs join himſelf vnto the Venetians againſt the Turks,yet that he could by no means afford vnto them ſuch aid and ſupplies as were of neceſſity to be required vnto ſo great a War, hee himſelf being in his Wars otherwiſe ſo intangled. As for all other confederation they could make without him,to be but weak and to no purpoſe. That which the Pope could do herein to be but little; for albeit he ſhould (according to his duty) exhort other Chriſtian princes to giue aid,and to ſtir them vp vnto this war;yet that beſide ſome little ſupply of mony hardly H drawn out of his own coffers and the Eccleſiaſtical reuenues,he could ſcarſe performe any thing more: or when he had don his vttermoſt deuoir,could but joine fiue gallies of his owne vnto the Venetian fleet,which with the gallies of the duke of Savoy,of the knights of Malta, and of the Florentines,could but make a fleet of ſome 20 gallies, which was but a ſmal matter. Beſides that, the Turkes were perſuaded,that betwixt the Venetian ſtate and the other Chriſtian Princes was no ſuch friendſhip and good agreement, as the greatnes of the imminent danger of that War, and as the neceſſity of the cauſe would require: And that hitherto their treaſures had bin ſo exhauſted in paying the debt they were run into in the laſt war, and in building of fortreſſes,that haply they were not now ſo furniſhed with coin, as was requiſit for defraying ſo great a war. And vnto this War againſt the Venetians conſented almoſt all I the Viſier Baſſa's; differing only in this, Where,or againſt what place of the Venetian Territory this war were to be firſt begun:ſome naming one place, ſome another, for diuers reaſons them therunto leading,which for breuity we paſſe ouer.

The ſixt opiniō for attempting Italy, and the reaſons therof.

Other ſome of the Baſſa's in the ſixth place, rejecting all the former opinions concerning the war to be taken in hand,would haue had all the forces of the Othoman Empire, as well by land as ſea, to haue been conuerted againſt Italy, for that otherwiſe the Turks ſhould neuer come vnto the monarchy of the whole world,wherunto as at a mark they had directed al their actions,except they did firſt ſubdue Italy. For that this country, as the centre of the whole world,was wont to giue both counſel and aid vnto the reſt of the limbs, whereby the deuices of others were croſſed:and that the Romans had at length commanded ouer all the World,eſpecially K for that they held in poſſeſſion this country. Herat did the Hunnes,the Alani, and Goths,the Vandals,the Frenchmen, Spaniards, and Saraſins direct all their thoughts and cogitations. In fine they concluded, That no expedition could be taken in hand more honourable and profitable than this: for that Italy was a Queene amongſt other prouinces, for commodious ſcituation, the wholſomnes of the aire, the plenty of all things neceſſary for mans life, for great, fair,and rich cities,for the antient glory and majeſty of the Roman Empire,and many other cauſes alſo. Neither that this expedition was to be deemed of much difficultie, for that Italy was vnder the rule of diuers princes, vnto whoſe command moſt of the ſubjects vnwillingly obeyed. As alſo for that the inhabitants of that country had now for many years liued in continual peace,and were therfore the more effeminat and fearful,and ſo vnfit for the L wars. And that if that expedition were in one or diuers places taken in hand, before the corn were full ripe,the Turks in that ſo fruitfull a Country could neuer want neceſſaries for them to liue vpon; wheras the inhabitants in great number wanting the ſame, and ſhut vp within the wals and fortifications of their Cities and ſtrong towns,ſhould be brought into extream wants. Which was the more euidently to be ſeen,for that at this time wherein they were at peace, they had not corn ſufficient in the Countrey for ſo great a multitude of people to liue vpon, but were glad to haue it brought vnto them from other places,eſpecially from Peloponeſus, Conſtantinople,and the Cities vpon the coaſt of the great Ocean. Furthermore,that it was to be conſidered, That moſt part of the Italians liued by no other meanes but by their handy labour or the trade of merchandiſe; of which means if they ſhould be depriued, they M ſhould in ſhort time be brought to that point, as to be glad to accept of ſuch conditions as the victor ſhould propound vnto them, or as tributaries to ſubmit themſelues vnto the Othoman gouernment. Neither that the ſoldiers would vnwillingly be drawn vnto that War,for that they were not to paſſe through barren regions of the enemy, frozen with ice,or deſolate,

A neither by rough woods or inacceſſible mountains,but were all the way thither to trauel thorow their own country;and as it were in the ſight of their own houſes:and if the Turks could oftentimes enter ſo far,when as they had their confines more remote, and their paſſages more difficult,that the ſame might now much more eaſily be effected, when as they had a far greater opportunitie,and their enemies ſo neer at hand.

The 7. opinion, for wars with the Polonian.

The ſeuenth opinion was theirs,which thought it beſt to haue the war transferred into Polonia, and from thence into Hungary and Germany : for which they alledged theſe reaſons; firſt,For that they thought it a diſgrace vnto the majeſty and reputation of the Othoman Empire, That the king of Polonia had ſomtime refuſed to pay his tribute due (for ſo the Turkes account of all ſuch preſents as are vnto their Sultan vſually ſent by their neighbor princes, of B curteſie)and that therfore he was by force of armes to be compelled therunto. Which they thought would the more eaſily be obtained, for that there was much ſecret hatred and heartburning amongſt the Polonian nobility. Neither that it would be any difficult or dangerous war to be taken in hand,foraſmuch as Polonia was confined with Moldavia, the Tartars, and the Sanzack of Acherman,Bendera,and Voſia : and moreouer, for that the Turks could neuer haue any aſſured or full poſſeſſion of Moldauia or Valachia,except the inſolencie of the Polonians were repreſſed; the Vayuods of which Countries, when they had inriched themſelues with much wealth,vſed ſtil to fly into the kingdom of Polonia. Beſides that,they ſhould therby reuenge themſelues for the injuries don them by the Coſſacks;and haue more free & ſafe traffique into Muſcouy, and bring a terror vpon the Duke of Muſcouy, by reaſon of the nighnes C of the country:which great Duke was an impediment to the Othoman Emperour,that hee conquered not the whole kingdom of Perſia. And when he had by this means by little & little drawn vnto Germany,haply it might ſo come to paſſe, that the Chriſtian emperor ſhould therby receiue ſome notable loſſe,his empire being ſtil more & more expoſed and invironed with the Turks forces and gariſons. Polonia they ſaid to be a plaine and open countrey,neither to haue any ſtrong places for to withſtand them;and the inhabitants to haue ſmall skill in martial affairs,for that they had now long liued in peace. For as for the war that they had with Maximilian the Archduke of Auſtria,it continued not long : and king Stephen in the late wars he had with the Muſcouit,vſed for the moſt part the Hungarian ſoldiers,& ended thoſe wars rather by beſieging than fighting.

The eight opinion, for war againſt the emperour, and the reaſons thereof.

D They which in the eighth and laſt place deliuered their opinions concerning the intended war,perſuaded to haue it conuerted vpon the Chriſtian Emperour, whom the Turks call the King of Vienna. The cauſes they alledged for the beginning of this War were, For that the Vſcocchi were grown ſo inſolent, as to make good priſe of the Turks both by ſea and land, in ſuch ſort,as that not onely for the harms they did, but euen for the majeſty and honor of the Othoman Empire, their inſolencie was not longer to be ſuffered. By whoſe injuries it chiefely came to paſſe, that the merchants to their great hinderance in priuat,and the Sultans great loſſe in common,hauing left the town of Narenta or Narona in the Turks dominion,had remoued their mart to Salona (now called Spalato) a town of the Venetians; and that yet for al that was not ſo ſufficiently prouided for the ſecurity of the ſaid merchants,although there E were peace betwixt the Emperor and the Venetians : for that theſe vnruly men for moſt part liuing vpon the ſpoile, troubled all both by ſea and land with their robberies, driuing away mens cattel,burning the villages,and taking away the young babes out of the mothers armes and laps. Whereby it was eaſily to be ſeen what mind they were of, and that it was not to be doubted,but that if occaſion ſhould ſerue for them to ſurpriſe any of the Turks ſtrong holds vpon the frontiers,they would with all their power attempt the ſame:which what a diſhonor and infamy(not to ſpeak of the loſſe) it would be vnto the whole Othoman Empire, euery man may eaſily gheſſe. Neither that it was vnknown,how little the Chriſtian Emperor had eſteemed of the Turk,at ſuch time as he was in war with the Perſian,paying his tribute too late at his pleaſure; an euident ſigne rather of violating than of eſtabliſhing the league. And that F the good ſucces of this war was not to be deemed either difficult or doubtful; for that the attempt might be giuen both by Croatia, Hungary, and Auſtria, Countries abounding with all things neceſſary for the maintenance of a great army; as alſo for that they were almoſt to trauell all the way in the Turks own territory. Beſide that,the chiefe fortreſſes of Hungarie, namely Belgrade,Buda,& Alba-Regalis,with many other ſtrong places,were already holden by the Turks garriſons, whither their Armies in all caſes of extremity might in ſafety retire, or out of the ſame garriſons repair their loſſes, if any ſhould be. The Roman empire (as they G ſaid) was more deſirous of peace than of war; & the princes of nothing more careful, than how to heap vp and preſerue their treaſures: and the people of Germany, for that of long time they had had no wars, to be leſſe fit now to bear armes, and worſe to be commanded by their Captains; alwaies hauing in diſtruſt the Hungarians, the Italians, and Spaniards, for that thoſe nations are not beloued, but rather hated of the Germans, beeing not at vnity amongſt themſelues, but diuided, eſpecially about matters of religion. Neither that it was to be feared, leſt forrein princes ſhould aid the Emperor in this war: The Polonian and Tranſylvanian to liue now in peace with the Turk, and therfore would by no meanes turn the heat of this War into their own boſoms; as alſo for that the Polonians were afraid, leſt in ſo doing they ſhould be H driuen out of their country, and inforced to remoue themſelues toward the frozen ſea: and the Tranſylvanian hauing receiued his ſoueraignty from the Turke, no leſſe in feare (if he ſhould ſo doe) to be of him again ſtript and ſpoiled of the ſame. As for the king of Spaine, although he were of ſuch power as might afford vnto the houſe of Auſtria great aid, yet that he was in other places now too much buſied: and that the Biſhop of Rome could not bee ready in all places to ſerue his turn: the princes of Italy would not ſpend their ſubiects and treaſures to pleaſure another man: and that the Venetian State would not raſhly ſtir vp the Turkes arms againſt themſelues, but rather at eaſe expect the euent of the war, than to intangle themſelues with other mens dangers.

Theſe were the chief opinions of the great Baſſa's, concerning the war to be taken in hand; I not ſo much proceeding from any ripe or ſound aduice (as commonly they doe) but rather from a certain barbarous inſolencie and contempt of others; wherwith they moued, do ofttimes vainly perſuade them of the eaſie performance of many expeditions, which in proofe they find to be not only moſt difficult, but vnto themſelues alſo moſt pernicious.

Amurath reſolues to make war with the Emperor.

In this ſo great diuerſity of opinions ſtood Amurath, of long in doubt what to reſolue vpon: deſirous he was in all places to ſhew his power, and if it were poſſible, to exceed the glory of his predeceſſors, as he thought himſelf to haue already don in Perſia; hauing, as he boaſted, by his ſeruants there performed more than they could themſelues in perſon with their mighty armies: wherſore contenting himſelf with that he had already don in the Eaſt, he reſolued now to turn his forces againſt the Chriſtian Emperor toward the Weſt. And that for diuers K reſpects: firſt, it grieued him to ſee the honor of the houſe of Auſtria, and that it durſt make head againſt him. Beſides that, to make war with a country confining vpon his own, would be a thing of far leſſe difficulty than was the Perſian war; where his armies were now ſtill to be led thorow his own peaceable countries, from whence they were to be at all times plentifully relieued with victuals and whatſoeuer els they needed. In which opinion he was alſo confirmed by Sinan Baſſa; who hauing in vain perſuaded him to haue made war againſt the Venetians, furthered now this war, in hope therby to recouer his credit and reputation (before greatly impaired abroad by the little he did in Perſia; as alſo at Conſtantinople, by the diſcord betwixt him & Ferat Baſſa, commonly called the black Serpent) as alſo to increaſe his wealth and riches. Which ſhortly after ſorted to his deſire, being by the great Sultan Amurath appointed L General for thoſe Wars. But aboue all others, Haſſan Baſſa of Boſna furthered this matter, in hope therby to haue gained great riches (as the Turks maner is) together with the greateſt honours of the field, as he was moſt vainly perſuaded by his cold prophets, to whom he gaue no ſmall credit. He therfore daily certified Amurath of the harms which the Vſcocchi and other the Archdukes ſubiects and ſeruants did vpon the frontiers of his territories; telling him of their burnings, ſpoilings and robbings, inciting him to begin his war in Croatia, and ſo to continue the ſame either againſt the Emperour or the Venetians, or els vpon the ſudden that way to break into Italy, as had ſomtime the like been done in the time of Mahomet, Bajazet, and Solyman, his noble progenitors: whereby to bring a great terrour vpon all the princes of Italy, and to inrich his ſoldiers with great ſpoiles. By which importunity he (as a M moſt mortal enemy not only to the houſe of Auſtria, but vnto all Chriſtendom) got leaue to begin thoſe ſtirs in the frontiers of the empire, which were firſt fatal vnto himſelf, and did afterwards notably exerciſe the armes of the two Othoman Emperors, Amurath and Mahomet; as alſo the Chriſtian Emperour, with others his friends and confederats. Yet vnto this leaue granted

A granted to the Baſſa, was this condition at the firſt anexed, That he ſhould not ſeem to doe it by Amuraths commandement, but of himſelf, vnder colour to reſtraine the Vſocchi; who as well by land as by ſea (as he pretended) ſpoiled both the Chriſtians and Turkes, by the great liberty of the princes of Auſtria, hauing ſmall care to chaſten them.

Now was it no great matter for Haſſan Baſſa to do what Amurath his great Lord & Maſter had commanded, for the diſturbing of the peace betwixt him and the Chriſtian Emperor: the Turks leagues with their neighbor princes being ſeldom ſo religiouſly kept, but that as well their ſouldiers in garriſon vpon their frontiers by land, as their aduenturers by ſea, might to keep themſelues doing, vpon a military inſolencie (as the Turks term it) now & then at their pleaſure make incurſions for booty both by ſea and land: which being anſwered with the like B from their neighbors ſo moleſted, there neuer wanted new grieuances, and iuſt cauſes of complaint, to the ſtirring vp of greater troubles euen among the greateſt princes. The Venetians thus wronged at ſea, and their merchants robbed, by their Embaſſadors complained at Conſtantinople, of the injuries don them by the Turks pirats, requiring to haue them called home and juſtice don vpon them. In like maner the Emperor alſo, ſeeing many things both this year and the next, attempted by Haſſan Baſſa in Croatia, and the other Turks in Hungary, contrary to the league; to the great diſturbance of his ſubjects in both thoſe countries; by his Embaſſador then lying at Conſtantinople complained of theſe outrages, deſiring to know whether ther they were don by the conſent & knowledge of Amurath, or not; and if not, then to require that order might be taken for the reſtraining therof. Which was accordingly don, and thoſe C incurſions for a while ſtaied, and the former peace continued. Amurath ſtill making ſhew, as if the league agreed vpon for eight years, ſhould not be in any wiſe on his part infringed. At which time the Perſian Kings ſon (the league not long before concluded) died in the Turks court, where he lay in hoſtage: whoſe dead body Amurath cauſed to be honourably ſent home to his father into Perſia, with an apologie in defence of himſelf, againſt the ſuſpition conceiued by ſome, That he ſhould haue bin the cauſe of the vntimely death of the yong prince; ſtil vrging withall the confirmation of the league, which by the death of the prince had like enough to haue bin broken. Wherof Amurath was the more deſirous, for that perſuaded by his Baſſa's (as is aforeſaid) to make wars with the Emperor (although he notably diſſembled the ſame) he was in hope therby to adde vnto his empire the reliques of Hungary, with ſome D good part of the territory of the houſe of Auſtria alſo, and ſo to open himſelfe a way into the heart of Germany. For which purpoſe he now cauſed very great preparation to be made, and a ſtrong army to be raiſed, and at the ſame time put a great fleet of gallies into the Archipelago, for the ſafety of his Iſlands in that ſea.

The Perſian hoſtage dieth in the Turks Court.

1592.

According to theſe deſignements, the Baſſa of Boſna by the commandement of Amurath, with an army of fifty thouſand entred into Croatia, and without reſiſtance burnt and deſtroyed the country before him, ſparing nothing that came in his way. And not ſo contented, laid ſiege to the city of Wihitz, being the metropolitical city of that country, ſtrongly ſcituat as it were in an Iſland, compaſſed about with the riuer Vna. Which city, after he had ſore battered, and twice aſſaulted, was by the diſtreſſed defendants (now diſpairing of reliefe, and not E able longer to hold it out) yeelded vnto the Baſſa, vpon compoſition, That the German ſouldiers there in garriſon might in ſafety with bag and baggage depart; and that ſuch of the Chriſtian citiſens as would, might there ſtil remaine without hurt from the Turkes either in body or goods. Which conditions the Baſſa faithfully performed vnto the gariſon ſoldiers, whom in number but four hundred, he ſent with ſafe conuoy into their own territory: but afterwards contrary to his faith and promiſe, exerciſed all maner of Turkiſh tyrannie vpon the poor citiſens. The Emperour troubled with this vnexpected inuaſion of the Turkes, ſent the Lord Petzen (whom he had many times imployed in embaſſages to the Turk) to craue aid of the German princes againſt the common Enemy. Who according to the greatneſſe of the danger, in large terms promiſed their helpe. The firſt that made head was Erneſtus Archduke F of Auſtria the Emperors brother, who with fiue thouſand ſouldiers came from Vienna to Savaria, commonly called Greis, the metropolis of Stiria: to whom repaired daily more ſtrength out of Carinthia.

Wihitz in Croatia yeelded to the Turks.

men and fiue hundred horſmen of the Chriſtians (who had taken the mountaines, woods, and ſtreit paſſages) and ſo hardly beſet them, that of all that number few eſcaped with life, among G whom many valiant ſouldiers and expert Captaines were ſlaine, namely Iames Prants, George Pleſbach, and Iohn Weluerdurff. The Baſſa after the barbarous maner of the Turks, to make his victory ſeem more famous, laded ſix wagons with the heads of the ſlain Chriſtians.

The Turks thus raging in Croatia, brought a general fear vpon all Hungary, Bavaria, Bohemia, Stiria, Carinthia, Sileſia, and the reſt of the prouinces therabout. Wherupon the emperor calling together the States of Sileſia and Moldavia, declared vnto them the iminent danger; perſuading them to joine their forces with the reſt, for the repulſing of ſo dangerous an Enemy.

After long delay, Erneſtus the Archduke the tenth of Auguſt came to the Emperour his H brother, with the embaſſadors of Hungary; and the ſeuenth day after were called together the Embaſſadors of the kingdoms and prouinces of the Empire; where it was throughly debated, how the Turks were to be reſiſted, and their attempts infringed; as alſo from whence forces, mony, and other warlike prouiſion was to be raiſed. For now it was manifeſtly ſeen, that longer to delay the matter was dangerous: and the rather, for that the Beglerbeg or great Commander of Grecia, with threeſcore thouſand ſelect ſoldiers both horſe and foot, of long time exerciſed in the Perſian war, was ere long expected, who joining with the reſt of the Turks army, might do great matters both in Hungary and the places adjoining. For preuenting of which ſo great and manifeſt dangers, they ſate daily in councel at Prague, yea oft times euen from morning vntill night: for the Hungarians, and eſpecially the Lord Nadaſti, a moſt Noble I and valiant gentleman amongſt them, inſtantly vrged to haue ſuccors ſent into Hungary; foraſmuch as the Turkiſh Emperor, if he ſhould get into his hands the reſt of the townes and caſtles yet holden by the Chriſtians in Hungary, it was to be feared leſt he ſhould in a ſhort time after indanger the whole ſtate of Germany; the ſtrength whereof the Turks feared not ſo much, as he did thoſe poor reliques of Hungary. Others were no leſſe carefull of the dangers of Croatia and Styria, as more proper to themſelues, the enemy there now raging. In theſe ſo great dangers, the Hungarians with the reſt of the diſtreſſed cried vpon the Emperor for help; and he likewiſe called vpon the Princes of the Empire. Diuers aſſemblies were made in Bohemia, Hungary, Moravia, Sileſia, and other the Emperors prouinces; and Embaſſadors ſent from almoſt all the German princes, to the Emperor. All was full of conſultation, but K as for help, that came in very ſlowly: yet ſuch as was to be had was forthwith ſent into Croatia, to defend the fortreſſes thereagainſt the further attempts and proceedings of the furious Enemy.

Certain vain attempts of the Turks.

The 18 of September, the Turkes with all warlike prouiſion vpon the ſudden by night aſſaulted the ſtrong caſtle of Toccay in the vpper Hungary, in hope to haue ſurpriſed it. But finding it a matter of more difficulty than they had before imagined, they departed thence; & attempted the leſſer Comara, which ſtanding in a mariſh ground, was alſo eaſily defended.
At which time alſo the Baſſa of Buda with his power entred into the frontiers of the Chriſtians; but hauing wel viewed the cities, towns, caſtles, and forts vpon thoſe borders, & finding nothing for his purpoſe, he without any thing doing returned again to Buda. L

The 26 day of September Haſſan the Baſſa of Boſna incamped with his army betweene the riuers of Kulp and Savus, and in the darkneſſe of the night paſſing ouer part of his army into Turopolis, with fire and ſword moſt miſerably ſpoiled all that pleaſant and fertile Iſland; the Lord of Bonny, to whom the keeping therof was committed, labouring in vain to defend the ſame.

Turopolis ſpoiled by the Turks.

About the end of this moneth, the Baſſa of Ziget, with the Sangackes of Mohas, Koppan, and Quinque Eccleſiæ, and other Turks of great name, came with a ſtrong Army, and incamped between Ziget and Rodeſto. And ſhortly after, newes was brought to the Emperours Court, That Caniſia (a City of Stiria not far from the riuer Zala) was hardly beſieged by the Enemy; and that the Turkes in comming thither had taken many Chriſtians Captiues, M whom they had ſent to be ſould at Conſtantinople; and that there was in the Turks Army about an hundred and ſixty thouſand men. But foraſmuch as the Chriſtian Army daily increaſed alſo, and was now growne to the number of threeſcore thouſand, men began to hope well,

A wel,that the enemies rage would be ſtaid from any further proceeding. About the ſame time Erneſtus the Archduke appointed General of the Army,with the Marquis, ſonne to Frederick the Archduke, his lieutenant,came both vnto the army.

In theſe preparations,about the beginning of October heauy newes was brought vnto the Emperors court,how that 7000 men,whom he but a little before had ſent into Croatia,vnder the conduct of Thomas Artelius Bean, George Gleichſpacher, and Dionyſius Denke, to hinder the courſe of the Turks proceedings,being incamped betwixt Wihitz and Carolſtat,and hauing the twelfth of September diſcouered from an high hil certain companies of the Turks(which were indeed of purpoſe come thither to view the Chriſtian army) ſent out fifty horſemen to diſcouer the Turks army where it lay,and what it attempted. Who finding no moe of the B Turks than thoſe they had before ſeen from the mountain,returned again vnto the army with ſuch ſimple intelligence. Wherto the Chriſtians giuing credit,became ſecure in their tents as men out of fear of the enemy,and ſo kept but negligent watch. But in this ſo great ſecurity the enemy on a ſudden came vpon them, and with 100000 men brake into their trenches: where the Chriſtian footmen for all that for the ſpace of foure houres maintained a notable fight, wherin many were on both ſides ſlain:but the poor Chriſtians being beſet round,& op-preſſed with the multitude of their enemies, were ſlain almoſt all; yet the Captaines ſeeing the danger,by ſpeedy flight ſaued their liues: for which their cowardiſe and careleſſe negligence they were afterwards apprehended and beheaded. Almoſt all the common ſouldiers were there ſlain; yea ſuch as fell aliue into the hands of the enemy, were moſt cruelly cut in C pieces. The ſpoil alſo of the tents of the Chriſtians fell vnto the enemy; wherein beſides aboundance of other things, they found ſixty thouſand Dollars, brought but two daies before from Lutz for the ſoldiers pay. The Turks after their barbarous maner,in oſtentation of their victory,laded 14 wagons with the heads of the ſlaine Chriſtians, which they ſent into diuers of their places therabouts. This was indeed a great victory, but gained by the Turkes with much bloud: for the Chriſtians fighting as men deſperat,ſlew of their enemies aboue twelue thouſand; and died themſelues as men rather with number oppreſſed, than with true valour vanquiſhed.

The caſtle of S.George ſurpriſed by the Turks.

The night following, the Turkes vpon the ſudden in the dead time of the night ſurpriſed the caſtle of S.George,and without reſpect of age or ſex,cruelly put to the ſword al that were D therin, except 150 perſons,whom they caried away captiue:and ſo ſetting the Caſtle on fire, departed. At the ſame time diuers companies of the Turkes were ſeen about Siſeg,who led away with them about ſix hundred Chriſtians into moſt miſerable captiuitie. And that nothing might be wanting vnto the calamities of this ſo miſerable a waſted Countrey; three hundred Waggons charged with all manner of prouiſion,ſent out of the prouinces there by for the reliefe of the garriſon ſoldiers in Croatia, were all intercepted by the Turkes; and ſo carried away.

The Emperour craueth aid againe of the Germã princes

The Emperor conſidering theſe proceedings of the Turkes, and that their ſtrength daily increaſed,gaue notice by writing to all the Princes and States of the Empire, what incurſions the Turks had of late made into Croatia and the frontiers of Hungary,with other places neer E vnto them:and that the Beglerbeg of Grecia,with the Baſſa's of Boſna, Buda,and Temeſwar, without regard of the league yet in force,had taken diuers Cities,Towns,Caſtles and ſtrong places,& ſo extended the bounds of their dominion aboue forty German miles, hauing ſlain or caried away into captiuitie the poor inhabitants of thoſe countries; & now to be grown to that hight of pride,that except their further proceedings were with like force repreſſed,they would in ſhort time ſet foot into Germany it ſelf,and poſſeſſing themſelues of Stiria and Ca-rinthia,would from thence daily more and more incroch vpon the empire. Which to hinder, was not in his power only,but required their help in generall. Wherfore he requeſted them, now at length in ſo publike a danger to open their coffers,and to ſend out their forces againſt the common enemy. Which requeſt of the Emperor,with the due conſideration of ſo great a F danger,mooued not only the Princes and States of the Empire,but others alſo farther off, to yeeld liberal contribution to ſo neceſſary and general a Cauſe.

The Turks now hearing of the great preparation of the Chriſtian Princes, beſide the army which was already in the field, and that they had made a ſtrong bridge ouer the riuer of Dra-nus, which they had alſo fortified;therby in ſafety at their pleaſure to tranſport their Army; without further delay furniſhed ſuch places as they had gotten,with ſtrong garriſons, and ſo withdrew themſelues into their own territory:which they did the rather, for that the Plague then raged ſore in Conſtantinople,inſomuch that there died a thouſand a day. Which contagion had alſo taken hold of the Turkiſh Army ; ſo that the Chriſtians for fear of infection ſlew what Turk ſoeuer fel into their hands. And thus ended the troubles of this year,beeing as it were an introduction for greater to inſue the year following.

Diuers incurſions of the Turkes vpon the Chriſtians.

The Turks together with the beginning of the new yeare began alſo their wonted incurſions into the frontiers of the Chriſtians. They of the garriſon of Petrinia (a ſtrong fort but lately and contrary to the League built by the Turkes vpon the Riuer Colapis or Kulp, for the further inuaſion of Croatia) made daily incurſions out of that new fort, and entring into the Iſland Turopolis,ſpoiled and burnt the town and caſtle of Beck-Vocobinam, and hauing made a great ſlaughter,carried away with them 400 priſoners. And in Hungary the Turkiſh gariſons to ſupply their wants, made diuers inrodes vpon the Chriſtians, and did exceeding much harm ; of which aduenturers, 600 paſſing ouer the frozen lake, were all drowned in the midſt therof. In another place three thouſand of them neer to Nuhuſe diuiding themſelues into two companies,the one ſhewed it ſelf in the ſight of the towneſmen,the other ſtill lying cloſe in ambuſh. They of the town vpon the ſight of theſe Turks ſallied out,and cauſing them to retyre,followed them ſo far,that they were paſt the place where the reſt of the Turkes lay ; who preſently ſtarting vp, ran with all ſpeed toward the town in hope to haue ſurpriſed it,and wanted not much of that they deſired ; for there was ſcarce a hundred of the Germans there in gariſon left in the towne,who had ſcarce ſo much time as to draw vp the bridge. Which don,they with the great ordnance from the wals inforced the Turks to retyre and forſake the town. About the ſame time alſo,the Turks in gariſon at Petrinia ſallying out vpon the ſudden,took the town Mattenize,which they ſpoiled ; and hauing ſlain and taken about 700 perſons,ſet fire on the town and ſo returned, hauing loſt in this exploit not paſt a hundred & fifty of their own men. Not long after,the ſame garriſon ſoldiers of Petrinia took another caſtle three miles diſtant from the riuer of Kulp,wherinto the Chriſtians dwelling round about had for fear of the enemy conueyed all their wealth,with great ſtore of victuals:all which the Turks took,and hauing ſlain 600 men in the caſtle,returned with an exceeding rich booty to Petrinia:which they bought with the liues of 500 of their fellowes ſlain in taking the caſtle. With like inſolencie did all the other gariſons of the Turks rage in al the other parts of Hungary. About Saſſouia in the vpper Hungary they caried away about three hundred Chriſtian captiues. And in the nether part of Hungary they took the ſtrong caſtle of S. Heling vpon the lake of Balaton,which they ſpoiled and burnt:and ſo likewiſe the Caſtle of Iſna ; but attempting the leſſer Comara, they were by the garriſon ſoldiers valiantly repulſed. They alſo fortified the Caſtle of Stock,which they had but a little before taken, that ſo it might ſerue as a ſafe refuge for their aduenturers. Which their manifold outrages contrary to the league euidently declared the deſire they had to begin that bloudy war which preſently after inſued: and was indeed the more ſuſpected,for that at the ſame time the Emperors Embaſſador Frederick Corcowitts was by Amuraths commandement ſhut vp cloſe in his houſe at Conſtantinople,and not ſuffered to ſpeak with any man,neither to write or to ſend any meſſenger vnto the Emperor. Which cauſed him the more to ſuſpect ſome great matter to be by the Turks intended,and therfore began to raiſe new forces. The Hungarians and Bohemians alſo ſeeing their Townes and Caſtles thus taken, their Prouinces ſpoiled, infinite numbers of people led away into captiuitie,and the enemy daily increaſing in ſtrength ; at length agreed vpon their own charges to maintaine a certaine number both of horſe and foot,far the repreſſing of theſe the Turkiſh incurſions.

Now although the Emperor knew right wel,al theſe outrages of the Turks contrary to the league,could not be don without the knowledge and good liking alſo of Amurath (as before informed therof by his Embaſſadour from Conſtantinople) yet to ſhew himſelfe willing to haue the league on his behalf kept,as alſo to make a further proof of Amuraths reſolution for peace or war,he wrot vnto him as followeth :

Rodolph the ſecond, Emperor of the Romans; Vnto Amurath the third, King of the Turks.

The Emperors Letters to Amurath.

*W Hereas nothing is hitherto on our behalfe omitted, for the preſeruation and continuance of the League and amity betwixt your moſt excellent Majeſty and vs, by the renued capitulations of peace; and that we haue with all ſinceritie and loue performed, and are herafter ready to perform whatſoeuer is on our part to be performed and done; and as we haue hitherto, ſo for euer herafter alſo make offer of the ſame: we moſt aſſuredly promiſe vnto our ſelues on your Maieſties behalfe, that you in like manner will not ſuffer any thing on your part to be wanting, but gladly and willingly to do all things which ſhall be meet and needfull for the preſeruation and keeping of this mutuall loue and friendſhip. Vpon which good hope grounding our ſelues, to declare our plain meaning and ſinceritie indeed, we will cauſe our moſt honorable B preſent (which is now ready) to be brought to your moſt royal Majeſty, at ſuch time as ſhal be agreed vpon betwixt our Embaſſador and you: vnto whom in all ſuch matters as he by our commandement ſhall haue to deal with your moſt excellent Maieſty, your Viſiers, or ſeruants, wee requeſt you to giue full credence.
In the mean time your Excellencie ſhall do well to prouide, that as we haue now ſeuerely commanded our ſubiects to keep the peace vpon our frontiers, ſo that your ſouldiers alſo make no incurſions as Enemies into our territories, nor to do in them any harm, but to indeauor themſelues alſo to peace and quietnes: and eſpecially, that all ſuch things as contrary to the capitulations of the league haue bin there of late taken from our people, or otherwiſe vniuſtly poſſeſſed, may be again reſtored, the loſſes recompenced, the new fort of Petrinia demoliſhed, and the Baſſa of Boſna and others the authors and breakers of the league puniſhed and diſplaced: wherby we ſhall gather your royall Maieſties moſt noble and kind affection toward C vs and our State; which as it ſhall bee a thing moſt iuſt, ſo ſhall it be a ſingular confirmation of our league. But concerning theſe matters, and others to the ſame belonging, our Embaſſadour is to declare our mind more at large, that ſo our preſt deſire for the continuance of our league and friendſhip with your Majeſty may be more plainly known. So wiſh we all health and proſperity vnto your moſt royall Maieſty.*

From Prague the 8 of March, 1593.

The Emperor alſo at the ſame time and to the ſame purpoſe writ to Sinan Baſſa in this ſort:

Rodolph the ſecond, Emperor of the Romans; To Sinan Baſſa the chiefe Viſier, Greeting.

The Emperors Letters to Sinan Baſſa.

*W E write at this preſent vnto your moſt excellent Emperor our moſt honored friend and neighbor, concerning ſuch matters as we thought fit for the preſeruation of the peace & league between vs, leſt haply we might ſeem to haue forgotten our duty. Now it ſhall well beſeem your vprightnes and good will, which we haue at other times proued, for the high place and authority which you hold (and which we rejoice to be again reſtored vnto you) to giue vnto theſe things ſuch eaſie paſſage before his Maieſty, as that we may acknowledge you kindnes and fauor, and haue occaſion therfore to ſhew our ſelues vnto you thankfull.
Firſt, we offer our ſelues moſt ready to continue the peace, and to performe whatſoeuer is according to the conuentions of the renued peace on our part to be performed: as alſo to ſend the honourable preſent, as yet not ſent, whenas our embaſſador ſhal haue with you appointed any certain time wherin it might be ſent.
E And we alſo aſſuredly hope, ſo to preuail with your Emperor, that on your part the places within our Territory by your people forcibly poſſeſſed, together with all ſuch things as haue bin wrongfully taken away, may be again reſtored, and the fort of Petrinia raſed. The Baſſa of Boſna alſo (who as we thinke would haue bin kept within the compas of duty, if you at that time had held the place of chiefe Viſier) and whoſoeuer els, guilty of the wicked breach of the league, to be worthily according to their deſerts puniſhed and diſplaced; and your ſoldiers ſeuerely charged not to make any further incurſion, nor to do any thing that may tend to the breach of the league. As we likewiſe ſhall with ſtreit commaunds moſt carefully reſtrain our gariſon ſoldiers vpon our frontiers, from all ſuch incurſions and enemies actions. But of theſe things our Embaſſador is more fully and at large to intreat with you: vnto whoſe ſpeech wee deſire ſuch credence to be giuen as vnto our owne, and we will ſo prouide, that you ſhall haue good proof of our great good will toward F you.*

From Prague the 8 of March, 1593.

Vnto which the Emperors Letters Sinan returned anſwer as followeth:

Sinan Baſſa*, chiefe Viſier to Amurath the third; Vnto Rodolph the ſecond, Emperour of the Romans, Greeting.

Sinan Baſſa's letters to the Emperor.

BY theſe we giue your Majeſty to vnderſtand, That two of your Majeſties Letters were brought hither before we were choſen and confirmed chief Viſier in this moſt royall Court; wherein your Maieſtie excuſe your ſelfe, and ſhew cauſes why the ſending of the wonted Preſents hath bin ſo long deferred, by laying the fault vpon the inſolencie of our garriſon ſoldiers in Boſna, and the breach of the publick peace. Which your letters being by vs read before our moſt mighty Emperor, his Highnes in choler burſt out into theſe words; And thy ſon the Beglerbeg of Buda hath ſtil hitherto writ, and giuen vs to vnderſtand, That the vſuall Preſents would certainly come, and that the King of Vienna would not in any caſe conſent to the breach of the league, or of the amity betwixt vs and him. And yet for all that, the preſents are not hitherto come: wherfore thy ſons writings and relations are not true. But now the Baſſa of Boſna hath ſent word to the Court, That your Maieſty will not ſend them, and all your doings to be but meer deceit and fraud. For which cauſe our moſt mighty Emperour hath remoued my ſon from his place in Buda, and rewarded the Baſſa of Boſna with honorable garments; wheras my ſon is for your ſake diſplaced. Now on our behalf nothing is don againſt the peace, but our ſoldiers as with a bridle kept in: wheras on your Maieſties behalfe, excurſions and harms into the territories of our Emperor neuer ceaſe, eſpecially in Boſna; wherinto your ſoldiers haue of late in warlike maner broken, although they were by our gariſons ouercome, their great ordnance taken and brought hither to the Court. Wherfore ſeeing the caſe ſo ſtandeth, your Maieſty is to reſolue vs vpon two points; whereof the firſt is, Whether you be minded to keep friendſhip with vs as beſeemeth, and to ſend hither the two laſt years preſents or not? And the ſecond, Whether you will ſet at liberty our captiue Sanzacks or no. Now if your Maieſty ſhall be content to keep the legue, and within theſe two months next to ſend the two years preſents, as alſo to diſmiſſe our Sanzacks; the league ſhall on our part be likewiſe vndoubtedly kept, your territories ſhal be in no caſe moleſted, ſuch Chriſtian Captiues as your Maieſty ſhall require, be inlarged, and a moſt firm and ſure friendſhip by vs continued. Wheras if you ſhall vpon any cauſe or excuſe longer delay to ſend thoſe honorable preſents, and vnto theſe our demands ſend us nothing but vain and windy anſwers; let God on high be therfore for euer praiſed: for now our moſt mighty and victorious Emperor, who wanteth neither ability nor power, hath commanded, That we our ſelf ſhould in perſon go in this war, and putting our confidence in the Higheſt, with the army of the right beleeuing Turkes to come into theſe parts. And therfore aſſure your Maieſty we will not fail there to incounter you; at which time ſhall appear vnto the world, what is by God our Creator (whoſe holy name be for euer praiſed) in his deep wiſdom preordained and ſet down for vs. Wherfore ſeeing that all which concerneth the League, together with the ſafety and quiet of our people on both ſides, is vnto your Maieſty thus declared, you are to conſider the end, and to follow our good aduice: Wheras if otherwiſe you ſhall be the cauſe of the breach of this ſo wholſom a peace and vnity (which we hitherto haue ſo ſincerely and firmly kept) the excuſe therof both in this world and in the world to come, ſhall lie vpon your ſelf. Now we requeſt of you no more, but forthwith to ſend vs anſwer of theſe our letters. As for the reſt, well may he ſpeed that taketh the right way.

From Conſtantinople the laſt of the moneth Giuma Zulcuel*, in the yeare of our holy Prophet Mahomet 1001

* which is the 16 of March, An. Dom. 1593

Yet for all theſe fair offers of peace thus by Sinan Baſſa made in his letters, was his purpoſe nothing leſſe than to haue performed the ſame: ſeeking onely to haue drawne the two yeares preſents from the Emperor, amounting to a great ſumme of mony, and ſo neuertheleſſe to haue proſecuted the intended war. The Emperor being the only man, of whom Amurath his great maſter had amongſt all the Chriſtian princes made choice to exerciſe his force vpon. Of all which things the Emperor was not ignorant, being therof (as we ſaid) fully before by his embaſſador aduertiſed from Conſtantinople.

Theſe troubles of the Spring thus paſt, enſued the Summer much more troubleſome, for Haſſan Baſſa of Boſna, chiefe author and deuiſer of theſe broiles, ceaſed not for the increaſe of his credit, to worke what miſchiefe he could againſt the Chriſtians that bordered vpon him.

A This great Baſſa mortally hated the Gouernour, or as ſome call him the Abbot of Siſeg, a ſtrong caſtle ſcituate vpon the borders of that part of Croatia,yet holden by the Chriſtians, where the riuer Kulp falleth into the famous riuer of Sauus or Saw (and was indeed the very bulwarke of that countrey) the cauſe of which his hatred is reported to haue beene this. The yeare before, the Baſſa had ſent a meſſenger to this Abbot, to require him to deliuer the caſtle or monaſtery vnto him : which meſſenger for certaine daies the Abbot entertained with many honourable ſpeeches, learning in the meane time of him ſo much as he poſſibly could of the Baſſaes intention, with what power, in what place, and with what engines he had determined to beſiege the caſtle. In the meane time it was diſcouered, that his ſteward had long before plotted with the Turke to haue betraied the caſtle, and had for certaine yeres paſt receiued of him a yerely penſion. Vpon which occaſion, the Abbot cauſed both the meſſenger & his own B ſteward to be apprehended, and ſo faſt bound hand and foot, to be caſt out at a window of the caſtle into the riuer of Saw. The Baſſa ſeeing his meſſenger not to returne, ſent another to the Abbot, grieuouſly threatning him, if he did not ſend him back again his meſſenger: wherunto the Abbot anſwered, that he had diſmiſſed him certaine daies before, and therefore maruelled if he were not as yet returned : neuertheleſſe concerning his demand, that he was reſolued to yeeld the monaſtery vnto the Baſſa, againſt whoſe forces he ſaw himſelfe vnable to hold it : requeſting only, that it would pleaſe him to ſend ſome men of account to receiue it at his hand, for that it would be no ſmall diſhonour vnto him to deliuer it vp vnto common ſoldiers. The Baſſa glad of this meſſage, ſent forthwith certain principall men of great account, hoping now C without any loſſe to haue that ſtrong place yeelded vnto him, which had ſo long time ſtood in his way. Three daies after, certaine troups of horſemen ſent from the Baſſa, came to the monaſtery as was appointed, and finding the gates open, entred, firſt the noblemen, and after them fiue hundred others or thereabouts : who were no ſooner within the gates, but that the portculleis was let fall, & certain murthering pieces (ſecretly placed in the court for that purpoſe) diſcharged ; with the violence whereof, the Turks that were already entred, were moſt miſerably rent in pieces, their heads, armes, and legs, flying in the aire ; when preſently the garriſon ſouldiers ſtarting out of their lurking places, made a quick diſpatch of all them that had eſcaped the fury of the great artillery. The reſt of the Turks ſhut out, hearing the noiſe and cry of them within, turning their horſes, betooke themſelues to ſpeedy flight. The great Baſſa hearing D of this ſlaughter of his men, and how he had beene deceiued, ſwore in great rage by his Mahomet, to raſe this monaſtery downe to the ground, and to plucke the Abbots skin ouer his eares : and ſo by threatning letters gaue him to vnderſtand as followeth :

Haſſan Baſſa of Boſna, vnto the Abbot of Siſeg.

The threatning letter of Haſſan Baſſa of Boſna vnto the Abbot of Siſeg.

It is not to thee vnknowne, how often wee haue ſent vnto thee our meſſengers with letters, declaring vnto thee our loue and good will ; requeſting thee in friendly ſort, and without further reſiſtance to yeeld vp vnto vs thy fortreſſe of Siſeg, not longer to be by thee holden. Vnto which our requeſt thou haſt hitherto moſt wilfully at thy pleaſure oppoſed thy ſelfe, not without the ſlaughter of our men ; and in ſo doing, E haſt giuen cauſe vnto the great Sultan to ouerthrow and raſe that thy fortreſſe, whereof thou for the Emperour wilt needs be the chiefe. Thinkeſt thou it will be for thy good, or yet well taken, that thou haſt ſo ſhamefully and perfidiouſly circumuented and ſlaine our Embaſſadors and ſeruants ſent vnto thee? Nay aſſure thy ſelfe, that if Mahomet *grant vs life, we ſhall neuer giue ouer the ſiege of that thy fort wherein thou ſo much truſteſt, vntill I haue before thy face ouerthrowne it, and (if thy God ſhall giue thee aliue into my hands) haue pluckt thy skin ouer thine eares, to the great reproch and ſhame of the Chriſtians ; for I am fully reſolued, not to depart from this place, but to continue the ſiege thereof vntill I haue it. Let a little time yet paſſe, and thou ſhalt ſee thy ſelfe on euery ſide beſieged, thy fort with moe and greater pieces of artillery than euer, battered, and our power ſtrong enough to conſtraine thee. Thou haſt hitherto put thy greateſt hope and comfort in the * Banne* Erodius, for whom by the help of Mahomet we are too F much ſtrong. In briefe, we are of nothing more carefull than how to get thee into our power : which if we do, looke not for any mercy at our hands.

 The Hungarian Bannes are Noblemen in power much like vnto the Turks Baſſaes.*

Haſſan Baſſa inuadeth Croatia.

Neither was the Baſſa vnmindfull of his promiſe, or of the loſſe he had receiued, but now in the beginning of Iune with an army of thirty thouſand horſe and foot, came and beſieged the

Siſeg beſieged by Haſſan Baſſa fortreſſe of Trenſchijn, which with continuall battery and often aſſaults he at length tooke, ſacked the towne, ſlew moſt part of the inhabitants, except 800 or thereabouts of the younger ſort, which he carried away with him into captiuity. And being proud of this victory, remouing thence by a bridge which he had made, paſſed ouer the riuer, and ſo the twelfth of Iune came and incamped before the monaſtery of Siſeg: and after vain ſummons giuen to the ſame, the next day cauſed his great ordnance to be planted, and with great fury thundering againſt the wals, in ſhort time ouerthrew the new tower, in the fall whereof two of the Chriſtian canoniers periſhed. This furious battery he maintained by the ſpace of ten daies without intermiſſion, giuing no time of reſt to the beſieged; ſo that it ſeemed not poſſible for the monaſtery to be any long time defended, if it were not with ſpeed relieued. The Biſhop of Zagrabia, and Rupertus Eggenberg Generall of the Emperours forces that then were at Zagrabia, gaue knowledge thereof to Andrew lord Auersberg Gouernor of Carolſtat, crauing his aid and counſell: who calling together his owne forces, raiſed a good number of good horſe and foot, and called alſo vnto him the bordering horſemen of Karnia and Carainia: who the ſeuenteenth day of Iune met all together not far from Inſtawitz, and there tarried that night. The next day paſſing ouer the riuer Savus neere vnto Zagrabia, they joyned themſelues with the Emperors forces, and marched the nineteenth day in good order to Sceline, where they expected the comming of County Serinus. The twentieth day Peter Herdelius with his Huſſars, and the lord Stephen Graſwein came into the campe, with many of thoſe light horſemen whom the Hungarians called Vſcocchi. The one and twentieth day they lodged at Gradium, ſtill expecting the comming of the County Serinus, who otherwiſe buſied, could not come. The next day after, a ſouldier ſent out from the beſieged, came into the camp, who gaue the captains to vnderſtand, that except they made haſte that day to relieue the diſtreſſed monaſtery, it would vndoubtedly be loſt, for that the enemy had made it ſaultable, and would that night giue the aſſault; and the defendants doubting how they ſhould be able to maintaine the place, began before his departure thence to think of compoſition with the enemy. Vpon which news the captains forthwith began to conſult among themſelues, what courſe to take in ſo doubtful & dangerous a caſe: where Auersberg was of opinion, that it were beſt to march on, and to giue the enemy battell; with whom alſo agreed the lord Rederen: the reſt of the captains being of a contrary mind, for that the ſtrength of the Chriſtians compared to the Turks, was too weake; and therefore they thought it better in time to retire whiles they yet might, than to hazard vnto moſt manifeſt perils the liues of ſo many valiant men, at ſo great ods. At which counſel Auerſberg was at the firſt much moued, but afterwards (as he was a man of great eloquence) plainely ſet before them the neceſſity of the cauſe, & with liuely reaſons cheered vp the fearfull Croatians; notably perſuading them all in generall, to put their whole truſt & confidence in God, to whom it was as eaſie to giue victory by few, as by many: and to fight like valiant men, for their religion, their country, their liues, their wiues, their children and friends, and whatſoeuer elſe they held deare; againſt that cowardly enemy, whoſe valour neuer brought him into the field, but only the vaine truſt he had in his multitude; and would therfore no doubt eaſily be put to flight, if he ſhould contrary to his expectation find himſelf but a little hardly laid vnto. With theſe and other like reaſons he preuailed ſo much, that they all yeelded to his opinion, & with one conſent reſolued to go againſt the enemy, and to do what they might to relieue their beſieged friends. So vpon a ſigne giuen, the whole army (in number not aboue 4000) forthwith remoued, and with great ſpeed haſted towards the enemy; and being come within a mile of the camp, put themſelues in order of battell. The Turks by their eſpials vnderſtanding of the approch of the Chriſtians, brought all their horſmen ouer the riuer of Kulp, by a bridge which they had made, and hauing put themſelues in order, came to joyne battell with the Chriſtians: who had in their vauntgard placed the Croatians and Huſſars, in the left wing them of Carolſtat, and the Harquebuſiers of Karnia; in the right wing the borderers, of Carainia, all horſemen; in the maine battell the reſt of the ſoldiers, with the horſemen of Sileſia, vnder the conduct of Sigiſmund Paradiſe; the rereward was incloſed with three companies of the Emperors ſouldiers. The Croatians and Huſſars in the vantgard gaue the firſt charge vpon the enemy: but hauing for a good ſpace made a great fight, they were about to haue retired, and diſcouraged with the multitude of the enemies, were euen vpon the point to haue fled: when Auersberg (Generall of the Chriſtian army) came on with his ſquadron, and not only reſtored

A great battell betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians.

A the battel, but ſo reſolutely charged the main battell of the Turks, that the Baſſa was conſtrained at the firſt to retire, and afterwards to fly; after whom all the reſt of the army followed. The Chriſtians ſtill keeping their array, purſued them with great ſpeed; and comming to the new made bridge before them, tooke from them that paſſage, to the great diſcomfiture of the Turks; who ſeeing the miſerable ſlaughter of themſelues, and no way to eſcape, ran headlong ſome into the riuer Odera, ſome into Kulp, and were there for moſt part drowned; the reſt were all ſlaine by the Chriſtians, before determined not to take any priſoners. In the meane time, the Turks that remained at the ſiege, vnderſtanding of the ouerthrow of their fellows, ſet fire on their powder and other prouiſion, and ſo in great feare betooke themſelues to flight. Whoſe tents the Chriſtians immediatly after tooke, and in them nine great pieces of artillery, and B good ſtore of great ſhot of 44 and 45 pound weight a piece, with the ſumptuous pauilion of the Baſſa, and much other rich ſpoile, which was all carried to the monaſtery of Siſeg. The number of the Turks ſlaine in this battell, and drowned in the riuers, is of diuers diuerſly reported, but moſt agree vpon eighteene thouſand. And amongſt them was Haſſan Baſſa himſelfe, found in the riuer neere vnto the bridge, known by his moſt rich and ſumptuous apparell; and neere vnto him Mahomet-Beg, and Achmat-Beg. In other places were alſo found the dead bodies of Suffer-Beg the Baſſaes brother, of Menibeg, Haramuran Beg, Curti-Beg, Operd-Beg, and Goſchus, the Baſſa's chiefe counſellor, and maſter of his houſhold. But of all others, the vntimely death of Sinam Beg, Amurath his nephew, his ſiſters only ſonne, ſent thither to haue learned the feats of armes vnder Haſſan the great Baſſa, was of the Turks moſt lamented. Of twenty C thouſand Turks that came ouer the riuer Kulp, ſcarcely two thouſand eſcaped. This ſo great a victory obtained, all the army of the Chriſtians went thrice about the Monaſtery, and euery time falling all downe vpon their knees, gaue vnto God moſt hearty thanks for the ſame, as by him miraculouſly giuen, and not by themſelues won; and afterwards made all the ſhew of joy and gladneſſe they could poſſibly deuiſe.

Siſeg relieued.

Eighteen thouſand Turkes ſlaine.

Siſeg thus deliuered, and the Turks army ouerthrowne, the Chriſtians with all ſpeed laied ſiege to Petrinia the ſtrong new fort of the Turks, which they for the ſpace of fiue daies moſt furiouſly battered: but hearing that the great Gouernor of Græcia (whom the Turks call the Beglerbeg of Romania) was with a great power comming to the reliefe of the fort, they raiſed their ſiege, brake vp their army, and returned euery man to his wonted charge.

D Whileſt theſe things were in doing at Petrinia, a Poſt came from Conſtantinople to Buda, who brought thither the firſt newes of the ouerthrow of Siſeg, for the report thereof was not as yet come to Buda; wherfore the Baſſa called vnto him the meſſenger, author of ſo bad news, and diligently examined him of the truth thereof: who told him, that at his departure from Conſtantinople, nothing was there knowne of that loſſe, but that vpon the way as he came, he met with diuers horſemen but lately eſcaped from the ſlaughter, who told him of a certainty, that the Baſſa was ſlain, and his army deſtroied. Wherunto the Baſſa of Buda replied, That he was happy in his death, for that if he had by chance eſcaped, he ſhould for his indiſcretion vndoubtedly haue ſuffered ſome other more ſhamefull death at the court.

Newes of the ouerthrow of the Turkes at Siſeg, brought to Buda.

When newes of the aforeſaid victory was brought to the Emperor at Prague, he comman- E ded publike prayers, with thankſgiuing to almighty God to be made in all churches; and ſent a meſſenger with letters to Amurath, to know of him how he vnderſtood theſe inſolent proceedings of his ſouldiers, and eſpecially this late expedition of the Baſſa of Boſna and his complices, contrary to the league yet in force betwixt them. After which meſſenger he ſent alſo the lord Popelius, with the yerely Preſent (or rather tribute) he vſed to ſend vnto the Turkiſh Emperor at Conſtantinople; yet with this charge, that when he was come as far a Comara in the borders of Hungary, he ſhould there ſtay vntill the returne of the aforeſaid meſſenger: who if he brought tidings of peace from Amurath, then to proceed on his journey to the Turkes Court; otherwiſe to returne againe with his Preſent, as he afterwards did. For Amurath enraged with the notable loſſe receiued at Siſeg, and prickt forward with the teares and F prayers of his ſiſter (deſirous of nothing more than to be reuenged for the death of her ſonne) the ſeuenth of Auguſt cauſed open war to be proclaimed againſt the Chriſtian Emperor, both at Conſtantinople and Buda. The mannaging whereof he committed to Sinan Baſſa the old enemy of the Chriſtians, his Lieutenant Generall, and perſuader of this war: who departing from Conſtantinople with an army of forty thouſand, wherein were 5600 Ianizaries, was by

Amurath himſelfe and the great men of the court brought a mile on his way: hauing in charge from the great Sultan, by the aſſiſtance of the Beglerbeg of Græce, the Baſſaes of Buda and Temeſware, and other his Sanzacks and commanders in that part of his Empire, to reuenge the death of his nephew, and the diſhonor receiued at Siſeg.

This war Amurath with great pride denounced vnto the Chriſtian Emperour and the reſt of the Princes his confederats in this ſort.

Amurath the third, by the grace of the great God in Heauen, the only Monarch of the World, a great and mighty god on earth, an inuincible Cæſar, King of all Kings, from the Eaſt vnto the Weſt, Sultan of Babylon, Soueraign of the moſt noble Families of Perſia and Armenia, triumphant Victor of Ieruſalem, Lord poſſeſſor of the Sepulchre of the crucified God, ſubuertor and ſworne enemy of the Chriſtians, and of all them that call vpon the name of Chriſt.

The proud and blaſphemous denunciation of war giuen out by Amurath againſt Rodolph the Chriſtian Emperour.

WE denounce vnto thee Rodolph the Emperour, and to all the Germane Nation taking part with thee, vnto the great Biſhop alſo, all the Cardinals and Biſhops, to all your ſonnes and ſubiects: we earneſtly (I ſay) by our crowne and Empire denounce vnto you open war. And giue you to vnderſtand, that our purpoſe is, with the power of thirteene Kingdomes, and certaine hundred thouſands of men, horſe and foot, with our Turks and Turkiſh armes, yea, with all our ſtrength and power (ſuch as neither thou nor any of thine hath euer yet ſeene or heard of, much leſſe had any proofe of) to beſiege you in your chiefe and metropoliticall cities, and with fire and ſword to perſecute you and all yours, and whoſoeuer ſhall giue you helpe, to burne, deſtroy, and kill, and with moſt exquiſite torments we can deuiſe, to torture vnto death and ſlay ſuch Chriſtian captiues as ſhall fall into our hands, or elſe to keepe them as dogs, captiues in perpetuall miſery; to empaile vpon ſtakes your faireſt ſons and daughters: and to the further ſhame and reproch of you and yours, to kill like dogs your women great with childe, and the children in their bellies: for now we are fully reſolued to bring into our ſubiection, you which rule but in a ſmall country, and by ſtrong hand and force of armes to keepe from you your Kingdome, as alſo to oppreſſe, root vp, and deſtroy the keyes and See of Rome, together with the golden ſcepter thereof: and we will proue whether your crucified Ieſus will helpe you and do for you as yours perſuade you. Beleeue him ſtill and truſt in him, and ſee how he hath holpen his meſſengers which hath put their confidence in him: for we neither beleeue, neither can we endure to heare of ſuch incomprehenſible things, that he can helpe, which is dead ſo many Worlds of yeares ago, which could not helpe himſelfe, nor deliuer his owne country and inheritance from our power, ouer which we haue ſo long time reigned. Theſe things, ô yee poore and miſerable of the World, we thought good to ſignifie vnto you, that you with your Princes and confederats may know what you haue to do and to looke for. Giuen in our moſt mighty and Imperiall city of Conſtantinople, which our anceſtors by force of armes tooke from yours, and hauing ſlaine or taken priſoners all their citiſens, reſerued ſuch of their wiues and children as they pleaſed, vnto their luſt, to your perpetuall infamy and ſhame.

Siſeg taken by the Turks.

Sinan with his army thus ſetting forward, kept ſtill on his way towards Buda, but the Beglerbeg of Græcia with a farre greater power marched towards Croatia, as well to relieue the forts diſtreſſed by the Chriſtians, as againe to beſiege the ſtrong caſtle or monaſtery of Siſeg: which he with his huge army at his firſt arriuall compaſſed about without reſiſtance, & with continuall battery ouerthrew the wals thereof, giuing no time of reſt vnto the defendants. Which breaches they for all that valiantly defended, & with reſtleſſe labour notably repaired, the very fearfull women bringing tables, ſtooles, and whatſoeuer els came to hand, that might any wiſe helpe to keepe the enemy out, of whom a great number was in the breaches ſlain: but what was that handfull againſt ſuch a multitude? At length the 3 day of September the Turks by maine force entred the Monaſtery, and put to ſword all the ſoldiers therein: among whom were 200 Germans, of whom the Turks cut ſome in pieces, and the reſt they threw into the riuer Kulp. One religious man there found among the reſt, they did flea quicke in deteſtation of his profeſſion, and afterward cutting him in ſmall pieces, burnt them to aſhes. So taking the ſpoyle of all that was there to be had; and leauing a ſtrong garriſon for the keeping of the place, they paſſed ouer Savus, burning the country before him, and carried away with them about a thouſand poore Chriſtians into perpetuall captiuity. Theſe inuaſions of the Turks cauſed the Emperor to craue aid both of the States of the Empire, and other forreine Princes further off: which was by ſome eaſily granted, but not ſo ſpeedily performed.

About this time Peter ſyrnamed le Huſſar (for that he commanded ouer thoſe horſemen which the Hungarians call Huſſars) captain of Pappa, by the appointment of Ferdinand county Hardeck Gouernour of Rab, lay in wait for the Turks Treaſurer in Hungary, who had the command of 5000 Turks: him this Hungarian tooke at aduantage, as he was muſtering and paying certain companies of his ſoldiers, miſtruſting no ſuch danger, and deſperatly charging him, ſlew him with diuers of his men, and put the reſt to flight, and ſo with the ſpoile and ſome few priſoners he returned againe to his caſtle, carrying with him the Treaſurer.

Sinan Baſſa beſiegeth Veſprinium.

Now Sinan the Generall being come with his army to Buda, reſolued with himſelfe to begin his wars in that part of Hungary, with the ſiege of Veſprinium. This Epiſcopall city was by Solyman the great Turke taken from the Chriſtians in the yeare 1552, and againe by them recouered about foureteene yeares after, about the yeare 1566; ſince which time vntill now it had remained in the hands of the Chriſtians. Sinan without delay marching with his army to Veſprinium, compaſſed the city round, and encamping as he ſaw good, planted his battery, wherewith he continually thundered againſt the city. The Chriſtians there in garriſon eaſily perceiuing that the city was not long to be holden againſt ſo great a power, placed diuers barrels of gunpouder in certain mines they had made vnder the wals and bulwarkes of the towne, with traines that ſhould at a certaine time take fire. Which done, they departed ſecretly out of the city in the dead time of the night, hoping ſo in the darke to haue eſcaped the hand of the enemy: which they did not ſo ſecretly, but that they were by the Turks deſcried, and moſt of them ſlaine. Ferdinand Samaria Gouernor of the city, after he had for a ſpace valiantly defended himſelfe, fell at laſt into the enemies hand, and ſo was taken aliue, together with one Hofkirke a German captain. The Turks entered the city the ſixth of October, ſtriuing who ſhould get firſt in, for greedineſſe of the prey, when ſuddenly the pouder in the mines tooke fire, and blowing vp the very foundations of the wals and bulwarkes, ſlew a number of the Turks that were within the danger thereof, and wonderfully defaced the city.

Palotta yeelded vnto the Turks.

From Veſprinium the Baſſa remoued with his army to Palotta, and gaue ſummons to the caſtle: but receiuing ſuch anſwer as pleaſed him not, he laied ſiege vnto it with all his power. Which at the firſt Peter Ornand captaine of the caſtle cheerfully receiued: but being afterward without any great cauſe diſcouraged (the caſtle as yet being but little ſhaken, & but one man ſlaine, and the reſt of the ſoldiers ready to ſpend their liues in defence thereof) he ſent vnto the Baſſa, offering to yeeld the caſtle vnto him, ſo that he with his ſouldiers might with bag and baggage in ſafety depart. Of which his offer the Baſſa accepted, and granted his requeſt. But he was no ſooner come out of the caſtle with his ſouldiers, and ready to depart, but the faithleſſe Turke contrary to his oath and promiſe cauſed them all to be cruelly ſlaine, except only the captaine and two other. After that, the Baſſa without any great labor tooke in all the country thereabouts neere vnto the lake of Balaton.

Now at laſt, though long firſt, about the middle of October the Chriſtians began to muſter their army, in number about 18000, all good and expert ſouldiers; with which power they ſhortly after paſſing ouer Danubius, at the firſt encounter with the Turkes, put them to the worſe, ſlew a great number of them, and reſcued a number of poore Chriſtian captiues.

Alba Regalis beſieged by the Chriſtians.

In the later end of this month, county Hardeck Gouernor of Rab, and Generall of the Chriſtian army in that part of Hungary, departing from Comara with all his power, came and laid ſiege to the ſtrong city of Alba Regalis, which by the force of his artillery he in ſhort time made ſaultable; but in aſſaulting the breaches, was by the Turks there in garriſon notably repulſed. So hauing made ſufficient proof both of the ſtrength & courage of the defendants, and perceiuing no good could be done without a long ſiege, for which he was not as then prouided; after conſultation had with the reſt of his captaines, he reſolued to raiſe his ſiege: which he did the ſecond of Nouember, remouing that day but halfe a mile from the city, becauſe he would be ſure of all his army. But as he was about the next day to remoue, news was brought him by his eſpials, that the enemies power was at hand, and euen now almoſt in ſight: which proued to be ſo indeed. For the Baſſa of Buda by the commandement of Sinan Baſſa the Generall, was come forth with thirteene Sanzacks, and twenty thouſand ſouldiers, thirty field pieces, and fiue hundred waggons laded with victuall and other warlike prouiſion, to raiſe the ſiege, and to relieue the city; and was now euen at hand, comming directly vpon the Chriſtians: whereupon the county, aſſiſted by the county Serinus, the lord Palſi, the lord Nadaſti, Peter le Huſſar, and other valiant captains of great experience, with wonderfull celerity put his army in order of battell, and ſo couragiouſly ſet forward to encounter the enemy. The Baſſa ſeeing the Chriſtians marching towards him, tooke the aduantage of the higher ground, and from thence diſcharged his field pieces vpon them; which mounted too high, by good hap did them little or no hurt at all. The Chriſtians for all that deſirous of battell, & nothing regarding the diſaduantage of the ground, but calling vpon the name of the Almighty, mounted the hill, and joyning battell with the Turks, by plaine force conſtrained them to fly. In this army of the Turks, being for moſt part horſemen, were about fiue thouſand foot, and many of them Ianizaries, who in flying oftentimes made ſtands, and wounded many, and yet neuertheleſſe were almoſt all there ſlaine, with many others: amongſt whom were three great men, the Sanzackes of Strigonium, Setchine, and Nouigrade; ſeuen Chiaus, & many other men of mark, the moſt valiant captains of the Turks borderers. The lord Nadaſti with ſome others taking view of the Turks that were ſlaine and loſt in this battell, deemed them to haue bin at the leaſt in number eight thouſand: few priſoners were ſaued, all being put to the ſword: which cauſed Sinan to ſweare by his Mahomet neuer more to ſpare any Chriſtian. All the Turks artillery, wagons, and prouiſion became a prey vnto the Chriſtians: many enſignes were there found, and weapons of great value. It is hardly to be beleeued how much this victory encouraged the Chriſtians, and daunted the Turks. Wherupon the county with great joy brought backe his army to Alba-Regalis, and encamped neere the bulwarke called Stopach, where the Turks moſt feared to be aſſaulted. Palſi, Nadaſti, and ſome others, earneſtly perſuaded with the county, not to depart from the city before he had won it: but he conſidering the hard time of the yere, the ſtrength of the city (which was now full of ſouldiers, by reaſon of them that were fled in thither from the late ouerthrow) with the want of things neceſſary in the army to maintaine a longer ſiege, and fearing alſo after long lying to be enforced with diſhonour to forſake it, would not hearken to their perſuaſions, but calling a counſell, reſolued to raiſe his ſiege, and to content himſelfe with the victory he had already gotten, which was afterward imputed vnto him for more than an ouerſight. So ſetting fire vpon the ſuburbs of the city, he riſe with his army, and departed thence the fifth of Nouember, and returned to Rab.

Sabatzka taken by the Lord Teuffenbach.

Not long after, Chriſtopher Lord Teuffenbach, the Emperours lieutenant in the vpper part of Hungary, who lay encamped at Caſſouia, with his army of foureteene thouſand ſouldiers remoued thence, and marching along the country two daies, came and laid ſiege to Sabatzka, one of the Turks ſtrongeſt caſtles in thoſe quarters, out of which they vſually did much harm among the Chriſtians. This caſtle Teuffenbach battered in three places; and hauing at length made it ſaultable, tooke it by force the nineteenth of Nouember, and put to the ſword all the Turkes there in garriſon, in number about two hundred and fifty, and in ſtead of them left a ſtrong garriſon of his owne: whereby all the Country thereabouts was reſtored to great quietneſſe.

Filek beſieged by the Chriſtians.

Sabatzka thus taken, the Chriſtian Generall remoued with all ſpeed to Filek a ſtrong city of the higher Hungary, which Solyman the Turkiſh Emperor tooke from the Chriſtians in the yere 1560, and placed therein a Sanzacke, vnder the command of the Baſſa of Buda. The Generall incamping before this city, the next day after planted his battery, and in moſt terrible manner without intermiſſion thundered againſt the wals and gates of the city. The Sanzacke Gouernour thereof, conſidering the power of the Chriſtians, got out ſecretly by night with a few ſouldiers, to acquaint the other Turkiſh Sanzackes his neighbours with the comming of the Chriſtians, and the number of their army; and further to conſult with them, how the city might be relieued. The Baſſa of Temeſwarе, with the Sanzacks of Giula, Hadwan, Scantzag, and Scirme, vndertooke the matter: and thereupon the Baſſa ſent for eight hundred Ianizaries, of late left by Sinan Baſſa in garriſon at Buda and Alba-Regalis; who all flatly refuſed to goe to this ſeruice; ſaying, That they would not be led as beaſts to the ſlaughter, as were their fellows but a little before at Alba-Regalis: Neuertheleſſe they enforced the Armenians, whom Sinan and his ſon had brought thither, to go; but of Buda, Alba-Regalis, and Scamboth, were ſent only fifteene hundred common ſouldiers. For all that, the Baſſa with

A the Sanzackes his followers, firme in their former reſolution for the reliefe of the diſtreſſed city, hauing made great preparation, and raiſed an army of 18000 ſtrong, with many field pieces, by night drew neere vnto Filek, and ſtaied within two miles of the city. But the Generall of the Chriſtians, with Stephen Bathor and the other captaines, vnderſtanding of their comming, with 7000 good ſouldiers choſen out of the whole army, went out preſently againſt them, and the one and twentieth of Nouember ſuddenly aſſailing them in their tents, ouerthrew them and put them all to flight, whom the Chriſtians fiercely purſued with a moſt terrible execution. In this fight and flight there were ſlaine 6000 Turks, and but few or none taken. The Baſſa himſelf, with the Sanzacke of Filek, and many others of great name, were found amongſt the bodies of the ſlaine Turks. This victory gained with little or no loſſe, yeelded vn- B to the Chriſtians a rich prey, many gorgeous tents and faire enſignes, much cattel, and 20 field pieces, with 200 waggons laded with victuall and other prouiſion; all which they carried into the campe at Filek, and ſo more ſtreitly beſieged the city than before. The ſame day the Lord Palſi and Martin Laſla came to the campe with ſix thouſand ſouldiers; and forthwith three Trumpeters were ſent to them of the city, That if without further reſiſtance they would forthwith yeeld the city, they ſhould haue leaue in ſafety to depart with life and goods, although the Tuks had of late in like caſe broken their faith with the Chriſtians at Palotta: but if they refuſed his grace, and would needs hold it out to the vttermoſt, then to denounce vnto them all extremities. For all this, the Turks nothing diſmaied, refuſed to yeeld: whereupon the battery began afreſh, and in more terrible manner than before; ſo that though the City was moſt C ſtrongly fortified both with walls and rampiers, yet had the Chriſtians in three daies ſpace with continuall battery made a faire breach into it, whereby they in deſpight of the enemy entred without any notable loſſe the foure and twentieth of Nouember, ranſacked the city, and burnt a great part thereof. The ſame day they alſo tooke the vttermoſt caſtle, wherein the Sanzacks palace ſtood. This caſtle ſtandeth vpon a very high hill, ſtrengthened both by art and nature, and had in it a ſtrong garriſon of valiant ſoldiers, who ſpared not luſtily to beſtow their ſhot amongſt their enemies, of whom they ſlew a great number. Neuertheleſſe the Chriſtians after they had for the ſpace of two daies and two nights with a moſt furious battery ſhaken the walls, by plaine force entred the caſtle the 29 of Nouember, and put to ſword all the garriſon ſouldiers, except ſuch as had in good time forſaken this caſtle, and retired themſelues in- D to another more inward. Who being in number eight hundred with their wiues and children, without hope of reliefe, and ſeeing the cannon now bent vpon them, ſet out a white enſigne in token of parly: which granted, it was agreed that they ſhould depart with life, and ſo much of their goods as euery one of them could carry. Vpon which agreement the caſtle was yeelded the eight and twentieth day of Nouember, and the Turks with a ſafe conuoy brought vnto the place they deſired. In this caſtle was found a great booty, many pieces of artillery, and much other warlike prouiſion, but of victuals ſmall ſtore. The Generall with the reſt of the Captaines entring the caſtle, fell downe vpon their knees, and with their hearts and hands caſt vp to heauen, thanked God for their victory, and for the recouery of that ſtrong city; but eſpecially for the deliuery of ſo many Chriſtians out of the Turkiſh thraldome: for it is re- E ported, that there were aboue eight hundred country villages ſubject to the juriſdiction of Filek, the poore inhabitants whereof were now all freed from the Turkiſh ſeruitude, by the taking of this only city. The Chriſtians forthwith repaired the wals, bulwarkes and trenches, and ſtrongly fortified euery place againſt the enemy: and ſo leauing a ſufficient garriſon in the city and caſtles, departed with their army, now in number about twenty thouſand, towards Sodoch, ſix miles from Filek. But as they were vpon the way, newes was brought vnto the Generall, how that the Turks had for feare abandoned the caſtles of Dijwin and Somoske: whereupon he ſent out certaine companies of ſoldiers to take in both thoſe places: who comming thither, found them indeed forſaken by the enemy, but yet many pieces of artillery and other warlike prouiſion there ſtill left.

Filek taken by the Chriſtians.

F In the later end of Nouember the Generall marched with his army towards Setſchine, a ſtrong towne in the Dioceſſe of Agria; but the Turks in that place had two or three daies before prepared themſelues to fly, and ſent their wiues, their children, and the beſt of their ſubſtance, ſome to Hatwan, ſome to Buda; and now hearing of the approach of the Chriſtian Army, ſet fire on the towne and fled. The Chriſtians immediatly entring, did what they could to quench the fire, and ſaued a great part of the Towne: ſo leauing there a conuenient garriſon, he haſted with ſpeed to Blaueſtein, which the Turks did alſo ſet on fire, and betooke themſelues to flight. The Chriſtians comming thither the next day after, namely, the fourth of December, found a great part of the towne yet vnburnt, wherein they left a ſtrong garriſon; and from thence marched to Sallek, which towne they alſo tooke, being forſaken by the enemy, and put thereinto a good garriſon. The Generall was of nothing more deſirous, than to haue proſecuted this ſo happy a courſe of victory: but ſuch was the fouleneſſe of the Winter weather, that he could not trauell with his great artillery, without which no great matter was to be done againſt the enemy, ſtill keeping himſelfe in his ſtrong hold. And his Army in that waſted and forſaken country began now to feele the want of victuals; ſo that many had withdrawne themſelues out of the army, vnto their dwelling places.

At the ſame time alſo the Lord Palſi going to Dregel and Palanka, and finding them forſaken by the enemy, furniſhed both places with garriſons of his owne men. Certaine other ſtrong places were alſo this moneth recouered from the Turks, as Ainacke, Sollocke, Weſtke, and others, and ſo much territory gained by the Chriſtians, as was in circuit thought equall with the lower Auſtria. The joyfull newes of the aforeſaid victories, with the recouery of ſo much of the country, and ſo many ſtrong towns and caſtles, made great reioycing both at Vienna and Prague: for which cauſe publike praiers with thankeſgiuing to Almighty God were made in both places, with many other tokens of joy & triumph both there, and in diuers other places of the Empire. Yet were not the dead bodies of the Turks ſlaine at Alba Regalis buried, whereof roſe ſuch a loathſome and noiſome ſmell thereabout, that no man could abide to come nigh the place, to the great trouble of the inhabitants thereabout. At length certaine Turks out of Buda and Alba Regalis, to the number of three hundred and fifty, met together to haue buried thoſe loathſome carkaſſes. Vpon whom it chanced a captaine of the Huſſars to light with his horſemen, who fiercely aſſailing them, left moſt of them there dead for others to bury, and carried away the reſt priſoners.

The Turks in burying their dead, ſlain by the Chriſtians.

The Baſſa of Buda had cauſed Murat Sanzacke of Palotta to be ſtrangled, for that he ſuſpected him to haue had intelligence with the Chriſtians: in whoſe room he placed another, who comming with 600 Turks to take poſſeſſion of the preferment, was by the way ſet vpon by Peter le Haſſar with the garriſon ſoldiers of Pappa & Thurne, and ſlain with moſt part of his followers: thirty fiue of them were taken aliue, with all the Sanzacks rich furniture. To end this yere withall, the Turks in garriſon at Petrinia, Siſeg, Gaſtrowitz, and other places thereabouts, met together in number about 3000; who the 19 of December paſſing ouer the riuer Sauus, began to ſpoile the frontiers of thoſe countries. But before they were gon far, they were ſo incountred by the Lord Graſwin and the borderers thereabout, that fiue hundred of them were left dead vpon the ground, diuers of good account taken priſoners, & almoſt all the reſt drowned in the riuer: ſo that of all them that came ouer, few eſcaped with life. In the later end of this moneth great numbers of ſouldiers were taken vp in Saxony and other places of Germany; whereof ſome were ſent to Prague, and ſome to Vienna in Auſtria: and in Hungary the Chriſtians encreaſed their ſtrength with new ſupplies. In Auſtria alſo a new army was raiſed, and two and twenty great pieces of artillery ſent down the riuer of Danubius to Comara, and new preparation made in euery place for the next yeares wars.

Amurath dreameth.

Amurath the Turkiſh Emperor going out of the city of Conſtantinople the 11 of Ianuary, to muſter the army he had prepared againſt the Chriſtians for this yere, was ſuddenly ouertaken with ſuch a tempeſt of wind and raine, that it ouerthrew his tents, his chariots, yea, his horſes and men had much ado to withſtand it. Wherewith he being (as with an ominous prodigy) exceedingly troubled, returned with his army into the city, and oppreſſed with melancholy, caſt himſelfe downe vpon his bed as a man halfe ſicke. Where falling aſleepe, he dreamed he ſaw a man of exceeding ſtature, ſtanding with one of his feet vpon the tower of Conſtantinople, and the other ouer the ſtreit in Aſia, who ſtretching out his armes, held the Sun in one of his armes, and the Moone in the other: whom whiles he wondred at, the Monſter with his foot ſtrucke the tower, which forthwith fell downe, and in falling ouerthrew the great Temple, with the Imperiall Palace. Amurath awaked (as he thought) with the noiſe, and much troubled with the dreame (for the Turks are in ſuch vanities very ſuperſtitious) ſent for all his Wiſards and Interpreters of dreames, to know the meaning of this his ſo ſtrange or rather ſo

A melancholy a dreame, Who hypocritically anſwered him, That foraſmuch as he had not with al his forces as a tempeſt impugned the Chriſtians, their great Prophet Mahomet threatned by that dreame to ouerthrow the tower, the temple and the Imperiall palace, that is to ſay, the religion and Empire of the Turks. Which vaine and feigned interpretation ſo much moued the ſuperſtitious Tyrant, That he ſwore from thenceforth to turn all his forces vpon the Chriſtians, and not to giue ouer war vntill he had done what he might to ſubdue them. This the Turks dreame, with the interpretation thereof, and the ſolemne vow he had made for the deſtruction of the Chriſtians, was publiquely read in the churches of Tranſyluania, and many godly exhortations made vnto the people, to moue them, by prayer and all other good means to auert that ſo threatned thraldome.

A faire preſent of the ſpoile of the Turkes ſent vnto the Emperour.

B Of the rich ſpoile taken from the Turks in the late victory there vnto Alba-Regalis, the Chriſtian Captaines made a preſent for the Emperor and the Archduke Mathias his brother, which they ſent by the Lords Gall and Bran; and was by them preſented vnto the Emperour and his brother the eleuenth of Ianuary at Vienna, in order as followeth. Firſt went the Maſter of the ordnance of Rab, on both ſides attended vpon with the other officers of the artillery: after them were drawne thirty great pieces of ordnance taken in the battell: After theſe pieces followed three Turkiſh horſes with rich ſaddles and furniture ſtudded with gold, the ſtirrups and bridles being of ſiluer, gilt and moſt curiouſly wrought: after them were carried 22 of the Turks enſignes, three of them were very rich, and the other nineteen faire. Then followed the two Embaſſadours aforeſaid, with each of them a gilt mace in his hand, ſuch as the C Turks Baſſaes vſe to carry: after them were brought many inſtruments of war, gilt ſcimitars, gleaues, bowes and arrowes, targets, and ten of the Ianizaries drums. Two of the aforeſaid horſes were preſented to the Emperour, and the third to the Archduke. The field pieces brought to the caſtle gate, and orderly placed vpon the plaine, were all, at ſuch time as the reſt of the Preſent entred the caſtle, forthwith by the canoniers diſcharged; and there for certaine daies left vpon the plaine for the people to feed their eies vpon. The Embaſſadors diſcharged of their Preſent, and rewarded by the Emperour with chaines of gold and other gifts, returned to the campe. Notwithſtanding that it was now deepe Winter, yet many ſharp skirmiſhes dayly paſſed vpon the borders, betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians. The fifteenth of this preſent month, 2000 of the Turks aſſembled together, were making an inrode into the country about D Filek: whereof the Lord Teuffenbach hauing intelligence, lay in wait for them, and ſetting vpon them fearing no ſuch danger, ſlew and tooke of them fifteene hundred.

Mathias Archduke of Auſtria, now Gouernor of Stiria, Carinthia, and the countries thereabout, by the departure of Erneſtus his brother (who a little before by Philip King of Spaine made Gouernor of the Low countries) was now alſo by the Emperor appointed Generall of the Chriſtian army againſt the Turks: who to be neerer vnto the enemy, and to further the new war, departed the 24 day of February from Vienna to Rab; after whom dayly followed the forces newly raiſed in Sileſia, Morauia, and Hungary, with others alſo ſent from Prague and Vienna. He conſidering to what ſmall purpoſe it would be to haue the laſt yeare taken ſo many ſtrong townes and caſtles, except the ſame were alſo well manned and furniſhed with E all needfull prouiſion, by the perſuaſion of the Lord Teuffenbach, ſent County Serini with a thouſand horſe to Filek, for the more ſafety of that place and the country thereabout ſo lately gained from the Turks.

It fortuned that about this time, a ſoldier of the Turks taken not far from Dregel, & brought into the campe; among other things whereof he was examined, confeſſed that in Nouigrade (a ſtrong towne and of great importance, but one mile diſtant from Vacia, and three from Buda) was left but a weake garriſon of about eight hundred ſoldiers, who there liued in great feare to be beſieged; and that the Turks doubting ſuch a matter, had brought thither much prouiſion for the better fortifying of the towne. Vpon which intelligence the Chriſtians began to remoue with their army, and being come betwixt Dregel and Nouigrade, vnderſtood F by the country people, that it was true that the Turke had reported: wherefore they reſolued that night to lay ſiege vnto the towne. So forthwith ſome were ſent to Dregel, to fetch thence certaine pieces of Artillery, whom certaine troops of German horſemen went to meet: who vſed ſuch diligence, that the eight of March a little before the riſing of the Sun, the whole army with the great ordnance was come before Nouigrade. That day the Chriſtians ſpent in pitched their Tents, and incamping themſelues: yet before night they had planted certaine great pieces vpon an high hill, from whence they might ſee into the caſtle: whereof the maſter of the ordnance cauſed three of the greateſt about the going downe of the Sun to be diſcharged againſt the caſtle, to giue the Turks to vnderſtand that they wanted nothing for the ſiege. The ſame night alſo the Chriſtians caſt vp a great mount in the vally, from whence they preſently ſent ſix great ſhot into the caſtle: but early in the morning, the Sun being yet ſcarſe vp, and all things now in readineſſe, they began to batter the caſtle, & that day out of ten great pieces diſcharged 300 great ſhot againſt the caſtle: but to ſmall purpoſe; for the Caſtle was built vpon a moſt ſtrong rocke, fortified with high and thicke walls; and a deepe ditch hewed out of the maine rocke, which compaſſed the caſtle round; and for the more ſtrength thereof was ſo fortified with palliſado's made of ſtrong timber, as that there was no acceſſe vnto the wals: yet by the commandement of the Generall, certaine companies of the Chriſtians prepared themſelues to aſſault the breach, ſuch as it was: who beſides their weapons, carying with them dry faggots, and ſetting them on fire, burnt the palliſado in diuers places, and ſo opened the way vnto the walls: and encouraged with the ſucceſſe, approched neerer, and ſlew diuers of the Turks vpon the rampiers. Who diſcouraged with their owne weakeneſſe, and the forwardneſſe of the enemy, faintly defended themſelues, and yet ſlew diuers of them, beating them downe from the wals with ſtones, timber, fire works, and ſuch like. This aſſault giuen in the night, was continued vntill foure a clocke in the morning, and ſo giuen ouer. Shortly after came the Archduke with 1000 horſe into the campe, and cauſed the battery to be againe renued, whereby it chanced that the chiefe cannonier in the caſtle (being a renegate Italian) was taken with a great ſhot and ſlaine, whoſe death ſo diſmaied the reſt of the defendants, that they preſently ſet forth three white flags in ſigne of parley: which for all that the Chriſtians ſeemed not to regard, but ſtill continued the battery. The Turks then pitifully crying out, named two captaines, whom they deſired to haue ſent vnto them, with whom they might treat of ſome reaſonable compoſition. So for a while the battery ceaſed, and thoſe Captaines being ſent vnto the Towne, brought two of the beſt of the Turks in the Citie with them vnto the Archduke: who by their Interpreter declared, That they well conſidered the force of the Chriſtians, and ſeeing no reliefe to come from the Baſſa of Buda, as he had promiſed, thought themſelues to haue already diſcharged the parts of good ſouldiers, and ſeeing no other remedy, were contented to yeeld the caſtle, yet ſo, as that with bag and baggage they might in ſafety depart. Whereunto the Lord Palfi (taking vpon him the perſon of the Archduke, for that he himſelfe would not be knowne) anſwered, That foraſmuch as they had not yeelded at the firſt ſummons, but holden it out to the loſſe of many of his mens liues, and his great charge, they were vnworthy any fauour; yet of his owne clemency he would receiue them, if they would abſolutely without any further condition yeeld themſelues to his mercy. This anſwer being reported to the Sanzacke Gouernor of the Towne, pleaſed him not, and therefore ſaid he would ſtill ſtand vpon his defence. Whereupon the Chriſtians were about to haue begun a freſh aſſault. But after a new parley, it was at laſt agreed, That the Turks yeelding the towne vnto the Archduke, ſhould in ſafety depart with their apparell and ſcimiters onely. With which agreement two of the Turks were ſent backe into the caſtle, and the reſt detained. Foure houres the Turks in the caſtle delaied the time, as men doubtfull what to do: but being earneſtly called vpon for a reſolute anſwer, and ſeeing the Chriſtians ready againe to aſſault them, they for feare yeelded: and ſo 450 of them came forth, amongſt whom was the Sanzacke Gouernor of the Towne, with his wife and daughter, the Sanzacke of Selendre (ſent thither to haue aided him) and one Chiaus lately come from the Court. Theſe great men brauely mounted, were commanded to alight from their gallant horſes, and had in their ſteads other bad iades giuen them to ride vpon: and as they paſſed by, as well the women as the men, were ſearched, that they carried with them nothing more than their cloathes: if any thing els were found, it fell vnto the ſouldiers ſhare for good booty. This ſtrong towne of Nouigrade had continued in the poſſeſſion of the Turks about 60 yeares, and ſerued as it were for a bulwarke to Peſth and Buda; which now recouered out of their hands, opened a way vnto their further harmes. The keeping of this towne was by the Archduke committed to the Lord Rebei a nobleman of Hungary and kinſman to Palfi, with a ſtrong garriſon and certaine troups of Huſſars.

Nouigrade yeelded vnto the archduke.

The Sanzacke of Nouigrade, after he had loſt the towne, comming to Buda, was preſently apprehen-

A apprehended by the Baſſa, and laid in priſon: who although he excuſed himſelfe, by alledging that the towne was not poſſibly to be holden with ſo ſmall a gariſon againſt ſo great a power; and that if any fault were, it was to be imputed to them of Buda, for not ſending reliefe in time; and therefore appealed to the further hearing of Amurath himſelfe: yet all ſerued him not, but was by the Baſſaes commandement in the night hanged vpon a tree neere vnto the gate of the city, and afterwards cut in pieces.

The Sanzacke of Nouigrade hanged at Buda.

Whilſt theſe things were in doing, the Emperor ſent his Embaſſadors to the great Duke of Muſcouia, the King of Polonia, and the Prince of Tranſyluania, to proue how they ſtood affected towards thoſe his wars againſt the Turke, and what aid he might procure from them.
Into Muſcouie was ſent one Warkutth a gentleman of Sileſia, who cumming to Muſco, found B in that Court the Embaſſadors of the Tartar, the Turke, the Perſian, the Polonian, and the Dane. Of all theſe, the Embaſſadors of the Tartar and the Turke could haue no audience, but were with contumelious words rejected as miſcreants. The Emperours Embaſſador was honorably entertained, and after the manner of that countrey, a large proportion of wine, mede, aquavitæ, fleſh, fiſh, and fowle of ſundry ſorts allowed him dayly all the time of his abode. At length hauing audience, he declared vnto the great Duke the cauſe of his comming, and in the name of his Maſter requeſted his aid againſt the Turke. Whereunto the Duke anſwered, That he would giue the Emperor towards the maintenance of his wars againſt the common enemy, 500000 duckats, and allow him yearely 400000 during the time of that war; requeſting him not to make any peace with the Turke, and promiſed to ſend him aid alſo of men in this war, C if he ſhould ſo need. The Perſian Embaſſador alſo honorably feaſted the Emperors Embaſſador, and had with him great conferance concerning the wars of the Chriſtians with the Turks, and in his maſters name promiſed the continuation of his wars againſt the Turke, ſo that the Emperor would likewiſe promiſe not to haue any league with him, ſo to giue him leiſure to turne all his forces againe into Perſia. This Embaſſador after he had almoſt foure months tarried in Muſcouia, returned to the Emperor. At which time Dr Wacker the Emperors Embaſ-ſador into Polonia, returned alſo with joyfull newes, how that the Polonians with an army of eight and twenty thouſand had ſtopped the paſſage of an hundred thouſand Tartars whom the Turke had ſent for againſt the Emperour; and that if he needed, he ſhould be aided with the Polonian Coſſacks: but vnto the reſt of his requeſts he could haue no anſwer of the States D of that Kingdome, for that the King was then abſent in Sweden; and was therefore referred to be further anſwered at his returne.

At the ſame time, County Serinus with three hundred Harquebuſiers and certain troups of horſemen, and the footmen of Stiria and the countries thereabouts, aſſembling to the number of ten thouſand, departed from Caniſia, to beſiege Breſenza a caſtle of the Turkes. But they vnderſtanding before of his comming, conueied away the beſt of their ſubſtance, and ſetting the caſtle on fire, departed the three and twentieth of March. The Earle comming thither, tooke the forſaken caſtle, and put therein a garriſon of his owne ſouldiers. In like manner he tooke alſo Sigeſta, forſaken of the Turks, where he alſo placed a garriſon of the Chriſtians.
And ſo going on to Baboſtcha, beſieged it, which caſtle although it was ſtrongly ſcituated in E a mariſh, and could not eaſily haue beene woon, was for all that, for feare abandoned by the Turks, and ſo taken by the County: by recouery of which places, there was a ſafe and eaſie way laid open euen to Ziget, the Baſſa whereof ſtood in no ſmall doubt to haue bin euen then beſieged.

Certain caſtles of the Turkes vpon the borders of Stiria taken by the County Serinus.

Amurath intending by all meanes he could to vex the Emperor, had determined to ſend his fleet into the Adriatique, to beſiege Zegna a city of the Emperors ſcituate vpon the ſea coaſt, in the bay Quernero, called in antient time Flanaticus Sinus. Which the better to effect, he ſent one of his Chiaus Embaſſador to the Venetians, to requeſt them, That his fleet might by their leaue paſſe alongſt the Adriaticke, and haue the vſe of their ports and harbours, as need ſhould require. Which his requeſt the Venetians hearing, refuſed in any caſe to yeeld there-F unto: fearing (and not without cauſe) the vnfaithfulneſſe and treachery of the Turkes, whoſe oathes and promiſes are no longer ſtrong, or by them regarded, than ſtandeth with their owne good and profit: neuertheleſſe they moſt honourably vſed the Embaſſador, and ſo ſent him away without obtaining of that he was eſpecially ſent for.

Hatwan beſieged by the Chriſtians.

In the vpper part of Hungary Chriſtopher Lord Teuffenbach the Archdukes Lieutenant hauing gathered an army of twenty thouſand ſoldiers, the ſixteenth of Aprill laied ſiege to Hatwan a ſtrong towne ſix miles from Buda, fortified with a triple ditch and bulwarkes of exceeding ſtrength. G Againſt which although the Chriſtians could not do much either by mines or mounts, (by reaſon it was ſo inuironed with water) yet they ſo ſhut vp all the paſſages thereunto, that nothing could be brought or carried in or out of the town. They of the town ſeeing themſelues thus blockt vp, by ſecret meſſengers certified the Baſſa of Buda in what caſe they ſtood, praying of him aid: who with 10000 choſen ſoldiers, which he had then in readineſſe, and the Sanzacks of Sirnah, Giula, Lippa, Lerwoge, and Tſchangrade, with 5000 moe, forthwith ſet forward toward Hatwan to raiſe the ſiege: and the laſt of Aprill being come within ſight of the Chriſtian army, about one of the clocke in the afternoone encamped on the ſide of the riuer Sagijwa: H but when he could not or els durſt not, for the deepeneſſe of the way, the abundance of water and neereneſſe of the enemy, aduenture to paſſe the riuer, he retyred back againe to paſſe ouer at Iaſperin (otherwiſe called Iasbrin) where the riuer was joyned with a bridge, and not far off a good foord alſo to paſſe ouer at; thinking ſo to haue come vpon the backs of the Chriſtians, and with more ſafety haue relieued the beſieged towne. But Teuffenbach perceiuing his purpoſe, forthwith after his departure paſſed the riuer with much difficulty, and ouertaking him with his army the next day, being the firſt of May, about one of the clocke in the afternoone, betweene Zarcha, and Fuſcaſalua, with his great ordnance diſordered the rereward of the enemies battell; and comming on couragiouſly with his whole army, began a moſt cruell fight: which the Turks a great while endured with wonderfull reſolution; I but now deſtitute of their wonted multitude (their greateſt confidence) and hardly laied vnto by the Chriſtians, they in the end turned their backes and fled; whom ſix thouſand Hungarians and Germans fiercely purſued, and had the killing of them almoſt to Buda. In this battell the Chriſtians tooke all the enemies great Ordnance, with ſeuenteene enſignes, and alſo the caſtle of Iaſperin, which the Turks had for feare abandoned; wherein was found good ſtore of victuals, certaine great pieces, with much other warlike prouiſion. Of this ſo notable a victory Teuffenbach by Letters preſently aduertiſed the Archduke, after he was againe returned to the ſiege of Hatwan. Which Letters becauſe they containe many particularities and circumſtances of this battell, I haue thought it not amiſſe here to inſert.

The copy of the leters of the L. Teuffenbach, to Matthias the Archduke, General of the emperours Army againſt the Turks.

K Although (ſaid he) I haue by a ſpeedy meſſenger vpon the very Kalends of May certified your Excellency of the notable victory which God of his great goodneſſe gaue vnto vs the ſame day ouer our hereditary enemy: yet afterward vpon diligent inquiſition we vnderſtood many particularities, as well of the captiues themſelues, as of the inhabitants about Zolnocke, Peſth, and Buda; whereof I thought good to aduertiſe you. The Captiues themſelues confeſſe, That the Baſſa of Buda, with the Sanzackes of Zolnocke, Zarwack, Giula, and Tſchangrad, Cippaio, Genne, and others, had with great celerity raiſed an army of 13000 ſoldiers, amongſt whom were many Tartars, with purpoſe to haue relieued the beſieged Towne of Hatwan, and vpon the ſudden to haue oppreſſed vs in our tents. Filled with which hope, they in great haſte came with all their power the laſt of Aprill towards Hatwan: but foraſmuch as they could not paſſe ouer the riuer Zagijwa by reaſon of the height of the water, they were the next day being the firſt of May, conducted L by the Captaine of Iaſperin to a more commodious paſſage, ſo to come the neerer vnto vs, and the next day in the morning to haue ſurpriſed vs in our tents. But our moſt mercifull God hath auerted this ſo great a miſchiefe from vs, and turned it vpon their own heads. For as it is moſt conſtantly reported from Zolnocke, Peſth and Buda, and confirmed by the Inhabitants of the ſame places, there are 2500 of the Turks ſlaine, and as many wounded, of whom many periſhed, and are found dead vpon the high-wayes leading to Peſth and Zolnocke: of theſe we haue ſent a thouſand heads to Caſſonia, and cauſed many of the Turks to be buried for feare of infection in this ſo great heate. Verily it was a bloudy battell; ſo that the old Souldiers ſay, they haue not remembred or ſeene the Turks (two moe in number) to haue ſtood ſo long in battell, and to haue ſo fought it out without flying. Many men of great name and place there periſhed and fell, amongſt whom are redeemed the Sanzackes of Peſth, Nouigrade, and Temeske; Genne Alauus, M Bogſte, Aluſtaſa, Marielaus, and certaine Chiaus lately ſent from the Court, with the Baſſa his guard, wherein were eight hundred right valiant ſouldiers, of whom few eſcaped with life. Many fell that would haue yeelded great ranſome; but it was agreed vpon betweene the Germanes and the Hungarians, not

A to ſpare any of the enemies,but to put them all to the ſword; and that whoſoeuer did otherwiſe,it ſhould be imputed vnto him for diſhonor. So that more than ſixteen common ſoldiers, none were taken priſoners;of whom we might learn how things went amongſt the Turks,with other circumſtances of the battell. Wee took thirteen field pieces,whereof four were greater than the reſt,which they called Organs,and 24 of the enemies Enſignes. The Baſſa of Buda,beſide other three wounds by him receiued,was grieuouſly wounded in the ſide. Of our men were loſt about a hundred,and many of them moſt expert ſouldiers;and about ſix hundred others grieuouſly wounded,of whom there is ſmall hope,many of them beeing already dead. Neither is the loſſe ſmall we haue receiued in our horſes and armor; for there are few amongſt the Germane horſmen,which haue not loſt one,two,or three of their horſes or ſeruants, whereby our horſemen are wonderfully weakned. Yet was the victory great,to God be the praiſe,to him be the glory and thankes therefore. B Let vs in the mean time proſecute the ſiege begun. The laſt night I commaunded the water to be drawn another way, ſo that now our trenches may be aduanced many paces,and bulwarks raiſed within two hundred paces of the wall. We haue already planted fiue great pieces of artillery in one bulwark,and hope the next night to place fiue moe vpon a mount faſt by,and will do what ſhall be needfull for a ſtreit ſiege: and when time ſhall ſerue, vndertake the town with all our power; God grant vs therin good ſucceſſe and victory.

The Turks in garriſon at Zabola a fort there by, diſcouraged with the ouerthrow of their friends,forſook the fort,which for ſtrength and greatnes was comparable with Tocay or Erla. Which ſtrong place the Chriſtians without any loſſe now recouered.

C Whilſt this valiant captain the Lord Teuffenbach thus lay at the ſiege of Hatwan, Mathias the Archduke General of the Chriſtian Army in Hungary, incouraged with the good ſucces he had at Nouigrad,came with his Army,being 44000 ſtrong,before Strigonium(ſometime the metropolitical city of Hungary,but now of long a ſure receptacle of the Turks) and the ſixt of May incamped his Army about a quarter of a mile from the Caſtle,in a moſt pleaſant medow,from whence both the city and the caſtle were plainely to be ſeene. Vpon whom the Turks out of the caſtle,and three gallies that lay vpon the riuer,diſcharged certain great pieces without any great harm doing. But after the Chriſtian fleet was a little before night come down the riuer,and with their great ordnance began to anſwer them again,the enemy ceaſed ſhooting,and lay ſtil that night. In the mean time it fortuned, that a Turkiſh youth taken in D a garden there by,and brought into the camp and examined, confeſſed that there was no garriſon in the city more than four hundred Ianizaries,and that a new ſupply was daily expected from Buda. The Chriſtians laboring that night, were by the breake of day come with their trenches to a hil ouer againſt the caſtle,where they placed their battery,and forthwith began to batter the city. The ſame day (being the ſeuenth of May) two and twenty Turkes heads were preſented to the Archduke,and four men taken aliue,newly ſent out of the city to haue viewed the Chriſtian camp. About night certain balls of wilde-fire were ſhot into the City, wherof one fel vpon the tower called S. Adelbert,and ſet it on fire; wherwith firſt the church, and afterward a great part of the town fel on fire. The Sanzacks houſe,with all his horſes and armor,and a great quantity of pouder was then burnt,and ineſtimable hurt done in the City. E The next day the Chriſtians had with continual battery made a breach in the caſtle wall:but adjoining vnto the wall was a high and broad ſandy rampier,which could hardly be battered: for all that,the Germans gaue a fierce aſſault to the breach, hoping to haue entred by the ruines of the wall: but not being able to get ouer the ſandy rampier,were inforced with loſſe to retyre. The day following they began again the battery with eighteen great pieces: When about eight of clock in the morning,the Raſcians that were in the old city gaue the General to vnderſtand, That if he would at a place by them appointed,aſſault the greater city,to draw the Turks thither,they would in the mean time deliuer vnto the Chriſtians certain little poſterns,and receiue them into the old city; vpon condition that no violence ſhould bee done vnto them or theirs. Which being ſo agreed vpon, the Chriſtians accordingly gaue the aſ- F ſault the eleuenth of May in the euening,and by the help of the Raſcians took the city: who according to promiſe were al taken to mercy,and the Turks ſlain,except ſuch as by good hap recouered the new town. The keeping of this city was committed to the charge of two companies of German footmen, and 600 Hungarians, with 300 Raſcians and other towneſmen, Strigonium beſieged by the Chriſtians.

The Chriſtians recouer the old city.

Thus was the old city of Strigonium gained by the Chriſtians, the ſuburbs whereof they preſently burnt; neuertheleſſe the new town with the caſtle was ſtil holden by the Turks. Wherfore the Chriſtians hauing caſt vp certain trenches and mounts, and placed their artillerie as they thought moſt conuenient, began again to batter the caſtle, and after they had by the fury of the cannon made it ſaultable, with great courage aſſailed the breach, which the Turks valiantly defended; ſo that the Chriſtians were glad to retire, leauing behind them aboue 130 of their fellows, ſlain in the breach. The Turks a little before the Chriſtians comming had fortified an hil, wherunto the caſtle was ſomewhat ſubiect, called of the Chriſtians S. Nicolas his hil. This hil ſo fortified, the Chriſtians with continual battery and aſſault gained the 17 of May, and put all the Turks left aliue therin to the ſword: and turning the ordnance, from thence alſo battered the caſtle. The 22 of May a little before Sun-ſet, certain enſignes of foot were drawn out of the Campe, to haue the next day aſſaulted the lower town, who taking the benefit of the night, attempting to haue entred the towne in the dead time of the night, were notably incountred by the Turks ſallying out of the town vpon them. The Chriſtians for all that hauing inforced them to retyre, proſecuted their former reſolution, and with much adoe got ouer the vtmoſt wall: but finding there contrary to their expectation ſuch a deep & broad countermure as was not poſſible to be paſſed, they ſtood as men diſmaid; neither could they in the darknes of the night wel ſee to get back again ouer the town ditch, but diſorderly retiring, ſtuck faſt many of them in the deep mud, and there periſhed. In this aſſault there were about 1000 of the Chriſtians wounded and ſlain: and albeit that they twice or thrice renued the aſſault, yet preuailed they nothing, but were ſtill repulſed with loſſe. Many alſo of the Turks garriſon were ſlain, and the Sanzacke himſelfe hurt with a great ſhot; and many other wounded men ſent down the riuer to Buda, brought thither true news of the aforeſaid aſſaults and of the ſtate of the beſieged.

The Raſcians in arms againſt the Turks.

In the mean time news was brought to the Campe, That Sinan Baſſa the old enemy of the Chriſtians, and the Turks great Lieutenant, comming towards Hungary with a great Army, and hauing by boats conueyed ouer part therof, was ſet vpon by the Raſcians (theſe are poore oppreſſed Chriſtians dwelling on both ſides of Danubius, who weary of the Turkiſh thraldom, and deſirous of their antient liberty, haue often taken vp arms againſt the Turks, as they now did, incouraged by the good ſucceſſe of the Chriſtians on the other ſide of Hungary) and that after diuers skirmiſhes they had taken thirteen of the Turkes veſſels, wherein beſides victuals and certain great pieces of Artillery, they found about 2400 weight of pouder, 447 hundred of lead, 46454 bundles of match, 1200 great ſhot, whereof 1005 were of 66 pound weight; and of ſmall ſhot for harquebuſiers 48500, with much other warlike prouiſion; a great part wherof was brought into the Camp at Strigonium, and the reſt reſerued to future vſes. This loſſe ſo troubled the great Baſſa, that he altered his purpoſe before intended for Caſſovia.

K

The fourth of Iune, about fiue hundred Turks ſent vp the riuer of Buda, conducted by two Sanzacks vnder two red and white enſignes, landed neer to Gokara on the farther ſide of Danubius ouer againſt Strigonium; where after they had a while refreſhed themſelues, and left ſome few for the more aſſurance of the place, all the reſt were conueyed ouer the riuer into Strigonium; where they had bin long looked for, the old garriſon being now ſore weakened by the former aſſaults. Four daies after, the Turkes incouraged with this ſupply, ſallied out vpon the ſudden, and had entred one of the forts of the Chriſtians, but were forthwith againe repulſed, hauing loſt ſix and twenty of their men, and two of their enſignes. Not far off lay a troup of horſemen, if they had in time come in, not one of the Turkes had eſcaped. Long it were to tell, how often and in what manner the Chriſtians aſſaulted this city; but were by the Turks ſo receiued, that in fiue aſſaults they loſt fiue thouſand of their men; amongſt whome were diuers Captains, Lieutenants, Antients, and others of good account: twenty three Canoniers were alſo ſlain, and ten great pieces of Artillery ſo ſpoiled, as that they were no more ſeruiceable. The garriſon of this city conſiſted for moſt part of the Ianizaries (the Turks beſt ſoldiers) whoſe notable valor in holding out of this ſiege, was both of their owne people and their enemies much commended. Whatſoeuer was beaten down by day, that they againe repaired by night, and ſtill relieued with victual and things neceſſary from Buda, did what was

A poſſible to be don for defence of the City. About the ſame time certain Turks chancing vpon a troup of German horſmen, in fight ſlew aboue fifty of them, and put the reſt to flight: wherupon an alarm being raiſed in the Campe, many ran out to the reſcue of their fellowes, taking with them certain ſmall field pieces. Which the Turks perceiuing, began to fly; whome the Christians eagerly purſuing, were ſuddenly aſſailed by other Turks ſallying out of a fort faſt by, and inforced ſhamefully to retyre, and to leaue their field pieces behinde them. Which the Turks ſeiſing vpon, cloyed them, brake their Carriages, and made them altogether vnſeruiceable.

All this while the Lord Teuffenback lying at the ſiege of Hatwan, about this time requeſted aid of the Archduke, for that his power was with often conflicts, hunger, and other difficulties alwaies attending long ſieges, ſo much weakened, as that hee had ſcarſly 6000 ſound B men in his camp. To whom the Archduke forthwith ſent 1200 footmen, being loth to ſpare any more, for too much weakning his own army.

The Archduke ſends aid to the ſiege of Hatwā.

Amurath diſdaining to ſee the frontiers of his empire in ſo many places impugned by the Christians, and daily to receiue from them ſo great harmes, ſought by all meanes to be reuenged. Wherſore beſide the great power of his own which he was now about to ſend with Sinan Baſſa into Hungary, he had alſo procured from the great Tartar a wonderful number of thoſe rough & ſauage people to be ſent into Hungary, there to join with his army. Theſe wild people, to the number of 70000, according to direction giuen, breaking into Podolia, Valachia, and Moldauia, gathered together an incredible number of oxen and Kine, to this end & C purpoſe, that driuing them before them, they might both be aſſured of victuals, and the ſafer trauel thorow a part of Polonia. But when they were come vnto the borders of that country, and there found the power of Samoſchie the great Chancellor and the Polonian Coſſackes in arms, they eaſily perceiued that they could not that way paſſe without great loſſe. Wherſore they placed the aforeſaid herds of cattel, ſome before, ſome behinde, and ſome on each ſide of the army, and ſo incloſed round about with thoſe Cattell as with a trench, marched on. But when they were come neer vnto the Polonians, this rude deuice ſerued them to no other purpoſe than the ouerthrow of themſelues; for the Polonians diſcharging their great Ordnance, ſo terrified the Cattel, that they turned vpon the Tartars, & ouerthrowing whomſoeuer came in their way, did exceeding much harm. Whom the Polonians immediatly following, and D hardly charging the confuſed Army, armed only with bow and arrowes, after ſome ſmal fight put them at laſt to flight, & obtained of them a notable victory, with an exceeding rich prey. Of the Polonians were loſt about eighteene hundred, but of the Tartars were ſlain thirty thouſand. The reſt retyring into Podolia, and paſſing the Riuer Neſter by the way of Tranſſylvania, where they did exceeding much harme, came to Temeſwaro, and ſo afterwards further into Hungary; vnto whom the Turkes ſent ſeuen hundred horſemen to conduct them to the army.

Strigonium aſſaulted.

But to return again to the ſiege of Strigonium. The 24 of Iune, the Christians betweene eight and nine of the clock in the morning, with great fury aſſaulted the town in three places: which aſſault they moſt notably maintained vntil it was almoſt three a Clocke in the afterE noone. Neuertheleſſe the Turks ſo valiantly defended themſelues, that at laſt the Christians were glad to giue ouer the aſſault, and with loſſe to retyre. The Archduke from an high place beholding the aſſault, had one of his footmen ſlain faſt by him with a ſmall ſhot. Many of the Turks were alſo ſlain in this aſſault, & among them one of the three Sanzacks that defended the city. The night following there aroſe a moſt horrible tempeſt, with ſuch raging winde, and abundance of rain, that many thought they ſhould neuer haue ſeen day; with the violence wherof the Archdukes tent was ouerthrown, and diuers others blown down or rent in ſunder, were in the air carried from place to place. About the ſame time, the Lord Palfi within the ſight of the caſtle caſt vp a notable Fort, with high mounts and ſtrong trenches (euen in the ſelfe ſame place where Solyman lay about fifty yeares before, when he beſieged and won StriF gonium) by which fort ſo built, the Enemy was embarred to conuey any thing vp the Riuer for relief of the City, to the great diſcomfiture of the beſieged. To haue hindered which worke, the Enemy oftentimes ſallied out, but to no purpoſe. This Fort beeing brought to perfection, the Christians tooke alſo another fort in an Iland on the further ſide of the riuer, which the Turkes had but a few daies before taken from the Christians, and cloyed the great pieces therin: which fort the Chriſtians now again repaired, furniſhing it with a ſufficient garriſon, and other great ordnance.

Strigonium ſore battered.

Theſe things thus don, the caſtle and the lower town were in fiue diuers places, out of the new built fort, the old town, and the Iſland, ſo battered with continual ſhot, that a man would haue ſaid that one ſtone ſhould not haue bin left vpon another, but that all ſhould haue beene beaten down and layd euen with the ground. The 17 of Iune one of the Chriſtian cannoniers ſo diſmounted one of the great pieces in the Caſtle, that the piece together with the Turkiſh canonier that had the charge therof, fel down out of the caſtle into the ditch. The ſame day a maſon that fled out of the caſtle into the camp, among other things reported, that many of the Turks were ſlain with this continual battery and often aſſaults; and that not paſt an hour before, forty of them were ſlain in one chamber, and now acknowledged themſelues to be indeed beſieged: and to haue reſolued, That when they were brought to the laſt caſt, then deſperatly to ſally out vpon the Chriſtians, and ſo either to returne with victory, or to make ſhift euery man for himſelf as he might. Which his report ſeemed not altogether feigned; for about midnight a thouſand of the Turkes ſallying out of the caſtle vpon the fort newly built vpon the riuer, in hope to haue ſurpriſed it, were by the Chriſtians therein notably repulſed, and inforced to retyre: in which conflict fifty of the Turks were ſlaine, and many moe wounded and taken priſoners. And the ſame day toward euening, eight Turks of good ſort being taken and brought into the camp, confeſſed, That about ſix daies before, they had ſeen ſeuen boats full of wounded and dead men ſent down the riuer from Strigonium to Buda. Whereby it was eaſily to be gathered how bloudy a ſiege this was to the Turks; foraſmuch as all thoſe bodies were the bodies of men of good account and place; for the bodies of ſuch common ſoldiers as were ſlain, they ſtil threw into the riuer running by.

The Turkes aſſault the new Fort.

The fort newly built vpon the banke of Danubius much troubled the beſieged Turkes in Strigonium, becauſe nothing could without danger of it be ſent vp the riuer for their reliefe. Wherfore they by fit meſſengers ſent word out of the caſtle to the Admiral of the Turks gallies lying below in the riuer, That he ſhould at an appointed time come vp with his Gallies as high as the fort, and on that ſide at leaſtwiſe to make ſhew as if they would aſſault it. At which time they of the town would be likewiſe ready to ſally out, and aſſail it indeed on the other ſide by land. The Admiral accordingly came vp the riuer with his gallies, and by diſcharging of certain great pieces, made ſhew as if he would on that ſide haue battered the fort: but was ſo welcommed from it, that he was glad with his rent gallies quickly to fal down the riuer again farther off out of danger. But whilſt the thundring ſhot was thus flying to & fro toward the riuer, they of the town ſallying out, aſſaulted the fort on the other ſide toward the land, and that with ſuch deſperat reſolution, that ſome of them were got vp to the top of the rampiers, and there for the ſpace of two hours maintained a moſt cruel fight, wherein many of them were ſlain and wounded, and the reſt inforced with ſhame to retyre.

The Chriſtians thus ſtil lying at the ſiege, and intentiue to all occaſions, partly by their Eſpials, and partly by ſuch as they had taken priſoners, vnderſtood that a new ſupply both of men and victuals was ſhortly to be put into Strigonium: and therfore ſent out certain Companies of ſouldiers, who lying in two conuenient places, the one vpon the riuer, the other by land, might intercept the ſaid ſupply. Both which places were before by the prouident Enemy poſſeſſed; who ſuddenly aſſailing the Chriſtians comming thither, and fearing no ſuch matter, ſlew ſome of them, and put the reſt to flight: who, neuertheleſſe in their retreit brake the bridge which the Turks had made of boats under the caſtle of Strigonium, ouer Danubius: of which boats ſome were carried away with the violence of the ſtreame, and of the reſt 30 fel into the hands of the Chriſtians, with the loſſe but of fiue, who making too much haſte out of a little boat, fel into the riuer and ſo periſhed. In this time, Fame the fore-runner of all great attempts, had brought news into the Chriſtian camp, That Sinan Baſſa the Turks great General was comming to relieue Strigonium; of whoſe power diuers diuerſly reported. But the greater part doubting the worſt, and weary of the long ſiege and of the calamities incident thereto, added ſtil ſomthing to the laſt report, to make the danger of longer ſtay at [illegible] the greater. Certaine it is, that the news of the comming of ſo great and puiſſant an Enemy raiſed many a troubled thought in the mindes of ſo great a multitude. Now were the beſieged Turkes in great wants in Strigonium, as appeared by Letters intercepted from the Sanzack

A zack to the Baſſa of Buda, declaring vnto him the hard eſtate of the beſieged, and humbly crauing his promiſed help, without which the city could not for want of victuals be poſſibly defended by the fainting ſouldiers aboue three daies. Which letters being read in the Camp, cauſed great preparation to be made for the continuing of the ſiege and the withſtanding of the enemy, whoſe comming was euery hour expected. All this while the great ordnance neuer ceaſed on either ſide, whereby many were ſlaine, as well Chriſtians as Turkes, and amongſt others many of the Cannoniers.

But foraſmuch as the rife fame of Sinan Baſſa's comming increaſed daily, and the Chriſtian camp poſſeſſed with a general fear, gaue vnto the wiſe iuſt ſuſpition of ſome great miſchiefe like to enſue; Matthias the General entred into counſell with County Ferdinand Hardeck, the B Lord Palfi, the Lord Vngenade Preſident of the Councel for the wars, and Eraſmus Braun gouernor of Comara, What was beſt to be done in ſo dangerous a time. Who with generall conſent agreed betimes before the comming of Sinan to raiſe the ſiege, and to remoue with the army into ſome place of more ſafety. Which their determinat reſolution, the day following, being the 26 of Iune, they made known to the other Princes and great Commaunders in the Army. Who wonderfully diſcontented therwith, eſpecially the Germanes, both openly by word, and ſolemnly by writing, proteſted againſt the ſame, as moſt diſhonourable, and altogether made without their knowledge or good liking. To whom the Preſident of the Councel for their further ſatisfaction declared, That the enemy was comming with a very great army, and euen now at hand, whoſe ſtrength increaſed daily, and with what power he had purpoſed C to aſſail them in their tents was vncertain. Beſides that, it was manifeſtly knowne vnto the world, how that in the former aſſaults they had loſt many of their beſt ſouldiers, beſide others that died in the camp: and that the place wherein they lay incamped was ſubiect vnto many dangers. For which ſo vrgent cauſes the General had reſolued to raiſe his ſiege, & before the the comming of ſo ſtrong an enemy, to remoue his army into a place of more ſafety. Which reaſons for all that did not ſo well ſatisfie the German Princes and Commaunders, but that they ſtill vrged their former proteſtation; requeſting his Excellencie to haue them excuſed before God and the World, if they yeelding to his commaund, as to their Generall, did that which they thought not altogether beſt, and which they would not otherwiſe haue done. For the more euidence wherof, the ſaid German princes and great commanders cauſed their ſayd D Proteſtation to be ſolemnly conceiued in writing, which they firmed with their ſeales, and ſubſcribed with their own hands in order following: Francis Duke of Saxony, Auguſtus duke of Brunſwick, Sebaſtian Schlick, County Wigand Maltzan, Erneſtus of Alſtan, Henry Phlugk, Iohn Nicolas Raſwormb, Henry Curwigger Heerrath, Iohn Oberhauſen, Henry Rotcirch, Melchior of Nothwith.

But the Archduke with the reſt, conſtant in their former reſolution, firſt ſent away the great ordnance, and raiſing the ſiege the 28 of Iune, followed after with the whole army, paſſing ouer Danubius not far from Gokara, doubtfully expecting what courſe Sinan the great Baſſa (being then euen at hand) would take. Yet before their departure they ſet the old town on fire, & raſed S. Nicolas fort, before taken from the enemy, which they once purpoſed to haue E kept. This vnexpected departure of the Chriſtians much gladded the beſieged Turks, who for want of victuals had not bin long able to hold out. Yet lay the Lord Teuffenbach ſtill before Hatwan, labouring by all means to take from the beſieged Turks their water, and with earth and fagots to fill up their ditches: which work he had now haply brought to ſome good perfection. Wherof they of the town by letters aduertiſed the Baſſa of Buda, and that vnles they were within three daies relieued, they ſhould be inforced to yeeld the towne. Which their diſtreſſe the Baſſa conſidering, with ſpeed aſſembled al his forces, and ſo ſet forward to relieue them, hoping to haue come vpon the Chriſtians before they were aware of his comming. But Teuffenbach vnderſtanding thereof, with fiue thouſand choſen horſemen went out of the camp to meet him; and ſuddenly comming vpon him, fearing no ſuch thing, ſlew fiue thouſand F of the Turks, put the Baſſa to flight, and together with the victorie obtained an exceeding rich prey.

The Archduke raiſeth his ſiege and with his army paſſeth the riuer.

Fiue thouſand Turks ſlaine.

Now was there no leſſe expectation and hope of the winning and yeelding vp of Hatwan, than was before of Strigonium. But according to the chance of war it fell out otherwiſe: for Teuffenbach hauing with continuall batterie layd the breaches faire open, and made choice of Hatwan in vain aſſaulted by the Chriſtians.

ſuch ſoldiers as he thought meet for the aſſault, was in the performing thereof ſo notably repulſed by the Turks, that he was glad to retyre with the loſſe of his beſt and moſt valiant ſoldiers: which put him out of al hope of taking the town by force. For beſide the loſſe of theſe good men, hee had ſcarſe ſo many ſound men left as might ſuffice to furniſh his garriſons for defence of thoſe territories, by reaſon that the Hungarians were almoſt all ſhrunk home, and of the Germans were ſcarſe left 2000: beſides that, he had often craued new ſupplies of the Archduke, but all in vain: for which cauſes he was glad to abandon two ſtrong forts he had built before Hatwan, and to leaue the town, now brought to great extremitie. Thus two notable cities, which were now as it were in the Chriſtians hands, and by the recouery whereof the broken ſtate of the afflicted Chriſtians in Hungary had beene much ſtrengthned, were as it were againe reſtored vnto the barbarous and cruell enemy. G H

Whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege of Strigonium and Hatwan, the Raſcians (of whom we haue before ſpoken) ſtriuing ſtil more and more to rid themſelues of the Turkiſh thraldom, gathered themſelues together to the number of 15000, betweene Buda & Belgrade vnder a General of their own chuſing. For fear of whom the Baſſa of Temeſware with an Army of fourteen thouſand went to fortifie and victual Lippa, doubting leſt it ſhould by them be ſurpriſed. But hauing done that he went for, in his returne hee was met withall by the ſame Raſcians, and twice fought withall in one day, and both times put to the worſt, with the loſſe of the greateſt part of his Army. After which victory the Raſcians tooke [illegible], a ſtrong town ſtanding in a mariſh four miles from Belgrade, and ſlew all the Turks they found therein. After that, they took a caſtle called Ortadt, and dealt with the Turks in like maner. From I thence they went and beſieged Beche, a Caſtle ſtanding vpon the riuer Tibiſcus or Teiſſe, where the towne adjoining vnto it yeelded preſently, but they in the Caſtle ſtanding vpon their gard a while, offered at laſt to yeeld alſo vpon certaine conditions. But the Raſcians knowing that the Turks therabouts had conueied into the caſtle the beſt part of their wealth, and withall that it was but weakely manned, would accept of no conditions, but would needs haue it abſolutely deliuered vp to their pleaſure. In the mean time the old Baſſa of Temeſwar and his ſonne, knowing it to tend to their diſhonour, to ſuffer this baſe people ſo to rage at their pleaſure about them, gathered together 11000 Turkes, and ſo in great haſte came to relieue the beſieged Caſtle. Vpon whom the Raſcians turned themſelues, and in plaine battell ouerthrew the Baſſa, and ſo purſued the victory, that of thoſe 11000 Turks ſcarcely eſcaped K 1000; the Baſſa himſelfe being there ſlain, and with him three Sanzackes, his ſon eſcaped by flight. In this battel the Raſcians took 18 great pieces of artillery: and not long after tooke alſo Werſetza and Lutz, two ſtrong places. After which ſo happy ſucces they ſent vnto the Archduke Matthias for aid, but eſpecially Cannoniers, profeſſing themſelues now vtter Enemies to the Turks. The Raſcians alſo about Temeſware ſent word vnto the other in the camp, That they would come and join with them. And they which inhabit the countrey betweene Danubius and Tibiſcus, by meſſengers ſent of purpoſe vnto the Lord Teuffenbach (the Arch-Dukes Lieutenant in the vpper part of Hungary) offered in ſhort time to ſend him tenne or twelue thouſand men, ſo that he would receiue them and their Countrey into the Emperours protection; which he eaſily granted them, & therof aſſured them in writing. And to the arch- L Duke himſelfe alſo they ſent truſty meſſengers, requeſting him to ſend them a Generall to lead them, promiſing vnto him all obedience. Which meſſengers departing from them the fourteenth of Iune, ſhortly after returned with ſuch anſwer as was thought moſt conuenient for their preſent eſtate. Thus againſt the comming of Sinan, Hungarie was almoſt all on a broile.

An Imperiall diet holden at Ratisbone for the withſtanding of the Turk.

The Emperor long before diſtruſting the Turks purpoſe for war, and wel conſidering what a difficultie it would be for him, with his own forces only to withſtand ſo puiſſant an Enemy as was Amurath, had by his Embaſſadors prayed aid of diuers Chriſtian princes, but eſpecially of them of the empire, as thoſe whom this war concerned moſt. Wherfore he after the antient and wonted maner of his State in ſo common and imminent a danger, appointed a gene- M ral aſſembly of the Princes and States of the Empire to be holden at Ratisbone in the later end of February: which for ſundry vrgent cauſes was put off vntil March, and again vntil Aprill, and ſo afterward vntil May. At which time the Emperour in perſon himſelfe, with the Princes Electors, and other the great States of the Empire, being met together with great pompe,

The Emperors ſpeech.

A point at Ratiſbone, and ſolemnly aſſembled in the Biſhops palace, began there to ſit in councel the ſecond of Iune. Vnto which Princes and States ſo aſſembled, after that the Emperor had firſt by the mouth of Philip Countie Palatine of the Rhine giuen great thanks for their ſo ready appearance, & briefly declared the cauſe of their aſſembly, he himſelf after ſome complaint made of the Turkiſh infidelitie, in expreſſe words declared vnto them, how that he by his Embaſſador then lying at Conſtantinople had in the yeare 1591 made a league for eight yeares with the preſent Turkiſh Sultan Amurath; which league Amurath himſelfe had approued and confirmed, and therof ſent him publique and ſolemn inſtruments; wherin it was prouided, That no hoſtility ſhould on either ſide during that time bee attempted. And yet notwithſtanding that he, contrary to his faith giuen, as an hereditary enemy of the Chriſtian, B had violated this league, and by ſundry incurſions barbarouſly ſpoiled and waſted, not Hungary only, but other of his Imperial prouinces alſo: but eſpecially Haſſan Baſſa of Boſna, who firſt with a ſtrong army beſieged, battered, and took Repitz an antient frontier caſtle, and after that, Wihitz, Drenik, Craſſowitz, with other places of name, and had in his dominion and territory built Petrinia a moſt ſtrong fort, hurtfull to all that countrey; out of which he had done incredible miſchief in Croatia, Windiſmarch, and the moſt fruitfull Iland of Turopolia, and out of theſe places caried away aboue 35000 Chriſtians into moſt miſerable captiuity. Of which ſhamefull injuries and breach of faith hee had many times by his Embaſſadors complained vnto the Turkiſh Sultan at Conſtantinople, and requeſted, That all hoſtility ſet apart, due reſtitution might haue bin made; but to haue therin preuailed nothing: C and that the ſame Baſſa in ſtead of condign puniſhment, had bin for the doing therof honoured by the great Sultan his Lord with honorable gifts, the ſure tokens of his fauor. Wherby he was ſo confirmed in his barbarous proceedings, that he began to make open war, & hauing raiſed a full army, and ſtrengthned alſo with certaine Companies of Ianizaries ſent from the court, had paſſed ouer the riuer of Kulp, and beſieged the caſtle of Siſeg: but by the iuſt iudgment of God, the Reuenger of wrongs, had there receiued the reward of his faithles & cruell dealing, being there ſlain, and almoſt all his army vtterly deſtroyed by his ſmall forces, raiſed in haſt for his own lawfull defence. Neuertheleſſe the faithleſſe Turk (as if he had bin highly wronged himſelfe) to make this his breach both of league and faith forthwith knowne to all the world, by commanding open war to be ſolemnly proclaimed againſt the kingdome of D Hungary, both in Conſtantinople and Buda; and by the Beglerbeg of Greece to haue beſieged and taken the ſtrong fortres of Siſeg. Wheras on the other ſide, becauſe nothing ſhould on his part be wanting, which might make his deſire of peace more knowne, he had again and oftentimes by his Embaſſador put the Turke in remembrance of his League made and confirmed by his faith. Who for all that had changed nothing of his purpoſe, but had ſent his great Viſier Sinan Baſſa, with the Beglerbeg of Grecia, and many inferior Baſſa's & Sanzacks into Hungary, who with fire and ſword inforced the inhabitants and country people (ſuch as they left aliue) to ſweare to the Turke obedience, and to become his ſubiects; and at the ſame time took Veſprinium and Palotta, two famous fortreſſes of that kingdome. And that the ſame Baſſa by commandement from his Lord and Maſter, had contrary to the Law of Nations, E imprisoned Frederick Creckowitz his Embaſſador, firſt at Conſtantinople, and cauſed the greater part of his Followers to be thruſt into the Gallies; and afterwards to haue ſent him with a few of his attendants vnto Belgrade, and there to haue kept him ſo long in priſon vntill he there miſerably ended his dayes. In reuenge of which ſo great and open wrong, and for the defence and comfort of his poor afflicted ſubiects ſo neer the Enemy, hee had raiſed a good ſtrength both of horſe and foot, by whoſe ſtrength, and the aſſiſtance of almighty God, the Baſſa of Boſna had reaped the fruit of his perfidious dealing; as had alſo the Baſſa of Buda, with many thouſands of their great Baſſa's, ouerthrowne neer vnto Alba Regalis, beſides many of their Caſtles and Townes taken or raſed. Yet for all that was it eaſie to bee ſeene, theſe ſo great victories by the goodneſſe of God had and obtained againſt ſo mighty and F cruell an enemy, not to ſuffice; but that there was ſtill need of a perſeuerant and continuall ſupply for the maintenance of a perpetuall War; and that it was daily to be expected, or rather euen now preſently to be deſcried, That the Turk in his quarrell (which he deemeth alwaies iuſt againſt the Chriſtians) and in reuenge of theſe ouerthrowes, would draw vp all his forces, and aduenture his whole ſtrength. For which cauſes he had by the knowledge and con-ſent of the Princes Electors of the ſacred Empire appointed that preſent Diet of the Empire, and not for the aforeſaid cauſes only, but for diuers other both neceſſary and weighty alſo, G as the general peace of the Empire, the pacification of the Low-countries, the reformation of iuſtice, and amendment of the coin: but eſpecially & aboue all other things to make it known vnto the world, how much it concerned to haue the Turk on that ſide better withſtood, and ſome effectual defence for Hungary (now in danger) at length prouided, being the moſt, and beſt defenced and ſtrongeſt bulwark of that ſide of Chriſtendom. And that whereas his own hereditary prouinces were not of themſelues alone ſufficient to maintain ſo chargeable a war, he therefore requeſted the Electors, Princes and States both preſent and abſent, not to grudge to the preſent with their helps, their counſell, and whatſoeuer els ſhould be needfull againſt ſo puiſſant and dangerous an enemy. So ending his ſpeech, he cauſed all his demands before contained H into writing, to be read, and ſo deliuered vnto them. For anſwer whereunto, the Princes Electors and others there preſent required time. Which granted, after many ſittings and long conſultations they at laſt with one conſent anſwered, That it was a hard matter, by reaſon of the late dearth and other like occaſions, for them to grant ſuch helpe and aid as the Emperor had in writing required: yet hauing before their eies the great and imminent danger wherein the Chriſtian commonweal then ſtood, they not regarding their own proper and priuate neceſſities, had in regard of his ſacred and Imperial Maieſtie, for the comfort and defence of the endangered Chriſtians, and for the repreſſing of the Turkiſh fury, of their own free will and meer compaſſion, granted beſide their accuſtomed contribution ſuch further relief for the ſpace of ſix years, as they thought ſufficient for the maintenance of a defenſiue War, both for the preſent I and for the time to come. What was by them further decreed concerning the Emperors further demands, as not pertinent to our purpoſe, we willingly paſſe ouer.

Sinan Baſſa with an army of 150000 betweene Buda & Alba Regalis.

Of all theſe things, as alſo whatſoeuer els had happened at Strigonium, Hatwan, or other places of Hungary, was not Sinan Baſſa ignorant: Who now euen vpon the departure of the Chriſtians from Strigonium, was come with an huge army between Buda and Alba Regalis, vnto whom 40000 Tartars, that by force had made themſelues way thorow Podolia and the vpper part of Hungary, had ioined themſelues; ſo that in his Army were reckoned about 150000 fighting men, to the great terror not only of Hungary, Auſtria, Stiria, Croatia, Bohemia, and the prouinces therabout, but alſo of the whole ſtate of Germany. With this great army the old Baſſa had purpoſed to haue ouerwhelmed the Chriſtians in their camp at Strigonium: K but now that they were before his comming departed ouer the riuer toward Comara, he reſolued to keepe on his way, and to beſiege the ſtrong City Iaurinum, now called Rab.
And to make all ſure before him, he thought it beſt to take in his way Dotis, a ſtrong towne of the Chriſtians in the mid way betweene Strigonium and Rab, about fiue Hungarian miles ſhort of Rab. The Chriſtian army but newly paſſed ouer Danubius, in marching toward Comara, might ſee the mountaines and fields on the other ſide of the riuer all couered with the multitude of the Turks army: who though they were indeed many, yet marching diſperſedly made ſhew of more than in truth they were. So both Armies marching in ſight one of another, and ſeparated onely with the riuer, held on their way, the Chriſtians to Comara, where they incamped vnder the very walls of the city, yet in ſuch ſort, as that they might afar off wel L deſcry one another; and the Turks toward Dotis, where the Baſſa with all his army incamped the 21 of Iuly. The night following, hauing planted his battery, he began in furious manner to batter the caſtle, the chief ſtrength of the town; the Chriſtian Army looking on, but not daring at ſo great ods to relieue their diſtreſſed friends. So whilſt the Baſſa granteth no breathing while vnto the beſieged, but tyreth them out with continuall battery and alarms, they of the town diſpairing of their own ſtrength, and to bee able for any long time to hold out againſt ſo mighty an enemy, within three daies after yeelded vp the town, beeing in that ſhort time ſore battered, and in diuers places vndermined: yet with this condition, That it ſhould be lawfull for the garriſon ſoldiers and towneſmen with their wiues and children in ſafety to depart. Which was vnto them by the Baſſa frankly granted, but not ſo faithfully performed: M for at their departure many of their wiues and children were ſtayd by the Turks, and the lord Baxi Gouernor of the Towne fouly entreated. Immediately after, the Baſſa without much ado tooke the Caſtle of S. Martins alſo, not far from Dotis, being by the Captaine yeelded vnto him.

Dotis and S. Martins yeelded vnto the Turks.

A In the mean time the country villages round about forſaken of the poore Chriſtians, were by the Turks moſt miſerably burnt, and all the Countrey laid waſt: yea ſome of the fore-runners of the Turks army paſſing ouer the riuer Rabnitz, ran into the Countrey as far as Altenburg, within fiue miles of Vienna, burning the Country villages as they went, and killing the poor people, or that worſe was, carrying them away into perpetual captiuity; yet not without ſome loſſe, 400 of theſe roming foreiners being cut off by the Lord Nadaſti. Palfi alſo, & Brun gouernor of Comara, following in the tail of the Turkes army, ſet vpon them that had charge of the victuals, of whom they ſlew a great numbre, tooke 120 of them priſoners, and 150 Camels, and thirty mules laded with meale and rice, which they carried away with them vnto Comara.

B Dotis and S. Martins thus taken, Sinan Baſſa conſtant in his former determination, ſet forward Rab.
again towards Rab, and being come within a mile of the city, there incamped; the Chriſtian army then lying not far off on the other ſide of the riuer. The city of Rab is a ſtrong and populous city, honored with a biſhops ſee, and was worthily accounted the ſtrongeſt bulwark of Vienna, from whence it is diſtant about 12 German miles, ſtanding vpon the South ſide of Danubius, whence the riuer diuiding it ſelf, maketh a moſt fertile Iſland called Schut, in the Eaſt point wherof ſtands the ſtrong City of Comara. The defence of this City of Rab was committed to County Hardeck, a man of greater courage than fidelity, with a gariſon of 1200 choice ſoldiers: vnto whom a little before the comming of the Baſſa, were certaine Companies of Italians joined, who together with the citiſens made vp the number of 5000 able men; C a ſtrength in all mens judgment ſufficient for the long defence of that place. The laſt of Iuly Matthias the Archduke about Sun-ſet departing out of the city of Rab, ouer the riuer into the Iſland ouer againſt it, came Sinan Baſſa with his hugy army and beſet it round, caſting vp trenches and mounts, wheron he skilfully placed his gabions and great artillery, and whatſoeuer els was neceſſary for ſo great a ſiege, and that with ſuch celerity, as was vnto the beholders thought moſt ſtrange. The ſecond of Auguſt he with great fury battered the city, & brought his trenches within musket ſhot of the wall. At which time 4000 Tartarian horſemen ſwam ouer the Danubius between Rab and Comara (after whom followed 6000 Turks, who being with much ado got ouer to the farther ſide, ſuddenly ſurpriſed a fort of the Chriſtians next vnto the riuer, and forthwith turning fiue great pieces of ordnance which they found therein, D diſcharged them vpon the camp of the Chriſtians; who terrified with the ſudden accident, riſe vp all in arms, and hardly charging thoſe deſperate aduenturers, ſlew many of them, eſpecially ſuch as ſeeking after booty, had diſperſed themſelues from their fellowes, and forced the reſt again to take the water, wherin moſt of them periſhed. About fiue daies after, the Tartarians The Tartars twice ouerthrown.
(liuing for moſt part vpon prey) ſwam again ouer the riuer, and vpon the ſudden burnt a village in the Iſland, and ſlew certain Chriſtians in their tents; but being quickly incountered by the Chriſtian horſmen, they were eaſily ouerthrown and many of them ſlain. The reſt caſting away their weapons, and forſaking their horſes, ranne headlong into the riuer, truſting more to their ſwimming than to their fighting; whom the Chriſtians hardly purſuing, in the very Riuer ſlew about two thouſand of them; and by this victorie obtained many of the Tartarians E ſwift horſes, with their ſcimiters, their bows and arrows, and ſuch enſignes as they had.
All this while Sinan Baſſa without intermiſſion lay thundering with ſixty great pieces of battery; but to little or ſmall purpoſe, for as yet he had made no breach wherby to enter, but the harm that was done was vpon the Towers or high built houſes, or in the Campe, by ſuch randome Rab battered.
Shot as flying ouer the Towne, fell by chance amongſt the Tents of the Chriſtians.
And the Ianizaries intentiue to all opportunities, in a great raine furiouſly and with a moſt horrible cry (as their manner is) aſſaulted an vtter bulwarke of the Chriſtians, which they for fear forſooke, and retyred themſelues into the City. Vpon which bulwarke ſo taken, the Ianizaries had ſet vp three of their Enſignes, when the Chriſtians aſhamed of that which they had don, and better aduiſed, taking courage vnto them, forthwith ſallied out again, and couragiouſly F charging the Ianizaries, but now entred, ſlew many of them, and recouered again the bulwark.

Sinan Baſſa leauing nothing vnattempted that might further his deſire for the winning of the city, was now caſting vp a great mount againſt the city, which whilſt he daily ſurueied he chanced to fal ſick, and therfore appointed one of the Baſſa's in his owne ſtead to ouerſee the worke:

work; who whilſt he was walking to and fro, haſtning the worke, and commanding this & that thing to be don, he was taken with a ſhot out of the town and ſlain. G

The 15 of Auguſt certaine Turkes before the riſing of the Sun getting ouer Danubius in boats, aſſailed a fort of the Chriſtians, which the ſoldiers that had the keeping of it preſently forſook, and left it to the enemy. Which Iohn de Medices, lately come into the camp with two thouſand Italians, perceiuing, forthwith came to the reſcue of the fort, draue out the Turkes, and hauing ſlaine diuers of them, forced the reſt into the riuer, where they were all drowned. At which time 5000 Tartars in another place paſſing ouer the riuer into the Iſland, were encountred by the Lord Palſi & the Huſſars his followers, & without any great reſiſtance put to flight, wherin many of them were ſlain. The reſt taking the riuer, were in good hope to haue got ouer, and ſo to haue ſaued themſelues: but other Turks meeting them in the riuer, would H with their weapons haue beaten them back and ſtaid their flight; againſt whom the Tartars oppoſing themſelues, made with them in the very riuer a moſt cruel fight, but with ſuch loſſe vnto the Tartars, that of the 5000 which aduentured ouer, few returned vnto their fellowes to carry news how they had ſped. Now began great ſcarſity of victuals in the Turks Campe, ſo that the ſoldiers were fain to feed vpon vnripe fruit, and ſuch other vnwholſom things, whereof inſued the bloudy flix and many other dangerous diſeaſes; which raging amongſt them, did wonderfully conſume the Baſſa's army. Beſide that, they of the city with continual ſhot had ſlain many, and amongſt them a ſon in law of the great Baſſa's, whoſe death hee is reported to haue taken ſo impatiently, that he fel ſicke for griefe, but in ſhort time after paſſed it ouer and recouered again. I

The Tartars not yet warned by their often loſſes, but paſſing again ouer the riuer into the Iſland the 10 of this month, were there 3000 of them ſlain. In the mean time certain companies alſo of the Turkes hauing ſecretly paſſed the riuer, in another quarter aſſailed the Chriſtians in their campe. In which hurly burly other of the Tartars got ouer the riuer not farre from Comara, hoping now at length to perform ſome great matter, which they had before to their coſt vainly attempted. But finding the Turks ouerthrowne before their comming, and the Chriſtians (contrary to their expectation) in arms ready to receiue them, they were eaſily diſcomfited, and 2000 of them ſlain. In this conflict the Sanzacke of Strigonium, with two others, and many moe of great account among the Turks periſhed. Shortly after, the Chriſtians ſallying out of the city, ſlew a great number of the Turks, and ſo retyred with ſmall loſſe. K Thus was the Turkes army daily diminiſhed, beſides that the want of victuals with the bloudy flix ſo increaſed, that many perſuaded the Baſſa to raiſe the ſiege, and to remoue with his army to ſome other more wholſome place, and of greater plenty: but he reſolutely ſet downe, not to depart, before he had either won the town, or inforced it to yeeld, would not hearken to any perſuaſions to the contrary.

Whilſt Sinan thus lay at the ſiege of Rab, Maximilian the Emperors brother took Craſtowitz a fortres of the Turks vpon the borders of Croatia, and put to ſword all the Turks there in gariſon. After that, he laid ſiege to Petrinia, a ſtrong fortreſſe of the Turks, which they but a few years before contrary to the league had built in the Emperors territory, for the annoying of Croatia, and for the exceeding ſtrength thereof was thought almoſt impregnable. Yet ſuch L was the induſtry of Maximilian and his ſoldiers, that what with continual battery and Mines, they ſo terrified the Turks there in garriſon, that they for fear ſet fire on the fort, and flying away by night, made ſhift euery man for himſelf as he might. Which they in the Caſtle of Siſeg hearing, ſet fire alſo vpon it and ſo left it to the Chriſtians. Whoſe example they alſo of Gara followed. By which ſo proſperous and happy ſucces of Maximilian, not the Prouince only, but euen the whole country of Croatia was for this time deliuered of a wonderful trouble, and no leſſe danger.

A great skirmiſh betwixt the Turks and Chriſtians.

The eight and twentieth day of Auguſt twelue thouſand of the Chriſtians paſſing ouer the riuer by a bridge into the Iſland, and ioyning with them of the towne, ſallied out vpon the Turks camp. The Hungarian Heidons in the forward, at the firſt onſet took two of the Turks M bulwarkes, and hauing beaten out the enemies, cloyed certaine of the great pieces. But the Turks returning with greater power, inforced the Chriſtians to retire, & recouered again the loſt bulwarkes. In this conflict many were ſlaine, as well Chriſtians as Turks. In the meane while Thonhauſe a great Captaine of the Chriſtians, and Geitzkofler, County Hardecks Lieutenant, A nant, with 1500 Hungarians and German foot came in great boats to haue holpen their fellowes, but landing ſomwhat too late, they were by the enemy beaten backe, and enforced with ſuch ſpeed to retire; that many of them being not able to recouer the boats, were drowned in the riuer, amongſt whom Geitzhoſler himſelfe periſhed, and Thonhauſe was deadly wounded in his breſt. Yet the Chriſtians not diſcouraged with this loſſe, but gathering themſelues together vnder the very wals of the city, gaue a ſecond aſſault vnto the enemy. In the foreward were the footmen, who were by the enemies horſemen eaſily repulſed; but by the comming in of the Lord Rhinsberg (who was at the firſt onſet ſlaine) the Turks were enforced into their trenches, except ſome few, which diuided from the reſt, hid themſelues in the Vineyards, but being found out by the Chriſtians, were there all ſlaine. In this skirmiſh the Lord Palſi was B grieuouſly wounded in his thigh: of the Chriſtians were ſlain 400, and of the Turkes about 2000. Theſe conflicts indured from 7 a clock in the morning, vntill 12; at which time the Chriſtians returning into the city, and ſo into the camp, among other ſpoils caried away with them 17 of the enemies enſignes.

2000 Turkes ſlain, and 17 enſignes taken.

No day now paſſing without ſome skirmiſh, at length the 9 of September, 10000 Turkes, ſome in boats, ſome by other meanes, hauing got ouer the riuer Danubius into the Iſland of Schut, ſuddenly ſet vpon the Chriſtians, all ſleeping in ſecurity, and little fearing any ſuch danger; of whom they ſlew about 2000, and after ſome ſmal fight, put the reſt to moſt ſhamefull flight; in ſuch ſort, that Matthias the Archduke himſelf, with other Noblemen and Captains had much ado by flight to eſcape. Thus whileſt euery man ſurpriſed with feare, made C what ſhift he could for himſelf, the enemy in the mean time entered the trenches, tooke their tents, their great ordnance, the ſhot and pouder, and all the money which but a little before was brought for the ſoldiers pay; beſides about 1000 wagons and 200 boats well loded with prouiſion for the camp, and ten gallies, wherin were 120 pieces of great ordnance. The loſſe receiued this day was valued at 500000 ducats. And albeit that this victorie coſt the Turks 1500 of their liues, yet therby they gained the maſtery both vpon the riuer and the land. So that now roaming far and neer without reſiſtance, they ſpoiled the country all about, & burnt certaine countrey Villages not far from Vienna: ſo that for many miles ſpace the Countrey Townes were for feare of the enemy forſaken by the inhabitants; of whom ſome were taken and ſlaine, ſome carried into captiuity, and ſome others, reſerued for a better fortune, with D ſuch things as they had got themſelues farther off into places of more ſecurity. And the more to increaſe theſe calamities, the Tartars ſhortly after paſſing ouer Danubius neere to Altenbourg, firſt ſacked Weiſenbourg, and after burnt it, with certaine other townes therabouts. But aduenturing to haue gone farther into the Countrey; they were with loſſe inforced to returne.

A great ſpoyl taken by the Turks.

Whilſt the Turks thus preuaile in Hungary, Cicala Baſſa the Turkes Admirall then at ſea with a fleet of Gallies, landing his men in diuers places of Italy did exceeding much harme, but eſpecially in Calabria, where he vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed Rhegium, rifled the town, and afterwards burnt it. From thence taking his courſe toward Sicilia, he in the ſight of Meſſana landed certain of his men, who aduenturing too far aſhore, were by the countrey people E ouerthrown and put to flight. So the Turks returning again to Rhegium, vtterly raſed what they had before left of that town. In the mean time not far from Meſſana, euen in the ſight of the garriſon of the town, they took a certain ſhip comming out of the Eaſt countries, and three others comming from Apulia. Afterwards chancing vpon certaine gallies of the Eaſt, they changed ſome few ſhot with them, but to no great purpoſe, and ſo turning their courſe, & ſailing alongſt the coaſt of Calabria, they oftentimes landed certain companies, which skirmiſhing with the Calabrians, had ſomtime the better, and ſomtime the worſe; and ſo with ſuch fortune as befel them, were again receiued into their gallies. They of Meſſana, vnto whoſe eies thoſe dangers were daily preſented, both by letters and ſpeedy meſſengers gaue the Viceroy knowledge therof (who then for his pleaſure lay at Palermo) requeſting his preſent aid: but he F dallying off the time, they for the more ſafegard of the city and of the ſea coaſt, of themſelues raiſed fiue hundred horſemen, whom they committed to the leading of Philip Cicala, the Renegat Turkiſh Admirals brother. And beſides ſtored the City with all ſuch things as they thought neceſſarie for the enduring of a ſiege, if it ſhould chance the Turke to haue any ſuch purpoſe. Of all which they certified the King of Spain, as alſo of the negligence of the Rhegium raſed by the Turks.

Viceroy, requeſting his ſpeedy aid againſt theſe terrors of the Turks. In the mean while the Neapolitans for ſafegard of their coaſt put to ſea 50 gallies: vnto whom the Pope, the Duke of Florence, the Genoa's, and the Knights of Malta joined alſo theirs, in all to the number of about 80 gallies, vnder the conduct of Auria. The prouident Venetians alſo, although they were as then in league with the Turk, yet for the ſafety of their ſtate put to ſea a fleet of about 100 ſail, ſome ſhips, ſome gallies, vnder the leading of Foſcarin their Admiral. Which two fleets ſailing vp and down thoſe ſeas, deliuered Italy, Sicily, Dalmatia, with many prouinces and Iſlands of the Chriſtians, of a great fear.

Rab aſſaulted.

Sinan Baſſa hauing before incouraged his ſoldiers with great hope and large promiſes, commanded an aſſault to be giuen to the city of Rab; which was accordingly by them begun the 23 of September, the Sun being yet ſcarſe vp, and furiouſly maintained al that day from morning vntil night. But they of the town ſo valiantly defended themſelues, that at laſt the Turks were glad to giue ouer the aſſault, and with loſſe to retyre. Neuertheleſſe the next day the aſſault was againe renued, and moſt deſperately maintained by the ſpace of two daies, wherein 12000 of the Turks loſt their liues, the other with ſhame retiring themſelues into their trenches. In few daies after, the Turks by a mine blew vp one of the bulwarks of the town, with the fall wherof the town ditch was in that place ſomwhat filled; wherby the Turks with all their power attempted thrice the next day to haue entered, but were by the valor of the defendants ſtil notably with loſſe repulſed. Yet notwithſtanding all this cheerfulnes and couragiouſnes of them in the towne, the puiſſant enemy ceaſed not with furious battery and continuall aſſaults to attempt the city, till that at length he had gained two of the bulwarks, from whence he might to his great aduantage, by the rubbiſh and earth fallen out of the battered bulwarks and rampiers, haue acceſſe vnto the towne, to the great terror of the defendants. Whereupon County Hardeck the Gouernor (who corrupted by the Turke, had of purpoſe many times before ſaid that the town could not poſſibly long be defended) now took occaſion to enter into counſel with the other captains of the town; (diuers of whom hee had already framed to his purpoſe) what courſe were beſt to take for the yeelding of it vp. And after a little conſultation, holden more for faſhion ſake, than for that he doubted what to do, reſolued to ſend a meſſenger to the Baſſa, for a truce to be granted for a while, to ſee if haply in the mean time ſome reaſonable compoſition might be agreed vpon. Yet the gouernor conſidering into what ſcorn and danger he might expoſe himſelfe, by yeelding vp ſo ſtrong a town, to colour the matter, and to excuſe his doings to the reſt of the nobility, and gariſons of Hungary, cauſed a publike inſtrument to be made in his and all the reſt of the Captaines names conceiued in writing; wherin they ſolemnly proteſted to the world, That foraſmuch as it was impoſſible, by reaſon of the weaknes of the garriſon, for them longer to defend the town againſt ſo mighty an Enemy, without new ſupplies in ſtead of them that were ſlain (which they had oftentimes in vain requeſted) they were therfore of neceſſity inforced to come to compoſition with the enemy. Which proteſtation ſo made, the gouernor and chiefe Captains confirmed with their hands and ſeals. So after a truce granted, and pledges giuen on both ſides, at length it was agreed vpon, That all the garriſon ſouldiers, together with the County and other captains, ſhould in arms with enſignes diſplaied, with bag and baggage depart in ſafety, and with a ſafe conuoy be brought to Altenburg. Which agreement though by oth confirmed, was not on the Turks part altogether performed: for when the County had the 29 day of September about ten of the clock in the forenoon deliuered vp the City to the Baſſa, and the Chriſtian garriſon was all come out, the County himſelf with a few of his friends was with a conuoy of Turks ſafely brought to the appointed place: but the Italians and other gariſon ſoldiers that came behind, and ought to haue bin by the gouernor protected, were contrary to the Turks promiſe ſpoild of al that they had, and hardly eſcaping with life, came that night to Hochſtrate, and the next day to Altenburg. Thus was Rab, one of the ſtrongeſt bulwarks of Chriſtendom, traiterouſly deliuered vnto the moſt mortall enemy of the Chriſtian religion; beeing euen then when it was giuen vp, victualled for a year, and ſufficiently furniſhed with all things neceſſary for defence: all which prouiſion, together with the city, fel into the hands of the faithles enemy. A loſſe neuer to haue bin ſufficiently lamented, had it not bin about four yeares after euen as it were miraculouſly again recouered, to the great rejoicing of all that ſide of Chriſtendom, as in the proces of this hiſtory ſhal appear.

Rab trecherouſly yeelded to Sinan Baſſa.

A Sinan glad of this victory, as the greateſt trophy of his maſters glory ouer the Chriſtians, gaue him ſpeedy knowledge thereof both by letters and meſſengers. Of whom he was for that good ſeruice highly commended, and afterward bountifully rewarded: for now had Amurath already in hope deuoured all Auſtria, with the Prouinces thereabout. The great Baſſa becauſe he would not with too long ſtay hinder the courſe of his victory, without delay repaired the ruines, new fortified the battered bulwarks, enlarged the ditches, and filled the Cathedrall church with earth, in manner of a ſtrong bulwarke, whereupon he planted great ſtore of great ordnance: and with exceeding ſpeed diſpatched all things neceſſary for the holding of the place. In the meane time he ſent certaine Tartars to ſummon the towne and caſtle of Pappa, which caſtle with a little towne ſubiect thereunto, the Chriſtians the night following, B ſet on fire, becauſe it ſhould not ſtand the enemy in any ſtead for the farther troubling of the country, and ſo fled.

Rab repaired by the Turks.

The Baſſa hauing at his pleaſure diſpoſed of all things in Rab, and leauing there foure thouſand Ianizaries, and ten thouſand horſmen in garriſon, departed thence with his army & laid ſiege to Comara, a ſtrong towne of that moſt fertile Iſland which the Hungarians call Schut, which ſituated in the very point thereof about foure miles from Rab, is on the Eaſt, South, and North incloſed with the two armes of Danubius. All theſe waies Sinan with his fleet (which he had there notably well appointed) laied hard ſiege vnto the towne, and gaue thereunto diuers aſſaults: and by land the Beglerbeg of Grece ceaſed not both by continuall battery and mines, to ſhake the walls and bulwarks therof. Thus was the city on all ſides both by water and C by land hardly laied vnto. But the Chriſtians within, with no leſſe courage defended themſelues & the city, than did the Turks aſſaile them; ſhewing indeed, that the liberty of their religion and country, was vnto them dearer than their liues. Matthias the Archduke in the mean time, not ignorant how much it concerned the emperor his brother to haue this city defended, hauing after the late ouerthrow gathered together a good army of Germans, Bohemians, and Hungarians, reſolued to go and raiſe the ſiege: and ſo marching forward with his army, came and encamped the 28 day of October at Nitria, about fiue miles from Komara. Now were the Tartars a little before departed from the camp, with purpoſe to returne home: yea, the Turks themſelues weary of the ſiege, and wanting victuall both for themſelues and their horſes, began alſo as men diſcouraged to ſhrinke away. Which the Baſſa wel conſidering, thought it not D beſt with his heartleſſe ſouldiers and army now ſore weakened, to abide the comming of the Chriſtians: and therefore vpon their approch he forthwith forſooke the city, which he had by the ſpace of three weeks hardly beſieged, and by a bridge made of boats tranſported his army and artillery ouer Danubius to Dotis, where he the next day after brake vp his army. Immediatly after the Turks were thus departed, the Archduke arriued at Komara, where he with great diligence cauſed the breaches to be repaired, the mines to be filled vp, and new bulwarks and rampiers to be made in diuers places for the more ſtrength of the city, leauing the charge thereof ſtill vnto the lord Braun the old Gouernor, who in the defence thereof had receiued a grieuous wound in his right knee: of whom alſo this notable fact is reported. The Baſſa in time of the late ſiege at Comara, vnder the color of a parley, had ſent fiue Turks into the city, to the E Gouernor, but indeed to proue if he were by any meanes to be won to yeeld vp the city, and not to hold it out to the laſt. The faithful Gouernor, hauing giuen them the hearing vntil they had diſcharged their whole trechery, preſently cauſed foure of their heads to be ſtrucken off, and to be ſet vpon long pikes vpon one of the bulwarks for the Baſſa to looke vpon; but the fift (the beholder of this tragedy) he ſent backe vnto the Baſſa, to tell him, That although he had found one in Rab to ſerue his turne, he was much deceiued, if in him he thought to finde County Hardeck; and that he wiſhed rather to die the Emperors faithfull ſeruant in the bloud of the Turks, than to betray the city committed to his charge.

Komara beſieged by Sinan Baſſa.

He raiſeth his ſiege.

County Hardeck late Gouernour of Rab, generally before ſuſpected to haue treacherouſly betraid that ſtrong towne vnto the Baſſa, was therefore ſent for to Vienna, and there by the Em- F perors commandement committed to priſon. Where among many things laid to his charge, as that he ſhould in the beginning of the ſiege negligently haue ſuffered many things to be done by the enemy, which afterwards turned to the great danger of the towne: and that in the time of the ſiege, he had cauſed ſome of the canoniers to diſcharge certain great pieces againſt the enemy, with pouder only without ſhot: and that ſeeing one piece among the reſt to do the enemy much harme, he had cauſed the ſame to be remoued, and ſo placed, as that it ſeemed to little or no vſe: beſide that, he (as it ſhould ſeeme) making ſmall reckoning of the [illegible] would G oftentimes ſay, That if the Turks ſhould win it, he ſhould be but one towne the [illegible] diuers other ſuch things, giuing iuſt cauſe of ſuſpition. The thing that lay moſt [illegible] him, was the teſtimony of one of Sinan Baſſa his chamber, who being a [illegible] and ſeruing in the Baſſaes chamber, was now fled from the Turks, and comming vnto the Archduke in the time of his ſiege, declared vnto him, that there was treaſon within [illegible] he but three daies before by the commandement of his maſter, had deliuered [illegible] duckats vnto two Chriſtians, of whom the one had a note or ſcarre in his face, and was afterwards knowne to haue bin one of the Counties ſeruants. Vpon this and ſuch like proofe the County was after many daies hearing, in open court, by the iudgement of [illegible] noblemen and captains of name, condemned of treaſon, and adiudged to be hanged, his dead bo- H dy to remaine vpon the gallowes by the ſpace of three daies, and all his lands and goods to be confiſcat: the rigor of which ſentence was afterward by the Emperor ſo mitigated, that he was by him adiudged to haue his right hand (by him before giuen vnto the [illegible] his faith) and his head ſtrucke off vpon a ſcaffold at Vienna, and ſo buried. Which ſentence was afterwards accordingly put in execution for the tenth of [illegible] being brought to the ſcaffold built of purpoſe in the high ſtreet of Vienna [illegible] of his condemnation there ſolemnly read, commending himſelfe vpon his [illegible] of God, with his eies couered, and his right hand laied vpon a blocke couered [illegible] both his hand & head ſo ſuddenly ſtrucke off by the executioner, as that the beholders could hardly iudge which of them was firſt off. His dead body with his head and hand, was preſently I by his ſeruant wrapped in a blacke cloth, and layed in his coach, which ſtood there of purpoſe couered with blacke, and was afterwards buried amongſt his anceſtors.

The Tartars but lately before departed from Sinans campe, paſſing ouer Danubius at Stri-gonium, had purpoſed through the vpper part of Hungary, and by the borders of Tranſylua-nia and Moldauia, to haue againe returned into their country: of whom two companies falling into the hands of the lord Palfi, were by him cut off and vtterly defeated: the reſt comming to the borders of Tranſyluania, and finding the paſſages ſo beſet by the Prince and the Vay-uod of Valachia, as that they could not without moſt manifeſt danger paſſe that way, returned againe the ſame way they came: and hauing rifled and burnt certaine townes and villages K in the vpper Hungary about Tockaie, paſſed the riuer againe at Strigonium, and wintering at Veſprimium, Palotta, and other places in the Countrey which is about Rab, liued vpon the ſpoile of the poore diſtreſſed Chriſtians, vpon the frontiers of Auſtria, euen as farre as Meinerſdorf.

Theſe Tartars (of whom we haue ſo often ſpoken) at their firſt comming to the aid of Sinan, by direction from the Turkiſh Sultan, ſtaied vpon the frontiers of Tranſyluania, of purpoſe to haue ſurpriſed that country, and either to haue thruſt Sigiſmund Bator the young Prince out of the gouernment thereof, or elſe to haue ſent him in bonds to Conſtantinople: for it was commonly reported, That he weary of the heauy tribute which he yerely paid vnto the Turk, and had now after their greedy manner beene diuers times inhaunſed, had purpoſed to reuolt L from the Turkiſh Sultan, & to enter into confederation with the Chriſtian Emperor. Which innouation and change, certaine of the Nobility and chiefe States of Tranſyluania ſought by all meanes to hinder: and acquainting Amurath with the matter, and entring into conſpiracy with the Tartars, vndertooke to deliuer the whole country into their hands, and to ſend the Prince priſoner to Huſt, where the Tartars then lay vpon the borders encamped. Wherefore diſſembling their purpoſe, they cunningly perſuaded the prince, that Samoſcius the great Chancellor of Polonia, in the confines of his countrey lay with a great power expecting his com-ming, to conſult with him of matters of great importance. And the better to colour this their trechery, they had counterfeited letters to that effect from the Chancellor to the Prince, and had wrought ſo effectually, that the prince not ſuſpecting any ſuch treaſon, gaue credit to their M perſuaſions, and ſo put himſelfe vpon his way towards the Chancellor (as he ſuppoſed) but by the way, he was aduiſed by ſome of his friends which had got ſome ſuſpition of the matter, not to go any farther, for that his comming was not intended by the Polonians his friends, (as he was perſuaded) but by the Tartars his enemies, who lay in wait for him at Huſt, to betray

A reaue him of his life & gouernment. The Prince aſtonied with the nouelty of the matter, liſ-ned vnto their perſuaſion, and retired with his traine to the ſtrong fort of Kehwere; where he ſtaied foureteene daies, as if it had beene only for feare of the Tartars. In the meane time he gaue notice to the Nobility and Gouernours of the Country, his friends, of the imminent and common danger, who forthwith repaired vnto him in armes. But the traitours proceeding in their purpoſe, ceaſed not to perſuade Bornemiſſa, who had the leading of the Princes army, that to fight with the Tartars was a matter of no ſmall danger: and that therefore if he wiſhed well to his country, he ſhould not haue to do with them, but only ſhew himſelfe neere vnto them, and that he was not vnprouided for them: which was accordingly done; and the Tranſyluani-an army brought ſo nigh vnto the Tartars, as that they might heare the noiſe of their drums B and trumpets. Whereby the Tartars as by the watchword, perceiuing themſelues diſcouered, and nothing to fall out according to their expectation, as had bin vnto them promiſed for the betraying of the Prince; they remooued thence, and by another way breaking through the midſt of Tranſyluania, and ſo into Hungary, rifled and burnt fiue hundred villages, ſlew all the males that were aboue twelue yeares of age, and carryed away the reſt vnto the Turkiſh army then lying at the ſiege of Rab. In the mean time the traitors (when as this firſt plot ſerued them not) conſpired to ſet vp one Balthazor Bator, the yong Princes nigh kinſman, and with the good fauour of Amurath to preferre him to the ſoueraigne gouernment of their Country. Which their purpoſe the Prince perceiuing, and doubting altogether to truſt vnto the fidelity of his owne ſubjects; writ to his neighbours the Raſcians, and other his confederats, praying their aid C in this his ſo dangerous and doubtfull eſtate. Which after he had receiued, he apointed a generall aſſembly of all his ſtates to be holden at Clauſenburg, and that vpon a great paine to be inflicted vpon all ſuch as ſhould not there perſonally appeare: ſo at the prefixed day all came, except the Cardinall Bator and Stephen his brother, who guilty of ſo foule a treaſon againſt their owne bloud, were now before fled into Polonia. Being all thus met together, the Prince commanded the gates of the city to be ſhut, and diligent watch and ward to be kept, forbidding by open proclamation, That any man vpon pain of death ſhould ſo much as ſpeak of any imagined treaſon. And at the ſame time politickly cauſed to be publiſhed in writing, how that the Germans had in the farther ſide of Hungary got a notable victory ouer the Turks; for joy whereof he commanded bonefires to be made, and the great ordnance to be in triumph ſhot D off, with many other ſignes of joy and gladneſſe: and withall cauſed a notable banquet to be prepared, whereunto together with others, were inuited alſo all the chiefe of the conſpirators: of whom, euen as they were at dinner & leaſt feared any ſuch matter, he commanded fourteen to be apprehended and committed to priſon, and the next morning cauſed fiue of them to be executed in the open market place. The principal of whom, who had vndertaken to haue him-ſelfe ſlain the Prince, after three or foure light cuts in the necke, he cauſed to be drawne in pieces with foure horſes: the other foure, namely, Alexander, and Cabriel Gengi, Gregory Diaco, and Ladiſlaus Sallentz were beheaded, and their dead bodies all that day left in the market place for the people to behold: the reſt were alſo afterwards worthily executed: and Balthazar Bator, whom the conſpirators had intended to haue exalted, ſtrangled. Hauing thus reuenged him-E ſelfe vpon his enemies, he by a publike edict diuulged through all his dominion, gaue leaue to all his ſubjects in generall, of their owne charge to take vp armes againſt the Turks, and whatſoeuer they could take from them, to haue it to themſelues, as good priſe gotten from their lawfull enemies. By which vnwonted liberty, the Tranſyluanians encouraged as with a great bounty, armed themſelues on all hands, to the number of forty thouſand; who being muſtered and ſworne to hold together againſt the Turks, made their firſt expedition towards Danubius: where at their firſt arriuall, by good hap they light vpon certain of the Turks ſhips laded with prouiſion for the campe, and merchandiſe of all ſorts, and much treaſure: of which rich ſhips, they at the firſt onſet tooke ſeuen, but the eighth (being indeed the Admirall) eſcaped their hands. In theſe ſhips they tooke an exceeding rich booty, ſlew many of the Turks, and in to-F ken of the victory, carried backe vnto the Prince ſeuen of the Turkiſh Enſignes. This victory cauſed great joy in Tranſyluania, euery man of ſo proſperous a beginning, conceiuing good hope of moſt happy ſucceſſe. It is reported, that Sinan Baſſa hearing of this loſſe, ſhould ſay, That if this prouiſion had come to him in ſafety, he could with that treaſure more eaſily haue bought Vienna in Auſtria, than he had Rab in Hungary. After this victory the prince laid ſiege to Temeſwar, but hearing of the returne of the Tartars from the Turks campe, and that they were comming toward Tranſyluania (as is before ſaid) he left Temeſwar, to looke to the defence of his owne country.

The Ianizaries in a tumult at Conſtantinople.

Not long after, about the two and twentieth of December a tumult riſe among the Ianizaries of the court at Conſtantinople, which grew to ſuch an height, that in the heat thereof one of the Baſſaes was by them ſlain, with ſome others of good account, and one of Amuraths ſons ſore wounded, and with much ado ſaued. Vpon conceit whereof, Amurath for anger & griefe fell into a fit of the falling ſickeneſſe (whereunto he was much ſubiect) and was therewith for the ſpace of three daies and three nights ſo grieuouſly vexed, as if he ſhould haue preſently giuen vp the ghoſt: ſo that the city was filled with heauineſſe and feare, and the great men of the Court were euen ready to thinke vpon a new Lord. This tumult of the inſolent Ianizaries many ſuppoſed to haue beene the cauſe of Amurath his death, which ſhortly after enſued: his griefe and malady encreaſing daily by the euill news ſtill brought vnto him both by meſſengers and letters, eſpecially out of Tranſyluania, where the Prince waiting vpon euery occaſion, was ſtill at hand with the Turks, cutting them ſhort in euery place; and in ſundry rodes which he made vpon them in this month, tooke many of their caſtles and forts from them. He had at that time in the field in diuers places three armies: one vnder the conduct of Geſty Ferens, in the country of Lugaz, neere vnto Temeſwar: another vnder the leading of Michael Horwat, on the ſide of Danubius, to intercept the Turks comming to Buda: and the third commanded by Caſpar Cornoyſe in the country neere to Giula; vnto whom came ſhortly after fifteene hundred horſemen out of the vpper Hungary.

1595 The Tranſyluanian Prince Sigiſmund Bator thus lately reuolted from the Turke, for the ſtrengthning of his ſtate thought it beſt betime to enter into confederation with his neighbors of Valachia and Moldauia (who moued by his example, ſhortly after in like maner alſo caſt off the ſeruile yoke of the Turke) but eſpecially with the Chriſtian Emperor Rodolph. For which purpoſe he ſent Embaſſadors honourably accompanied: who comming to Caſſouia in Hungary the fourteenth of December, arriued at Prague the twelfth of Ianuary, with twenty waggons, and an hundred and fifty horſe, where they were by the Emperours appointment moſt honourably receiued and royally entertained: and after a few daies hauing deliuered vnto the Emperor the ſumme of their embaſſage, which was for a confederation to be made betweene the Emperor and the Prince: after much graue conſultation and ſerious diſcourſe it was fully concluded and agreed vpon: the chiefe points whereof I thought it not amiſſe here in briefe to ſet downe, for the ſatisfying of ſuch as deſire to know in what termes that worthy Prince next neighbour vnto the Turke then ſtood with the Chriſtian Emperour.

The capitulations of the league betwixt the Emperor & the Tranſyluanian Prince.

Firſt it was agreed vpon, That the Emperour for himſelfe and for the States of Hungary ſhould promiſe to proceed in his wars begun againſt the common enemy, and not to conclude any peace with him, without the knowledge and good liking of the Prince. And that in all concluſions of peace to be made betwixt him and the Turke, the countries of Tranſyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, ſhould be alwaies compriſed: in regard whereof, the Prince likewiſe promiſed for himſelfe and the States of Tranſyluania, to proſecute the commenced warre, and not to enter into any league with the Turke, without the knowledge and conſent of the Emperor and the Nobility of Hungary; and this to be confirmed by ſolemne oath on both ſides.

Secondly, That the Prouince of Tranſyluania with all the parts and confines thereof hitherto poſſeſſed by the Prince of Hungary, ſhould remaine vnto the ſaid Prince Sigiſmund and to his heires male, with all the profits ariſing thereof, in ſuch ſort as they had done in the time of Iohn, Stephen, and Chriſtopher, his predeceſſours, to haue therein a moſt free and abſolute authority, yet ſo, as that they ſhould acknowledge his Imperiall Majeſty and his lawfull ſucceſſors for their lawfull ſoueraignes; vnto whom they ſhould alwaies ſweare their fealty, but without any homage doing: and that to be performed by his ſucceſſours at the time of the change, but by the Prince himſelfe, preſently after the confirming of this league. But that for lacke of heires male, the country of Tranſyluania with all the territories thereunto annexed, ſhould diſcend vnto his ſacred Majeſty and his ſucceſſours the Kings of Hungary, as a true and inſeparable member thereof: whereunto the Prince and all the States of Tranſyluania ſhould bind themſelues by ſolemne oath. But yet that at ſuch time as the heires male ſhould faile in the line

A line of the preſent Prince, and that the country of Tranſyluania ſhould according to theſe preſent conditions be deuolued to the crowne of Hungary, as well his preſent Imperiall and Royall Majeſty, as his ſucceſſors, ſhould keep inuiolate the antient lawes, priuiledges, aad cuſtoms of that country, and alwaies appoint one of the nobility of Tranſyluania to be Gouernour or Vayuod of the ſame, and no other ſtranger.

Thirdly, That his Majeſty ſhould acknowledge the Prince of Tranſyluania for an abſolute Prince, and by ſpeciall charter confirme vnto him the title of Moſt excellent.

Fourthly, That his Imperial Majeſty ſhould procure one of the daughters of the late Archduke Charles his vncle, for a wife for the Prince, that as they were now to be joyned in league, ſo they might be joyned in affinity alſo.

B Fifthly, That the Emperor ſhould procure him to be made one of the order of the Golden Fleece.

Sixthly, That the Prince might with more cheerfulneſſe and ſecurity make war againſt the common enemy, his imperiall and royall Majeſty ſhould not at any time, howſoeuer things fel out, forſake the ſaid Prince or any of the countries ſubject vnto him: and euen now preſently to aid him according as the preſent occaſion required, and afterward (if greater need ſhould be) with greater help, whether it was by his Generall of Caſſouia, or others: and this giuing of aid to be on both ſides mutuall and reciprocall, according as the neceſſity of the one or other part ſhould require: and that where moſt need was, thither ſhould moſt helpe be conuerted.

Seuenthly, That the ſacred Roman Empire ſhould take vpon it the protection and defence C of the Prince and his territories. And that his Imperiall Majeſty ſhould create the ſaid Prince and the Princes his ſucceſſors, Princes of the Empire: yet ſo, as that they ſhould haue neither voice nor place among the ſaid Princes.

Eightly, That whatſoeuer caſtles, townes, cities, or other places of ſtrength, ſhould by their common forces be taken or recouered from the common enemy, at ſuch time as his Imperiall Majeſty ſhould ſend into the field a ful army, ſhould be all his Majeſties: but ſuch places as the Prince ſhould by his own forces or policy gaine from the enemy, ſhould remaine vnto the Prince himſelfe. Yet that what places ſoeuer the Prince ſhould recouer, which at any time before belonged to the kingdome of Hungary before it was taken by the Turke, thoſe he ſhould forthwith deliuer to his Majeſty, as ſoone as reaſonable recompence were by him therefore D made vnto the Prince.

Ninthly, His ſacred Majeſty ſhould promiſe of his own bounty to giue vnto his Excellency ſufficient aid for the fortifying and defence of ſuch places as ſhould be thought neceſſary for the behoof of the Chriſtians: as again the ſaid Prince ſhould likewiſe promiſe not to ſpare his own cofers or forces, that the ſame places ſhould be throughly fortified and defended for the behoofe of his Majeſty and the common good of the Chriſtian commonweale.

Laſtly, That foraſmuch as the euents of war are vncertain, and many things ſuddenly happen contrary to mens expectation, if ſuch neceſſity ſhould chance vnto his excellency or his ſucceſſors (which miſhap God forbid) that hauing ſpent themſelues, they ſhould not be able longer to defend their ſtate & country, but that the mighty enemy preuailing, they ſhould at laſt E be enforced to forſake the ſame: in this their extremity, his imperiall & royall Majeſty ſhould promiſe both for himſelfe and his ſucceſſors, within the ſpace of one moneth to aſſigne ſome certain place in ſome other of his dominions, where the ſaid prince & his ſucceſſors might honorably liue: and the like regard to be had alſo of other ſuch principall men, as ſhould together with the Prince aduenture their liues and liuings in defence of the Chriſtian commonweale.

Which articles of confederation agreed vpon, & ſolemnly confirmed, the ſame Embaſſadors were with all kindnes, bounty, and magnificence diſmiſſed & ſent back again vnto the Prince: who was not himſelfe in the mean time idle, but labouring by all the means he could to draw vnto him Michaell the Vayuod of Valachia (a man of no leſſe worth than himſelfe) and Aaron the Palatine of Moldauia, both of them then the Turks tributaries; & by them to alienat from F the Turke both thoſe countries, that ſo with their combined forces they might the better defend their liberty, and withſtand their common enemy: wherein he did ſo much, and preuailed ſo far with them both, that caſting off the Turks obeiſance, they ſhortly after to the great benefit of the Chriſtian commonweale, and no leſſe hinderance of the Turks proceedings in Hungary, joyned hands both together with him for the recouery of their loſt liberty. Which reuolt of theſe bordering Princes, for that it ſo much concerned the common good, as that the ſafegard of Auſtria, and of the remnants of Hungary, with ſome good part of Germany alſo, G is euen by them that in thoſe matters ſaw much, not without cauſe ſuppoſed to haue reſted therin; & that this noble Vayuod (of whom much is to be ſaid hereafter) was the ſecond actor herein, it ſhall not be from our purpoſe to ſee the manner of his reuolt alſo from the Turke, as we haue already the Tranſyluanians. For the more euidence whereof, as for the honor of the man (whileſt he liued, a moſt worthy member of the Chriſtian commonweale) we will a little ſtep backe to ſee how he obtained of the great Turke this ſo honourable a preferment, as was the Vayuodſhip of Valachia, not without his reuolt long now to be holden.

Valachia oppreſſed by the Turks.

Alexander the late Vayuod of Valachia, a Moldauian borne, and by Amurath himſelfe promoted to that dignity; proud aboue meaſure of this his ſo great a preferment, as alſo of his owne nobility, and the deceitfull fauor of Fortune ſtill fawning vpon him; not only oppreſſed H his people himſelfe with intollerable impoſitions, but to be in farther fauor with the Turks, brought into that country (too much before exhauſted) ſuch a company of them, as that they ſeemed now almoſt wholly to haue poſſeſſed the ſame, oppreſſing the poore Chriſtians (the naturall inhabitants) with new exactions, and more than tirannicall injuries, euen ſuch as were not elſwhere by the Turks themſelues vſed; not only breaking at their pleaſure into their houſes, and diſpoiling them of their goods, but taking tythes alſo of their children, as if it had bin of their cattell, a thing neuer before there ſeen: and for the ſatisfying of their beaſtly luſt, rauiſhing their wiues and daughters, euen in the ſight of their husbands and parents, with diuers other ſuch outragious villanies, not with modeſty to be rehearſed. So that by this meanes he I had violently taken from his Chriſtian ſubjects all hope of recouery of their antient liberty, had it not as ſomtime it falleth out in theſe worldly things both vnto men and commonweals, which brought vnto the laſt caſt, & euen as it were to the bottome of deſpaire, by the goodnes of God, contrary to all hope, find ſometime ſuch vnexpected helpe and reliefe, as that thereby they, beyond their hope, euen to the aſtoniſhment of the World, mount vp again vnto a greater luſtre of their ſtate, than was that from which they before fell: it had euen ſo by the ſingular mercy of God now hapned vnto the Valachians, not knowing which way to turn themſelues.
There was at Crailowa (a city in the confines of Valachia towards the confines of the Hungarians and Turks, where the Gouernor of thoſe borders is for the defence thereof with a ſtrong garriſon alwaies reſiant) a noble gentleman called * Ion Michael, ſon to Peter the Palatine of that K country, the aforeſaid Alexander his predeceſſor: who as he was vnto the people for the honor of his father, the prerogatiue of his birth, the comlineſſe of his perſon, and talneſſe of his ſtature, well knowne; ſo was he for his zeale towards the Chriſtian religion, his loue towards his country, his kindneſſe towards his equals, his courteſie towards his inferiors, his vpright dealing, his conſtancy and bounty vnto them, no leſſe gratious; and for other the noble vertues of his heroicall minde and naturall diſpoſition for the performance of great matters, his deepe wiſedome and quicke foreſight, his ſweet and pleaſing ſpeech, void of all affectation, vnto all good men moſt deare: whoſe fame, both for the honor of his houſe, and of his own vertues, ſtill more and more encreaſing, and riſe in the eares of Alexander the Vayuod, was the cauſe that he commanded him as the ready or rather naturall competitor of his ſtate and honor, to be ſecretly L apprehended, and ſo taken out of the way; wherof he by good fortune hauing intelligence, and carefull of his owne health, for ſafegard of himſelfe fled firſt into Hungary, and there not ſtaying long (God ſo directing him) went to Conſtantinople in the yeare 1591, to ſue for the Vayuod his place, all the nobility of his country and the prouinces thereunto adjoyning, ſecretly rejoycing thereat. About which time the chiefe and moſt graue of the Valachian nobility and counſellors proſtrating themſelues at the feet of Amurath, moſt grieuouſly complained vnto him of the manifold and intollerable injuries they had already ſuſtained, and were ſtill like to endure, without hope of redreſſe, from Alexander their Vayuod, and the followers of his court; the Turks garriſons and merchants with plentifull teares orderly declaring many his moſt foule and deteſtable facts, and afterward highly commending Ion Michael for his M rare vertues, as the true heire of their prouince; moſt humbly requeſted Amurath either to haue him appointed the lawfull Gouernor of their country, or els ſome other place by him aſſigned for them to dwell in, wiſhing any where to liue, rather than vnder the heauy command of ſo mercileſſe a man as was Alexander. For the furthering of which their ſute, Michael his vncle by

A the mothers ſide, a Greeke borne, and a man for his exceeding wealth in great fauour in the Turks Court, ſpared for no coſt. So Michael by the goodneſſe of God was by Amurath with great ſolemnity created Vayuod of Valachia, and the oppreſſed and almoſt forlorne ſtate of that ſometime moſt flouriſhing countrey by little and little well relieued (although not altogether without moſt ſharpe and violent remedies, ſuch as extremity oft require) began now againe to lift vp the head, and to aſpire vnto the antient liberty and honour thereof. At the beginning of whoſe happy ſoueraignty, Alexander his predeceſſor in his owne conſcience guilty of his euill and ſhamefull gouernment of that ſo notable and great a prouince, and now in feare to be called to account, ſecretly fled. But certaine yeares after remouing to Conſtantinople with his wife, and there attempting diuers euill meanes for the obtaining of the Palatinat B of Moldauia, and for thoſe his vnlawfull practiſes accuſed by the Palatine his Agent; he was by the commandement of Amurath taken in his owne houſe, and there in his princely apparell moſt miſerably ſtrangled vpon Palme Sunday, in the yeare 1597, about ſix yeares after his departure out of Valachia.

Michael by Amurath created Vayuod of Valachia.

Alexander ſtrangled at Conſtantinople.

Michael thus made Vayuod of Valachia, long it was not but that it fortuned the reuerend Father Cornelius de Nona, ſent from Pope Clement the eighth vnto the great Duke of Muſcouy, in his returne conferring with Sigiſmund the Tranſyluanian Prince, and Aaron Palatine of Moldauia, enformed them of the great conſent of diuers zealous Chriſtian Princes, for the maintenance of the war againſt the dangerous and common Enemy; with many graue and effectuall reaſons perſuading them (but eſpecially for that they were themſelues Chriſtians) in C that Chriſtian quarrell to joyn vnto them their forces alſo, raiſed in thoſe their countries neer vnto the great riuers of Danubius and Neſter: but vnto Michael the Vayuod of Valachia, he could not for diuers his other important buſineſſes then come: whom for all that, the aforeſaid Tranſyluanian Prince Sigiſmund his neighbour deſirouſly ſought to draw into the fellowſhip of this warre, euen for the ſame reaſons almoſt wherewith he had beene himſelfe moued.
Firſt, by diuers great reaſons remouing ſuch doubts as might juſtly ſeeme to hinder him from giuing thereunto his conſent; and then by declaring the Turkiſh inſolency daily increaſing, with the infinite grieuances by them deuiſed againſt the miſerable Valachians; when as the incurſions of the Turks or Tartars, or their paſſages that way (no leſſe troubleſome than their inrodes) was almoſt euery moneth to be feared, their armies as friends to be in Winter and D Summer receiued, their ſouldiers to their great charges relieued, and their commanders and captaines rewarded. Valachia thus impoueriſhed, was not able (as he ſaid) to pay the great ſums it did already owe, neither was to expect any releaſement of the euils it was wrapped in, much leſſe was it able to ſuffice vnto the grieuous exactions to be thereunto by them afterwards impoſed. None of his predeceſſors (as he ſaid, and as truth was) had for many yeares now paſt, for any long time, or with any ſecurity held their ſtate or gouernment: but that either by the calumniation of the Enuious, or bribes of their ambitious competitors, brought into ſuſpition with the Sultan, they were violently thruſt out, or moſt cruelly put to death.
In briefe, he ſaid it was a wiſe mans part, not without moſt manifeſt and weighty reaſons, to promiſe vnto himſelfe better fortune, or more aſſurance of his ſtate, than had his vnfortunate E predeceſſors before him; but warned by their harmes, betimes to prouide for his owne ſafety.
By which perſuaſion he ſo preuailed, that the Vaynod (whoſe name, whoſe fame, whoſe wealth and life, together with his ſubjects was all thereby indangered) although he would not (for the weightineſſe of the matter) at the firſt yeeld thereunto; yet aſſuredly promiſed, with his friends and the reſt of the Nobility of his country to conſider thereupon. Hauing it by the Prince plainly laid downe before him, how a ſufficient number of ſoldiers might at all times be raiſed, their pay prouided, and aid ſtill ſent him as need ſhould be, from the German Emperor, or himſelfe out of Tranſyluania; as alſo that Aaron the Palatine of Moldauia would at all times be ready to combine himſelfe vnto them, that ſo with their vnited forces they might vpon the banks of Danubius and Neſter eaſily repulſe the incurſions both of the Turks and F Tartars their enemies: the Chriſtian Emperor in the meane time with leſſe trouble proceeding in his wars againſt the Turke on the other ſide of Hungary.

Now whileſt this plot was thus in laying, and matters to and fro debating, not altogether without the Turks ſuſpition; Sinan Baſſa comming with a great army into Hungary, had taken the ſtrong Towne of Rab, as is before declared: with which miſchance ſo much concerning the poore remainders of Hungary, the Vayuod not a little moued, began more deeply to conſider of his owne eſtate. And as he was a man of a great ſpirit, and no leſſe zeale toward his countrey, grieuing to ſee his ſubjects committed to his charge, to be ſo daily by the inſolent Turks ſtill more and more oppreſſed: he (as he had before promiſed to the Tranſyluanian) called an aſſembly of all the States of Valachia, to conſult with them what were beſt to be done for the remedy of ſo great euils, as alſo for the preuenting of greater, not without cauſe then to be feared. Where by the generall conſent of them all it was agreed, rather to joyn with the Emperor and other Chriſtian Princes in confederation, as they had bin oftentimes by them requeſted, than longer to endure that heauy yoke of the Turkiſh thraldome and ſlauery. Whereupon the Vayuod taking vnto him two thouſand of the Hungarian garriſon ſouldiers, now before for that purpoſe ſecretly layd vpon the frontiers of his country; and calling vpon the name of Chriſt Ieſus, in one day to begin withall, ſlew about two thouſand of the Ianizaries (who without his leaue had in that country proudly ſeated themſelues) with all the reſt of the Turks (in the midſt of their inſolency) together with the traiterous Iewes, not leauing one of them that he could come by aliue in all the open country. And purpoſing to driue them out of their ſtrong holds alſo, and ſo to make a cleane riddance of them, he within fourteen dayes after ſet vpon Dziurdzowa, a great towne of the Turks vpon the banke of Danubius, which he burnt all ſauing the caſtle, and hauing there made a great ſlaughter, and loded with the ſpoyle of the Turks, returned to Buchareſta the chiefe ſeat of his Palatinat.

But long it was not after this his ſo great preſumption, but that he perceiued the Turks in reuenge thereof to ſeeke after his life: although he yet ſeemed to yeeld his obedience vnto Amurath, and to haue done that he did as enforced thereunto by the inſolency of the Turkes, and for the neceſſary reliefe both of himſelfe and his ſubjects. For the ſame moneth (Rab being, as is aforeſaid, taken by Sinan) one of the Turks * Emirs, diſcended of the great family and ſtock of Mahomet their falſe prophet, and then Cadileſcher (a man of great account and place amongſt the Turks) accompanied with 2000 choſen ſoldiers, fifty of the great Sultans chamber, and many of the Zauſij and Spahi, vpon the ſudden came to Buchareſta vnder the colour of refreſhing themſelues, after their long trauell, but indeed with purpoſe to haue taken the Vayuod: where they without controlement committed all kind of outragious villany; and taking vp all the chiefe houſes in the city, imperiouſly demanded of the Vayuod (who then lay at his palace neere vnto the new monaſtery without the city, built without any caſtle or defence, vpon the riuer Dembowiza) 10000 florens for a Preſent, with victuals and other neceſſary prouiſion for his followers. And preſently after being certainly informed that he lay there but ſlenderly accompanied, and almoſt himſelfe alone, the Emir himſelfe on foot with 1000 of his ſoldiers, went out of the city, as if it had bin but for his pleaſure, and in courteſie to haue ſeene him. Of which ſo ſuſpitious a gueſts comming, the Vayuod vnderſtanding, got him betimes away into the campe of his Hungarian Mercinaries, which then lay but faſt by: when the Turke thus deceiued of the hope he had before conceiued for the taking of him, craftily ſent certaine of his followers, to know of him to what end he in time of peace did entertaine ſuch a number of Hungarian ſoldiers? Wherunto the Vayuod cunningly anſwered, That they were at the firſt entertained for the taking of Peter the ſon of Alexander, ſometime Palatine of Moldauia: who although he were now before apprehended, and openly hanged vpon an hooke at Conſtantinople, yet that thoſe ſouldiers were for their ready ſeruice, of neceſſity ſtill to be bilited in the country vntill ſuch time as their pay might be prouided. Which the Turke hearing, commanded the Vayuod forthwith to diſcharge them as men vnneceſſary, and to his ſubjects troubleſome, promiſing him the next day to lend him a tunne of gold to pay them their wages. Which feigned promiſe the Vayuod ſeemed thankefully to take; yet neuertheleſſe commanded the Hungarians forthwith in armes to ſtand in readineſſe in the camp, for the intercepting of the Turks, if haply by him diſtreſſed, they ſhould betake themſelues to flight: whileſt he in the mean time with his courtiers and other ſouldiers ſecretly aſſembling into a vally there by, came ſuddenly vpon the Turks (not as then dreaming of any ſuch thing) compaſſed about the Innes wherein they lay, and ſetting fire vpon them in fiue places, notably forced them both with fire and the ſword, the two greateſt extremities of war; ſeeking now for nothing more than the juſt reuenge of his ſpoiled City, his forced Virgins, and wronged ſubjects. Howbeit the Turks for a ſpace right valiantly defended themſelues, & by plain force ning the poore remainders of Hungary, the Vayuod not a little moued, began more deeply to conſider of his owne eſtate. And as he was a man of a great ſpirit, and no leſſe zeale toward his G countrey, grieuing to ſee his ſubjects committed to his charge, to be ſo daily by the inſolent Turks ſtill more and more oppreſſed: he (as he had before promiſed to the Tranſyluanian) called an aſſembly of all the States of Valachia, to conſult with them what were beſt to be done for the remedy of ſo great euils, as alſo for the preuenting of greater, not without cauſe then to be feared. Where by the generall conſent of them all it was agreed, rather to joyn with the Emperor and other Chriſtian Princes in confederation, as they had bin oftentimes by them requeſted, than longer to endure that heauy yoke of the Turkiſh thraldome and ſlauery.

Whereupon the Vayuod taking vnto him two thouſand of the Hungarian garriſon ſouldiers, now before for that purpoſe ſecretly layd vpon the frontiers of his country; and calling vpon H the name of Chriſt Ieſu, in one day to begin withall, ſlew about two thouſand of the Ianizaries (who without his leaue had in that country proudly ſeated themſelues) with all the reſt of the Turks (in the midſt of their inſolency) together with the traiterous Iewes, not leauing one of them that he could come by aliue in all the open-country. And purpoſing to driue them out of their ſtrong holds alſo, and ſo to make a cleane riddance of them, he within fourteen dayes after ſet vpon Dziurdzowa, a great towne of the Turks vpon the banke of Danubius, which he burnt all ſauing the caſtle, and hauing there made a great ſlaughter, and loded with the ſpoyle of the Turks, returned to Bucharesta the chiefe ſeat of his Palatinat.

Michael the Vayuod of Valachia reuolteth from the Turks.

But long it was not after this his ſo great preſumption, but that he perceiued the Turks in reuenge thereof to ſeeke after his life: although he yet ſeemed to yeeld his obedience vnto I Amurath, and to haue done that he did as enforced thereunto by the inſolency of the Turkes, and for the neceſſary reliefe both of himſelfe and his ſubjects. For the ſame moneah (Rab being, as is aforeſaid, taken by Sinan) one of the Turks * Emirs, diſcended of the great famly and ſtock of Mahomet their falſe prophet, and then Cadileſcher (a man of great account and place amongſt the Turks) accompanied with 2000 choſen ſoldiers, fifty of the great Sultans chamber, and many of the Zauſij and Spahi, vpon the ſudden came to Buchareſta vnder the colour of refreſhing themſelues, after their long trauell, but indeed with purpoſe to haue taken the Vayuod: where they without controlement committed all kind of outragious villany; and taking vp all the chiefe houſes in the city, imperiouſly demanded of the Vayuod (who then lay at his palace neere vnto the new monaſtery without the city, built without any caſtle or defence, K vpon the riuer Dembowiza) 10000 florens for a Preſent, with victuals and other neceſſary prouiſion for his followers. And preſently after being certainly informed that he lay there but ſlenderly accompanied, and almoſt himſelfe alone, the Emir himſelfe on foot with 1000 of his ſoldiers, went out of the city, as if it had bin but for his pleaſure, and in courteſie to haue ſeene him. Of which ſo ſuſpitious a gueſts comming, the Vayuod vnderſtanding, got him betimes away into the campe of his Hungarian Mercinaries, which then lay but faſt by:
when the Turke thus deceiued of the hope he had before conceiued for the taking of him, craftily ſent certaine of his followers, to know of him to what end he in time of peace did entertaine ſuch a number of Hungarian ſoldiers? Wherunto the Vayuod cunningly anſwered, That they were at the firſt entertained for the taking of Peter the ſon of Alexander, ſometime Palatine L of Moldauia: who although he were now before apprehended, and openly hanged vpon an hooke at Conſtantinople, yet that thoſe ſouldiers were for their ready ſeruice, of neceſſity ſtill to be bilited in the country vntill ſuch time as their pay might be prouided. Which the Turke hearing, commanded the Vayuod forthwith to diſcharge them as men vnneceſſary, and to his ſubjects troubleſome, promiſing him the next day to lend him a tunne of gold to pay them their wages. Which feigned promiſe the Vayuod ſeemed thankefully to take; yet neuertheleſſe commanded the Hungarians forthwith in arms to ſtand in readineſſe in the camp, for the intercepting of the Turks, if haply by him diſtreſſed, they ſhould betake themſelues to flight: whileſt he in the mean time with his courtiers and other ſouldiers ſecretly aſſembling into a vally there by, came ſuddenly vpon the Turks (not as then dreaming of any ſuch thing) M compaſſed about the Innes wherein they lay, and ſetting fire vpon them in fiue places, notably forced them both with fire and the ſword, the two greateſt extremities of war; ſeeking now for nothing mote than the juſt reuenge of his ſpoiled City, his forced Virgins, and wronged ſubjects. Howbeit the Turks for a ſpace right valiantly defended themſelues, & by plain force

THE LIFE OF MAHOMET, THE THIRD OF THAT NAME SEVENTH EMPE-ROR OF THE TVRKS.

1595

THe death of the late great Sultan Amurath was [illegible] made knowne in the Court, but with wonderfull ſecrecie [illegible], not only for feare of the Ianizaries, (who in the [illegible] of the Empire alwaies doe whatſoeuer pleaſe[illegible] for that the people hauing in diſtruſt the [illegible] Amurath his eldeſt ſonne, were generally better [illegible] Amurath the younger brother, a Prince of a more [illegible] teous diſpoſition, vnto whom they in [illegible] wiſhed [illegible] honours, which could by no [illegible] the great [illegible] prejudice of his elder brother, and danger of the whole ſtate, be giuen vnto him. Ten daies after [illegible] Mahomet in poſt from Amaſia to Conſtantinople, and was there by the great Baſſaes and other his mighty fauourits ſaluted Emperour: which done, he preſently after cauſed all his brethren to be inuited to a ſolemne feaſt in the court: whereunto they (yet ignorant of the death of their father) came cheerefully, as men fearing no harme; but being come, were there all by his commandement moſt miſerably ſtrangled: and at once to rid himſelfe of the feare of all competitors (the greateſt torment of the Mighty) he the ſame day (as is reported) cauſed [illegible] of his fathers wiues and concubines, ſuch as by whom any iſſue was to be feared, to be all drowned in the ſea.

Mahomet ſaluted Emperor of the Turks.

He murthereth his brethren.

The Ianizaries and other ſoldiers of the court not before acquainted with the death of Amurath, neither with the choice that the great Baſſaes had without their priuity made of Mahomet, and not a little offended to ſee themſelues ſo diſappointed of ſuch ſpoiles as they reckoned due vnto them in the time of their vacancy, as men [illegible] riſe vp in a rage, and made ſuch hauock & ſpoile in the Imperiall city, as greater they could not well haue made, had there bin as yet no Emperor choſen at all; and not ſo contented, were now euen vpon the point to haue rifled the new Emperours court, and to haue laid violent hands vpon the perſon of himſelfe, in reuenge of the tyranny by him executed vpon his brethren and fathers wiues (which inhumane cruelty the Turkiſh Emperors eaſily excuſe by the name of the policy of their ſtate) for the appeaſing of which ſo dangerous a tumult, Mahomet called vnto him certaine of the chiefe men amongſt theſe ſeditious, ſuch as were thought to be able to do moſt with them, whom he ſought by faire perſuaſions and large promiſes [illegible] the reſt. Which ſerued him to little or no purpoſe vntill ſuch [illegible] came out with their followers: who [illegible] with moſt grieuous threats, and firme promiſe of a generall pardon, [illegible] the more ſafety, kept all the chiefe ſtreetes of the city with [illegible]. [illegible] thus ouerblowne, a new tent was by the commandement of the new Emperor ſet vp [illegible] Temple of Sophia: wherein on the right hand was placed the dead body of the [illegible] Amurath his father, and on the left hand the bodies of his nineteene ſtrangled brethren [illegible]

The tumult appeaſed.

[illegible]

A forth of purpoſe,as an heauy ſpectacle for the people to behold : who all not long after were together with their father in great ſolemnity after the Turkiſh manner buried, and Mahomet himſelfe (being about nine and twenty yeares old) now openly proclaimed great Emperor of the Turks,and lord of all,from the riſing of the Sun,vnto the going downe of the ſame. After that, returning to his palace, he made vnto his Baſſaes and other great men a ſumptuous and royall feaſt,as the manner was:but whileſt they were in the midſt of their mirth, vpon the ſudden all the city was againe in an vprore, and the people in armes, in ſuch ſort, as that it was thought ſcarce one man would haue eſcaped aliue from that banket,had not the chiefe Baſſa with his grauity and wiſedome and wonderfull labour in good time appeaſed their fury, and withall to their great terror, cauſed all the great ordnance in the city to be brought forth into B the ſtreets ready charged,to be ſhot off amongſt them.

The Ianizaries againe in an vprore.

Whileſt theſe troubles thus paſſed at Conſtantinople, vpon the late confederation made betweene the Emperor,the Tranſyluanian Prince,the Valachians and Moldauians,diuers fortunate inrodes and ſkirmiſhes were by them made in the frontiers of the Turks dominions, many ſtrong places were ſurpriſed,many rich booties taken,and notable examples done,which we will but briefely paſſe ouer, as the precedents of a greater war. The city of Weitze,before taken by the Turks,was now againe in the beginning of this yeare recouered:and the Chriſtians about Scuthia,in number about foure thouſand,breaking into the Turks frontiers, carried away an exceeding rich prey,with diuers noble captiues. The like did alſo the Chriſtians of Viuaria : at which time alſo the garriſon ſoldiers of Altenburg making a rode into the country C about Rab,encountered with foure thouſand Turks,of whom they ſlew two hundred,tooke certaine priſoners,whom they ſent ſome to Presburg,ſome to Altenburg : and Sinan Baſſa the late Generall returning towards Conſtantinople with much treaſure, which he had greedily ſcraped together in the late wars in Hungary, was by the Valachians ſet vpon by the way not far from Belgrade,and ſtript of all that he had,hauing much ado to eſcape himſelfe with ſome few of his followers. The ſame Valachians,together with the Tranſyluanians, vnder the conduct of their valiant captaine Geſtius Ferens,entring further vpon the Turks, tooke from them diuers of their townes and caſtles, as Pondeſie, Nicopliſe, Killa, and Rebnichi, and meeting with twelue thouſand Tartars,ſlew a great number of them, and put the reſt to flight. With this inſolency of the Valachians his late tributaries,but now his enemies, the Turkiſh Emperour D was highly offended : and therefore ſent one Bogdanus a Valachian borne, deſcended of the Palatines houſe,with a great power to expulſe the old Vayuod,and to poſſeſſe himſelfe of that honour,as his tributary;promiſing vnto him all fauour and kindneſſe. Bogdanus thus ſupported and furniſhed, came with his power into Valachia; yet thought it beſt before he attempted any great matter,to expect the comming of the Tartars left the laſt yeare in Hungary by Sinan : of whoſe comming the Valachians and Tranſyluanians hauing vnderſtanding, met them by the way,and ioyning battell with them,ſlew eight thouſand of them,put the reſt to flight, and ſo returned : vnto whom preſently after this victory the Tranſyluanian Prince ſent fourteene thouſand ſoldiers moe to aid them againſt the Turks. But Bogdanus vnderſtanding both of the ouerthrow of the Tartars and the comming of this new ſupply,durſt not proceed E any further in his enterpriſe,but kept himſelfe ſtill in his trenches. Not long after,by the commandement of the Turkiſh Emperour, Han the Crim Tartar with a great power of his Tartarian horſemen entred into Moldauia, with purpoſe to haue by fire and ſword reduced that country againe vnto the Turks obeiſance : of whoſe comming Aaron Vayuod of Moldauia hauing knowledge, and aided by his neighbour Michael Vayuod of Valachia, ſo belaied the Tartars,that he in three diuers battels ouerthrew them,and hauing ſlaine twelue thouſand of them, enforced the reſt to retire againe out of his countrey: and following the courſe of this victory, preſently after tooke Bendar, Schinitz, Tigna, Mechnis, with ſome other caſtles and fortreſſes of the Turks neere vnto the riuer of Danubius, all which he furniſhed with his owne garriſons ; and withall tooke in the rich countrey of Bobraga, the inhabitants thereof F willingly ſubmitting themſelues vnto him, as men weary of the Turkiſh thraldome. With like good fortune, aided by the Polonian Coſſackes, he ouerthrew Ianicula the ſonne of Bogdanus, ſometime Vayuod of Moldauia, now ſent by Mahomet with a great power, as a moſt fit inſtrument to trouble the Vayuod,and to recouer againe that countrey : with whom Aaron battell, and hauing ſlaine eight thouſand of his Turks, put him to flight, and tooke the ſpoile of his whole campe. Neither yet ſo contented, marched preſently to Neſter Alba, where he G put the Turks in great feare, and afterwards burnt the ſuburbs of the City, and ſo retired.

The Emperours Embaſſador dieth in priſon at Belgrade.

How Amurath the late Sultan in the beginning of theſe troubles, had at Conſtantinople ſhut vp in priſon Fredericke Krecowitz the Emperours Embaſſador, is before declared. This Embaſſadour Sinan Baſſa brought with him the laſt yeare when hee came into Hungary, who after many indignities by him ſuffered both on the way and at Belgrade, there died: fiue of whoſe ſeruants the falſe Baſſa cauſed to bee kept in ſtreit priſon, as guilty of their Maſters death, ſo to auert the infamy thereof from himſelfe. But now lying himſelfe at Belgrade for the better mannaging of this yeares warres, vpon the comming of a new Treaſurer from the Court, hee cauſed the fiue poore priſoners to be brought before him, and moſt impudently H charged them with the death of their Maſter: ſaying, That they ſhould anſwere for the ſame vnto God and their Emperor; and that his purpoſe in bringing of him from Conſtantinople, was to no other end, but to haue vſed his helpe in concluding a peace betweene the Great Sultan and the Emperor, and ſo to haue ſet him with all his at liberty: But now that he was dead, he would ſend them his treacherous ſeruants vnto the Emperour to be by him examined: and withall to tell him, That hee was ſent from the Great Sultan, (whoſe power was not by any but God onely to be withſtood) to beſiege Vienna, which he could (as he ſaid) the laſt yeare haue taken with leſſe labour than he had done Rab: and that therefore it were beſt for him betime to ſeeke for peace, before ſo great a power had taken the field: and that for further inſtructions, he would referre them to his ſonne the Baſſa of Buda, to whom he ſent them from I Belgrade, together with the new come Treaſurer. Being come to Buda, they were forthwith brought before the Baſſa, and amongſt them the late Embaſſadours Secretary, vnto whom after he had ſaid ſomewhat of the hard dealing with the Embaſſador and his followers, he declared that hee had alwaies diſliked of that manner of proceeding, and oftentimes entreated his father for their liberty; and now at laſt to haue obtained, That the Embaſſadour beeing dead, his ſeruants might be ſet free: and ſo put them in good hope, that they ſhould in ſhort time be reſtored to their wonted liberty. In the meane time, That one of them ſhould go to the Emperours Court, and there ſpeake with one of his ſecretaries, whom he had before aduiſed to bethinke himſelfe of peace: vnto whom alſo he afterwards writ, vpon what conditions he thought peace might be at the Sultans hand obtained. Which were, If all the caſtles and K ſtrong holds taken by the Emperors forces in theſe wars, as Filek, Setchine, and Nouigrade, with their territories, ſhould be reſtored, Siſeg in Croatia ſurrendered; if the Emperor ſhould from thenceforth refuſe to aid or protect the Tranſyluanians, Moldauians, & Valachians, and leaue them to the Great Sultan to be chaſtiſed as rebels; if finally the Emperour would at once ſend vnto the Turkes Court his wonted tribute for the yeares paſt, and ſo yearely afterwards: ſo he could be content by the mediation of his father, to attempt to appeaſe the fierce and inueterate diſpleaſure of the Sultan, and to further the treaty of peace. This he commanded the Secretary to write, and to ſend it by the young Lord Perling, and to require thereof anſwere: yet that he ſhould go with this condition, That if the ſaid Perling within the ſpace of fiue and twenty daies returned not with anſwere, all the reſt ſhould for his default loſe their L heads. A ſubtill deuice and full of deceit, wherein the crafty Baſſaes, both the father and the ſon, ſought for nothing elſe but to ſee what confidence the Chriſtians had in themſelues, and to breake the confederation made betweene the Emperour, the Tranſyluanians, Moldauians, and Valachians: and that other Princes whom God had ſtirred vp in defence of ſo juſt a cauſe, hearing of a rumour of peace, might grow cold, and deferre to ſend their promiſed aid. For now the Turks had found by experience, how hurtfull and dangerous the reuolt of the three countries of Tranſyluania, Moldauia, and Valachia was vnto them, as they which brought ten hundred thouſand duckats yearely into the great Sultans Treaſury: beſides that, thoſe people now become their enemies, were of all others fitteſt to intercept all manner of prouiſion to be brought by land either to or from Conſtantinople, were it victuall or other warrelike M prouiſion. Notwithſtanding this motion of peace made by the two Baſſaes, Sinan the old Baſſa in the meane time, with great diligence at Belgrade prepared all things neceſſary for warre, and cauſed three bridges to be made, whereby he might in diuers places as he thought beſt, tranſport his army ouer Danubius; and at the ſame time ſent for the garriſons round about,

A and other ſouldiers before billited in the countrey, and put in readineſſe all things neceſſary for a moſt mortall warre.

The Baſſa's ſubtill demands anſwered with like.

Within the appointed time came Perling from the Emperors court with anſwer to the letters written by the Embaſſadours ſecretary, at the commandement of the Baſſa; the effect whereof was, that he had receiued his letters by Perling, and did thereby vnderſtand what had paſſed betweene the captiue ſeruants of the late Embaſſador, and Sinan Baſſa at Belgrade, and alſo betweene them and Sinan Baſſa his ſon at Buda; and that the Emperors minde was neuer other, but that a firme peace might haue been made betweene him and the Sultan, and that the Emperour had done nothing elſe by his Embaſſadour at Conſtantinople, or by others in other places, but that ſuch reaſonable conditions might haue beene found out, as might haue ended B thoſe wars, and haue on both ſides deliuered their innocent ſubiects from their great and daily calamities, which might eaſily haue been done, if Sinan the author and fautor of this warre, had with like deſire furthered the peace. But that it was manifeſt vnto the whole World, that all complaints of infinit grieuances, being by the Embaſſador, yea, and by the Emperor himſelfe, by his letters laid open vnto the Sultan and his chiefe Baſſaes, had not only nothing preuailed, but alſo to haue beene with great contempt rejected, and the treaty of peace once begun, to haue by the inſolency of the Baſſa of Boſna been interrupted: That the Emperour because the matter ſhould not breake out into open war, had ſent his double tribute into the confines of Hungary, which was a great while laid vp at Comara vntill the Sultans minde were known. But when all his deſignes tended to war, and the Chriſtian Prouinces were by his robbers C on euery ſide ſpoiled, the inhabitants led away into moſt miſerable captiuity, the townes and villages burnt, yea, whole countries lay deſolate, and all manner of outrages were vpon a meere pride and contempt as it were of the whole World exerciſed: then the Emperour to haue taken his refuge vnto the defence of his juſt cauſe, and to haue vſed ſuch remedies as are both before God and the World to be allowed, and ſo by lawfull war to haue repulſed warre. And that although all had not the laſt yeare proſpered in his hand, but that he had receiued ſome loſſe; yet that Sinan Baſſa himſelfe, and the Baſſa of Buda his ſon, with other of the wiſer ſort of the Turks muſt needs confeſſe that to haue chanced, not by their wiſedome, policy or power, but by the ſufferance of God, by a rare misfortune, through the inexcuſable negligence and treaſon of ſuch as he had put in truſt with the confines of his empire, worthy moſt ſeuere D chaſtiſement. And that no man could deny, but that great powers of the Turks, had not once, but oftentimes bin ouerthrowne and diſcomfited, by ſmall handfuls of the Chriſtians: therefore their power not to be ſo inuincible, as they vainly vanted of. But wheras it is written, that the great Viſier Sinan and the Baſſa his ſonne are of opinion, that the Emperor is brought to ſo low an ebbe, that he muſt be glad to accept of moſt hard and diſhonorable conditions of peace propounded by them: therein they erre much, and deceiue themſelues far; for by the power of God they ſhould ſhortly by experience know, that his Imperiall Majeſty wanteth neither power nor wealth, to repaire the loſſe receiued through the treaſon of them he truſted, yea, and to recouer whatſoeuer he had loſt elſe: and that it ſhould in ſhort time be witneſſed vnto the whole World, by the help of God and the defence of a moſt juſt cauſe, that the Emperour E was not ſo poore and weake as they ſuppoſed him to be. Yet as he of his owne naturall goodneſſe and clemency, with his owne incomparable loſſe and harme, had alwaies ſought for the quiet and profit of his ſubjects, and to the vttermoſt of his power ſtaid the effuſion of innocent bloud; ſo now alſo forgetting all injuries, he could happily be content to thinke of an honorable peace: whereunto he was more enclined than to protract the warre with the vnſpeakable harmes of the ſubjects on both ſides. Yet aboue all things it behooued Sinan to know, that he was to reſtore all ſuch caſtles and townes as had in this warre beene taken by the Turks, beginning at Wihitz in Croatia, euen to the laſt innocent ſubject by them caried away into captiuity. And that the Tranſyluanians, Moldauians, and Walachians (people many ages joyned and vnited as inſeparable members to the kingdome of Hungary, as vnto the true body, and F now of late by the practiſe and treachery of certaine rebellious perſons ſeparated from the ſame) were from henceforth to be left vnder the protection and gouernment of his Imperiall Majeſty, and neuer more to be impugned by the Turks. If theſe things were done, and order taken that the injury and diſgrace done vnto the Emperours late Embaſſadour (a fact that all the Princes of the World cried ſhame of) might not remaine vnpuniſhed: and that his ſeruants in durance at Buda and Conſtantinople, might be reſtored vnto their wonted liberty; then ſome good forme of peace, and bounding of their territories might happily be agreed vpon: without which conditions, all talke of peace was but vaine: hoping that God the iuſt and mighty protector of ſuch as put their truſt in him, would not faile to helpe his Imperiall Maieſty, with the reſt of the confederat Princes, in their ſo iuſt a quarell, and abate the pride of ſuch as truſt in their owne ſtrength and power.

This anſwer the captiues at Buda were commanded to giue vnto the Baſſa, either by writing or by word of mouth: and withall earneſtly to requeſt him both for their owne liberty and their fellows, wrongfully detained at Conſtantinople. Which if it could not be obtained, yet to comfort themſelues with that, that they ſhould in bounteous manner receiue from the Emperour ſuch allowance, as ſhould ſuffice to prouide them things neceſſary: as he had granted to Perling, whom he might haue iuſtly detained and not ſent him backe againe, but for his oaths ſake, being no lawfull priſoner. Thus were the vnreaſonable conditions of peace craftily by the Baſſa propounded, by others anſwered: but by whom he knew not, no mans name being ſet thereunto.

The Emperor not ignorant with what an enemy he had to do, and of nothing more carefull than of the kingdome (or more truly to ſay, of the reliques of the kingdome) of Hungary, lying now as it were in the Lyons mouth, ceaſed not to pray aid, not of the Princes electors only, but of others alſo farther off; yea euen as far as Italy and Spaine, but eſpecially of the King of Polonia, as his neere alliance and neighbor. Vnto whom both he and the States of Hungary ſent their Embaſſadours, at ſuch time as he, moued with the daily incurſions of the Turks and Tartars into the countries adioyning vpon his, had for the ſafety of his owne Kingdome, called a parliament of all his States in February laſt, at Cracouia. Whereof Mahomet the Great Turke hearing, ſent alſo two of his chiefe Chiaus, his vſual Embaſſadors, vnto the king and his States ſo aſſembled, to craue his aid in his wars in Hungary: which if the King ſhould not refuſe, then to promiſe him to want no coine to pay his ſouldiers, and that Mahomet mindfull of ſo great a courteſie, would at all times be ready to requite him with like, when his occaſions ſhould require. Theſe Embaſſadors, hauing obtained ſafe conduct from Michael the Vayuod of Valachia for their paſſage through his country, comming thither, were by the Vayuod himſelfe honourably entertained and welcommed, and ſo brought into a faire lodging, where they diſcourſed with him of many matters. But the Vayuods followers, grieued to ſee ſo great honor done to theſe his ſworne and mortall enemies, with weapons in their hands brake into the roome where the Embaſſadors were, and without more adoe ſlew them both: and in the ſame fury ſetting vpon the reſt of the Turks their followers, cut them all in pieces, ſo that of them none came into Polooia to do their great Maſters meſſage, either yet returned to Conſtantinople to carry newes of the reſt, but there altogether periſhed. Of which outrage Mahomet yet vnderſtanding, was therewith wonderfully enraged, threatening all euils both to the Moldauians and Valachians, and forthwith ſent out other Embaſſadors to the ſame purpoſe, who with better fortune afterwards arriued in Polonia.

The Tartars in many places (as is before declared) ouerthrown, and many ſtrong caſtles and forts taken from the Turks by the Tranſyluanians, Valachians, and Moldauians, the Turkiſh affaires going to wracke in thoſe quarters, and ſore ſhaken on that ſide of Hungary; Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperour called home to the Court Sinan Baſſa his Generall in Hungary, to conferre with him (as it was thought) of ſome great matters. In whoſe place he ſent Ferat Baſſa, he who ſometime had the leading of Amuraths great armies againſt the Perſians: who now departing from Conſtantinople, came to Belgrade in Aprill, and there tooke the charge vpon him. Where at his firſt comming, in the night time all the ropes and cords of the tents were ſuddenly cut in ſunder, and ſo the tent let fall about his eares: which ſome ſuppoſed to haue beene done to his diſgrace, by the proourement of Cicala Baſſa, before by him wronged; or as others thought, by the inſolent Ianizaries, who diſliking of him, did it in deſpight, wiſhing rather to haue beene led by Mahomet himſelfe.

The Plague & Famine among the Turks.

Now at his comming, the Famine which the laſt yére began amongſt the Turks, was growne exceeding great, not at Buda and Belgrade only, but euen generally in moſt places of Hungary poſſeſſed by the Turks: inſomuch that the Tartar women that followed the campe, were faine to roaſt their owne children and eat them. This Famine was alſo accompanied with a moſt terrible Plague, whereof great numbers of the

A the Turks and Tartars died dayly: ſo that of foureſcore fiue thouſand Tartars which came the laſt yeare into Hungary, now remained ſcarce eight thouſand, the reſt being all deuoured with the Sword, famine, and the Peſtilence.

Great were the harmes the Turkes ſtill dayly receiued from the late reuolted countries of Tranſyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, the Chriſtians of thoſe places ſeeking by all means to annoy them. Michael Vayuod of Valachia, not contented with that they had already done, but entring into the Turks frontiers, ſurpriſed Scihmele, together with the caſtle; wherin he found fourteene field pieces, amongſt which were two which had vpon them the armes of the Emperor Ferdinand, and other two hauing vpon them the armes of Huniades; which pieces he afterward ſent as a preſent to the Tranſyluanian Prince. After that, he tooke Oroſige, a famous B port towne, the dwelling place of the Turks great purueyor for butter, cheeſe, and hony, and ſuch other prouiſion for the court; wherein he found ſuch ſtore of the aforeſaid prouiſion, as might well haue ſufficed eight thouſand men for a whole yeare: and ſtill proſecuting his good fortune, took from the Turks Gileç and Kalempe, with the ſtrong caſtle of S. George, commonly called Grigio, and at length beſieged Laganoc.

With the beginning of the Spring came Matthias the Archduke and Generall of the Chriſtian army, from the aſſembly of the Nobility of Hungary at Presburg, to Vienna, and ſo from thence to the Emperor his brother at Prague; who appointed him Generall of the lower Hungary; and Maximilian his brother Generall of the vpper Hungary: giuing them for their Lieutenants, vnto Maximilian the Lord Teuffenbach, and to Matthias the County Charles Manſ-C felt, by him ſent for out of Flanders, and after created one of the Princes of the Empire. Iohn de Medices, who was yet in Hungary, he made Maſter of the great ordnance, with charge to fortifie Komara; which he ſo well performed, as that it was thought nothing in ſtrength inferiour to Rab. All this while the Emperor ceaſed not by his Embaſſadors and letters to ſolicite the Chriſtian Princes, for the repreſſing of the common enemy, to put too their helping hands: and ſo much preuailed with them, that out of his owne hereditary prouinces, and from other Princes his friends, he had this Spring raiſed a right puiſſant and ſtrong army for the defence of Hungary: which how it was raiſed, and from whom, it ſhall not be much from our purpoſe briefly to remember, as the chiefe ſtrength vnder God, whereby the Chriſtian commonweale was this yeare moſt notably defended. Out of the higher Saxony came a thouſand two hun-D dred horſemen, and out of the lower Saxony ſix hundred: from Franconia a thouſand horſemen: from Sueuia foure thouſand footmen: out of the County of Tirol as many: from Bauaria three thouſand: out of Bohemia two thouſand men at armes, ſix hundred light horſemen, and ſix thouſand footmen: from Sileſia a thouſand fiue hundred horſemen: from Luſatia fiue hundred horſe and a thouſand foot: from Morauia a thouſand horſe, and two thouſand foot: out of Auſtria two thouſand horſe, and ſix thouſand foot: from Hungary fiue hundred horſemen and a thouſand foot: from the nobility of Sueuia and Francouia foure thouſand foot: from the King of Spaine out of the Low-countries vnder the conduct of Charles County Mansfelt, two thouſand horſemen and ſix thouſand foot: vnto theſe the Biſhop of Rome added two thouſand horſemen, and eight thouſand foot: the great Duke of Florence ſent fiue hundred E horſe & three thouſand foot: the Duke of Ferrara a thouſand fiue hundred footmen: the Duke of Mantua a thouſand foot: and the Duke Venturee fiue hundred horſe. All which being put together, fill vp the number of fifteene thouſand nine hundred horſemen, and fiftie thouſand fiue hundred foot. Which notable army, raiſed from the power of diuers Chriſtian Princes, and conducted by worthy Chiefetains, had by the goodneſſe of God much better ſucceſſe this Summer againſt the antient enemies of Chriſtendome, than had the like army the yeare before: as in the proceſſe of this Hiſtory ſhall appeare.

The notable army of the Chriſtians, and from whence it was raiſed.

Among the worthy Commanders that were in this puiſſant army, Charles County Manſfelt the ſonne of Peter Erneſtus the old County, from his youth brought vp in armes, was by the King of Spaine at the requeſt of the Emperor ſent with the aforeſaid forces of two thou-F ſand horſe and ſix thouſand foot out of the Low-countries, as a man for his approued valor and direction, fit to mannage theſe dangerous warres againſt the Turks vnder Matthias the Archduke, as his Lieutenant Generall: who hauing raiſed the appointed forces, for moſt part Wallons, departed from Bruxelles about the midſt of February, and by the way taking his leaue of his aged father at Luxenburg, and trauelling through Germany, came in March to Prague, where he was by the Emperour and the Archduke his brother moſt honourably entertained, G and ſhortly after with great ſolemnity created one of the Princes of the Empire. His forces following after him, were by the way ſtaied, partly by the inundation of waters (the riuers they were to paſſe ouer at that time riſing to an vnwonted height) partly by the jealouſie of ſome of the German Princes, who denied them paſſage through their territories, vntil ſuch time as that the Emperour by his letters had opened vnto him the way: which Princes for all that ſtood vpon their guard, and ſo gaue him paſſage.

Now ran great rumors of wonderfull preparations of the Turks, as alſo of the Chriſtians; Fame after her wonted manner, encreaſing the report of all things aboue meaſure: which cauſed the Turks with exceeding care to looke to the fortification of their frontier townes, eſpecially of Rab and Strigonium, as did the Chriſtians to the fortification of Comara and Altenburg. H In the meane time many hot skirmiſhes paſſed betweene the Chriſtians and the Turks, eſpecially in the late reuolted countries of Tranſyluania and Valachia, wherein the Turks were ſtill put to the worſe, to the great diſcontentment of their Emperour. Neere vnto Temeſware the Baſſa of Buda was ouerthrowne, by the valiant Captaine Geſtius Ferentz, and the Tranſyluanians. And in Valachia the Turks Generall entering with a great army, was there alſo by the Lord Nadaſti and the Valachians, aided with the Tranſyluanians, in a great battell diſcomfited and ouerthrowne. Eight thouſand of the Turks heads in token of this victory the Lord Nadaſti ſent to Alba-Iulia to the Tranſyluanian Prince, and certaine enſignes, amongſt which was one moſt richly garniſhed with pretious ſtones and pearles, thought to be worth thirty thouſand dollars; which the Prince afterward reſtored againe to Nadaſti, I offering him great poſſeſſions in Tranſyluania, if he could haue been content there to haue ſeated himſelfe.

All this Spring the Turks countenanced their warrs with greater boaſts and threats, than true force; giuing it out, That they would in ſhort time worke wonders both by ſea and land. For the more credit wherof, Murat Rays, a notable pyrat, was ſent out with twelue gallies; who landing here and there vpon the coaſts of Italy, did much harme, cauſing it to be reported in euery place where he landed, That this was but the beginning of a greater war, and that a wonderfull fleet was to follow him: which raiſed a great feare, as well in other places, as in Italy. Howbeit, no ſuch fleet afterwards appeared: for why, the Turkiſh Emperour, much troubled with the reuolt of Tranſyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, and the great mortality then raging K both among his ſouldiers and their horſes, was not at leiſure to looke into the ſea, hauing his hands full enough with the troubles of Hungary, where his men of war enjoyed little reſt in the frontiers of his territories.

Sigiſmund the Tranſyluanian Prince, had vpon ſome juſt cauſes, of late ſuſpected Aaron the Vayuod of Moldauia, to haue intelligence not only with the Polonians, but alſo with the Cardinall, Bator, and other his mortall enemies, and ſecretly to haue been about to make his peace with Mahomet, and ſo againe to fall off from him vnto the Turke: which vehement ſuſpition growing dayly more and more, was about this time manifeſtly confirmed by certain letters intercepted concerning that matter. For the preuenting whereof, the Prince cauſed Aaron to be apprehended, and with his wife and ſonne to be ſent as priſoners to Prague: in whoſe roome L he by the conſent of the nobility of the country, placed one Stephen Rozwan, a wiſe and diſcreet man amongſt them, and ſuch an one as had been vnto him alwaies faithfull. So as much as in him was, prouiding, that that country ſhould not be rent from him and the vnion of the other. But againſt the ſecret practiſes of the Polonians, he proteſted openly by letters vnto the Emperour, by the power of God, and aid of his faithfull ſubjects, to redreſſe thoſe ſo great injuries himſelfe by the ſword.

Mahomet ſendeth Embaſſadours to the prince of Tranſyluania.

In the middeſt of theſe troubles came three Chiaus, Embaſſadors from the Turkiſh Sultan vnto the Prince, to perſuade him againe to put himſelfe into his protection, and to giue him paſſage through his country, as in former time, into Hungary; promiſing him, that all the injuries by him or his people don, ſhould be for euer forgotten and forgiuen: M and that he ſhould haue thoſe three countries of Tranſyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, as his owne free inheritance, without paying any tribute, and ſo to be accounted as the Turks moſt louing friend and vaſſall. What the Prince anſwered thereunto, was not knowne, but by his doings afterwards it was eaſily to be gathered, that he hearkened not vnto the deceitfull charmes of the faithleſſe

A tyrant, truſting more vnto the league he had with the Chriſtian Emperour. Theſe Embaſſadours were ſcarce gone, but that a ſecret meſſenger came with letters from the chiefe of the Chriſtians in Bulgaria to the Prince, declaring vnto him, That if he did with any good ſucceſſe proſecute his wars, they would be ready to ſollow his fortune, and to joyne hands with him againſt the cruell tyrant, and to ſhut vp all the paſſages that way into Valachia, Moldauia and Hungary.

Whileſt theſe troubleſome times thus paſſed in Tranſyluania and Hungary, one of the old Ianizaries called Waſuode Giezi, an old ſouldier, but a confident bold ſpoken fellow, moued as ſhould ſeeme with the diſcontentments of the time, came vnto Mahomet the great Sultan at Conſtantinople, and there openly ſet vpon him with this rough and abrupt ſpeech:

How loug at laſt, moſt mighty Emperour, wilt thou endure thy ſelfe to be ſeduced and blinded by the great Baſſaes of thy Court, and Commanders of thine Armies? How long wilt thou ſuffer thy ſelfe to be deceiued, to the great danger of thy ſelfe, and hurt of thy ſubjects? Seeſt thou not how ouerthwartly, fraudulently, and cunningly they, moued only with their owne couetous and ambitious humour, haue hitherto dealt with thee and thy father? eſpecially in that, that perſuaded by them, thou haſt diſhonourably broken thy league, and taken vp armes againſt the Chriſtian Emperour. At length open thine eies and ſee their deceit, and how much they abuſe thy power. Sinan Baſſa, who muſt haue himſelfe honoured and exalted aboue all others, hath not by ſtrong hand honourably woon Rab, as hath been the manner of thine Anceſtors, but hath craftily bought it with thy mony, and thereby caſt thee into a moſt dangerous war and infi-
C nite troubles. O Rab, Rab, now the cauſe of great triumph and rejoycing, as if thereby all Chriſtendome ſhould in ſhort time be ſubdued to thy Scepter. But thou art therein much deceiued; thy barnes, thy ſtorehouſes, as are Tranſyluania, Valachia, Moldauia, Bulgaria, and other prouinces adjoyning, from whence this thy Imperiall City of Conſtantinople, with the country about it, thy Court, yea, thy ſelfe art to be relieued, are by this war ſhut vp; ſo that downe the riuer of Danubius out of the Weſt, or by the Euxine out of the Eaſt, thou art not able to looke for any prouiſion. From whence then ô moſt mighty Emperour, wilt thou maintaine thy ſelfe, thy Court, this populous City, and the Country hereabout? Not to ſpeake in the meane time of thy mighty Army now in Hungary, fleſh fiſh, corne, all manner of victuall are now at ſuch a price, that the common ſouldiers cannot buy them. In this extreame dearth all things, not men only, but euen the very beaſts and cattell ſtarue for hunger. Thy horſes go fat perhaps into Hungary, but neither D thou nor thy ſelect ſouldiers can liue by graſſe and weeds, all that is left in that country. This miſery and calamity of thy people thou ſeeſt dayly, and yet thou wilt not with ſound judgement lift vp thine eies, to ſee from whence theſe harmes come, and how that they by thee put in greateſt truſt, ſtudy not for thy profit or the profit of the commonweale, but only how by all meanes to enrich themſelues.

The preſumptuous ſpeech of one Waſuode an old Ianizary, to Mahomet the great Sultan.

Mahomet much mooued with the confident ſpeech of the old Ianizary, commanded him to be forthwith committed to ward, and by faire meanes to be examined, by whoſe ſetting on, and for what cauſe he had ſo boldly vttered this rude ſpeech vnto his Soueraigne, and what further things he had intended: but the reſt of the Ianizaries hearing thereof, riſe preſently in E a tumult, and by ſtrong hand tooke him out of priſon, and by ſolemne oath combined themſelues to defend him, euen to the ſpending of their owne bloud, whereat Mahomet was glad to winke.

The greateſt part of the aid promiſed by the Chriſtian Princes for the maintenance of this yeres wars againſt the Turks being now come to Vienna in Auſtria, County Mansfelt Lieutenant General vnder the Archduke, forthwith called a Councell of the Colonels, captains, and other great commanders of the army, to conſult with them what courſe to take for the begining of this great war: as whether they ſhould preſently lay ſiege to ſome towne of the Enemies, or elſe to expect him in the plaine field, and to giue him battell. All things well conſidered, and that reſolued vpon which was thought moſt expedient, he remoued from Vienna to F Altenburg, where he muſtered his whole army; and departing thence, with ſome few of his followers came to Walkenburg, a village vpon the ſide of Danubius, where he made choice of a place to encampe his army in: which after he had marked out, he returned againe with ſpeed to Altenburg, and by open proclamation thorow the Campe gaue ſtreit commandement, That againſt a certaine houre euery man ſhould be in readineſſe to remoue and ſet forward ward toward the enemy:but diuers of the ſouldiers, and eſpecially the Germans, began forthwith after their wonted manner to cry out for their pay before they would ſtir any further: ſo that the County was glad by a ſecond proclamation to command them to ariſe, promiſing them their pay within eight days. But they ſtil ſtanding vpon their former reſolution for their pay, refuſed any further to follow their captains, and ſent ſix of the beſt ſort among thoſe mutinous ſoldiers to the County, in the name of all the reſt to demand their pay; whom he forthwith commanded to be all hanged: but three of them hauing reaſonably excuſed themſelues, he let them go, and cauſing the other three to caſt lots for their liues, hanged vp two of them. Which ſeuere execution ſo terrified the reſt, that vpon the ſigne giuen they all riſe, and with the reſt of the army followed the County. The whole army being come to Walkenburg vnto the place where they were to encamp; the County himſelfe with others of the nobility began with ſpades & ſhouels to dig and caſt vp the trenches, and ſo wrought vntill they ſweat again, with whoſe example all the reſt of the army, of what degree ſoeuer, being moued to labor, had in ſhort time caſt vp a very great trench from Danubius vnto the Mariſhes, large enough for 80000 men to incamp in, the great worke with wreſtleſſe labor going forward both night and day vntill it was fully finiſhed. The County lying thus intrenched with his army, was ſtill carefull by his eſpials to vnderſtand where the enemy lay, and what he did. He was ready ſtill to heare all, but to beleeue that which ſeemed moſt like to be true: what he purpoſed, he kept moſt ſecret, ſo that the enemy could neuer diſcouer any of his deſignes (wherein the Generals of late yeares before him had much erred:) and commonly his moſt certaine reſolutions were ſhadowed vnder the open ſhew of ſome other matter nothing meant: ſecurity he much abhorred, as neuer free from danger: and although it was by diuers meſſengers brought vnto him, That the enemy was but of ſmall ſtrength, vnable to meet him, diſorderly incamped, and in great diſtreſſe for want of victuals; yet would he giue little credit thereunto, as knowing ſuch reports to haue oftentimes bin giuen out by the Turks, of purpoſe to lull the Chriſtians in ſecurity, the more eaſily to oppreſſe them. The Chriſtian army thus ſtrongly entrenched, and the trenches planted with great ordnance, the County himſelfe with certain troups of horſemen would oftentimes ſhew himſelfe before Rab, and ſometime before Dotis, viewing ſometime the one place, and ſometime the other, as if he had verily purpoſed to haue beſieged one of them: and to giue the greater ſhew that he had ſo determined, he cauſed the ground to be marked out for his army moſt conueniently to incamp in, and for the caſting vp of his mounts. Which cauſed the Turks of Strigonium, Veſprinium, Palotta, and other places farther off, to ſend part as well of their warlike prouiſion, as of their garriſon ſouldiers, ſome to Rab, ſome to Dotis, for the defence of thoſe places, neereſt as they thought vnto danger. The County in the meane time hauing now put all things in readineſſe, came with his army and ſate downe before Dotis, demanding to haue it yeelded vnto him. And rhe more to confirme the Turks that he would aſſuredly beſiege that place, he began to caſt vp his trenches, and to raiſe his mounts as ſeemed moſt conuenient; ſtreitly commanding euery man of what condition ſoeuer, to put his hand in ſome meaſure to the furtherance of thoſe works: and the more by his own example to encourage others, would oftentimes himſelf carry a faggot or ſome other thing before him vpon his horſe for the raiſing of the mount. For all that, certain Hungarian gentlemen diſdaining ſuch baſe labor (as they deemed it) refuſed to do any thing therein: which the County perceiuing ſtreitly charged one of them by his example, to carry a fagot to the mount: which the Hungarian gentleman refuſing, the County therewith much moued, laid the fagot he was carrying himſelf, before the Hungarian vpon his horſe, charging him to ſee that he caried it to the appointed place. the Hungarian diſdainfully taking it, carried it vntill he thought he was out of the Counties ſight, and then in ſcorn threw it down: which the County (hauing ſtill an eie after him) perceiuing, commanded him to be taken, and all armed as he rid to be preſently hanged vpon the next tree for his obſtinacy. Which wholſome ſeuerity, both then and afterwards cauſed others more diligently to doe what they were commanded by their ſuperiours.

An obſtinate Turke.

It happened about this time, that three Turks being taken priſoners, were brought into the camp: whom the County ſtreitly examined of many matters. But the firſt of the three could neither by faire or foule means be induced to anſwer to any thing that he was asked; and was therefore by the commandement of the County in the ſight of the other two cut into ſmall pieces. Who terrified with his diſmembring, confeſſed many things whereof they were asked:

and

A and among others, That the Turkiſh Sultan had determined to turne his greateſt forces into Tranſyluania, Moldauia, and the vpper part of Hungary; and therefore would this Summer ſend ſmall forces or els none at all into thoſe quarters.

Now was Dotis ſo belaied by the County, as that no man doubted but that he had therein purpoſed to haue gaged his whole forces, when ſuddenly the laſt of Iune, commandement was giuen through the campe, That euery man vpon ſigne giuen, ſhould be in readineſſe to follow his leaders, for that the County had determined forthwith to remoue: yet whether the army was to be remoued, few or none knew, more than certaine of the chiefe commanders. As for to go to Strigonium, few there were that ſo much as dreamed thereof, all was kept ſo ſecret: yet was it the Counties purpoſe euen from the beginning to attempt the winning of that city, B which the Archduke had in vaine the laſt yere beſieged. The next night being both darke and foule, the County riſe with all his army, and the next day being the firſt of Iuly, came to Strigonium, they of the city not hearing of his comming before they ſaw him vnder their walls. Wherefore the Turks in the ſuburbs called the Raſcian city, and they in the fort vnder S. Thomas hill, deſpairing of the keeping of thoſe places, ſetting fire on the houſes, and defacing the fort ſo much as in that ſudden feare they poſſibly could, fled into the lower towne. The next day the County without reſiſtance tooke the aforeſaid places forſaken by the Turks, which he manned with certaine companies of Wallons, and made a bridge of boats ouer Danubius, caſt vp certaine mounts, and did many other things for the furtherance of the ſiege. In three daies he had againe repaired the fort vnder S. Thomas hill abandoned by the Turks, and therein pla- C ced foure great pieces of artillery, wherewith he began to batter the lower towne, and in other places to ſtreit the beſieged more than they had bin the yere before. The Baſſa of Buda not ignorant of the want both of men & munition in the beſieged city, (and the rather, for that they had but a little before ſent part of their gariſon with ſhot & pouder to Rab and Dotis) attempted thrice (as he did many times after during the time of the ſiege) to haue by the riuer put new ſupplies both of men and munition into the city: but was ſtil by the diligence of the Chriſtians excluded, and enforced with loſſe to returne. In ſhort time the lower towne, which they call Waſſerſtat, or the Water-towne, was with continuall battery ſore beaten, ſo that ſcarcely any houſe or building was left whole; and a counterſcarſe made the laſt yeare beaten downe. Whereunto certaine Wallons were ſent, onely to haue viewed the bredth and manner of the D ditches: after whom certaine companies of the Hungarian Heidons preſently followed, without any command of their captaines; who with great courage got to the top of another high counterſcarſe, & there ſet vp ſome of their enſignes. Which the Turks beholding, & comming on cloſe together, by plain force enforced them with loſſe to retire. Among theſe Hungarians were diuers alſo of the Wallons ſlaine, with ſome others of good name and place, to the great griefe of the County, being not a little offended with that diſordered ſeruice: yet day & night the battery ceaſed not, & the Chriſtians out of their trenches with their musket ſhot ſlew many of the Turks vpon the wals, receiuing little harme again, the Turks ſtil ſhooting ſparingly, for feare of wanting ſhot and pouder at their greater need; yet that they ſpent they beſtowed ſo well, that amongſt others they had ſlain foure of the Chriſtian canoniers, and one Wallon E captaine. About the midſt of Iuly the County with continuall battery had made the Water-towne (as he thought) ſaultable: and therefore ſent certain companies to begin the aſſault, who hauing paſſed the counterſcarſe, found the ditch full of deep mud, and but newly cut broader certain paces by the Turks, ſo that it was thought ſcarce poſſible to be paſſed without a bridge; behind which ditch was an high wal, with ſtrong bulwarks, and within al this was another new caſt ditch, and vpon the very brinke therof a thicke and high parapet: all which for all that, certain companies of Wallons with great labor and danger adventured to paſſe: but ſuch was the valour of the defendants, and the ſmall number of them that came on to the aſſault, with the diſaduantage of the place wherein they ſtood, that at length they were glad to retire with the loſſe of many of their fellows. The Chriſtians in the beginning of this ſiege had taken a little F Iſland in the riuer before the city, which was kept with ſome few companies of the Lord Palſi his Heidons; whereof the Turks hauing intelligence at Buda, with three gallies and certaine other veſſels, landed in the Iſland 3000 ſoldiers, which ſlew the Heidons, vnto whom no ſuccor could be ſuddenly ſent, and ſo recouered againe the Iſland: wherein they left a ſufficient garriſon for the keeping thereof, furniſhed with all things neceſſary, and ſo departed.

County Mansfield remoueth with the army from Dotis to Strigonium.

The Chriſtians repulſed.

About three daies after the former aſſault, the Chriſtians in hope of better ſucceſſe, the ſecond time aſſailed the Water-towne, in which aſſault the chiefe leaders were the Lord Grein and Anthony Zinne a famous captaine, had he not ſtained his honour with County Hardecke at Rab, but being pardoned by the Emperour, did now together with the reſt appointed to that ſeruice, moſt couragiouſly aſſault the breach, but were againe by the Turks notably repulſed, and enforced at laſt to giue ouer the aſſault, and ſo to retire with the loſſe of 150 men: among whom Zinne himſelfe was ſlaine, with one Captaine Bager, and ſome of the Counties owne Guard: the Lord Greis was wounded in the head, and the younger Lord Schwendi with diuers other Captaines grieuouſly hurt. The next day after, 600 of the mountaine people came into the campe vnto the County, with ſupplications to requeſt him, Not to giue ouer the ſiege vntill he had woon the City; promiſing him in the name of thoſe Townes and Villages from whence they were ſent, Of their own charges to repaire for him what harme ſo euer he ſhould do in the City for the taking thereof, yea, though he ſhould lay it euen with the ground: for why? the harmes they dayly receiued from the gariſon of that City were wonderfull.

Mahomet carefull of Strigonium.

At the ſame time alſo he was aduertiſed, by his eſpials (of whom he maintained many for the diſcouery of the enemies doings) that Mahomet the Turkiſh Sultan had writ vnto the Baſſa of Buda, carefully to prouide that his beloued city of Strigonium tooke no harme, and not to ſpare either for men or mony in time to relieue it: and therein to do nothing without the aduice and good liking of his old and faithfull ſeruant Alis-Beg, who of long time had gouerned and alſo defended that city: and to the intent that nothing ſhould be wanting for the performance hereof, that he had ſent Alexander, Aga of the Ianizaries from the Court (whoſe ſeruice he might ill haue ſpared) whoſe approued counſell and helpe he might alſo vſe in all things; for that he had rather loſe ſome other whole kingdome, than that one city: And that therefore he ſhould beware that it were not by the enemy woon, or by any compoſition yeelded; wherein if he failed, he threatened vnto him his heauy diſpleaſure, not to be appeaſed without the price of his head. Which ſo ſeuere a commandement of the great Sultans the Baſſa ſent to them of Strigonium; with moſt grieuous threats from himſelfe, if they, terrified with any battery, vndermining, or aſſault, ſhould yeeld the city, & not hold it out as became valiant ſouldiers vnto the laſt man; ſwearing to impale them al vpon ſtakes that ſhould conſent to the yeelding vp thereof. The old gouernor Alis-Beg hauing receiued this ſo ſtreit a command from him that was both able and like ynough to performe what he had threatened; vtterly to deter the ſouldiers from once thinking of yeelding, cauſed diligent enquiry to be made throughout the gariſon, if any of them had at any time made any motion of yeelding vp the city, or otherwiſe murmured againſt their captains or commanders appointing them to any ſeruice: and ſuch as he found to haue ſo done, he to the terror of others cauſed to be preſently executed: and after that went downe himſelfe into the lower towne, to ſee that nothing were there wanting or amiſſe, where moſt danger was. But when he would haue again returned into the vpper town, he was ſtaied by the Ianizaries, who told him, That ſeeing he was of ſo valiant and couragious a mind, and their Gouernor, he ſhould there ſtay with them, and take ſuch part as they did, were it better or worſe: and ſo would he, or would he not, there needs ſtay he muſt.

Now the Baſſaes of Buda and Temeſware, with diuers Sanzackes as well of thoſe parts of Hungary which the Turks poſſeſſed, as other places, were aſſembling their forces for the reliefe of the beſieged in Strigonium: whereof the Tranſyluanian Prince hearing, made ſhew as if he would forthwith haue beſieged Temeſware, ſo that the Baſſa thereof leauing the intended expedition for Strigonium, was glad to returne for the defence of his owne charge. They alſo of Stiria, Carinthia, and Croatia, with the troups of County Serinus had ſo ſtopped all the paſſages, that twelue thouſand Turks which were comming from Zigeth and the places thereabout, could by no meanes come to ioyne themſelues with their fellowes for the reliefe of the diſtreſſed city.

The higher city of Strigonium battered by the Christians.

The County leauing nothing vnattempted or vndon that might help for the gaining of Strigonium, had made a notable fort vpon S. Thomas hill, and therein placed fiue great culuerins: wherewith he furiouſly battered the higher city, and did therein great harme: and thereby alſo brought to paſſe that no man could goe vp or downe the hill betwixt the vpper towne and the lower, but he was in danger to be ſet off with thoſe pieces, or the musketiers; who defended by thoſe great pieces, lay vpon the ſide of the hil in caues and buſhes, awaiting for ſuch as

A ſhould go vp or downe betwixt the two townes. Thus the Chriſtians at one time battered the vpper towne, the lower towne, and the ſtrong towne and fort of Gokara, ſtanding on the further ſide of Danubius ouer againſt Strigonium, beſieged by the lord Palſi. But of all theſe places, Gokara was with the fury of the great ordnance moſt ſhaken: which the County perceiuing, cauſed the battery to be encreaſed, and ſo continued, vntill he had beaten downe the counterſcarſe, and made certaine faire breaches in the wall. Whereunto the Morauians (vnto whoſe lot it fell) the one and twentieth of Iuly gaue an aſſault in fiue diuers places, whom the Lord Palſi ſeconded with his Hungarians, of whom certaine were of purpoſe appointed, beſide their armes, to bring things with them for the firing of the towne; which they in the time of the aſſault found meanes ſo well to beſtow, that in a while the towne was all on a light fire. The B Turks at firſt made notable reſiſtance, but finding themſelues ouerpreſſed, and ſeeing the town now on a fire about their eares, which with the wind ſo encreaſed, that it caught hold of the lower towne on the other ſide of the riuer; they retired to the riuer ſide, where ſome of them by boats got ouer to Strigonium, other ſome periſhed in the riuer, the reſt falling into the hands of the Chriſtians, were by them all put to the ſword. Gokara thus taken, and the fire quenched, the Chriſtians repairing the breaches, and ſtoring it with all warlike prouiſion, left in it a ſtrong garriſon. Within a night or two after, were two hundred of the Turks horſmen deſcried in a field faſt by, which cauſed an alarme to be raiſed in the campe, as if the whole army of the Turks had bin at hand: howbeit thoſe horſemen retiring, and no other appearing, it was afterwards knowne, that they were only ſcouts ſent out by the Turkes to take view of C the army of the Chriſtians, in what ſort they lay encamped.

Gokara taken by the Chriſtians.

The latter end of this moneth it fortuned, that a young country fellow ſecretly ſent out of the city by the Gouernor, and falling into the hands of Palſi, was by him ſent to the County; by whom he was in friendly manner demanded, from whence he came, whether he was going, and whereabouts? Whereunto the youth frankly anſwered, That he was ſent from the Gouernor with letters to the Baſſa of Buda; which he preſently drew out of his boſome, and deliuered them vnto the County: who after he had read them, cauſed them to be cloſed vp againe, and ſo deliuered to the yong man, with ſome few crownes, commanding him to carry them to the Baſſa, as he was about, and in his returne to bring him the Baſſaes anſwer, promiſing for his ſo doing to reward him bountifully: which the yong man vndertooke to do, and ſo departed.
D Now the purport of the Gouernours letters was, That if the Baſſa did not within ſix or ſeuen daies ſend him aid and relieue him, he ſhould for want of victuals & other things neceſſary for the holding out of the ſiege, be inforced either to abandon the city, or to yeeld it vp into the enemies hands. Wherunto the Baſſa returned anſwer by the aforeſaid meſſenger, that he would within the appointed time be with him, willing him in the meane time to be mindfull of his wonted valor, and not to be with any thing diſcouraged: appointing him the day, the houre, the way, the meane, with all the other circumſtances how he would relieue him. Which letters the yong man according to his promiſe deliuered vnto the County: who thereupon prouided accordingly for the welcomming of the Baſſa. Within a day after alſo, one of the Turks canoniers conſidering the danger the city lay in, and fearing that it would be loſt, fled out of it into E the camp: who beſides that he aptly declared the ſtate of the city, and the wants the beſieged were in, did alſo afterwards good ſeruice during the time of the ſiege. The Turks had in this while many times ſallied out to their great loſſe: yet now vpon hope of better ſucceſſe, they aduentured the 29 of this moneth to ſally out againe, but with like fortune as before, leauing fourſcore of their men behind them, hauing ſlaine but fiue of the Chriſtians.

Now had the Turks in great wants by the ſpace of a moneth right worthily defended Strigonium, expecting ſtill for reliefe. At length news was brought into the camp, That the Baſſa of Buda with 20000 men was comming to raiſe the ſiege: who the ſecond of Auguſt came accordingly, and with his army encamped within foure miles of the Chriſtians: lying ſo nigh, that certaine of the Turks horſemen ſeeking after booty, came very neere vnto the camp of the F Chriſtians, and out of the paſtures, euen vnder their noſes, carried away ſome few horſes: againſt theſe deſperat aduenturers, certaine troups of the Hungarian and German horſemen iſſuing out, had with them an hot skirmiſh; but the Turks of purpoſe retiring as men ouercharged, and the Chriſtians ſtill following on, had at length drawne them vnto the place where diuers other troups of the Turkes lay in ambuſh for them, who now ſtarting forth, on euery ſide hardly charged them. The Hungarian light horſemen well acquainted with ſuch skirmiſhes, ſeeing the danger, preſently fled and left the Germans to themſelues: who for a G while valiantly encountered their enemies, but oppreſſed with multitude, were glad at laſt to fly alſo. In this skirmiſh of the Chriſtians were loſt and grieuouſly wounded about 100. The Turks encouraged with this ſo proſperous a beginning, came on the next day with all their army, being before reſolued, by plaine force to open themſelues a way into the city, and ſo to relieue the beſieged. Of all theſe things was not the County ignorant, as thereof forewarned by the Baſſaes letters before deliuered vnto him; and had therefore with his army ſtrongly belaied all the waies vnto the city. Neuertheleſſe the enemy came ſtill on betweene the hills S. Thomas and S. George, and neere vnto the ſuburbs called the Raſcian city, put themſelues in order of battell, as did alſo the Chriſtians, giuing the enemy leaue to come euen to their trenches. H In the mean time the Lord Palſi with his Hungarian horſmen fetching a compaſſe about the hill on the one ſide, and the Lord Swartzenburg with his horſemen on the other, had ſo inclosed the Turks behind, as that they could not without great danger retire. Both armies orderly ranged, and the ſignall of battell giuen, the Turks hauing before without any great harm done diſcharged 17 field pieces, came on after their wonted manner with a moſt hideous cry, and at the firſt onſet, with their Turkiſh arrowes, as with a thick ſhoure darkned the sky: when on the other ſide the German and Wallon horſmen with their petronels ſent their deadly ſhot as thicke as haile amongſt them againe; and the men at armes after them taught the Turks to their coſt, how vnfit their light and halfe naked horſemen were in a ſet battell to meet with them ſo well appointed: in a trice, but not without great ſlaughter, the battell was brought to I the ſword, and to be tried by true valor: There was to be heard a cry heauens high, the thundering of artillery both great and ſmal, the clattering of armor, the gliſtering weapons, the neighing of the horſes, the crying of the wounded, the heauy groanings of the dying, with the noiſe of the trumpets, drums, and other warlike inſtruments, made deafe the ears of the hearers, preſenting vnto them nothing but horor and euen preſent death. It was a moſt miſerable ſight to ſee ſo many men in ſo ſhort time ſlain: for the battell had ſcarce endured halfe an houre, when many thouſands of the Turks lay dead vpon the ground, and the reſt ſeeing the victory incline to the Chriſtians, betooke themſelues to flight, leauing behind them their great ordnance and whatſoeuer els they brought for the reliefe of the beſieged: whom ſo flying, the lords, Palſi and Swartzenburg (who had before taken the ſtreits wherby they were to paſſe between the mountains) K ſo receiued with their freſh horſmen, that of them that came that way few eſcaped. The Baſſa himſelfe, who ſtood vpon the hill, ſeeing the diſcomfiture of his men, fled alſo himſelfe: the Baſſa of Natolia with about 100 of the Turks moe by good fortune got into Strigonium.

The number of the Turks ſlain in this battel was great, & is of diuers diuerſly reported, ſome ſaying that there were ſlain 14000, and ſome fewer. Beſides them that were ſlaine, many were alſo taken, and ſome of them men of great name and place. There were alſo taken 27 enſignes, with a multitude of camels, aſſes, and mules, laded with mony, ſhot, pouder, and other neceſſary prouiſion: all which, brought thither for the reliefe of the beſieged, became a prey vnto the Chriſtians. In the heat of this battel they of the city ſallying out, had entred a fort of the Chriſtians L vpon the riuer ſide, but were againe preſently driuen out, and with loſſe enforced to retire.
After this victory the County ſent certaine companies of the Hungarian and German horſemen with 500 waggons to the enemies campe not far off in the mountaines: who comming thither found it vtterly forſaken by the enemy, but well ſtored with all maner of neceſſary prouiſion, which they carried all away, together with 600 tents, many whereof were lined with damaske, ſatin, and other ſilke, richly embroidered or layed with gold lace or gold twiſt. The Baſſaes rich Tent taken by the Colonell of the horſemen, was afterwards by him giuen vnto the County, as was alſo the plate and money there found, all which hee diuided among the ſouldiers according to their deſerts. In the Turks campe were alſo found certaine heads of the Chriſtians, with the dead body of the Lord Brandenſteine, ſlaine in the conflict but the day before, which the Chriſtians carried away with them into the camp, and there honourably M buried them. Thoſe that remained of the Turks army hid themſelues in the mountains and woods, and ſo holpen by the darkeneſſe of the night, made beſt ſhift for themſelues that they could. The Baſſa himſelfe accompanied but with twenty horſe came to Buda about midnight, and by his comming filled the City with great heauineſſe, euery man lamenting

A his loſt friends. The Hungerian Heidons beſt acquainted with the countrey, pricking vp and down the mountains and by-waies, for certain days after the battel, brought in daily into the camp ſuch priſoners as they tooke, or elſe the heads of ſuch Turks as they ſlew. Of this ſo notable a victory, the County by a ſpeedy meſſenger certified the Archduke at Vienna, who rewarded him for his good newes with a chaine worth fiue hundred duckats: and preſently cauſed the ſong of thankſgiuing to be ſung in the church of the Auguſtine Friers, and afterward in all the Churches of the City. The County alſo to gratifie the Emperour, ſent him by the Lord Chalon his nephew, vnto Prague, two of the chiefe priſoners taken in the late battell, with foure horſemens Guidons cunningly made of horſe haires, ſuch as are commonly carried before the greateſt Commanders of the Turks armies, and fourteen other enſigns of the Turks; B with fourteen moſt goodly horſes of the Turks for a Preſent.

The next day after this battell, the County ſent the Lord Palfi with an interpretor vnto the City, to demand it to be yeelded; who hauing audience, declared vnto the Turks in what danger they were, that they help they looked for was now quite ouerthrowne, new reliefe could not but in long time be ſent vnto them; and that therfore it ſhould be good for them, whilſt yet they might, to be well aduiſed, and betimes to bethink themſelues of yeelding vp the city, leſt haply when they would, it then would not be accepted: promiſing to intreat with the Generall, that they might in ſafety depart, and with ſure conuoy be brought vnto ſuch place of ſafety as were conuenient. Whereunto the beſieged Turks anſwered, That the Chriſtians had now fiue weeks lien at the ſiege, and muſt yet lie three weeks longer: and that whereas of late C ſome few of their friends came to haue relieued them, and had failed therein, there was yet an hundred thouſand moe to come after them, who if they ſhould not be able to performe that they came for, yet that they would not for that deliuer or forſake the City, before they were ready to be drawne out of it by the heeles, and that yet they would then take three daies to reſolue thereupon.

Now had the Chriſtians with long and continuall batterie ſore beaten both the vpper and the lower towne, which battery they now maintained with greater fury than at any time from the beginning of the ſiege, & within the city their wants increaſed daily, hauing nothing left to liue vpon but a little wheat and barley, with ſome horſe fleſh: to whom thus diſtreſſed, the Lord Palfi by the commandement of the County (to try what confidence they yet had in D themſelues) the ninth of Auguſt ſent two Gentlemen to the city, to do a meſſage from him to the Gouernor. Who aduertiſed therof, being a very aged and courteous man, accompanied with the Aga of the Ianizaries, came to the wals to heare what they had to ſay; where one of the ſaid Gentlemen in few words deliuered him this ſhort meſſage.

My moſt gratious Lord the Lord Palfi, moſt worthy Gouernor greeteth thee well, and knowing thee to be a Captaine both valiant and wiſe, and one that hath alwaies courteouſly vſed ſuch as haue fallen into thine hands, hath compaſſion of thy deſperate eſtate: and therefore, whereas thou art to looke or hope for nothing elſe but preſent death and deſtruction, he as thy neighbor and a louer of thy vertues, aduiſeth and exhorteth thee, if thou wilt ſaue thy ſelfe and thine from moſt vndoubted and imminent death and other confuſion, without delay to deliuer vp this city, which thou canſt not longer holde.

The meſſage ſent by the lord Palfi to the Gouernor of Strigonium.

E Vnto whom the old Gouernour thus without any countenance anſwered.

Thy ſpeech my friend, and thy Maſters aduice are vnto me both vaine. Tell the Lord Palfi thy maſter, that I cannot pleaſure him with the leaſt ſtone in this city. One foot I haue already in the graue, and will with honour carry theſe my gray haires into the ſame; and am yet comforted with a moſt certaine and vndoubted hope, that my moſt dread and mighty Soueraigne, and my Lord Sinan Baſſa will not forſake me: yea and that if they ſhould write vnto me, that they could find no meanes or way to relieue me (which I am ſure they will not) yet would I well, and at leiſure conſider, whether it were fit for me to deliuer vp this city or not; ſeeing that of the defence thereof, dependeth all mine honour and credit. Beſides that, what reward they haue on both ſides, that ſo eaſily deliuer ouer the cities they haue in charge, all the world doth ſee.

The reſolute anſwer of the old Gouernor, to the meſſage ſent him by Palfi.

F With this anſwer he ſent them away. All this while the Aga of the Ianizaries ſtanding by, ſpoke not one word, but ſighing in ſilence and grinding his teeth, declared by his countenance his indignation and inward griefe.

In the mid way betweene Buda and Strigonium, in the middeſt of the riuer of Danubius lieth lieth a little Iſland called Vizze, wherin many rich Clothiers dwelt: this Iſland the Hungarian Heidons ſpoiled, and in returning thence met with 24 wagons laden with Corne, going to Buda, which they took, with 28 priſoners which they brought into the camp. The lower towne being with long and continual battery made ſaultable, was by the Chriſtians the thirteenth of Auguſt, in three diuers places at once aſſaulted. The Bauarians were by lot to giue the firſt charge; who in the performing therof beginning to faint (for that they were notably repulſed by the Turks) but ſeconded by them of Reitnaw and Sueuia, pluckt down a great palliſado, filled the ditches, remoued whatſoeuer ſtood in their way, and ſo long fought with the Turks, that by the comming in of the Marqueſſe of Burgawe with ſixe enſignes of freſh men, they preuailed vpon the Enemy, and ſo altogether brake into the Towne. In the middeſt of this dangerous fight was the Marqueſſe himſelfe, who both with his preſence and cheerefull ſpeech ſo incouraged his ſouldiers, that they as men fearing no perill, ran headlong into all danger, vntill they had entered the Towne. There might a man haue heard a miſerable cry, eſpecially of women and children thorowout the City; when as the Chriſtians breaking in on euery ſide ſlew whomſoeuer came in their way, without reſpect of age or ſexe, ſparing neither women great with child, neither the little children hanging at their mothers breſts. Yet did not all that were entred ſo much attend the preſent execution, as ſome of them did the ſpoile and prey; and eſpecially the Hungarians, vnto whom all was good booty, euen the very hinges of the doors and windows: wherby many eſcaped into the caſtle and vpper towne, with the Baſſa and Alis Beg the old Gouernor. The Chriſtians had not many houres poſſeſſed the town, but that diuers fires began to break out at diuers places, but by what meanes was not at the firſt known. At laſt it was found out, that the Turks doubting the loſſe of the town, had before where they thought beſt left gunpouder, which taking fire by matches left burning for that purpoſe, ſhould at a certaine time ſet all on fire. By which meanes many moſt horrible fires were raiſed in the Towne, which conſumed many goodly buildings, and other things which might haue ſtood the Chriſtians in great ſtead, and could hardly be in a day or two quenched.

The low town taken by the Chriſtians.

This ſo joyfull a victory ſaw not hee, by whoſe good direction next vnder God it was gained, the worthy County: for he a few daies before being fallen ſick of a feuer, taken by drinking too much cold drink in his heat, with immoderat paines taken in the late battell, and ſo afterwards falling into a great flix with a feuer, was by the counſell of his phyſitians (for the better recouering of his health) remoued to Comara, as a place of more quietnes: hauing before his departure ſent for the Archduke to come into the towne, and for Blankenſtein into Bauaria to ſupply his own room. But his diſeaſe ſtill increaſing, became at laſt deſperat, ſo that the Phyſitians themſelues now diſpaired of his health. Yet lying thus drawing towards his end, he almoſt euery hour inquired how the Army did, and whether the City were yet taken, or what hope there was of the taking thereof. But when it was told him a little before his death, That the lower town was won, hee thereat very greatly reioiced, and the next day being the fourteenth of Auguſt, towards night quietly departed this world, to the great loſſe of the Chriſtian commonweal, and the exceeding griefe of the whole army. A man euen from his childehood brought vp in arms, of ſtature great, but of courage greater, & painful aboue meaſure, not the leaſt cauſe of his vntimely death. All the time of this ſiege hee tooke little reſt either by day or night, ſcarce ſo much as to lie down vpon his bed in two or three nights together. The little meat he did eat, for moſt part he ate in ſtanding or walking, yea ſometimes on horſe-back: he was a moſt ſeuere obſeruer of martial diſcipline, which cauſed him to be of his ſoldiers both beloued and feared. His bowels were with due ſolemnity buried at Comara where he died: but his body was brought back again to Luxemburg, there to be honorably interred with his Anceſtors.

About this time Theodore the great Duke of Muſcouia hearing of the wars betweene the Emperor and the Turk, ſent two Embaſſadors with letters & preſents to the Emperor: which Embaſſadours comming to Prague the 16 of Auguſt, accompanied with 250 horſe, were by the Emperors appointment honorably receiued and entertained. And afterwards hauing audience, firſt deliuered the Letters of credence from the great Duke, reported to haue beene of this purport.

The great duke his Letters to the Emperor.

A Your Maieſty hath ſent vnto vs your Embaſſador Nicolas Warkotſie, requeſting our brotherly aid againſt the hereditary enemy of all Chriſtianitie, the Turkiſh Sultan. Wherfore we alſo deſiring to liue with you our dear and welbeloued brother, in all perpetuall amity and friendſhip, ſend vnto you by our faithfull Counſellor and ſeruant, Michael Iwanowitze, and Iohn Sohnie, aid out of our treaſurie againſt the ſaid enemy. Vnto whom wee haue alſo giuen other things in charge to be propounded to your Majeſty, requeſting you to giue vnto them in all things full credit.

Giuen in the great Court of our power at Muſco, An. Mundi 7103. and from Chriſts natiuity 1595. in the moneth of April.

B What things in particular theſe Embaſſadors were ſent for was not commonly known, but among others it is ſaid, That the Muſcovit requeſted the Emperor to ſend an Embaſſador to the Perſian king, to draw him alſo into the league with them againſt the Turk: which Embaſſador ſhould firſt go into Muſcovie, and that way paſſe into Perſia. The preſents which the great Duke ſent the Emperor, were 150000 florins of gold, great ſtore of moſt rich furres and pretious perfumes deemed to be of exceeding value, two white Falcons, and three Leopards aliue. Iwanowitze the Embaſſador himſelf preſented vnto the Emperor of himſelfe, certaine rich Turky, Perſian, and Babylonian hangings & carpets, certain timbers of ſables, with other rich furres as pretious as ſables, ſo many as eight porters could hardly carry. Theſe Embaſſadors tarried at Prague vntil the 27 of December, and then taking their leaue, returned with C the Emperors anſwer to the Duke.

The gouernour of Strigonium ſlain.

But to return again to Strigonium: The Chriſtians now poſſeſſed of the lower town, bent all their battery vpon the higher town, where it fortuned the 14 of Auguſt, That the old Gouernor Alu Beg, whilſt he was carefully walking from place to place, to ſee where moſt danger was, had his arm ſtruck off with a great ſhot, of which hurt he preſently died. He was a man of great grauity, about 80 years old, and had of long time notably both gouerned and defended that famous city, the loſſe wherof was like enough to haue bin vnto him greater grief than was the loſſe of his life there. Much about the ſame time alſo died the Aga of the Ianizaries, beeing before mortally wounded. Both the chief commanders thus ſlain, the Ianizaries with the other ſoldiers and citiſens made choice of the Baſſa of Natolia (who as is afore ſaid, eſcaped D out of the late battel into the city) for their gouernor; who with heauy cheer tooke vpon him that forlorn charge. The Chriſtians not ignorant of the death of theſe two worthy men, in whoſe great and approued valor they ſuppoſed the chiefe defence of the City to haue reſted, were in good hope that now the reſt would more readily hearken to ſome good compoſition: and therfore ſent a meſſenger to demand, if they would yet whilſt there were ſome mercy left yeeld the city. Who though they had loſt their chief Commanders, with the greateſt part of their garriſon, and were in great wants both of victuals and all things els neceſſary for their defence; yet their anſwer was in few words, That they would hold it out euen to the laſt man. The greateſt cauſe of which their obſtinate reſolution was the ſtreight charge the Baſſa of Buda had giuen them for the defence thereof: beſides that, they accounted the City holy, as E won by their magnificent Emperor Solyman, whom the Turkes generally had in a deuout remembrance, and therfore thought it great impiety to deliuer it vp vnto the Chriſtians. The next day after came Matthias the Archduke into the campe; who after he had wel viewed the whole army, and the maner of the ſiege, he called together into his tent the chiefe Commanders, namely the Marquis of Burgaw his couſin, Iohn de Medices the Florentine, and the Lord Palſi the Hungarian, to conſult with them, what were further to be don for the winning of the city. Shortly after, he commanded the city to bee at once in two places aſſaulted: which was by the Germans and Wallons couragiouſly performed; but ſuch was the valor of the defendants, that when the Chriſtians had don what they could, they were glad at laſt to giue ouer the aſſault, & with loſſe to retyre. About this time came the Duke of Mantua, with the three F Counties his brethren to the ſiege; and now the Turks began again to draw together neer to Buda, there to make head for the relief of Strigonium, & to be reuenged of the loſſe they had there before receiued. Whereof the Archduke hauing intelligence, ſent out againſt them 8000 choſen ſoldiers out of the campe, who ſuddenly ſetting vpon the Turks in their campe, before Sun riſing, made a great ſlaughter among them, and tooke certain priſoners, of whom the Sanzack of Copan was one; and ſo with victory returned again vnto the ſiege.

The beſieged Turks in Strigonium vnderſtanding of this ouerthrow of their friends, from G whom they expected moſt ſpeedy reliefe, and beſides the terror of the continuall battery, and the ſtill feared aſſaults, pinched alſo with extream wants of all things, began now to faint.
Wherfore the Baſſa and the other captains, ouercome with the aforeſaid difficulties, and the general outcry of the fearfull people, reſolued with one conſent to come now to parle, & vp-on reaſonable conditions to yeeld vp the city. Wherupon a flag of truce was ſet vp, and parle craued: which granted, the Archduke after Sun ſet came into the lower towne, where nine of the Turkes attended his comming; who entring into parley, required that they might vnder ſafe conuoy with bag and baggage depart, and ſo leaue him the city: which the Arch-Duke would not by any means agree vnto. At length with much intreaty they obtained, That they H might vpon the ſame conditions depart, that the Chriſtians did at Rab, with their ſcimiters by their ſides, and ſo much of their goods as they could carry vpon their backs, to ſuch ſhips as were to be appointed for their cariage to Buda. For performance wherof hoſtages were on both ſides giuen; and ſo the next day, being the ſecond of September, they began to come out of the city, moe in number than either the priſoners taken in the time of the ſiege had confeſ-ſed, or the Chriſtians had thought. Thirty ſhips were appointed for conueying of them down the riuer to Buda; which not ſufficing, many of them tarried in the City vntil the next day, at which time the Baſſa with the ſick and wounded ſailed to Buda, the priſoners and pledges on both ſides beeing before faithfully deliuered. Thus by the goodnes of God, and the good conduct of a few valiant Chriſtians, was Strigonium the metropolitical city of Hungary, af- I ter it had 52 years groaned vnder the miſerable yoke of the Turkiſh ſeruitude, again reſtored to the Chriſtian commonweal; which the Chriſtians forthwith repaired and new fortified, as was thought beſt for the defence therof againſt the enemy. All which being done, about the midſt of this month the Archduke ſent 18000 to beſiege Vicegrade, otherwiſe called Plindenburg, a ſtrong caſtle of the Turks vpon the riuer betwixt Strigonium and Buda: which ca-ſtle they tooke. Which when they of Buda vnderſtood, they were ſtricken with ſuch a fear, that many of the better ſort were ready to forſake the city; inſomuch that the Baſſa to ſtay their flight, was glad to command the gates of the city to be ſhut vpon them, and no man ſuffered to paſſe out. This good ſucces of the Chriſtians in theſe wars cauſed great reioycing in moſt parts of Chriſtendom. K

Strigonium yeelded to the Chriſtians.

Vicegrade taken by the Chriſtians.

All the while the Chriſtians were thus buſied at the ſiege of Strigonium, the Tranſyluanian prince was not idle, but in diuers places did the Turks exceeding much harme; ſo that now his name began to be dreadful vnto them. It fortuned the ſame day that Count Mansfelt departed at Comara, that the Prince at Alba-Iulia with great ſolemnity maried Maria Chriſtina the daughter of the late Archduke Charles, ſon to the Emperor Ferdinand; her other ſiſter Anna being before maried to Sigiſmund King of Polonia. For ſo it was agreed for the more aſſurance of the league betwixt the Emperour and him, That hee ſhould take his wife out of the houſe of Auſtria, which he now did. Of this ſolemnity the Turks his euil neighbours hauing intelligence, aſſembling to the number of 30000 or more, thought as vnwelcome gueſts to haue come vnbidden or vnlooked for thereunto; but the vigilant prince vnderſtanding of L their comming, prouided for their entertainment accordingly, and ſetting his pleaſures for a while apart, and comming vpon them when they leaſt looked for him, in a great battell ouer-threw them and ſlew moſt part of them, carrying away with him as a triumphant Victor the whole ſpoil of his enemies.

About the ſame time the Tranſylvanians alſo beſieged Fagiat, a town holden by the Turks not far from Temeſware; where after they had lien twelue daies, they of the town diſpairing to be able long to hold out, came to parley, and couenanting to depart with bag and baggage began to go out of the town. But in their departure, vnderſtanding that the Baſſa of Temeſ-ware, with the Sanzacks of Lippa and Ienne were comming to their reliefe, they that were yet in the town began to find delaies, and they that were already gon out began to return. Wher- M with the Tranſylvanians much mooued, by plaine force entred the town, and put them all to the ſword; and afterward turning vpon the Baſſa, who with ten thouſand Turkes and certaine field pieces was comming to haue relieued the Town, had with them a cruell battell; wherein moſt part of the Turks fell, with ſmall loſſe vnto the Tranſylvanians: who ſo eagerly purſued

A ſued the victory, that the Baſſa himſelfe had much adoe with 500 others to eſcape. The two Sanzacks with diuers others of good place were taken and ſent priſoners to the Prince. Not long after, about the later end of Auguſt the Tranſylvanians beſieged Lippa, a famous city of Hungary ſtanding vpon the riuer Maracz, not far from Temeſwan which the Turks being not able longer to hold, fled into the caſtle, where finding themſelues in no great ſafety, after three daies ſiege they came to parley, and ſo yeelded, vpon condition that they might in ſafety depart with ſo much of their goods as they could themſelues carry. About which time alſo the Baſſa of Boſna with 10000 Turks and Tartars went forth to haue again recouered Babotſca, a frontier town before taken by the Chriſtians: which the Stirians and the reſt of the Chriſtians dwelling therabouts, between the two riuers of Sauus and Drauus vnderſtanding, conducted by the Lords Herbenſtein, Lencowitz, and Eckenberg, that had the charge of thoſe frontiers, B ouertook the ſaid Turks and Tartars neer vnto Babotſca, fought with them, and in plain field ouerthrew them.

Lippa taken by the Chriſtians.

Mahomet not a little grieued with the good ſucces of the Chriſtians in euery part of Hungary, and aboue meaſure offended with Ferat Baſſa his General, through whoſe negligence all or at leaſtwiſe moſt part of this had hapned (as hee was by the enuy of Sinan Baſſa perſuaded) ſent for him home, and in his place ſent out Sinan. Of which the great Sultans diſpleaſure Ferat was not ignorant, as forewarned therof by her that beſt knew, euen the Sultans mother, and aduiſed not to come in ſight vntil his peace were made. Who neuertheles truſting to his own innocencie (the comfortable, but moſt dangerous and weake ſtay of the Great) and doubting C not to anſwer whatſoeuer Sinan ſhould be able to charge him with, came to the Court, where he was by Mahomets commandement ſhortly after ſtrangled; and his goods to the value of 500000 ducats confiſcated.

Ferat Baſſa ſtrangled.

Among all the dangerous enemies of the Chriſtian commonweale was none at this time more cruel than was Sinan, an Epirot born, a fiſhers ſonne, of a rough and vnciuill diſpoſition, now about 83 years old, euen from his youth brought vp in the Warres, and yet (as his motto was) breathing nothing but Bloud and war. He had many times fortunatly led the huge armies of the Turkiſh Emperors, Solyman, Selymus, and Amurath, and is now ſent by the great Sultan Mahomet, as the fitteſt man to reduce the late reuolted countries of Tranſylvania, Valachia, and Moldavia, to their former thraldom, which he before promiſed vnto Mahomet, vpon perill of D his head to doe. Hee hauing raiſed a right puiſſant army, by a bridge made of boats (after a months labor ſpent therin) paſſed ouer the great riuer of Danubius into Valachia. Of whoſe comming the Tranſylvanians with the Valachians and Moldavians hauing knowledge, had before ſo ſhut vp the paſſages of the country, as that he could not without much danger haue far entred; and were alſo ready with their vnited forces at once at his firſt enterance to giue him battel. Which he not refuſing, there began a moſt mortall and cruel fight, with much bloudſhed on both ſides. Thrice were the Tranſylvanians inforced to retyre, but ſtil relieued with new ſupplies, and knowing that they then carried in their armes the welfare of their whole country, came on afreſh again, and as hardly charged the Turks, as they had bin by them charged. Thus with doubtfull fortune and great ſlaughter was the battel maintained from morning E vntil night, victory with doubtfull wings howering now ouer the one ſide, now ouer the other. Vntill that at length the Turks ouercome by their valour, their battels being quite diſordered and broken, were now glad to ſeeke to ſaue themſelues by flight. In this battel (being fought the eleuenth of September) beſides many thouſands of the common ſouldiers, were ſlain alſo diuers of great account amongſt the Turks, and amongſt the reſt, Haider Baſſa, a man of them much regarded, was found dead euen in the ſame place where the battell was fought. Sinan himſelfe in making too much haſte to get ouer the bridge, fell into the deepe mud, and in that general confuſion of his army was like enough there to haue periſhed; but as the common prouerb goeth, Seldome dies the Diuel dead in a dike, the old Viliard was with much ado drawn out by them of his gard, and ſo eſcaped that miſchief. Neuertheleſſe the dan- F ger was ſo great, that for certain daies it was commonly reported that he was there drowned, moſt of his owne people not as yet certainly knowing what was become of him. All the ſpoil of the Turks became a prey vnto the Chriſtians, as did alſo the great ordnance, and many of their enſignes: amongſt which was one green one which they accounted Religious, as ſacred

to the prophet Mahomet; wherunto they in time of their greateſt diſtres fly as to their laſt refuge. There was taken alſo all their tents, with great aboundance of victuals and other Warlike prouiſion.

The old Baſſa thus ouerthrown, ful of grief, and euen made for deſpight, poſted himſelf in all haſt to the court; thinking it better himſelfe to make the beſt of that which was indeed naught, than to haue it made worſe than naught by the enuious report of others, and withal to fil the great Sultans mind with deſire of reuenge, which no man ſo much longed after as himſelf. Wherin he ſo diſcreetly vſed the matter, as that the late loſſe was eaſily paſt ouer, as receiued by the common chance of War, or any other occaſion elſe whatſoeuer, rather than by any default of his; and new Commiſſion giuen him for the raiſing of another Army for the ſubduing of the late reuolted countries. In the mean time, to ſhew his hatred vnto the Chriſtians, and to pleaſe the eies of them of the court with the nouelty of the ſight, he cauſed an hundred & twelue Chriſtian captiues whom he had in priſon at Belgrade, to be brought like beaſt in chains to Conſtantinople, and ſo being led thorow the principal ſtreets of the City, to the vain contentment of the citiſens, to brought to the court gate for the Sultan to look vpon, and the Courtiers to deride. From whence they were after many vnſpeakable indignities conueyed to moſt miſerable and loathſome priſons, there to be fed with the bread of tribulation.

The Turkes ouerthrown in Croatia.

About this time the Turks vnder the command of the Baſſa of Boſna, to the number of almoſt 20000 made a road into Croatia; where they were by the Chriſtians vnder the leading of the Lord Eckenberg and Leucowitz ouerthrown and almoſt all ſlain; the Chriſtians following the chace euen into the Turks frontiers, burnt 15 of their villages, and took the Caſtle of Varuiuar. Immediatly after, their forces increaſing by the comming in of the Lord Herbenſtein gouernor of Valeria and Windiſmarch, and certain other troups of horſemen out of Carinthia and the countries therabouts, they returned the 13 of September to beſiege Petrinia, otherwiſe called Petrowina; which becauſe they were in hope to take by aſſault, they euen at their firſt comming couragiouſly aſſailed. But after two hours hard fight, finding both greater reſiſtance and more difficultie than they had before ſuppoſed, and that without great ordnance (which could not in ſhort time be got ouer the mountaines) there was no good to bee don, they were glad to giue ouer the aſſault, and with ſuch loſſe as they had receiued, to return to Siſeg, there to conſult further of the matter. But the ſame night a fugitiue horſman fled from the enemy, came to the camp, and told the Chriſtians, That Ruſtan Beg gouernor of Petrinia was in the late aſſault wounded in the breſt with a ſmal ſhot and dead; & that the Turks in the town diſcouraged with his death, and the late ouerthrow of their friends in Croatia, would vpon the firſt ſight of them abandon the town, if they would but again return to beſiege it. Vpon which good hope the Chriſtians preſently riſe, and ſet forward again toward Petrinia; which the Turks, hearing of their comming, had before, as the ſoldier reported, for fear abandoned. So the Chriſtians without reſiſtance entring the town, found therin ſome pillage, but better ſtore of ſhot and pouder: and preſently ſending for certain troups of horſemen to purſue the flying Turks, took diuers of them, and amongſt the reſt the late gouernors lieutenant, whom they brought back into the town. Thus was Petrinia again recouered from the Turks, to the great quiet and ſafety of all that ſide of the country.

Petrinia taken by the Chriſtians.

Sigiſmund the Tranſyluanian prince not ignorant with what an enemy he had to do, either of the malice of old Sinan, (who he knew would not be long before he returned) or yet of the Polonians ſecret practiſe for the drawing of the country of Moldauia from him; ſought now by all means (as it ſtood him vpon) to make himſelfe as ſtrong as he could againſt ſo many ſtormes ariſing. It fortuned that euen at the ſame time the Zacullians (better knowne by the name of Siculi) in former time a free people, but as then tributary vnto the Turks, bordering vpon the Northeaſt part of Tranſylvania, now weary of the Turkiſh thraldom, and ſeeing the good ſucces of the Prince, and the late reuolted countries their neighbours, offered vnto the Prince their ſeruice; promiſing of their own charge to maintain forty thouſand men in the field during his Wars with the Turke, and yearly to pay him of euery houſe a Dollar, with a certaine Meaſure of Wheat, Oats, and Barley, after the manner of their own Country; and further, That if God ſhould bleſſe him with a ſon to ſucceed him in his gouernment, euery houſholder

A ſholder ſhould giue vnto him a good fat oxe. For all which ſeruice they craued no more, but that as his ſubiects they might liue vnder his protection; yet ſo, as to bee gouerned by their own antient lawes and cuſtomes. Of which their offer the prince accepting, it was forthwith by them proclaimed in their camp, and all the people ſworn to the performance of the aforeſaid agreement. And hauing at that preſent but 25000 in the field, they without delay ſent out their officers to preſſe vp 15000 moe, for the filling vp of the promiſed number of 40000, wherwith they came to the Prince; who taking a view of his army, found himſelfe to be now 80000 ſtrong, to welcome the Baſſa withall when he ſhould come again into his country.

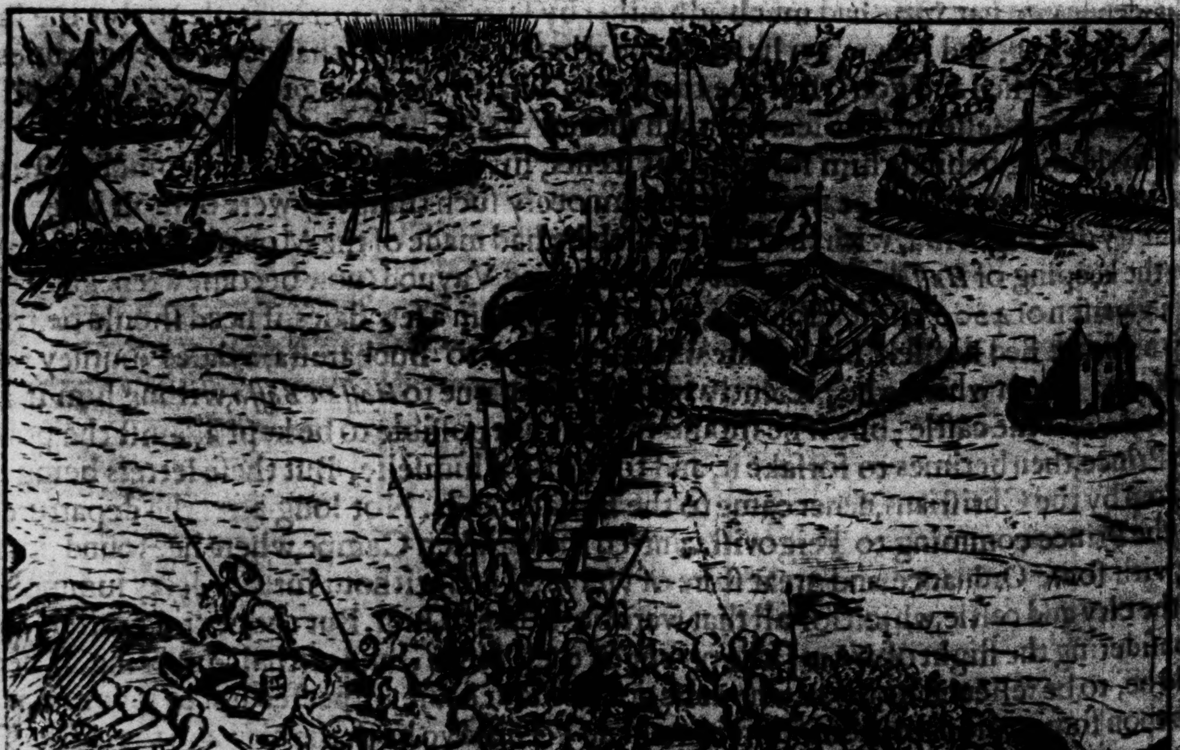
Now had Sinan with great ſpeed raiſed an army of 70000 choice ſoldiers, amongſt whom were many whole bands of the Ianizaries, the ſtrength of the Turkiſh Empire. With which B power, joined vnto the reliques of his other broken forces, he thought himſelf ſtrong enough for the ſubduing of the Prince. Vnto whom alſo afterward came Haſſan Baſſa, ſon to the great Baſſa Muhamet, one of the Turks moſt renowned men of War, and Bogdanus the late expulſed Vayuod of Valachia, with many others of great name. With this Army the old Baſſa by a bridge which he with exceeding charge had made of boats, paſſed ouer the great riuer Danubius at a town called Zorza or Giorgo (with vs S. George) in Valachia, a great way beneath that place where ſomtime the Emperor Trajan built his famous bridge of ſtone, worthily accounted amongſt the rare and wonderfull buildings of the world. From Zorza hee marched to Tergoviſta, (ſomtime the Vayuods chiefe City, but then in the Turks power) where is a notable Monaſterie, which hee conuerted into a Caſtle, fortifying it with deepe trenches and C ſtrong bulwarkes, and good ſtore of great ordnance; purpoſing to make that the ſeat of his war, vntill he had again reſtored thoſe late reuolted countries vnto the Turkiſh empire, which he vpon pain of his head had vndertaken to perform. The Prince both by meſſengers and Letters vnderſtanding of the Baſſa's arriual there, and hauing his army in good readines, ſet forward to meet him and giue him battel. But being come into Valachia, and there incamped, it is reported, That a great Eagle deſcending from an high rocke thereby, called the Kings Rock, and houering ouer the Chriſtian army, flew about the princes tent, and there lighting, was taken and preſented to the Prince, who commanded her to be kept as the preſage of his good fortune, holding on ſtil his way; and the fifteenth of October being come within halfe a daies march of Tergoviſta, he vnderſtood by two Chriſtians lately eſcaped from the Turks, D That two daies before, the Turks hearing of his comming, were ſtrucken with ſuch a general and ſudden feare, that Sinan had much ado either by faire meanes or by foule to ſtay the Ianizaries from flight; and that when he had done what he could, yet that certaine companies of them were quite fled and gon. But the truth was, That Sinan ſeeing the general feare of his Army, and he himſelfe no leſſe fearfull than the reſt; vpon the Princes approach fled with all his Army, leauing behinde him for haſte his Tents, his great Ordnance, with much victualls and other warlike prouiſion; carrying with him onely ſuch things as were of moſt value. As for the city of Tergoviſta, with the caſtle which he had made of the Monaſtery, hee committed to the keeping of Haſſan Baſſa and Bogdanus the late Vayuod (now become a renegat Turk) with a garriſon of 4000 choſen ſoldiers, promiſing within a few daies, if need ſhould be, to reE lieue them, but fled himſelf in all haſte with his Army to Buchareſta, a daies journey from Tergoviſta. From whence he preſently writ backe againe to Haſſan Baſſa, willing him if hee could to defend the caſtle; but if he ſhould think it not poſſible to be kept againſt the power of the Prince, then betimes to forſake it, and to ſhift for himſelfe. But theſe letters being intercepted by the Chriſtians, neuer came to the Baſſa's hands. Not long after the departure of Sinan, the Prince comming to Tergoviſta, entred the forſaken Campe, where hee found many tents, with ſome Ordnance, and great ſtore of victuals; and without further delay ſummoned both the city and caſtle, which for all that were both denied him. But the next day after, Haſſan conſidering the flight of Sinan, the power of the Prince, and withall doubting, if need ſhould be, to be relieued by Sinan, whom he not without cauſe ſuſpected not to loue him, was about vpon ſome reaſonable compoſition to haue yeelded vp both the city and the caſtle. To which the gariſon ſoldiers (being moſt of them Ianizaries) would not in any caſe giue their conſent, but ſtood vpon the defence of the place. Wherfore the prince began furiouſly to batter both the city and the caſtle, and after ſome few hours battery, by aſſault took both, and put to ſword the whole garriſon; only Haſſan Baſſa, as taken with his own hand, he ſpared, and two other Sanzackes. Bogdanus the Renegate was there ſlain among the reſt. The Chriſtians had there a rich prey, beſides 42 great pieces of ordnance, and good ſtore of all manner of warlike prouiſion. Haſſan thus taken, grieuouſly complained, That Sinan had of a milicious purpoſe expoſed him to ſo manifeſt peril, for the grudge he bare vnto his dead father the Viſier Mahumet, vpon whom becauſe he could neuer be reuenged, he now by ſiniſter means had cunningly performed it vpon his ſon: yet he craued of the prince to be wel vſed, offering for his ranſome 100000 Hungarian ducats. Whilſt the Prince yet thus lay at Tergoviſta, came thither 4000 Turks, whom Sinan had before his departure thence ſent forth to ſpoil the country, & to ſeek after prey, thinking to haue there found him ſtil: who now falling into the hands of the Chriſtians, were there all ſlain, and 60000 head of cattell recouered, which theſe Turkes had taken out of Valachia and Moldavia, and ſhould by Sinans appointment haue bin ſent to Conſtantinople. For Valachia and Moldavia do ſo abound with corn and cattel, that they plentifully ſerue the Imperial city of Conſtantinople not only with corn and fleſh, but alſo yearely ſend at leaſt 150 ſhips thither by the blacke ſea, laded with other kind of victuals. Of which ſo great commodities the Turks were now depriued, by the reuolt of the ſaid Countries.

The fruitfulnes of Valachia & Moldavia.

The Prince hauing a ſtrong garriſon in Tergoviſta, ſet forward with his army towards Bucareſta, hoping there to haue found Sinan: but he hearing of the loſſe of Tergoviſta, and thinking himſelf in no good ſafety at Bucareſta, fled thence alſo to Zorza. The prince comming to Bucareſta, found it abandoned by the Turks, & ſo took it without reſiſtance; yet had therin certain field pieces, with good ſtore of ſhot and pouder left there by Sinan. Hauing there ſtaid a while for the maning of the place, hee ſet forward againe towards Zorza, and that with ſuch ſpeed, that he ouertook great numbers of the Turks, whom hee put all to the ſword. So that the fields betwixt Bucareſta & Zorza were in many places couered with the Turks dead bodies. Neuertheles he could not make ſo great haſte, marching ſtil in good order, but that the fearfull Baſſa diſorderly haſting, was about ſome ſix hours or more before come vnto the bridge he had with great charge made ouer the riuer Danubius; the forme whereof you may here ſee.

Bucareſta takē by the Prince.

The Bridge made ouer Danubius by Sinan Baſſa, Anno 1595.



Sinan flieth.

A Ouer the hithermoſt part of which bridge (being in length about a mile) was Sinan with the greateſt part of his Army, before the comming of the Prince, got ouer into an Iſland in the midſt of the riuer, wherin he had at his comming ouer incamped: but doubting now there to ſtay, with all the ſpeed he could got him ouer the other part of the bridge, to the farther ſide of the riuer, with ſo many of his men as in ſo ſhort time poſſibly could: where to ſtay the further purſuit of the Prince, he brake the bridge on that ſide, and ſet fire vpon it; and therby cut off alſo many of his own men that were not as yet come ouer. Whom the Prince incloſing, forced many of them into the riuer, where they periſhed; the reſt flying into the Iſland, were by the Chriſtians fiercely purſuing them, either there ſlaine, or ſeeking by the other part of the bridge to haue got ouer (wherof the farther end was before broken down by Sinan, and the B hither end toward the Iſland now cut off by the Chriſtians) were together with the bridge caried away by the violence of the riuer, and ſo all together periſhed. Others of the Chriſtians in the mean time took the bridge that leadeth to the caſtle of Zorza, which ſtands compaſſed about with an arm of Danubius, and being not very great, was kept by a gariſon of 700 ſelect ſoldiers. Vnto which caſtle the prince preſently laid ſiege (the reſolute ſoldiers being not by any means to be perſuaded to yeeld it vp, but to hold it out euen to the laſt man) and after he had ſore battered it, by plain force took it, and put to the ſword all the garriſon ſouldiers hee could lay hands vpon. About 100 of theſe Turks ſeeing they muſt needs fall into the power of their enemies, deſperatly leapt from the top of the Caſtle into the riuer, where not one of them eſcaped, being all either drowned, or ſlain with ſmall ſhot. In the winning of this caſtle C 250 of the Chriſtians were loſt, and many wounded: but of the Turks and Tartars betweene the eighteenth and the laſt of October, periſhed aboue ſix and twenty thouſand. In this Caſtle were taken thirty ſnine great pieces, with ſuch ſtore of armor and other warlike prouiſion as might haue ſerued for a whole kingdom, and 4000 Chriſtians, beſides women & children, whom Sinan had taken out of Valachia, reſtored to their former liberty. With whome the Prince, after he had ſet all things in order, returned in great triumph to Tergoviſta, and ſo afterwards to his palace at Alba-Iulia, where, as alſo at Claudiopolis and other Cities thorow his dominions, he cauſed publique prayers, with thankeſgiuing to Almighty God to bee deuoutly made for ſo great a victory: as did alſo Michael the Vayuod of Valachia, who in all theſe great wars againſt the Turks was nothing inferior to the Tranſylvanian himſelf.

The Prince returns with victory to Alba-Iulia.

D A greater loſſe than this the Turkiſh Emperor receiued not at land in many years before; being by this ſo happy and victorious a prince, and the reuolt of theſe three countries, depriued of ſo much territory as they had not from the Chriſtians in long time gained. It was by ſome of the better ſort of the Turks that were taken, reported, That Sinan Baſſa ſhould oftentimes ſay, That this yong Tranſylvanian prince had bereft him of all the honor and renowne he had with great trauel got in the courſe of his long life: and that although he had eſcaped his hands, yet that he feared he would be the cauſe for him in theſe his great years, euen in the winding vp of all, to loſe his life together with his goods and honor. Now was the Tranſylvanian princes name (after the ouerthrow of this great Baſſa) become dreadfull to the Turkes, and alſo famous thorow all Chriſtendom: which as it hath filled the ears of many with admiration, E ſo haply may the liuely repreſentation of his feature, by cunning hand ſet forth, feed the longing eies of ſome with delight, and ſerue in better ſtead than the rude deſcription of his perſon.

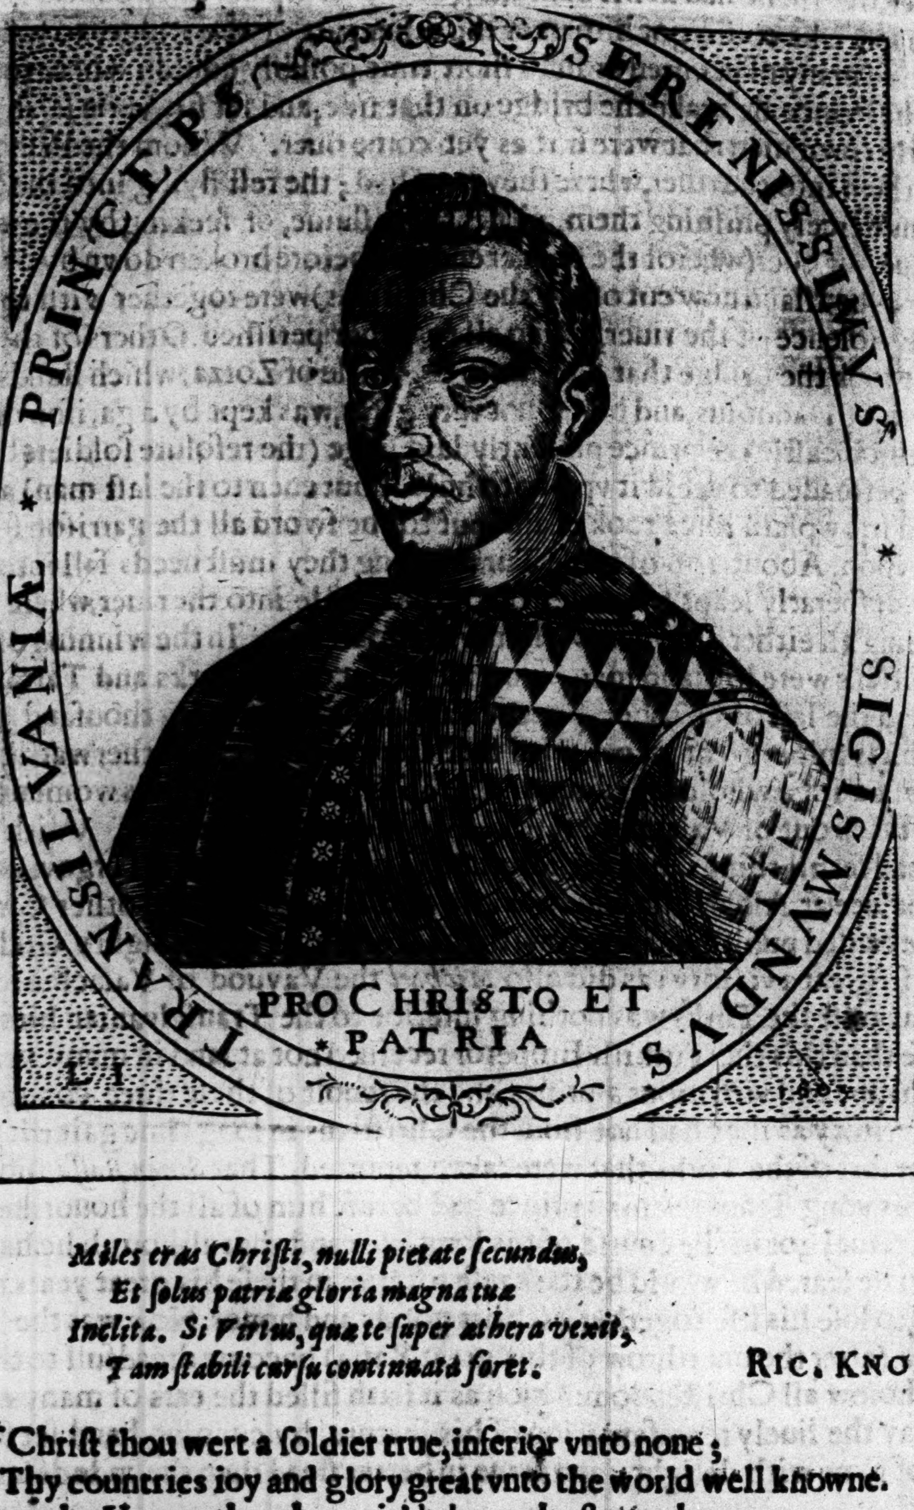
SIGISMVND, Prince of Tranſylvania, Valachia, and Moldavia.



Miles eras Chriſti, nulli pietate ſecundus, Et ſolus patriæ gloria magna tuæ Inclita. Si Virtus, quæ te ſuper æthera vexit, Tam ſtabili curſu continuata foret.

RIC. KNOLLEVS.

Of Chriſt thou wert a ſoldier true, inferior vnto none;
Thy countries ioy and glory great vnto the world well knowne.
If worthy Vertue, that thee rais'd aboue the ſtarry sky,
With ſtedfaſt pace had run the race ſo wel begun by thee.

Jenna yeelded to the Tranſylvanians.

Whilſt this worthy prince was thus buſied in this expedition againſt Sinan, hee cauſed the caſtle of Ienna, ſtanding vpon the highway betweene Temeſware and Giula, to be beſieged by certain of his Captains appointed to that ſeruice; in which caſtle lay one of the Turks Sanzacks with a garriſon of 700 Turks, who much troubled ſuch as paſſed that way. They now brought to ſome extremitie, and terrified with the ſucceſſe of the prince, offered to giue vp the Caſtle, ſo that as ſouldiers with their ſcimiters by their ſides they might in ſafety bee brought to Panoda. Which their offer being accepted of, and they now vpon their way, the Hungarian light horſmen that ſhould haue conducted them, informed that theſe Turks now vnder their charge, had ſecret intelligence with the Turkes in garriſon at Giula and Temeſware, That they ſhould lie in ambuſh for them neer Panoda, and ſo cut them off by the way; M ſet

A ſet vpon theſe Turks whom they ſhould haue conducted, and cut the throats of four hundred of them: and yet ſtill holding on their way, met with theſe Turks that lay in ambuſh for them, whom they after a ſharp skirmiſh ouerthrew, and hauing ſlain a great number of them, put the reſt to flight. By the taking of Ienna the waies therabout were quieted, eſpecially for them of Waraden. The Sanzack of Ienna reported, That Mahomet had but a little before ſent word vnto his Baſſa's and Sanzacks in Hungary, That ſuch caſtles and towns as they thought were not to be defended againſt the Chriſtians, they ſhould betimes as occaſion ſerued yeeld them vp, or forſake them; ſo to ſpare the needleſſe loſſe of his good ſoldiers, of whom he had with ſo many towns and ſtrong holds loſt no ſmall number this year in Hungary. Ienna thus taken, diuers of the richer ſort in Temeſware fearing to be euen preſently beſieged; ſent their wiues B and children with their treaſure and ſuch other things as they made moſt reckoning of, out of the city in wagons, to be conueyed vnto places of more ſafety: of which Wagons ſeuenty were by the Chriſtians lying thereabout in garriſon, intercepted, and in them an exceeding rich booty.

Mahomet hauing this year fully purpoſed the vtter ruine of the Tranſylvanian prince, and the reducing of the countries of Tranſylvania, Moldavia, and Valachia vnto his obeiſance by the great Baſſa Sinan; had for the better effecting thereof before prouided, That the Crim-Tartar (ready ſtil at his call) ſhould with his own people (whereof he hath great ſtore) & certain bands of the Turks, at the ſame time inuade Moldauia; & poſſeſſing himſelf of this countrey, to place one Sidreake Vayuod, in ſtead of Stephen placed by the Prince, and to people the C country with his Tartars, in reward of his good ſeruice, as he ſaid, but indeed to haue them always neer at hand to do his commandements in Hungary, Polonia, Tranſiluania, or the other countries of the Chriſtians thereunto adioining. The Tartar according to his appointment, came with 70000 Tartars, accompanied with their wiues and children, to haue planted themſelues in the countrey, at the very ſame time that Sinan came to Tergouiſta. But being come vpon the frontiers of Moldauia, to haue put in execution what he was by Mahomet commanded, he found there Zamoſchie the great Chancellour of Polonia ready with a ſtrong army to oppoſe himſelfe againſt him, and to ſtay his farther paſſage. Whereupon ſome light skirmiſhes paſſed betweene the Tartars and the Polonians: where the Tartars were ſtill put to the worſe with the loſſe of 3000 of their men. The Tartar Cham with Sidriake the Vayuod D appointed by the Turke, finding themſelues, though in number moe, yet in ſtrength inferior vnto the Polonian, and that without his good leaue he could not paſſe; ſent vnto the Chancellor to excuſe that was alreadie paſt, as done without their conſent, by the inſolencie of the ſouldiers; and to tell him, That their comming was not to fight with him, as hauing expreſſe commandement from the great Sultan Mahomet, in no caſe to diſturbe the league betwixt him and the Polonians, but quietly to paſſe by their frontiers into Moldauia, and there to place Sidriake Vayuod his tributarie, in ſtead of Stephen that now vſurped the place by the appointment of the Tranſiluanian, which that they might do, they craued his leaue as friends to paſſe. Wherunto the Chancellor anſwered, That he was come thither by the commandement of the king, to defend thoſe countries from the inuaſion of ſuch as had in them no right: & that there had E of long time bin an antient league betwixt the Polonian Kings and Turkiſh Emperours, vpon certaine conditions, which he would for his part keep inuiolate, with the fauor of the Turkiſh Emperor; yet ſo, as that the kingdome of Polonia tooke no harm therby, and that they might quietly liue by him as their good neighbour; which league he proteſted not to haue been by him, but by them infringed: as for to giue them paſſage, he ſaid he could not. Meſſengers paſſing thus to and fro, and ſome parley had, at laſt certaine articles were agreed vpon, to the reaſonable contentement both of the Tartar and of the Chancellor (though not of Sidriake, diſappointed thereby of his Vayuodſhip) as alſo of the Turkiſh Sultan, whoſe pleaſure they both ſeem'd to haue in ſpecial regard. Hereupon the Tartar with his multitude preſently returned, leauing the Chancellor to his owne deſigns. Now was it commonly thought, that the F Chancellor had don the Tranſiluanian Prince great ſeruice by keeping out of the Tartars, & much honour was by many that ſaw leaſt ſpoken of him therefore. But far was it from his thought to do the Tranſiluanian therin any ſuch good, at whoſe glory he enuied, and had with the cardinal and his brother, the princes vncles (but moſt deadly enemies) ſecretly conſpired, ſomuch as in them was, his vtter ruine and ouerthrow: wiſhing thoſe Countries rather in the ſubiection of the Turke, than to ſee them ſo honorably at liberty, gouerned by the Prince: ſuch is the force of malitious enuy, the inſeparable companion of worthy vertue. Which the Chancellor (otherwiſe a man of great fame and honour) began now openly to poure forth: for preſently after the departure of the Tartars, hee with all his power paſſing ouer the riuer Nieſter or Tyros, into Moldauia, euen at ſuch time as the prince was going againſt Sinan at Tergouiſta, firſt ſeiſed on the caſtle of Chotijm, which he furniſhed with his owne ſouldiers; and from thence marching to Zorona, the metropoliticall City of that Prouince, and ſeat of the Vayuod, had it yeelded vnto him; and ſo proceeding on, had in ſhort time almoſt the whole countrey deliuered to him; Stephen the Vayuod placed by the Prince, flying from place to place before him, from whom he leſt feared any ſuch thing, hauing made account of no other enemies but of the Turks and Tartars. Stephen the Vayuod thus driuen out, and the Chancellor poſſeſſed of the country, he preſently placed one Hieremias Vayuod in ſtead of Stephen, to hold that honour of the Polonian King as his Soueraigne. Yet neuertheleſſe to ſatisfie the Turk, he ſent a meſſenger to Sinan Baſſa, then but newly come to Tergouiſta, requeſting him not to take it in euill part, that he had entred into Moldauia, and there placed a new Vayuod, but in the name of the great Sultan Mahomet to confirm this his doing, and the Vayuod by him placed; promiſing the country of Moldauia to remaine tributarie ſtill vnto the Sultan, and that this new Vayuod ſhould forthwith pay vnto him what tribute was behind, and from thenceforth a far greater tribute yerely than had the country of Moldauia before. Whereunto the hauty Baſſa (then fearing nothing leſſe than that which immediatly after happened, to be driuen out of thoſe countries by the Prince) proudly anſwered, That it was not the great Sultans mind, that the Polonians ſhould at all inuade Moldauia, for that beſide he could without their helpe reduce thoſe countries to his obedience, he had giuen that countrey to the Tartar, in reward of his good ſeruice alreadie don in Hungary and other places; whoſe ſubiects the Tartars would ere long be ready with their wiues and children to take poſſeſſion of. Neuertheleſ the Chancellor proceeded to defend the new Vayuod by him placed: which was no great matter for him to do, Sinan the Turks champion (as is before declared) being preſently after ouerthrown, and driuen quite out of thoſe countries by the Prince. Who if he had not then gained the victory, the Chancellor had not now holden Moldauia, but the Turk, whoſe quarell he ſeemed rather to fauor than the princes. The Chancellor to colour this his inuaſion, pretended that the countrey of Moldauia did of antient right belong vnto the kingdome of Polonia: which the Tranſyluanians tooke to be no other but meere and open wrong. This ſuppoſed title, ſuch as it was, the Chancellor had ſo faſhioned out vnto the King and States of that Kingdome, that they referred it to his diſcretion to inuade the countrey, and remouing the Vayuod placed by the Prince, to place another in his ſtead: & the rather to perſuade them, labored by many forced reaſons to ſhew the power of the Tranſiluanian Prince to be ſo far inferior vnto the Turks, that it was to be feared he ſhould at length be thruſt out of all his dominions, and ſo they together with Moldauia become ſubiect to the Turks: which if it ſhould ſo come to paſſe, then ſhould the Polonians haue an vntruſty and troubleſome neighbour. And that therfore it were better that Moldauia were poſſeſſed by them that were better able to defend it than was hee, that ſo the Turke might be kept farther off from Polonia. Which occaſion he ſaid was not longer to be delaied, but now betime to be laid hold vpon: perſuading himſelfe to find ſuch grace and fauor with the Turkiſh Emperor, as that he ſhould be therwith right well contented: which was like enough for a time to be, for that the Tranſiluanian ſhould therby be much weakned. By theſe and ſuch like reaſons, framed to ſerue his owne gaine, the Chancellor ſo preuailed with the King and the States of the kingdom, that he receiued (as I ſaid) ful authoritie to proceed in the matter as he did, and as is before declared, to the great trouble of the Prince, and benefit of the Turk: the late choſen Vayuod not long after opening a way in three places for the Tartars into Tranſiluania, one by the country of Siculi, another by the way that leadeth to Alba Iulia, and the third by Valachia.

The reaſons pretended by the Chancellor for the inuaſion of Moldauia.

The late choſen Vayuod opens three ways vnto the Turks & Tartars into Tranſyluania.

The Tranſyluanian prince ſeeing the country of Moldauia by this practiſe of the Chancellor thus taken from him & diſſeuered from the other ioined prouinces, to the great weakning of his eſtate, after the flight of Sinan, ſent certain companies both of horſe & foot, to Stephen the late Vayuod, but now driuen out by the Polonians, to proue if haply he could by that meanes driue out the Polonian againe, and recouer his former dignitie. With this aid ſent from

A from the Prince and others that fauoured his quarrel, he joined a bloudy battel with the Polonians: but being therin by them ouercome and taken, and for a ſpace kept (as the prince feared, to haue bin deliuered to the Turks) he was by them, as is reported, cruelly afterward put to death.

This foul dealing of the Polonian in Moldavia much grieued many good Chriſtians, as tending to the general hurt of the Chriſtian commonweal. For which cauſe the Emperor by his Embaſſadors ſent for that purpoſe to the Polonian king, ſought to perſuade him to deſiſt from ſuch inuaſion of the Tranſylvanian Prince by his Chancellour, as not ſtanding with his honor; and that ſome good reconciliation might be made betwixt the prince and the cardinal Bator & his brother the Princes vncles, authors of all theſe troubls. To which purpoſe alſo the B Pope ſent a meſſenger with like inſtructions and letters to the king, perſuading him not ſo to proſecute his wars againſt the prince, but to turn his thoughts vnto a more peaceable & Chriſtian-like courſe, eſpecially with him whom he was ſo neer linked to in mariage. To the like effect he writ alſo to Cardinal Bator; and after many graue admonitions, peremptorily cited him to Rome. But foraſmuch as the proceedings of the Polonian againſt the prince are more plainly to be gathered by the Popes letters vnto the King, it ſhall not I hope be miſtaken, if I here ſet them down, as I find them by others reported.

Pope Clement the eighth; To our beſt beloued Sonne in Chriſt,

C Sigiſmund by the grace of God, King of Polonia, with the Benediction Apoſtolicall ſendeth greeting.

The Popes letters vnto the Polonian King.

BY how much greater affection of fatherly loue we embrace your Maieſtie in the Lord, ſo much the more feruently wee wiſh all your actions to bee adorned with the greateſt commendation of wiſdome both before God and men. Wherof it proceedeth, that we are ſo much the more vehemently and grieuouſly mooued, if we hear any ſuch thing of you as may ſeem not agreeable to your vertue and approued Zeale toward the Catholike Religion, or tending to the obſcuring of the glory of your name, as is now brought vnto vs concerning the affairs of Moldavia; wherof not without great grief we write vnto you. And to rehearſe things a little before paſt: With what earneſtneſſe dealt I with you, that for Gods cauſe, and D the defence of the health and liberty of the Chriſtian Commonwealth againſt the tyrannie of the Turkes, you would combine your ſelfe with our moſt dearly beloued ſonne Rodolph the Emperour, and many other Chriſtian princes? And that you ſhould not let ſlip ſo notable an occaſion, ſo worthily to deſerue of God, of the Catholique Faith, and of the Chriſtian Commonweale in generall? And albeit we then thought, as well for many your owne priuat reſpects, as alſo of your Kingdomes, That you were to be born withall and excuſed, if you did not now openly deſcend into this confederation of the Chriſtian Princes, againſt the moſt mortall and Common Enemy, neither apertly ioyn your forces, or giue aid for the repreſſing of his inſolencie; yet we alwaies aſſured oor ſelues, That no let ſhould in any caſe proceed from you, whereby either the Emperour or the other Chriſtian Princes ſhould be the rather hindred, iuſtly to proſecute their injuries, or to caſt off from their necks the heauy yoke of the moſt cruell Tyrant; whoſe deſire of ſoueraign- E tie is not compriſed within the compaſſe of any bounds. But that you ſhould in fauour of the Turkes impugne the Catholique Princes and defenders of the Chriſtian Faith, and ſo joine hands with the Enemies of the Croſſe of Chriſt, as that by your help their force and fury ſhould be increaſed, and ours not only weakened, but in the very courſe of victorie hindered, and caſt into moſt grieuous perils; this wee haue not only not thought of you, but not ſo much as once ſuſpected: yea and can ſcarſe now be perſuaded to beleeue thoſe things to be done by you, which are reported vnto vs as moſt true and vndoubted. For the report goeth, That you hauing intelligence with the Turks and Tartars, haue with them conſpired: And namely againſt our well-beloued Sonne Sigiſmund Prince of Tranſylvania, who with inuincible courage fighteth the battells of the Lord; and leſt he ſhould be able to abate the force and the attempts of the moſt proud Enemy (which by the ſingular mercy of God he hath hitherto aboue his owne power per- F formed) but rather be inforced much to fear his owne eſtate, a new Vayuod or Prince as it were, by a triumvirate authority and compact to bee placed in Moldavia, and him by the Turkes, You, and the Tartars together, to be made Gouernour of that Countrey. Which vnto vs ſeemed ſo new and ſo ſtrange, and contrary to the good opinion we had alwaies conceiued of you, yea and ſo vnbeſeeming your zeale and wiſedom, that for griefe and admiration I had almoſt cried out with the Prophet, You heauens be amaſed G at this, and you gates thereof be you exceeding heauy. For what could be ſuſpected or imagined further from the expectation of vs and all good men, or more incredible, than that Sigiſmund the moſt religious King of Polonia and Sweden, who had alwaies profeſſed himſelfe a moſt earneſt defender of the Catholicke Religion, who was ready euen with his owne bloud to redeem the victory of the Chriſtians, and glory of the Croſſe, againſt the moſt wicked enemies of the ſame, to be vpon the ſudden become ſo vnlike vnto himſelfe, and (ſo much as in him was) to cut off the hope and happy ſucceſſe of that Religious Warre; and to do harme to a Chriſtian and Catholique Prince, not to refuſe to joyne in league and friendſhip euen with the moſt barbarous Nations and the Tartars, the perpetuall enemies of himſelfe and of the kingdome of Polonia. For which cauſes our minde is tormented with ſuch bitterneſſe of griefe, that wee H could not but by ſpeedy meſſengers write vnto you concerning this matter, that hereby you might the ſooner ſee the greatneſſe of our griefe: and we alſo without delay might ſignifie vnto you, what our fatherly loue towards you requeſteth in ſo important a matter. For haply we will ſend one euen of purpoſe to you concerning this cauſe, the care wherof grieueth vs more than can be well expreſſed. Wherfore moſt dearly beloued ſon we exhort you, and in the moſt effectuall maner wee can, aduiſe you and beſeech you in the Lord more attentiuely to conſider, what great diſpleaſure both of God and man, this your action and reſolution may incur, what a ſtaine it may bring vnto your Crowne and dignitie. For beleeue vs, that are to you in ſtead of a father in Chriſt, who loue you not feignedly, but faithfully, and indeed; who wiſh for your glory in this world, and your eternall felicitie in the world to come: beleeue vs (I ſay) this doth much blemiſh your fame with all Chriſtian Kings and Princes; all men take it in euill part, and deteſt it as a I thing monſtrous, that it ſhould by your means be wrought, that the Chriſtian affairs ſhould not proſper; that an heroicall Prince, who had vowed himſelfe for Chriſt and his Country, ſhould not haue proſperous ſucceſſe in this ſo neceſſary and religious a war againſt the Infidels, Turks and Tartars, no leſſe yours, or peraduenture alſo more yours and other Chriſtian Princes enemies, than his. But what do we ſay? you to hinder the proceedings of the Tranſylvanian Prince? this were haply but a ſmall matter; nay verily, by this means not onely a Chriſtian and Catholique Prince, and valiant Champion of the Chriſtian faith (a vertue both admirable and amiable in the very Enemy) but your owne brother in law, bound vnto you with ſo many bonds of affinitie, whoſe children ſhall be as it were your childrens brethren, is by this means brought into great danger, and expoſed vnto the fury of the mercileſſe Turks. What do you then my moſt dearly beloued ſon? Beware that all men, both now liuing, and hereafter to come, condemne you not of the K greateſt inhumanity. But beware yet more that you ſeem not ingratefull not onely to your own nigh kinſman but to God himſelf, who hath bountifully bleſſed you with two great kingdomes, and ſo many good things; and that you prouoke not him to wrath againſt your ſelfe, that reiecteth and confoundeth all euill and wicked deuices: and that this miſchiefe that you haue brought vpon your brother, by the iuſt iudgment of God redound not to the greateſt deſtruction of you and your kingdom, which he in mercy forbid. Doe you think, that the Tranſylvanian being ouercome, you ſhall in ſafety liue from the trechery of the Turk?

Do you not know him to be a faithleſſe man, which meaſureth all things by his owne profit, which keepeth faith with none, but as ſtands with his own commoditie: who with an inſatiable deſire gapeth after euery kingdom, nay thirſteth after the deſtruction of all Chriſtendom. Think alſo my ſon, what wrong you ſhall do vnto the Emperor your couſin, out of whoſe Imperiall bloud you haue begotten ſonnes and heires, and by L Gods grace ſhall more; but alſo our dignitie, and the dignity of this Apoſtolicall ſeat (which you haue alwaies ſo deuoutly honored) is therby hurt, and your moſt dear mother (which we know you of all other leaſt would) the Roman Church is offended, which for maintenance of this ſacred war is at very great charges? and our forces, which by you ought to haue bin relieued and increaſed, being in ſo vnfit a time by theſe ſtirs in Moldavia diſſeuered and diminiſhed, and the enemies on the contrary increaſed and ſtrengthned, into what danger and diſtreſſe may both our armies of the Church and the Emperors fall? And withall, how greatly all the maner and managing of this whole war is therby confounded, euery man ſeeth. Moreouer, which no leſſe concerns the dignitie of vs and this learned See, we haue vndertaken and certainly promiſed to our dearly beloued ſons Rodolph and Sigiſmund, that you ſhould no way hinder or hurt their affairs.
Nor did we herof aſſure them vpon light occaſion; but moued with great reaſon, not only becauſe we M ought ſo to do in ſo iuſt a cauſe, but alſo for that it was ſo vnto vs plainly and expreſly written by the reuerend father the Biſhop of S. Seuerus, our apoſtolick Nuntio with you; whom we know to be faithfull to vs,

and

A and to you dutifull: neither can we by any means doubt thereof, becauſe hee writ vnto vs concerning ſo weighty a matter, that he receiued it euen from your owne mouth. Which things ſo ſtanding, ſeeing you your ſelf ſee the manifeſt abſurdities of this fact on euery ſide, not to ſpeak of the heinouſnes thereof, we requeſt you again, yea and oftentimes, forthwith to apply the neceſſary remedies to theſe hurts. The Tranſylvanian Prince your brother in law, deuoted to your ſelf, and deſirous of your fauour, either protect with your defence, or at leaſtwiſe hurt him not: yea hurt not the whole ſtate of the Chriſtian Commonwealth, and relieue not by any means the quarrell of the enemies of Chriſt. If you haue any controuerſie with the Prince Sigiſmund, or deſire of him any thing, refer it vnto vs, that is to ſay, to your moſt louing father. You know your affairs to be of vs fauored, and we hope by the power of God it may eaſily come to paſſe, that ſome conuenient means may be found, wherby peace and quietnes may be confirmed betwixt you, and good B vnitie grow betwixt you two brethren our ſons, and ſo all the root of bitternes and diſpleaſure to be vtterly pluckt out of your minds. This haue I writ vnto you my ſon, frankly and from a ſincere heart, though truly much grieued, becauſe we loue you, and are much carefull of your honor and good. Shew you againe indeed that you take it ſo as written from your father; and that you altogether prefer our fatherly & wholſom exhortations before the ſiniſter perſuaſions of others. Further concerning theſe matters you ſhal vnderſtand by the ſame Biſhop our Nuntio now with you, to whom you may, as you haue done, giue credit in all things, as to our ſelfe.

These letters dated from Rome the eight day of Nouember, were deliuered to the King in December; with others to the Cardinal and Chancellor, whom the Pope ſharply reprooued, C as the authors and contriuers of all theſe miſchiefs.

The Tartar Cham, before ſtirred vp by the Turkiſh Emperor Mahomet, for the inuaſion of Moldavia (as is already before declared) about this time ſent his Embaſſadour alſo vnto the Polonian King, for the confirmation of ſuch articles as he had before agreed vpon with the Chancellor: which becauſe they manifeſtly declare the ground and purpoſe of his intended expedition into Moldavia, with the foul colluſion of the Chancellor with the Turks & Tartars, againſt the Tranſylvanian Prince, I thought it not amiſſe, or from our purpoſe (for the more manifeſtation of that which is already ſaid) here to ſet them down as they are tranſlated out of the Tartar Language.

Cham Kazikieri, vnto the King of Polonia and Sweden, our Brother, one of the great Lords amongſt the Chriſtians, humbly boweth his head.

The Tartars Letters to the king of Poland

First we ſignifie vnto you, That Aaron Palatine of Moldavia was a forſworn traitor; who hauing gathered a power of the Valachians, and ioyning vnto him the Polonian Coſſacks, ſpoiled the teritories of the great Sultan. But afterwards diſſention ariſing amongſt them, the Hungarian Coſſacks liuing in Valachia, ſent Aaron in bonds vnto the King of Vienna. After him followed another traitour called Rozwan, who alſo hauing raiſed certain companies of ſoldiers, began in like manner to forrage the coun- E tries of the Turkiſh Emperor therabout. Which as ſoon as he had knowledge of, he writ vnto me his brother, That I ſhould with all poſſible ſpeed go into Valachia to chaſtiſe theſe rebels, to burn their houſes and towns; and hauing with the edge of the ſword ſlain their men, to carry away with me their wiues & children into captiuity. Hauing this in charge, I the great Cham of the great territory of the great Lord Karykterey, with my brother Letikerry Galga, and other my brethren & Counſellors, warlike and valiant Captains and Murzis; mounting myne horſe, came with myne army into Valachia vnto the Riuer Prut, where it meeteth in another Riuer called Cocoza: here we chanced vpon a faithfull ſeruitor of yours our brother the Chancellour, who was alſo come a little before vs into Valachia; with whom after ſome light contention, when we began to be more tractable, hee declared vnto vs, That he was of purpoſe come into Valachia to place there a new Vayuod; which (as he ſaid) of antient right belonged vnto the Poloni- F ans, without any wrong or preiudice therin to be don to the couenants and league they had with the Emperor of the Turks: and deſired, That one Ieremias whom he had appointed Vayuod, might haue the command of that prouince; and that the antient amity, ſuch as was in the time of Sultan Solyman and Cham Dawlethgerd, might be faithfully kept. Which when I had on my part faithfully ſworn to do, and he alſo had cauſed the ſame to be done by ſuch of his as he had therfore ſent vnto me; we decreed together, That the Coſſacks on the farther ſide of Nieſter (diſordered and rebellious men) ſhould be vtterly rooted out, that they ſhould not hereafter do any harme in the territories of the great Sultan, and that the Preſents G vſually ſent vnto vs of long, euen ſince the time of Sultan Solyman, ſhould no more be detained, nor any harms be hereafter done in any part of our dominion. And therfore when the Chancellor had promiſed vnto vs, That he would take order that theſe Coſſacks ſhould be vtterly deſtroyed; I alſo conſented, That according to the pleaſure of the royall Maieſty of you my brother, Ieremias ſhould hold the Vayuodſhip of Valachia: which I forthwith by letters ſignified vnto the Turkiſh Emperor. Now if it be ſo, that your Majeſty ſhall giue your conſent vnto thoſe things which we haue here agreed vpon with your Chancellor, you ſhall then for euer finde brotherly friendſhip with me, my brother, and all other our captains and Marzies: but if you ſhall not deſtroy theſe Coſſackes, you ſhall not then perform the oath and couenants made.

Theſe things we haue commanded to be declared vnto you by our Embaſſador our brother Gianach Metagra, whom we requeſt your Maieſty curteouſly to entertain, and by him to ſend the preſents vnto vs: for H we will not now this year ſend any other.

Giuen at the riuer Prut, in the year of Mahomet 1004.

After the Tartar Embaſſador had deliuered thoſe letters vnto the King, with a ſpeech in effect to the ſame purpoſe, hee in the name of the Cham gaue vnto him an horſe and an arrow for a preſent: and afterward being brought to a lodging appointed for him, was commanded there to expect his anſwer. At length his diſpatch was giuen him in Letters ſealed vp, which he took much againſt his will; requeſting the king to ſend an Embaſſador vnto the Cham, and I further by word of mouth to tell him what to anſwer vnto his Lord. But other anſwer could he get none, than was already deliuered him in writing: and ſo rewarded with a gowne furred with Sables, was diſmiſſed without the preſent requeſted by the Cham, or any Embaſſador to accompany him.

Thus the Tranſylvanian Prince, on the one ſide mightily impugned by the Turk, & on the other by the ſetting on of the Turke, ready to haue bin no leſſe indangered by the inuaſion of the Tartar; receiued greater harm from the Polonians being Chriſtians, than from both thoſe great Mahometan Princes: the Polonians in ſome ſort performing for the Turk, what hee had plotted to haue bin don by the Tartar, & ſo by the taking away of Moldavia from the prince, not only weakned his ſtrength, but alſo opened a way for the barbarous enemy into his Country. K Howbeit much it is that the Polonians alledge for the excuſe of themſelues, & defence of that which was by the great Chancellor then done in Moldavia; which for that it cannot be better told than by the great Chancellor himſelf, let vs heare how he by his letters anſwereth the matter euen vnto Pope Clement himſelf.

John Zamoſchie, vnto Clement the eighth the great Biſhop.

Zamoſchy his letters to Pope Clement.

MOſt holy and bleſſed Father in Chriſt, and moſt gracious Lord, after the kiſſing of your moſt bleſſed L feet, and my moſt humble commendations; I haue by your Holineſſe Letters directed both vnto the Kings Maieſty and my ſelfe, vnderſtood, as well his royall Maieſty and my moſt gracious Lord and Maſter, as alſo my ſelf as his ſeruant, to be both accuſed vnto your Highneſſe; as if by thoſe things by vs don in Moldauia, the endeauours of the Chriſtians had bin hindred, and the power of the enemy confirmed.
Wherof I am not with many words to purge my ſelf vnto your Holineſſe, foraſmuch as I aſſure my ſelfe your Holineſſe to haue already fully vnderſtood both what the things were that were done in Moldauia, and how they were don; partly by the Kings Maieſties Letters, and partly by his principall Secretary, for that cauſe eſpecially ſent vnto your Holineſſe. Yet doubt I not to requeſt this one thing of your Holineſſe, That if it hath known me for a man, I will not ſay of any capacity or wit, but euen of the leaſt experience in the world, or of any religion at all, ſo to perſuade it ſelfe of mee, nothing to haue bin done, eſpecially in this M matter, either raſhly, or to the hinderance of the Chriſtian commonweal. I will not now repeat what myne opinion was concerning the league and confederation to be made with the reſt of the Chriſtian princes, for combining their forces againſt the Common enemy, eſpecially his ſacred Maieſties: as alſo what myne own labor & indeauor was in the laſt aſſembly of the States in the high court of parlement: which thing after it was

A was euen by whom it moſt concerned, either delayed or neglected, or vtterly caſt aſide; and yet his Maieſty had ſtil a great deſire to do the Chriſtian commonweal ſome great good, I alſo to the vttermoſt of my power labored to that end; that by the common decree of the kingdom an expedition might be made into Tartary, not ſo much in reuenge of the iniuries don by that enemy in theſe late years paſt, as ſo in the mean time to turn him from the necks of the Chriſtians, as that he ſhould not join his forces with the Turk. Or if it ſo pleaſed God to bleſſe thoſe our indeauors, vtterly at length to root out that ſo great a miſchiefe. But how it came to paſſe that this expedition, ſo much by the King deſired (yet ſcarcely begun or taken in hand) took not effect, it is not for me to declare, for that I ſuppoſe your Holineſſe hath by others, eſpecially your Nuntio, vnderſtood the ſame. In the mean time, by Letters and often meſſengers news was brought, that Sinan Baſſa with a great army was already come ouer Danubius; and I by letters from the Vayuod of the farther Valachia was aduertiſed, how that he, not able to incounter him, had forſaken that prouince, which B at the firſt impreſſion taken and almoſt vtterly waſted by Sinan, hee was now come faſt vpon Tranſylvania: and in Moldavia the Tartar was ſtill expected; inſomuch that Roſwan (who hauing taken priſoner Aaron the Palatine whom he ſerued, in his houſe, and ſo himſelf injoyed the Palatine) began now alſo to quake for fear, and to craue help of me, or rather to ſeek how he might fly away (as not long after hee did) neither hauing any great ſtrength about him, or expecting any greater from the people of that countrey: for why, that prouince was brought ſo low by the miſeries of the former yeares, but eſpecially by ſuch as had euill gouerned the ſame, that at ſuch time as I entred into Moldavia, I aſſure your Holineſſe there were not in it of houſholders aboue 15000, and thoſe alſo for the moſt part poor country people of the baſeſt ſort, in whom there could neither be any great help, neither if they had bin able to haue don any thing, C durſt Roſwan haue truſted himſelfe with them, vpon whom he had with all kinde of cruelty tyranniſed. Chotijm a caſtle in the very confines of this kingdom, was kept with no greater Garriſon than 200 Hungarians, who perceiuing themſelues neither of ſufficient ſtrength to hold the place, nor to withſtand the enemy, they alſo by and by followed after Roſwan. All the reſt of the prouince was not only vnarmed, but without any defence at all; two caſtles only excepted, which ſtanding vpon the confines of Polonia, might haue ſerued better for the enemy, out of them to haue infeſted vs, than for the defence of Moldauia againſt them. So that had the enemy once ſet foot into that prouince, neither could it without a great power haue bin recouered; neither being recouered, could eaſily haue bin defended againſt ſo puiſſant an enemy: and that which worſe was, was not it ſelf alone to haue bin conſumed with that fire, but like enough to haue caried away with it Podolia alſo bordering vpon it, with a great part of Raſcia. Wherefore in this ſtate of D things, when as that prouince was in greateſt danger to haue bin loſt, and ſo many enemies houered not more ouer the heads of all Chriſtendom, than ouer this Kingdom, what was of vs to be done? I know to whom I ſpeak theſe things, euen vnto him, not only whoſe Diuine wiſedome, but ſingular loue alſo toward my natiue countrey is to me moſt known. Verily I entred into Moldavia with no great Army, yet ſuch a one as haply (as in like caſe it often chanceth) Fame had made amongſt the enemies a very great one. So that Sinan fearing, if he ſhould thruſt himſelfe with his Army into the ſtreits whereby he was to breake into Tranſylvania, to be ſhut in by our Army, ſtayd his journy; and the Tartar the more earneſtly he was called vpon by Sinan, by reaſon of the fame of this our Army, reſolued to make himſelf ſo much the ſtronger. So that whilſt he aſſembled the Nogaian Tartars and others farther off, and ſo from all parts raiſeth the greateſt power that he could, the matter was delayed almoſt vnto the end of Nouember: at which time E he with a moſt huge Army, accompanied with Sendziack Iehiuenſe, and a great power of the Turks raiſed out of their prouinces there by, came directly vpon me in the fields of Coroce. Sendziak the Tartar Cham his ſiſters ſon now called himſelf the Baſſa of Moldavia; as did the Tartars eldeſt ſon name himſelf Prince of another part of that prouince alſo. For ſo that Countrey was to haue bin diuided betweene them, that that part which was next vnto the Tartars dominions ſhould be alotted to the Tartar, and the other part confining vpon this kingdom, to be gouerned by Sendziak, as Baſſa thereof, and ſo to make it the ſeat of a perpetuall war, from whence Podolia, Raſcia, and the lower Polonia might be with continuall incurſions waſted euen before our faces. Concerning which matter they now diſperſed their letters, wherein they publiſhed the power and authority giuen them from the grand Seignior, exhorting the people of that country to receiue the ſame. A whole day we fought with this multitude, our men alwaies by the goodnes of God hauing not only the vpper hand, but without any notable loſſe alſo, yet not without great ſlaughter F of theirs: and would to God I had had ſuch ſtrength, as that not onely the conditions of peace, but euen the enemies themſelues might haue bin in my power. But when we were oftentimes come to parle (they ſtill requiring the ſame) and ſo at length to conditions of peace; if ſuch were giuen them, as wherby this only kingdom had without the wrong of any other bin deliuered from ſo great and ſudden a danger, what reaſonable man could finde fault therwith, if we ſhould haue preferred the health of our countrey (wherevnto all good men owe all they haue) before others profits? But now theſe things were ſo don, as that it was no leſſe prouided for the good of the neighbor Chriſtians, yea and haply not the leaſt for theirs, who for the ſame ſlander this kingdom vnto your Holineſſe. The fury of Sinan Baſſa was by this meanes repreſſed; who whilſt he feared to be ſhut vp in the ſtreits by our army now come into Moldauia, and expected the Tartars comming, ſpent almoſt all the reſt of the ſummer idlely, and without doing any thing. The Tartar himſelf was not only turned from the bowels of Chriſtendom, wherinto he had purpoſed (as the yeare before) to haue entred, we hauing with our own breſts receiued his force and fury; but being brought vnto conditions, was expreſly enioyned in a moſt ſhort prefined time, and without any more harm doing, to return again into his country by the ſelf ſame way he came, and by no other: wherby it is come to paſſe, that vntill this day Chriſtendom hath not this year yet felt the fury of the Tartars weapons. But vnto Tranſyluania and Hungary, what a ſpace and power was giuen for them to gather their ſtrength and forces together, and out of the ſame places to oppoſe againſt the enemy, when as our Army kept them ſafe at their backs, and eaſed not only Moldauia, but Valachia and Tranſyluania alſo of that care? Whereas if this cauſe of delay had not bin obiected, to the Turks firſt, and after vnto the Tartars; not to ſay any thing of the Turks, the Tartars at the very ſelf ſame time that the Tranſyluanian army was gon into Valachia againſt Sinan, might haue broken into Tranſyluania before it could haue returned home; or els marching directly towards that army, might haue met with it out of Tranſyluania. As for Moldauia, which together with the memory of the Chriſtian name yet left in it, had vtterly periſhed, it was moſt manifeſtly preſerued by the comming of our army. Which what end it would haue had, if the enemy at his pleaſure might haue raged as he did in the farther Valachia, thoſe moſt bitter remembrances in it, yet at this day ſmoking, do well declare: out of which it is well knowne, more thouſands of Chriſtians haue bin carried away into moſt miſerable captiuity, than almoſt out of any other prouince in all the time of this miſerable wars. Which though it be thus, yet boaſt we not therof, neither ſend we any triumphant letters vnto your Holineſſe, nor brag we of any good ſeruice done for the Chriſtian commonweal; but content our ſelues with the conſcience of the thing it ſelf. In the mean time we are accuſed vnto your Holineſſe. But for what cauſe? If any man complain for the taking of Moldauia, I will not ſay it was by them before willingly forſaken, whilſt I was yet in the frontiers therof, but that this kingdom hath a moſt antient right vnto it, and ſuch a right, as that our Kings buſied in their wars againſt the Muſcouit, the Cruciat Teutonic brethren, or others, ſome others alſo troubling the ſtate therof, it for a time became a prey vnto the Turkiſh Tyrants; yet in all the Leagues made or renued betwixt this kingdom and them, it was ſtill excepted, That all ſuch things as the Palatine of Moldauia was of duty to perform vnto the King, ſhould by him ſtill be performed. Which Kings of Polonia, and namely Auguſtus himſelf, the laſt of the Iagellonian Family, appointed diuers of thoſe Palatines themſelues. Which although they be things moſt manifeſt, yet hauing more regard to the welfare of that prouince, as a Chriſtian country, than of our right, we reſtored it into the ſame ſtate wherein it hath bin for many yeares before theſe * Warres. Wherefore if any man doe thinke any thing done, wherby the enemies of the Croſſe of Chriſt might be eaſed or ſtrengthned, or the Defenders of the faith hindered; it is ſo far from any ſuch thing to be don, that rather (as is before declared) the enemies forces are repreſſed and auerted, and greater means giuen vnto the Chriſtians a front to impugn them; the enemies being at their backs by vs ſhut from them. But I fear they haue not fully informed your Holineſſe, how theſe things were done, who haue reported vnto your ſaid Holineſſe, not onely the name of the Turks to haue bin proclaimed together with the Polonians in Moldauia, but alſo the name of the Tartars, the proper enemies of the Polonians, and by the power and decrees of them three, as it were confederat together, things to haue bin ordered in Moldauia. Which their complaint if it tend to that end, as if a confederation were made with them, I frankly confeſſe certain conditions to haue beene giuen them, but ſuch as wherby is prouided not only for the quiet and ſecuritie of this kingdom, but no leſſe alſo for the whole Chriſtian commonweal, as is before declared. All which things for all that, although they were done for the good of this kingdom, and all Chriſtendom in generall; yet were they ſo done, that they were all referred by me vnto the Kings Maieſty, and the States of this kingdom: ſo that at this preſent the King is at free liberty either to ioyn in confederation with the reſt of the Chriſtian Princes, or if that cannot vpon certain and indifferent conditions be agreed vpon, yet with no mans injury or hurt to ratifie this, ioyned with the health and good of a great part of the Chriſtian commonweal: only God grant that the Chriſtian Princes may ſeriouſly think both of this ſo Chriſtian a confederation againſt the Common Enemy,

* Viz. tributary vnto the Turks.

A Enemy, and ſtrike alſo all together againſt the enemy with their weapons, and not with miſreports and ſlanders one againſt another. They are not to aſſail the enemies feet, but his throat; neither is the ſeat of the war to be placed in the borders of Poland, where it concerneth themſelues much to haue all things there peaceable behind them. But let the war be undertaken with no leſſe charge and preparation, than if the Enemies whole ſtate were to be aſſailed, which ſtanding in an open and plain country, ſhal alwaies without much ado be his that being ſtrongeſt can take it. This haue I written at large, as my purpoſe was, and which I moſt humbly beſeech your Holineſſe with your diuine wiſdom to conſider of, and with your accuſtomed clemency to accept the ſame: and ſo proſtrat at your Holineſſe feet, I moſt humbly commend me to your Clemencie. From Zamoſchie the tenth of Ianuary, 1596.

B Thus much the great Chancellor in defence of himſelfe, and of that he had don in Moldavia: which howſoeuer it contented the Pope, wel I wot it nothing pleaſed the Emperour, and much leſſe the Tranſylvanian Prince, now not a little weakned by the taking away of Moldavia from him.

To end this troubleſome yeare withall, many ſharp and bloudy skirmiſhes yet daily paſſed in diuers places of thoſe frontier countries, the Turks almoſt in euery place ſtil going to the worſe. In the beginning of Nouember, Lencowitz gouernor of Caroloſtat the ſecond time ſurpriſed Wihitz in the frontiers of Croatia where theſe wars firſt began; but being not able to take the caſtle, contented himſelf as before with the ſpoil of the city, and afterward ſetting it on fire, departed. Maximilian alſo attempted Zolnoc: and the Chriſtians in gariſon at Strigonium C and Plindenburg, now become neer neighbors vnto the Turks at Buda, did with continual inrodes not a little moleſt them both all the later end of this year and the beginning of the next. And the Turks in Braila in Valachia vpon the ſide of Danubius; fearing after the flight of Sinan to be beſieged by the Vayuod, forſook the city, & in ſuch haſt paſſed the riuer, that in that tumultuous paſſage three hundred of them periſhed. Sinan Baſſa by the Tranſylvanian prince of late driuen out of Valachia, was not long after ſent for to Conſtantinople: but the crafty old Fox not ignorant of the fierce nature of the great Sultan, and warned by the late miſerie of Ferat, found occaſions to delay the time ſo long vntill that hee was ſent for again, and after that the third time alſo. In the mean while he had ſo wrought by his mighty friends in court, and by rich rewards mightier than they, that at his comming to the court he D was there honorably receiued, as chief Baſſa; and being afterwards offered to be diſcharged of the wars, as a man aboue 80 years old, hee refuſed ſo to bee, ſaying, That hee was borne and brought vp among ſoldiers and martial men, and ſo wiſhed among them to die: as not long after he did, as it was thought of conceit of the euil ſucceſſe he had in his Wars againſt the Tranſylvanian.

The death of Sinan Baſſa.

Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperor exceedingly grieued with the loſſe of ſo many his Cities and ſtrong places loſt this yeare, viz. Strigonium, Vicegrade, Siſeg, Petrinia, Lippa, Ienna, Tergoviſta, Buchareſta, Zorza, and many others of leſſe name; and both by letters & meſſengers vnderſtanding daily of the ſlaughter of his people, and waſting of his frontiers, commanded great preparation to be made againſt the next Spring: giuing it out, That he would then E in perſon himſelf come down into Hungary with ſuch a power as neuer had any his warlike predeceſſors, and there take moſt ſharp reuenge of all his former wrongs. Neuertheles theſe his ſo haſty deſignes were by the plague & famin (both which then raged extreamly in thoſe parts of his empire) and by other great occurrents of the ſame time, ſo croſſed, that by that time the Spring came, he ſcarcely wel knew which way to turn himſelf firſt. For beſides theſe troubles of the Weſt, of themſelues enough to haue filled his hands, the Georgians in the Eaſt (a warlike people) moued with the good ſucces of the Chriſtians in Valachia and Hungarie, had taken vp arms againſt him: and the old Perſian King but a little before dead, had left that great kingdom to his ſon, a man of greater ſpirit than was like to endure the manifold iniuries before don vnto his father by the Turks, to the great diſhonor of that kingdome, and prejudice F of himſelf. Of which things the Baſſa of Tauris gaue him ample intelligence, wiſhing him betimes to prouide for that ſtorm: which ioined vnto the reſt, filled his head with many troubled thoughts, whervnto we leaue him vntill the next Spring.

Mahomet perplexed.

The Traſilvanian prince careful of his eſtate, and not a little troubled with the diſſeuering of Moldavia, thought it not vnfit for his affairs, now after the flight of Sinan, and diſcomfiture of the Turks, to go in perſon himſelf to the Emperor, to declare vnto him the wrong don him G by the Polonian; and further to conferre with him concerning the mannaging of the Warres againſt the common enemy. So hauing put al things in readines for his iourny, he ſet forward 1596: in Ianizary, 1596, and by the way of Caſſovia the fourth of February arriued at Prague in Bohemia; where he was by the Emperors appointment moſt honorably entertained. But imme-diatly after his comming thither he fel ſick of an ague, which grieuouſly vexed him for three weeks ſpace. In the later end of February hauing ſomwhat recouered his health, he went vnto the church, where after his deuotions done, he was by the Dean of the Cathedral church wel-commed with a moſt eloquent oration, ſetting forth his worthy praiſes, and further animating him vnto the like exploits againſt the common enemy of all Chriſtianitie. Whereunto H he forthwith anſwered in Latine ſo eloquently and ſo readily, that all men maruelled that heard him. Proteſting in his ſpeech, That as he and his ſubiects had not hitherto ſpared their liues or goods in defence of the common Cauſe; ſo would they not afterwards ſpare the ſame, but aduenture all for the benefit of the Chriſtian commonweal: wel hoping that the Emperor and other Chriſtian princes would not as occaſion required bee wanting vnto him with their forces, or the Clergy with their prayers. Which done, he doubted not (as he ſaid) by the power of God, but to obtain more notable victories than he had yet, againſt the Turks the Enemies of God.

The Siculi rebell againſt the Prince.

Whilſt he yet thus lay at the Emperors Court, it fortuned that the people called Siculi, offended to haue their liberties in ſome part infringed in the late aſſembly of the States hol- I den in Tranſylvania in December laſt paſt, riſe vp now in armes in diuers places, refuſing to yeeld their former obedience vnto the Prince. A matter like enough to haue wrought him much trouble, and ſuppoſed not to haue bin don without the priuity of the Cardinal his Vn-cle: but by the wiſdom and courage of ſuch as he had in his abſence put in truſt with the go-uernment of his country, diuers of the ring-leaders of this rebellion were apprehended, and in diuers ſorts executed; and 300 of their complices, to the terror of others, had their noſes and ears cut off. By which wholſom ſeuerity all thoſe troubles were appeaſed, and the Country again quieted.

At the ſame time alſo the Tranſylvanians obtained of the Turks a notable victory, with an exceeding rich booty. Mahomet the Turkiſh Sultan had about this time ſent a new Baſſa for K for the gouernment of Temeſware: againſt whoſe comming the Baſſa the old gouernor had in 75 wagons truſſed vp a wonderfull deal of wealth, which hee had there gotten in the time of his former gouernment; to haue bin together with himſelfe with a ſtrong conuoy conducted to Belgrade. Of this his purpoſe the Hungarian Heidons lying at Lippa and Ienna hauing intelligence, lay in wait for him vpon the way, and in his paſſing by ſet vpon him; where in a ſharp conflict they ouerthrew the conuoy, and ſlew the Baſſa, whoſe head they ſent as a present to the Princeſſe at Alba-Iulia, and took the ſpoil of the Baſſa's carriages, wherein was taken a wonderfull wealth; for in one of thoſe wagons is reported to haue been found 20000 Hungarian ducats.

The Baſſa of Temeſware ſlaine, and a great booty taken.

In this abſence alſo of the Prince, 10000 of the Raſcians reuolting from the Turke, came L and offered their ſeruice vnto the Princeſſe: wherof ſhe by letters with great ſpeed certified the Prince her husband: who therupon haſted to diſpatch with the Emperor, and hauing procured both from him and the Pope the promiſe of ſome aid to be afterwards ſent him, took of him his leaue, and being honorably accompanied, departed from Prague to Vienna, where he arriued the 11 of March, ſitting in a princely Chariot drawn with ſix moſt beautifull horſes, the gift of the Emperor. At his comming thither he was met by the Nobility of the Country, and by Aldobrandinus the Popes nephew, who preſented him with three goodly horſes for ſeruice, richly furniſhed. Him the prince took into his charet, and ſo accompanied entred the city, where he was with all due honor receiued and ioyfully entertained, and ſo brought vnto the Emperors palace, where by the learned ſtudents of that Vniuerſitie was for his pleaſure M acted before him the notable hiſtory of Ieſua. Hauing ſtaid there three daies, and purpoſing to haue in his returne viſited his mother in law at Greics in Croatia; newes was brought him, That the Turkes and Tartars by the ſetting on of Stephen Bathor his Vncle, were about

A to break into Tranſylvania. Wherfore changing his purpoſe, he departed thence to Presburg, and ſo with all ſpeed kept on his way toward Tranſylvania, where to the great ioy & comfort of his ſubiects in general he arriued in ſafety in the beginning of April.

In this while many hot ſkirmiſhes paſt betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks in the frontiers of their territories; and now the plague and famin which had long raged in Conſtantinople and other places of the Turks dominions began to aſſwage. Of which ſo great calamities as had deuoured many thouſands of his people, the Turkiſh Emperor finding himſelf ſomwhat eaſed, forthwith cauſed the continuation of his wars againſt the Emperour and the Tranſylvanian prince to be three daies together proclaimed in Conſtantinople, and a great army to be raiſed to be ſent into Tranſylvania and Hungary: giuing it out, That he would B with that ſo puiſſant an army in perſon himſelf paſſe into Hungary. At which time it was alſo reported, That he had already ſent his tents and other his neceſſary prouiſion before to Hadrianople.
For now was nothing more odious in the Turks court, than the name of the Tranſylvanian prince.

Of all theſe things was not the Emperor ignorant, as fully therof certified both by letters and eſpials, as alſo by the vniform confeſſion of ſuch Turks as were daily taken priſoners. For which cauſe he alſo with as much ſpeed and care as hee could, prouided for the raiſing of his army, as he had the year before; as alſo for the leuying of mony, and prouiſion of all things neceſſary, that the enemy at his comming might not find him vnprouided. Neither ſpared he to pray aid of his neighbour Chriſtian princes, eſpecially the Polonian, whom he had diuers C times ſought to draw into the confederation with the other Chriſtian princes againſt the Turk. To which purpoſe he now alſo ſent to him the Biſhop of Preſlaw and the Lord Poppelius his Embaſſadors: as did the Pope alſo ſend vnto him the cardinal Cajetan his Legat; and the Princes Electors alſo their Embaſſadors: vnto whom the Polonian gaue good hearing and good words, but would not by any means be perſuaded to break his league with the Turke, or to afford any aid to the Chriſtians; although the Cardinal with many pregnant reaſons ſhewed him what ſmall aſſurance there was in the Turks leagues, and how dangerous it might bee to his ſtate, if the Turk making peace with the Emperor, ſhould turn his forces vpon him; as it was like enough he would, knowing no man longer for friend, than ſtood with his profit: beſide the immortal blemiſh of his honor, by diſſeuering himſelf from the vnion of the Chriſtian D princes, to hold friendſhip with the Turks and infidels. But all this & much more was to no purpoſe, ſo reſolutely was the Polonian ſet down for keeping of the Turks fauor. So that of al the Chriſtian princes ſo neer vnto the deuouring enemy, none ſtood the Chriſtian commonweal in leſſe ſtead than he. Which for all that, moſt men imputed not ſo much vnto the King, as to others about him, eſpecially to Zamoſchie the great Chancellour, by whom that ſtate was moſt ſwayed; who was not only ſuppoſed, but openly reported to haue ſecret intelligence both with the Turk and the Tartar.

All this while the Lord Palſi gouernor of Strigonium ceaſed not with continuall inrodes to vex the Turks euen to the gates of Buda; as did alſo the other Chriſtian captaines in other places of the Turks frontiers in Hungary. Neere vnto Buda were two great country villages E for moſt part inhabited by Chriſtians, who hauing giuen their oath of obedience vnto the Turk, liued a miſerable life for the paiment of an exceſſiue tribute yearly. Theſe poor Chriſtians weary of the Turkiſh thraldom, and the continuall ſpoile of their labours by them of Strigonium; by ſecret meſſengers requeſted the Lord Palſi, of mercy to carry them and their goods and cattell away into ſome other place of the Chriſtian territory, that ſo they might yet liue amongſt Chriſtians; as he had but a little before done for them of old Buda. Vnto which their ſo reaſonable a requeſt the Chriſtian gouernor charitably hearkned, willing them againſt a certain appointed time to put themſelues and all their things in readineſſe. There was of theſe Chriſtians about 755 families, who with their wiues and children, & ſuch traſh as they had packt vp in fourſcore Wagons drawn with fourteen or ſixteen oxen apiece, at the F appointed time about midnight committed themſelues with all that they had, vnto the conduct of them of Strigonium, ſent out of purpoſe for them; by whom they were in ſafetie brought to Strigonium. Among them were many rich men, who brought with them good ſtore of coyne, with an exceeding great number of cattell. Vnto theſe new come gueſts Palſi aſſigned certain fields betwixt Strigonium & Vivaria, on the North ſide of Danubius, where they ſo commodiouſly liued,as was poſſible in ſo troubled an eſtate of a countrey. G Lippa beſieged by the Turks.

Shortly after, 600 garriſon ſoldiers of Lippa ſeeking after booty,and aduenturing too far into the enemies territorie,were diſcouered by the Turks ſcouts,& ſo beſet by the Turks and Tartars bilited in the country about Temeſwar,that there was no way left for them to eſcape.
Which they well perceiuing,reſolued among themſelues (as became valiant men) to fight it out euen to the laſt man: and with no leſſe reſolution performed what they had before determined, for being on euery ſide beſet and hardly charged by their enemies, they as men before reſolued to die, although ſcarce one to twenty, fought moſt deſperatly, ſeeking for nothing elſe but to ſell their liues as deere as they could vnto their enemies: and ſo fighting were all ſlain,except ſome few which by great fortune eſcaped,leauing vnto the enemy a right bloudy victory:yet by this loſſe of ſo great a party was the garriſon of Lippa greatly weakned,which H the enemy knew right well,and thereupon began forthwith to prepare to beſiege the Towne.
Which Barbelus the Gouernour (a moſt valiant man) wiſely foreſeeing, ſent in poſt vnto the Tranſyluanian Prince, to requeſt him with all ſpeed to ſend him foure or fiue thouſand good ſoldiers,with which power he doubted not by the help of God,to be able to defend the town againſt al the forces the enemy was at that time able to bring againſt it. To whom the prince without delay ſent 8000, who all in ſafety in good time arriued at Lippa: for ſhortly after their arriual,40000 of the Turks and Tartars came and ſat downe before the towne, incloſing it on euery ſide,and ſo lay for certaine dayes without any thing doing worth the ſpeaking of;
they of the towne in the meane time doing them all the harme they could with their great ſhot,which they ſent among them not ſparingly. But they had not ſo long lien,but that news I was brought into the camp,That the Tranſyluanian Prince was with a great power comming thither to relieue the towne; whereupon they preſently riſe, and retyred to the place where they had before incamped about two miles from Lippa; where certainly vnderſtanding that the Prince neither was, neither could in ſhort time be in ſuch readineſſe as was before reported,they forthwith returned,and more ſtreitly beſieged the towne than before.They had now brought with them ſeuenteen pieces of batterie, eight waggons laded with ſhot and pouder, and forty ſix others laded with ſcaling ladders and other warlike prouiſion: thus appointed they began to batter the towne,and afterwards gaue thereunto diuers deſperat aſſaults,which the Chriſtians valiantly receiued, and ſtill with great ſlaughter repulſed their enemies. For that ſtrong town was with towers and bulwarks flanking one another, ſo fortified, that out of K them the Chriſtians with their murthering pieces made great ſpoile of their enemies,and ſtil inforced them with loſſe to retyre,no bullet almoſt flying in vain. In the heat of one of theſe aſſaults the Gouernor cauſed one of the gates of the town to be ſet open,hauing before within the town placed ſixteene great pieces at the very enterance of the ſame gate,charged with all kind of murthring ſhot. To which gate as of meer deſperation ſet open by the defendants, the Turks and Tartars deſirous of reuenge, came thronging as thicke as might be,thinking to haue thereby entred: when ſuddenly,and as it were in the turning of an hand, they were with the aforeſaid murthering pieces cut downe as with a ſithe, and ſo againe, and the third and fourth time,before they could cleere themſelues of the danger thereof,their heads,armes,and legs,and other rent limbs,flying in the aire moſt miſerably to behold. Neuertheleſſe the ſiege L was by them continued,& the often aſſaults ſo reſolutely maintained,as if they had therupon purpoſed to haue gaged all their liues. But this ſo obſtinat a reſolution was by an vnexpected accident when they leaſt thought,conuerted into ſuch a deſperat feare and aſtoniſhment, that they vpon the ſudden, no man forcing them,forſooke their trenches wherein they lay incam-ped,and leauing behind them their tents,their great Ordnance, and whatſoeuer els they had, they betook themſelues to a moſt diſordred flight. The Tranſyluanians,who by chance were euen then comming thither,purſuing them,ſlew diuers of them, & took ſome others of them priſoners. At this ſiege, the Baſſa of Temeſwar himſelfe was mortally wounded, and Hamat Sanzacke of Giula with diuers others of good place ſlain,and 4000 of the common ſoldiers.
The cauſe of the Turks ſo great and ſudden feare was this; Whilſt the Baſſa of Temeſwar lay M at the ſiege of Lippa, as is aforeſaid, they that were left in the City fearing no harm,liued in great ſecuritie; in the meane time the Gouernor of Lugaz ſent out ſix thouſand ſouldiers towards Tameſwar,now in the abſence of the Baſſa to ſeek after booty:who comming to Temeſwar with great ſpeed,rifled the ſuburbs of the City, ſlew all the Turkes they could light

A vpon,and ſet at liberty a thouſand captiues:and ſo hauing truſſed vp their booty,ſet on fire all their ſuburbs and departed. Which fire grew ſo great and ſo terrble,that it was plainly ſeen into the camp at Lippa,making a ſhew as if the whole city had bin on a light fire. Which ſo daunted the hearts of the Turks at the ſiege, that they preſently fled (as is before ſaid) leauing all that they had behind them.

Plenia ſackt by the Chriſtians.

The Tranſylvanian all this while buſied in raiſing of his army,and prouiding of all things neceſſary for the maintenance of his warres, was come into the confines of Hungary towards Temeſwar,euen as the Turks fled from Lippa. At which time certaine Hungarian Heidons that ſerued him,getting ouer Danubius not far from Nicopolis,took Plenia a little towne of the Turks,which they ranſacked and burnt; and hauing ſlain in the country therabout aboue B three thouſand Turks,returned with a rich prey vnto the Prince.

Cliſſa regained by the Turks.

Not long before,the Chriſtians had ſurpriſed Cliſſa, a ſtrong frontier town of the Turkes in Dalmatia not far from Spalato: which town the Baſſa of Boſna ſought now again to recouer, and thereto laid hard ſiege. For the reliefe wherof, Leucowitz gouernor of Stiria and the other prouinces thereabouts belonging to the Houſe of Auſtria, and the gouernor of Zenge, with a fleet of forty two ſhips,wherin they had imbarqued 4000 ſoldiers wel appointed with all things neceſſarie,ſet forward toward Cliſſa: and by the way lighting vpon a galley of the Venetians bound with certain warlike prouiſion toward the Turkes campe,tooke her as good prize and rifled her. This fleet with a fair wind arriued at Siret,neer vnto Trau,where the gouernor landing his men,marched that night part of his way toward Cliſſa, & all the next day C lay cloſe. The night following they ſet forward againe, and hauing marched fifteen miles, came to the enemies camp before day:where ſetting vpon the Turks in their trenches,fearing no ſuch peril,they brought ſuch a general fear vpon the whole camp,that the Turkes as men amaſed fled,ſome one way,ſome another,euery man (as in ſuch ſudden fear it commonly hapneth) making ſhift for himſelf, leauing whatſoeuer they had in their trenches behind them. The Chriſtians contented ſo to haue put their enemies to flight,fel preſently to the ſpoile,as more deſirous thereof,than by the haſty purſuit of their enemies to put themſelues in poſſeſſion of an aſſured victory. Which the Turks quickly perceiuing,and from the hills with the dawning of the day diſcouering the ſmall number of the Chriſtians, and how they were diſordred,they gathered themſelues again together,and comming down,incloſed on euery ſide D the diſordered Chriſtians(greedily hunting after the ſpoil) and ſlew them downright. Leucowitz himſelf,with the gouernor of Zeng & ſome others got into Cliſſa,where hauing ſtaid two daies, and doubting to be able to keepe the ſame, they ſecretly by night iſſued out with 600 men,in hope to haue recouered their fleet; but the Turkes ſuſpecting ſuch a matter, had ſo beſet the paſſages,that of all that company, Leucowitz had much adoe himſelfe with three others to eſcape. The enemy now again poſſeſſed of his trenches, laid ſtreiter ſiege vnto the town than before:which they of the gariſon perceiuing,and now out of hope of relief,agreed with the Baſſa, that they might with bag and baggage depart, and ſo yeelded vp the towne. Thus Cliſſa one of the ſtrongeſt townes of Dalmatia,through the greedy couetouſnes of the diſordred ſoldiers,fel again into the hands of the Turks.

Sombock taken by the L. Palfi.

E About the ſame time Palfi gouernour of Strigonium, vnderſtanding of the meeting together of certain notable aduenturers of the Turks at Sombock, a caſtle almoſt in the mid way betwixt Alba Regalis and Buda,raiſed the greateſt ſtrength he could,and ſo with certain pieces of artillery, and other things neceſſarie for an aſſault, ſet forward from Strigonium the two and twentieth of May,before the riſing of the Sun,and about three a clocke in the afternoon came to the aforeſaid caſtle; wherunto he preſently gaue a moſt terrible aſſault, which he neuer gaue ouer vntil he had taken it: for after he had by the ſpace of three hours together, with great danger maintained a moſt deſperat aſſault, at length he with much difficulty preuailed,and put to the ſword all the Turks he found therein,man,woman,and childe, and with the reſt,fifty Ianizaries but that day come thither. This caſtle was of great beauty, and moſt F pleaſantly ſcituated, whereunto the Baſſa of Buda oftentimes for his pleaſure repaired: For which cauſe Palſi was very deſirous to haue taken it without ſpoiling; but the fire he had already raiſed therein ſo preuailed, that it burnt downe all the goodly buildings thereof, with great ſtore of victuals and other prouiſion, nothing remaining but what the Chriſtians had ſaued for themſelues.

Temeſware in vaine beſieged by the Tranſylvanian Prince.

The Tranſylvanian Prince hauing raiſed a great army for the reliefe of Lippa,it beeing by great chance a little before his comming relieued,came and laid ſiege to the City of Temeſwar;where he had not long lien,but that the Turks and Tartars,fearing to loſe that ſo famous a city,aſſembled together from all places thereabouts to the number of 40000, and ſo came to raiſe the ſiege. Of whoſe comming the Prince hearing,riſe with his army and went to meet them,and had with them a great and terrible battel,the victory for a great while ſtanding very doubtful,yet ſeeming to incline rather to the Turkes and Tartars than to the Chriſtians; but at length the Turks diſordered with the great artillery, and the Tranſylvanians charging them afreſh,began to giue ground, and ſo at laſt to betake themſelues to plain flight. In this battel were ſlain of the Turks and Tartars 5000, and of the Chriſtians 1500. The Prince was reported to be ſlain in this battel: which was not ſo,being reſerued to the further plague of the Turks,& comfort of his afflicted country. After this victory he returned again to the ſiege,which he more ſtreightly continued than before, leauing nothing vnattempted that he could poſſibly deuiſe for the winning of the city. Where whilſt he yet thus lay battering the city both night and day,news was brought him, That Giaffer Baſſa and the Tartars were comming with a great army to the reliefe of the beſieged. Whereupon he conſidering his owne ſtrength, and the power of his enemies, and that the aid promiſed him both from the Emperor and out of Hungary was not yet ready,with great griefe of minde raiſed his ſiege, and retyred with his army to Lippa,there expecting new ſupplies as well of his owne, as from his friends. Whilſt he yet there lay, hee was certainly informed,That the Baſſa of Natolia (the fore runner of the great Sultan Mahomet) was come to Belgrade with fourteen thouſand horſe and four thouſand Ianizaries, to ioine with the Baſſa of Buda for the relieuing of Temeſwar; whoſe forces ioined together were in number threeſcore thouſand;and that Mahomet himſelf (of whoſe comming had been riſe report all this yeare) was now comming after with a farre greater power. Wherupon he departed from Lippa, leauing therein a ſtrong garriſon, and ſo returning to Alba Iulia, called there an aſſembly of all his States, for the repreſſing of ſo puiſſant an Enemy.

Mahomet for the better ſucceſſe of his wars in Hungary, had drawn forth the Tartar with a mighty power:who although he was at the firſt ſo vnwilling to that ſeruice (conſidering the great loſſes he had therin before receiued) that he would not,as hee ſaid, ſend ſo much as one Aſſe therunto: yet ouercome with great gifts, and the reſpect he had to the Turkiſh Sultan, was now ready with a ſtrong army vpon the frontiers of Moldauia, to meet him in Hungary: vnto whom the late choſen Vayuod ſent certaine preſents, with ſuch ſtore of victuals as hee could poſſibly prouide for him. Yet foraſmuch as hee was not that way to paſſe without the leaue of the Polonian, Mahomet had both by letters and diuers Embaſſadours intreated with the Polonian King for his paſſage,as alſo for the confirmation of the antient league hee and the Polonian kings his predeceſſors had to their good of long time had with the Othoman Emperors: from which he wel knew the Chriſtian Emperor,with diuers other the Chriſtian princes,to ſeek by all means to draw him. Mahomet alſo not ignorant, how hurtfull and dangerous the confederation betwixt Michael the Vayuod of Valachia, and the Tranſylvanian, was vnto him and his deſignes; ſent vnto him Embaſſadours,by the ſhew of great danger to deter him from the Tranſylvanian, and by many glorious promiſes to allure him to ſubmit himſelf again vnto his protection,and in token of his fidelitie to deliuer vnto the Sultan two of his frontier towns ſuch as he ſhould require; in regard whereof he ſhould together with the Sultans fauor receiue golden mountains. Wherunto the Vayuod anſwered,That as yet he was not weary of the friendſhip he held with the Prince:and for the towns he required,that they were not in his power to giue,as belonging to the Prince,vnto whom hee ſaid hee would write,and ſtay the Embaſſador in the mean time vntil he had from him anſwer.

The Emperor on the other ſide had with al carefulneſſe ſo far as in him was,prouided that his army might be ready to take the field with the beginning of the Spring:but as commonly it chanceth,the ſpeedy proceedings of great actions (wherin the hands of many mighty are required) to be much hindred by delaies,ſomtimes of one,and ſometimes of another;ſo fell it out with him now:for albeit that his own forces were in ſome good time ready, yet was the Spring,yea and a good part of Summer alſo far paſt,before the aid promiſed from other princes, met together. At length after long expectance, when ſome conuenient number for an

A army was from diuers places come together at Vienna: they were by the lord Swartzenburg and their other cammanders brought forth into the field, and not far from Altenburg encamped, within the ſelfe ſame trenches that were the laſt yeare caſt vp by County Mansfelt for the ſafety of his army; there to expect the comming downe of the great ordnance and other prouiſion by the riuer from Vienna, as alſo the reſt of the Chriſtian forces dayly looked for.
From Altenburg the Chriſtian army remooued to Comara, and not ſtaying there long, the foure and twentieth of Iuly marched towards Vacia, otherwiſe called Woczen: but before it came thither, the Turks hearing of the approch of the Chriſtians, forſooke the town, and with their cattell and beſt part of their ſubſtance fled to Peſth, carrying alſo away with them the great ordnance; the greateſt whereof they buried by the way, which was neuertheleſſe afterwards B found out by the Chriſtians. And although the Turks at their departure had ſet fire both vpon the towne and caſtle, yet the Chriſtians left there did what they might to quench the ſame: by whoſe diligence and the helpe of two thouſand footmen, and certaine troups of horſemen ſent thither by Swartzenburg, a great part both of the towne and the caſtle was preſerued: the whole army of the Chriſtians following after, encamped in the open field, and with their horſemen braued the Turks euen to the gates of Peſth. This ſo ſudden a comming of the Chriſtians brought a great feare both vpon them of Peſth and Buda, inſomuch, that they ſent their wiues and children, with the chiefeſt of their ſubſtance downe the riuer vnto places of more ſafety, and farther off from danger: which was done ſo diſorderedly (as it hapneth in ſuch common feares) that many of them for haſt thruſt one another into the riuer, C and ſo periſhed.

Vacia abandoned of the Turks, is taken by the Chriſtians.

Hitherto in the former wars againſt the Turke, had Matthias bin Generall of the Chriſtian armies: but now of late, Ferdinand the Emperors vncle County of Tirol being dead, Matthias was by the Emperor his brother preferred to the gouernment of that rich countrey and the prouinces thereabouts, not inferior to ſome kingdomes; and Maximilian his younger brother appointed Generall in his ſtead: who departing from Vienna in the later end of Iuly, came into the campe the fourth of Auguſt, where he was by the Lord Swartzenburg his Lieutenant, and the Lord Palfi, honourably and with great triumph receiued.

Now were the Chriſtians threeſcore thouſand ſtrong, and hauing fortified Vacia, and therin placed a conuenient garriſon, reſolued by common conſent to beſiege Hatwan, a ſtrong D towne of the Turks in the vpper Hungary. And thereupon riſing with their army from Vachia the 13 of Auguſt, came the 15 of the ſame moneth about noone and ſat downe before the towne, and that with ſuch ſpeed, that they were ſeene of the Turkes in the towne, before that they heard any thing of their comming: inſomuch, that at the firſt ſhew of them, they of the towne tooke them to haue been ſome come out to ſeeke after booty; and therefore ſallying out vpon them, skirmiſhed with them a while, vntill they perceiued the whole battel comming.
The Chriſtians approching the town, encamped themſelues as they thought moſt conuenient, and began in three places to batter the counterſcarſe. This frontier towne of the Turks, beſides that it was kept with a ſtrong garriſon, was alſo ſtrengthned with a broad ditch, and fortified with a broad counterſcarſe and ſtrong paliſadoes. Whilſt the Chriſtians thus lay E at the ſiege, the Turks ſallying out of the towne, brake into their trenches, and there did great harme; and like enough they were to haue done more, had not the horſemen in good time come in vpon them and inforced them to retire. In this ſally, amongſt others was one Greis a notable captaine ſlaine, being ſhamefully forſaken of his owne men; who for that their cowardiſe, were all in the ſight of the whole army diſarmed, and ſo turned out of the campe as men vnworthy any longer to beare armes. One morning alſo as the Chriſtians were at their deuotions in their trenches, a Turkiſh prieſt from out of an high tower not far off, railed moſt bitterly vpon them, curſing and deriding them: wherewith one of the Chriſtian canoniers much moued, made a ſhot at the tower, which he ſo well beſtowed, that therewith he ſtrucke downe the tower, together with the idolatrous prieſt, as he was yet rayling and blaſpheming. At length F the Chriſtians had with exceeding labor & continual battery made the town ſaultable: wherwith the Turks diſcouraged, offered (but all too late) to yeeld vp the town vpon the ſame conditions that they of Strigonium had: whereunto they receiued no anſwer; yea, commandement was giuen throughout the campe, That no man vpon paine of death, ſhould haue any parley with them. Shortly after, all things being now in readineſſe for the aſſault, the Chriſtians

ans one a day about fiue a clocke in the afternoone, aſſaulted the town in foure places, and after three houres hard fight, by ſtrong hand tooke it, with the ſcriching and lamenting of the women and children, and other fearefull people, who now gaue themſelues all loſt and forlorne. Foure houres execution was done vpon all that came to hand, without reſpect of age, ſex, or condition: women were ſlaine great with childe, and young children hanging at their mothers breaſts; it booted not to cry for mercy, the bloudy ſword deuouring all. The fury of the Wallons here exceeded, who ript the children out of their mothers wombs, and made thongs and points of the skins of men and women, whom they had ſlain quicke. Which their cruelty they afterwards excuſed when they were therefore reproued, by pretending that thereby they did teach the Turks hereafter not ſo wickedly to blaſpheme againſt Chriſt, or with ſuch their wonted and barbarous cruelty to torment the Chriſtians that fell into their hands, for feare of like themſelues. In this aſſault and fury periſhed of the Turks about 4000, and of the Chriſtians not paſt 300. In this towne beſide that which the fire deuoured, was found a very rich prey. The firſt that entred the towne was one Terskie a notable captaine, with his company: after whom followed Ruſwurme, who each of them were thought in their entrance at the breach, to haue ſlaine with their owne hand eight or ten Turks.

Mahomet the great Sultan commeth to Buda with an army of two hundred thouſand men.

Now in the mean time Mahomet the great Sultan being come to Belgrade, remoued thence to come downe into the heart of Hungary, ſending Cicala Baſſa before him: and at length after long looking for, the ſecond of September arriued at Buda, hauing in his army about two hudred thouſand men, and three hundred field pieces. From thence he preſently ſent forty thouſand to Temeſware; but ſtaied there himſelfe with the reſt of his army.

The Chriſtians yet lying at Hatwan, & doubting leſt the Sultan ſuddenly paſſing the riuer ſhould come vpon them not yet ready for battell, departing thence, and retiring backe againe, came and encamped not far from Vachia. And albeit that the Archduke before his departure from Hatwan, had left a conuenient garriſon for the keeping of the towne, yet ſuch was the terrour of the Turks approch, that the next day after, they that were there left in garriſon forſooke the towne, and ſetting it on fire, followed themſelues after the campe. This comming of the Turkiſh Sultan to Buda, brought alſo a great feare vpon them at Vienna, as much doubting leſt he ſhould that way haue turned his forces, which cauſed them both day and night to labor for the better fortification of the city, and for the prouiſion of all things, as if it had bin for a preſent ſiege.

But Mahomet not prouided for the vndertaking of ſo ſtrong a place, and not ignorant of the diſgrace his great grandfather the victorious Solyman had ſometime receiued vnder the wals thereof, had no purpoſe thereto, as hauing bent his thoughts quite another way. In the vpper part of Hungary is an antient famous city, well fortified and honored with a Biſhops See, called Agria, not far from Hatwan: vpon this city, as the chiefe fortreſſe of the Chriſtians in thoſe quarters, had Mahomet at his comming into Hungary caſt his eies, and began now that way to make head, with purpoſe by taking of that city, and placing therein a ſtrong garriſon, to hinder the vniting of the Emperors forces with the Tranſyluanians, for the mutuall ſtrengthning of the one the other by the way of the vpper Hungary. Which the Archduke perceiuing, ſent thither forthwith the valiant Colonell Terskie with a notable company of Italians and Germans, and a thouſand other harquebuſiers, who all arriued there in ſafety. At which time alſo the Lord Teuffenbach ſent into the city three thouſand footmen, vnder the conduct of County Turne, with good ſtore of warlike prouiſion needfull for the defence thereof. The one and twentieth of September, Mahomet attended vpon by the great Baſſaes, Ibrahim, Giaffer, Haſſan, and Cicala, for old Sinan was now dead, with his army of an hundred and fifty thouſand men, came and encamped betweene the two riuers of Danubius and Tibiſcus, couering a great part of the country with his tents. Approching the city, he with wonderfull celerity caſt vp fiue great mounts, and from them with ſuch fury battered the wals, that the Chriſtians were glad night and day to ſtand in armes for the defence thereof. And although that the wals were ſo great, and in many places ſo weakly fortified as that they were not but by a greater garriſon to be defended againſt ſo puiſſant an enemy; and that therefore the defendants with their honor lawfully might euen the firſt day haue ſet the city on fire, & retired themſelues into the caſtle, which was both faire and ſtrong, and the only place to be truſted vnto; yet for the ſpace of ſix daies they worthily defended the whole city againſt the fury of the enemies; and out of it did

A them great harme. But ſeeing the danger greatly encreaſing, and that the city was not longer to be holden, they ſet it on fire; hauing before conueied all the beſt of their ſubſtance with themſelues into the caſtle: which the Turks quickly perceiuing, brake ſo ſuddenly into the city, as if they would together with the Chriſtians haue entred the caſtle alſo; but in the attempt therof they were notably repulſed & many of them ſlaine. Adioyning to the caſtle was a great and ſtrong bulwarke, againſt which the Turks for certain daies furiouſly thundred with their great ordnance, and that without intermiſſion: and hauing in diuers places ſore ſhaken it, in the ſpace of two daies aſſaulted it 12 times; but not without the wonderfull loſſe of their men: & yet gaue it not ſo ouer; but as men with their loſſe more enraged, came on againe with greater fury than before, and ſo at laſt by plain force took it: and there put to the ſword all them they B found therin, except ſuch as by good hap got betimes into the caſtle. This bulwarke thus loſt, the Chriſtians the next day ſallying out, again recouered; wherin they ſlew a great number of the Turks, with the loſſe of ſome thirty men, and as many moe wounded. The beſieged now diuers times both by letters and meſſengers craued aid of Maximilian the General, giuing him to vnderſtand, that they could not long hold out for want of ſhot and pouder, if they were not betimes relieued (whereof the enemy alſo was not ignorant) yet were they reſolued to hold it out euen to the laſt man; although the great Sultan had oftentimes by meſſengers ſent of purpoſe, willed them to yeeld it vp, with promiſe that they ſhould in ſafety with life and goods depart; otherwiſe threatning vnto them greater extremities than was of late ſhewed vnto the Turks at Hatwan, if they ſhould as obſtinate men hold it out vnto the laſt. Wherunto they neuer C anſwered him any thing: for Terskie had forbid them all parly with the enemy; and in the midſt of the market place had cauſed a paire of gallowes to be ſet vp, threatning to hang him thereon, whoſoeuer he were, that ſhould once make motion of yeelding vp the city.

A bulwarke twelue times aſſaulted in two daies.

Whileſt the beſieged thus lay in hope of reliefe, the Archduke vpon the comming ouer of the Sultan towards Agria, hauing retired with his army to Strigonium, and there ſtaid ſomewhat too long expecting the comming of more aid; began now at length to ſet forward, and to make ſome ſhew as if he had indeed purpoſed to haue relieued his diſtreſſed friends ſo hardly beſet at Agria. But ſuch was the fouleneſſe of the weather, hindring the paſſage of his great ordnance (not to ſpeake of any thing elſe) that in fourteene daies he marched ſcarcely twelue miles forward. Whereby the enemy tooke occaſion to preuaile as he did in his ſiege: who D now hearing of the comming of the Chriſtians, and ſeeing to how little purpoſe he had ſo long battered the caſtle, conuerted all his indeauors to the filling vp of the ditch of the old caſtle, with fagots, earth, and ſuch like matter: for the haſtening of which worke, Mahomet himſelfe ſpared not to ride vp and downe in all places of his army, with his preſence and cheereful ſpeech encouraging his men in that deſperat worke. But whileſt the Turks were thus buſie in fulfilling his command, the Chriſtians ſallying out vpon them made great ſlaughter of them, and put to flight Ibrahim the great Baſſa with ſuch as were about him: after whom they ſo eagerly followed, that he in the flight loſt his tulipant for haſt, & was there very like to haue bin taken. Neuertheleſſe the worke went ſtill forward, and was now at length with the reſtleſſe labour of ſo great a multitude brought to ſuch perfection, that the Turkes thought it now no E great matter by aſſault to enter the caſtle: and thereupon the tenth of October gaue vnto it foure deſperat aſſaults one vpon another, being ſtill with greater ſlaught of his men repulſed. But comming on againe the fifth time with freſh ſupplies, and greater fury than at the firſt, they preuailed; and ſo entring, put to the ſword all they found in the caſtle, in number about eight hundred; foure hundred of whoſe heads one of the Turks captains cauſed to be carried vnto Mahomet in the camp, in the beholding wherof, he is ſaid to haue taken great pleaſure, as in the vndoubted ſignes of his victory.

The old caſtle taken.

The old caſtle thus taken, nothing remained but the new caſtle, againſt which the Turks conuerted their whole forces, wherin they repoſed not ſo much hope (although their battery were very terrible, and their power great) as in the ſecret mines wherewith they had in 14 places F vndermined the caſtle, and were now almoſt ready to be blowne vp. Which the beſieged perceiuing, and withall conſidering the ſtate wherein they ſtood, and not hearing any thing of reliefe; reſolued amongſt themſelues (without the conſent of their chiefe Commanders) no longer to hold out, but to yeeld. And thereupon altogether as if it had been but one man, riſe vp in a mutiny againſt their two Gouernours; Paul Niari, and Terskie; who at the firſt by all the reaſons they could deuiſe, diſſuaded them from ſuch cowardiſe, putting them in mind of the oath they had taken: which not preuailing, they afterwards vpon their knees requeſted G them as men to hold it out yet a while, in hope of ſpeedy reliefe: yea, Teskie with his hands caſt vp entreated them, that if they would no longer hold it out, but needs yeeld, then they ſhould firſt kill him with their owne hands, that he might not liue to ſee ſo great a diſhonor.

But what auaileth perſuaſion with men poſſeſſed with ſo great feare? And in the meane time two hundred and fifty of the common ſoldiers, among whom were many Italians, ſecretly eſcaping out of the caſtle fled into the camp, of whom diuers became runegats & turned Turk; which added to the former feare, ſo much diſcouraged the minds of the reſt, that they forthwith required to come to parly with the enemy, and ſo agreed, That they might with bag and baggage and their ſwords by their ſides in ſafety depart: the great Sultan giuing his faith for the performance thereof, with hoſtages deliuered on either ſide. So the 13 of October about H noone, the garriſon ſoldiers came out of the caſtle in number about two thouſand: but they were not gone far, but that they were in a great plaine ſet vpon by the Turks and Tartars, and there cut in pieces; ſome of them were ſlain quicke, and ſome other of them otherwiſe ſhamefully diſmembred; the Turks in the meane time vpbraiding them, and ſaying, That faith was not to be kept with them that had ſo cruelly before dealt with them of Hatwan. This perfidious dealing much offended diuers of the better ſort of the Turks, inſomuch that ſome of them complained thereof vnto the Sultan; who (as is reported) cauſed ſome of the chiefe authors therof to be put to death: and afterward by open proclamation commanded, that if any of the Turks or Tartars had taken any of them priſoners, they ſhould forthwith ſet them at liberty. I Thus is the famous city of Agria, of long time a Chriſtian Biſhops ſeat, now become a ſure receptacle for the Turks and Infidels.

Agria yeelded vnto the Turks.

Petrinia beſieged by the Turks.

Whileſt Mahomet thus lay at the ſiege of Agria, the Baſſa of Boſna with certain other of the Sanzackes thereabouts, hauing raiſed a great army, came and beſieged Petrinia in the borders of Croatia: which he at his firſt comming ſo furiouſly battered by the ſpace of ſeuen daies, that it was of many thought not poſſible for it to hold out two daies longer. In the mean time the Lord Herbenſtein and Leukowitze, with all the power they could make out of Croatia and Windiſmarch, came towards Petrinia: but hauing no meanes in ſo great haſte to make a bridge ouer the riuer of Kulp, they retired towards Siſeg, there to paſſe ouer. The Turks hearing of their retire, and ſuppoſing them to haue fled for feare, put ſix thouſand horſemen ouer K the Riuer to purſue them: Vpon whom the Chriſtians turning, and charging them home, ouerthrew them; and hauing ſlaine many of them, draue the reſt headlong into the Riuer, where moſt of them periſhed. The Chriſtians neuertheleſſe keeping on their way to Siſeg, there the next day by a bridge paſſed ouer the Riuer, and ſo marching towards Petrinia, and being come neere vnto the Towne, were encountered by eight thouſand Turkes, whom they alſo put to flight; and by certaine priſoners there taken, vnderſtood that the Baſſa the day before was riſen from before the Towne and gone: which they at the firſt beleeued not, but comming thither found it ſo, to their owne good contentment, and the great joy of the late beſieged.

Petrinia reliued.

Maximilian the General marching on faire and ſoftly from Strigonium, at length the ſeuenteenth L of October came to Caſſouia, foure daies after that Agria was loſt, and there met with the Tranſyluanian Prince, who was come thither with eighteen thouſand men, and forty field pieces to aid him: of whom eight thouſand were mercinary horſemen, fifteene hundred were of the nobility of his country, and the reſt footmen. The next day after, they ſetting forward from Caſſouia, joyned themſelues with the reſt of the army led by the Lord Teuffenbach and Palfi, and ſo of all their vnited forces made one army, conſiſting now of two and thirty thouſand horſemen and eight and twenty thouſand foot: who drew with them an hundred and twenty field pieces, and twenty thouſand waggons, wherewith they euery night encloſed their army as with a moſt ſure trench. So orderly marching, they kept on their way towards Agria, with a full reſolution to giue the Turks battell, whereof the whole army ſeemed to be very M deſirous. By the way at length they came to a faire heath two miles long and foure broad, where they were to paſſe ouer a certaine riuer, the paſſage whereof Giaffer Baſſa had before taken with twenty thouſand Turks and Tartars, the reſt of the Turks army lying ſtill not farre from Agria. Now the purpoſe of the Baſſa was, to haue enlarged the paſſage of the riuer, and ſo

A ſo to haue made way for the whole army, to haue afterwards paſſed to the other ſide, as moſt commodious for many purpoſes, eſpecially for water, wherof they ſo might themſelues haue had plenty, & yet kept the Chriſtians from it. But of this his purpoſe, by the comming of the Chriſtians he was quite diſappointed: for the next day being the 23 of October, they skirmiſhed with him in diuers places, eſpecially at the paſſage of the riuer; where at the firſt incounter he loſt 300 of his men, and in the end ſeeing himſelfe too weake to withſtand the whole power comming on, fled to the Sultan, hauing loſt two of his enſignes & 20 field pieces, but of his men not many, both for that he fled betime, and the approch of the night hindered the purſuit of the Chriſtians, who were now become maſters both of the paſſage of the riuer, and of the place where the Baſſa lay: which they finding not ſo commodious for them as they had at B the firſt ſuppoſed (eſpecially for lacke of wood, the weather being then extreme cold, as alſo hearing of the approch of the Sultan with his whole army) they forthwith forſooke the ſame, and retired again ouer the riuer to the place where they lay before, incloſing themſelues with their waggons, as if it had beene a city ſtrongly incloſed with woodden wals. The next day which was the 24 of October, towards night, Mahomet with all his army ſhewed himſelfe vnto the view of the Chriſtians, and ſent 3000 Tartars to paſſe the riuer: of whom the Chriſtians ſlew a great number with their great ſhot, and put the reſt to flight. Both the armies were populous and ſtrong, and couered a great deale of ground, a moſt goodly ſight to behold: both drunke of the ſame riuer, as well the men as their horſes, and therfore kept continuall watch all that night on both ſides of the riuer, eſpecially at the paſſage. In the morning betwixt ſix and C ſeuen a clocke, Mahomet with his army ranged in order of battell, came within ſight of the Chriſtians, his ſquadrons as it were couering all the country on that ſide of the riuer as far as the Chriſtians could well ſee; and now again ſent part of his army ouer the riuer: with whom the Chriſtians skirmiſhed from morning till night, both the armies parted but by the riuer, all this while ſtanding faſt, and as it were facing the one the other. But being at length on both ſides well wearied, and many ſlaine, the Turks retired again ouer the riuer to the camp: in the mean time (as if it had bin by conſent) they reſolued on both ſides the next day to try the fortune of a battell; and ſo commandement was giuen through both the armies, for euery man againſt a certaine appointed time to make himſelfe ready. So the next day, being the 26 of October, Mahomet brought forth his army again out of his campe, which was not far from the D Chriſtians; and began now to draw downe towards the riuer. Neere vnto this place were the ruines of an old church, where Mahomet placed certain companies of Ianizaries, and 24 field pieces, and commanded ten thouſand of his ſelect ſouldiers to paſſe the riuer, which they readily did. The Chriſtians alſo ready for battell, and now thinking it time vpon the comming ouer of the enemy to begin; with part of their army thereunto appointed, ſo fiercely charged the Turks that were already come ouer, that they quickly ouerthrew them, and not them only, but certain companies of Tartars alſo that were in another place come ouer the riuer: and not ſo contented, but following them they had in chaſe, put to flight them alſo that ſtood on the farther ſide of the riuer, of whom they ſlew a great number, and by the comming on of the reſt of the army, tooke from them 190 great pieces of artillery: whereof ſo great a feare riſe in E the enemies campe, that Mahomet with Ibrahim the great Baſſa ſeeing the diſcomfiture of the army fled in all haſte towards Agria, ſhedding ſome teares by the way as he went, and wiping his eies with a piece of Mahomets garment, which hee for reuerence carried about him as a relique. It drew now towards night, and the Archduke was about to haue cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and that day to haue done no more. But the Tranſyluanian Prince, the Lord Palſi, and the reſt, perſuaded him in that ſo great feare of the enemy to proſecute the victory; and the rather, for that the Turks began againe to make head, and to repaire their diſordered battels. Wherefore the Chriſtians ſtill keeping their array, charged afreſh the front of the enemies reſtored battell, conſiſting of forty thouſand men, and that with ſuch violence, as that they in ſhort time had ſlaine the moſt part of them, and put the reſt to flight: and with the F like good fortune charging the body of the maine battell, forced the diſcouraged Turks with great ſlaughter into their owne campe. Now commandement was before giuen throughout the Chriſtian army, that no man vpon paine of death ſhould in ſeeking after ſpoile breake his array, or forſake his place, before the victory were aſſuredly gotten. But they in this hot purſute breaking together with the Turks into their tents, and there killing a great number of them,

A great and long skirmiſh betwixt the Turks & the Chriſtians.

Ten thouſand Turks paſſe the riuer, and are together with the Tartars put to flight.

them,and ſeeing in euery place great ſtore of rich ſpoile, contrary to the aforeſaid commandement, G left the purſuit of their enemy, and diſorderly fell to the ſpoile of the tents, vntill they came to the very tent of the great Sultan. But here began all the miſchiefe, with a moſt ſudden change of fortune. For here theſe greedy diſordered men,not now worthy the name of ſoldiers, light vpon a ſtrong ſquadron of reſolute men, with good ſtore of great ordnance ready charged, which they diſcharged amongſt the thickeſt of their enemies, and rent in ſunder a number of them,and after that came on reſolutely themſelues : when in the meane time Ciela Baſſa with his horſemen yet vntouched, brake in vpon them alſo, and with the terrour of his comming brought ſuch a feare vpon them,that they began amaine to fly,eſpecially the Hungarians & Germans,moſt buſied in the ſpoile.Neither could they in that feare, by any threats or intreaty of their commanders be perſuaded to make a ſtand, or ſo much as once to looke H backe,or to ſhew any token of true valour : which their haſty flight was the ouerthrow not of themſelues only,but of others alſo that would haue fought ; for whilſt they fled headlong vpon the ſpur,and could not be ſtaid, they ouerran their own footmen, and ſo furthered the enemies victory. Thus for want of good order, through the greedy couetouſneſſe of a ſort of diſordered men,the moſt notable victory that euer the Chriſtians were like to haue had ouer the Turks,was let ſlip out of their hands. Many noble gentlemen & commanders,in ſeeking to ſtay the flight of their own men,were here ſlaine:& although the enemy followed the chaſe ſcarce halfe a mile,yet were the Chriſtians poſſeſſed with ſuch a feare,that they fled amaine all ouer the country with greater ſhame than loſſe,no man purſuing them. The Archduke himſelfe ſeeing all deſperat fled to Caſſouia. The Tranſyluanian of all others moſt orderly retired himſelfe I towards Tocaij,hauing not loſt in this battell aboue 200 men, and of them neuer a man of name. All this loſſe he imputed to the couetouſneſſe of the Hungarians, and cowardiſe of the German horſemen. The Lord Brenſtein hauing charge of the great artillery, fled alſo, and made ſhift for himſelfe,as did Palfi,and in fine all the reſt. Neither was the feare leſſe amongſt the Turks(a wonderful thing to be ſpoken)than it was among the Chriſtians:for the night following they for fear of the return of the Chriſtians, truſſing vp the beſt of their things,fled alſo towards Agria. And it was afterwards known,that the Turks great ordnance, tents,and baggage ſtood three daies in their trenches,either altogether vngarded,or ſo ſlenderly garded, as that they might haue bin eaſily taken by the Chriſtians,if they would but haue made head again.
Yea, Mahomet himſelfe is reported oftentimes to haue confeſſed the danger and feare he K was then in to haue bin taken,and al his army deſtroied,if the Chriſtians had(as they ſhould) purſued the victory, and not ſo baſely run after the ſpoile : by which danger he then warned, afterwards euer ſhunned to aduenture his perſon to the like perill in the field. In this battel of Kareſta(for ſo it is of a place thereby called)and at the ſiege of Agria, were loſt of the Chriſtians about 20000,and of the Turks 60000. Mahomet after this victory fortified Agria,and for the keeping thereof left in it 10000 ſoldiers,and ſo returned to Belgrade.

Twentie thouſand Chriſtians ſlain, & threeſcore thouſand Turks.

Vacia beſieged by the Baſſa of Buda.

The Baſſa of Buda perſuading himſelfe that the Chriſtians after ſo great an ouerthrow could not this yere to any purpoſe recouer their ſtrength, came with all the power he was able to make,and the fourth of Nouember beſieged Vacia,in hope to haue eaſily carried it:but finding there greater reſiſtance than he had before imagined,& hearing that the diſperſed Chriſtians L in the vpper part of Hungary were making head for to come to the reliefe of the towne, he more afraid than hurt,brake vp his ſiege, and ſo returned to Buda:for indeed the diſperſed reliques of the late army of the Chriſtians were drawing together,but vnarmed and vnſeruiceable, as hauing in the laſt flight ſhamefully caſt away their armes, and therefore could haue done the Baſſa ſmall harme if he had continued the ſiege.

Mahomet thinking it honor enough for him to haue thus won Agria, and driuen the Chriſtians out of the field,diuided his army into two parts at Belgrade: whereof the one he billetted in the countrey thereabout, to be ready for all euents, and with the other he returned to Conſtantinople:but by the way he was ſet vpon by Barthelius [illegible] the Tranſyluanian princes Lieutenant, and the Vayuod of Valachia, who with a great power both of horſe and foot M being got ouer the riuer Danubius,and ſecretly fauored by the country people,lay in ambuſh for him in places of aduantage,and ſtill following in the taile of his army,cut off 7000 of his men before he could be rid of them:and ſo with much trouble arriued at length at Conſtantinople, where we will for this yeare leaue him,vntill we heare of him more.

A Maximilian with a ſmall retinue arriued at Vienna in the later end of Nouember, where he found the Viſcont of Burgaw, Swartzenburg, and ſome other of the commanders of his late army; moſt of the reſt, eſpecially the Italians, being ſlaine. The ſmall remainder of this vnfortunat yere was ſpent with often skirmiſhes and inrodes one into anothers frontiers, as the maner of war is, without any great thing done worth the remembrance.

Rodolph the Chriſtian Emperor, notwithſtanding the late diſcomfiture of his army not farre from Agria, made choice again of his brother Maximilian the Archduke for the managing of his forces for his next yeares wars againſt the Turke. Whereunto the Pope by his legat Fran.
Aldobrandino promiſed of his owne charge to ſend him 10000 Italians, vnder the conduct of the Duke of Mantua; as did alſo the German Princes their wonted aid, with ſome others. All B which ſlowly at length meeting together neere vnto Poſſonium and Altenburg, in the months of Iuly and Auguſt; departing thence, marched to Pappa, which after eight daies hard ſiege they tooke, and ſo again retyred to Altenburg, where they took a generall muſter of the army, and afterwards in the beginning of September ſhewed themſelues before the ſtrong town of Rab: where the lord Bernſtein approching too neere the walls, was with a ſhot ſlaine. Neuertheleſſe the reſt there ſtaied, vntill that hearing of the comming of Mahomet Baſſa the Turks Generall with a great army, they left the ſiege, and the 24 day of September paſſing ouer the riuer Danubius, into the Iſland Schut towards Comara, there on the North ſide of the riuer encamped. Where they had not lien paſt 8 daies, but that the caſtle of Dotis ſtanding vpon the South ſide of Danubius, was by the Baſſa before their faces, and as it were euen vnder their C noſes beſieged and taken; the whole army of the Chriſtians in the meane time as idle beholders looking on, but not daring to relieue their diſtreſſed friends: but afterwards ariſing, marched to Vacia; where hearing of the Turks comming againſt them from Peſth, they ſet fire on the caſtle, and ſo retired alongſt the North ſide of the riuer, vntil they came ouer againſt Vicegrade a caſtle of their owne on the farther ſide of Danubius; where by the good direction of the lord George Baſta a moſt expert captaine, and lieutenant Generall of the army, they encamped ſo ſtrongly, as that the Turks after many braue attempts giuen to haue forced them in their trenches, were glad with ſome loſſe to depart.

Pappa taken by the Chriſtians.

Dotis taken by the Turks.

Neither went things this yere better forward with the Chriſtians in other places than in this ſide of Hungary: for Sigiſmund the Tranſiluanian prince by his Chancelor beſieging the ſtrong D city of Temeſwar in October, was by the valor of the defendants, and the vnſeaſonableneſſe of the weather enforced to raiſe his ſiege, and with diſhonor to depart. Michael alſo the Vayuod of Valachia, who moued with the example and perſuaſions of the Tranſyluanian Prince, had reuolted from the Turks, and don them great harme (as is in part before declared) now wearied with their often inuaſions and the ſpoile of his country, almoſt brought to vtter deſolation, many thouſands of his ſubiects being by the Turks and Tartars carried away captiues, and his townes and caſtles for moſt part raſed; to giue his people a time of breathing, ſubmitted himſelfe againe vnto the Turkiſh obeiſance, ſolemnly receiuing at the hands of one of the Turks Chiaus (for that purpoſe ſent from Conſtantinople) an enſigne in token of his ſubmiſſion vnto the Turkiſh Emperor, as alſo of his fauor towards him. Which the more to aſſure him of, he E by another honorable meſſenger ſhortly after receiued from Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperour more kind letters than at any time before, with the confirmation of the Vayuodſhip of Valachia by the grand Seignior his ſolemne oath, vnto Michael the Vayuod and his ſon Peter, then about thirteene yeares old, for the terme of both their liues, without diſturbance, paying but the halfe of the old yearely tribute by the Turks before demanded. So glad they were vpon any condition to haue reduced that martial man with his country vnto their obeiſance: and in token of further grace, together with thoſe letters he receiued alſo a goodly horſe, moſt richly furniſhed, with a faire ſcimiter and an horſemans mace, in ſigne of the martiall power and gouerment committed vnto him by the great Sultan Mahomet. All which goodly gifts and honors the Vayuod ſeemed thankfully to accept: neuertheleſſe not daring too far to truſt vnto F the Turkiſh faith, of the ſmall aſſurance whereof he had before had ſufficient experience, he ſtill kept ſtrong garriſons vpon the frontiers of his countrey, with ſuch other forces alſo as he was wont, excuſing the ſame to be done for feare of the Tartars; by whom he alſo excuſed himſelfe, for not going with the Turks Generall this yeare into Hungary, as he was by ſpeciall meſſengers from the grand Seignior himſelfe requeſted; telling him that he might not in any caſe ſo to do, for feare of the Tartars moſt horrible incurſions, and the ſpoiles of his country: yet knew he right well, how that they were by the great Sultan his expreſſe commandement charged not to do any harme either in Moldauia or Valachia, as they went into Hungary. But this wary Vayuod not greatly truſting either the Sultan or them, as alſo loth himſelfe a Chriſtian to go againſt the Chriſtians his friends and late confederats, excuſed himſelf by the neceſſary care he had of his ſubiects and country, and ſo requeſted that his reaſonable excuſe to be in good part of the great Sultan accepted: but of him more is to be ſaid hereafter. Thus paſſed this yeare without any great thing done more than is before declared; both theſe great Princes, the Emperor and the Turkiſh Sultan, being warned by the laſt yeres work, what it was to put al to the fortune of a battel: & therfore now contenting themſelues to haue ſhewed their 1598 forces; as not afraid one of the other, countenanced this yeres wars more in ſhews than deeds.

What great things might by the Chriſtian Princes at vnity amongſt themſelues be done againſt the Turk, is by the conſiderat right eaſily to be gathered: but eſpecially by the notable victory of the famous Tranſyluanian Prince Sigiſmund, who confederated but with his poore oppreſſed neighbours the Valachians and Moldauians, and ſtrengthened with ſome ſmall aid from the Emperor and the Hungarians, not only deliuered thoſe three countries from the heauy burthen of the Turkiſh thraldom, but vanquiſhed alſo their moſt renowned captains, ouerthrew their mighty armies, burnt and ſpoiled their Countries, raſed their townes and cities; which as it hath been before in part declared, ſo if it ſhould be all particularly ſet downe, beſides that it would be tedious, ſo alſo might it haply ſeem almoſt incredible. Beſide which calamities of war (commonly more felt of the ſubiect than of the Prince) the great Sultan himſelfe found no ſmall wants, as well in his coffers, as other his neceſſary ſupplies for the maintenance of his wars, eſpecially in Hungary; the only countrey of Moldauia before theſe troubles yeelding vnto him yerely a tun of gold, 2000 horſes for ſeruice, 10000 great meaſures of wheat, with as much barly, and a wonderfull proportion of butter, hony, and other victuals; the other two prouinces paying the like or more, as a yerely tribute: whereof he had of late, to his great diſcontentment, by the generall reuolt of theſe three countries bin quite diſappointed. But this ſo wholeſome a confederation (to the great hurt of the Chriſtian commonweale, and benefit of the Turks) now broken, and Moldauia by the Polonians diſſeuered from the reſt, and againe made tributary to the Turke, as is before declared, and now Valachia alſo in a ſort acknowledging the Turks obeiſance, the noble Tranſyluanian prince, who hitherto with great cheerfulneſſe and courage had fought the moſt Chriſtian battels againſt the Turke, now left as it were all alone, and doubting how with his own ſmall forces to be able long to defend his country againſt the Turke and the Polonian, whom he feared not much leſſe than him: leſt the ſame ſhould together with himſelf, fal into the hands of the Turks or ſome other his enemies, by a wonderful change voluntarily reſigned this his countrey of Tranſyluania vnto Rodolph the Chriſtian Emperor and his heires for euer: and ſo leauing his wife in Tranſyluania, went himſelf into Sileſia, there to take poſſeſſion of the Dukedomes of Oppel and Ratibor, which together with the yerely penſion of 50000 Ioachims, or the reuenues of the Biſhoprick of Vratiſlauia, he had in lieu thereof receiued of the Emperor: whereupon the poſſeſſion of Tranſyluania, by the generall conſent of all the States of that country was in the beginning of this yere 1598, deliuered vnto the Archbiſhop of Vacia, the County Nadaſti, and Dr Petzi the Emperors commiſſioners; and a ſolemne oath of obedience and loyalty taken of them all in generall: albeit the aforeſaid Commiſſioners, as alſo the Emperour himſelfe would haue perſuaded the Prince, either not at all, or at leaſtwiſe not ſo ſuddenly to haue forſaken his country, but to haue ſtill kept the gouernment thereof himſelfe yet for a yeare or two; well foreſeeing, that the ſame could not ſo conueniently be gouerned by any other, as by himſelfe, a naturall Prince therein borne, and exceedingly beloued of his ſubiects. The ſame Commiſſioners alſo in Iune following, going into Valachia, there tooke the like oath of obedience of Michael the Vayuod and his people: who loathing the Turkiſh ſoueraignty, all willingly yeelded themſelues vnto the Emperors protection. Theſe commiſſioners alſo at the ſame time came to agreement with the Tartars Embaſſadors, offering vnto the Emperor peace and aid for the yearely penſion of 40000 duckats, and as many ſheep-skin-gownes, their vſuall manner of apparell.

A great tribute:

The Prince of Tranſyluania reſigneth his country vnto the Emperor.

Michael the Vayuod ſubmitteth himſelfe with his people vnto the Emperors protection.

All this while continued the Diet of the Empire, begun in December laſt paſt at Ratisbon, Matthias the Emperors brother being there his deputy, & in his Maieſties name demanding

A greater aid for the maintenance of his wars againſt the Turks the common enemy, than was by the Princes and States of the Empire offered: where after great and long deliberation, a large proportion was by them all agreed vpon for the defraying of the charges of thoſe wars, and defence of the Chriſtian commonweale, to be paied in three yeares next, and ſo thereupon was the aſſembly diſſolued. But as they were returning home, behold, contrary to all hope, Rab one of the ſtrongeſt fortreſſes in Chriſtendome, three yeares before betraied vnto the Turks by County Hardeck, was now by the wiſedome and valor of Adolphus Baron of Swartzenburg, the Emperours Lieutenant in the lower Hungary, againe recouered, to the great griefe of the Turks, and wonderfull rejoycing of the Chriſtians, in ſuch ſort as followeth:

Two Italian priſoners flying out of Rab, diſcouer the ſtate of the towne to the Lord Swartzenburg.

This noble gentleman the lord Swartzenburg, of no leſſe courage then experience, then lying B at Comara, and ſtill in doubt leſt the Turks ſo neer vnto him at Rab, ſhould attempt ſomthing againſt him and his charge, prouided for his owne defence all that Winter time with a ſtrong garriſon, keeping continuall watch and ward, although it were as then no time for the enemy with any army to keepe the field. So Winter paſſing, and the Spring approching, it fortuned that the 22 day of March, about 7 a clocke in the night, the gates being ſhut, were heard neere vnder the walls of the towne, two men, who by their ſpeech ſeemed to be Italians: with great inſtance requeſting, for the ſafegard of their liues, to be let in, for feare of the enemies purſuit: Which by one of the ſentinels was forthwith reported vnto the Gouernor: who doubting it to be ſome ſubtill practiſe of the enemy, commanded them there to take their fortune vntill the morning: at which time they were receiued into the city, and being brought before the Go- C uernor, proſtrating themſelues forthwith at his feet, pittifully requeſted him to haue compaſſion of their miſery, & to comfort them with his charitable relief, that ſo they might at length returne againe into their country. Who at the firſt asked them, what countrymen they were, and from whence they came at that time of the night? Whereunto they anſwered, That they were Italians, and that they had but euen then eſcaped out of the cruell hands of the Turks at Rab. But deſiring to know of them ſome news, they after their manner humbled themſelues, ſhewing by their geſture not to know any: Yet would he needs vnderſtand of them the particularities, when and how they were taken by the Turks, and the means they had vſed to eſcape out of that cruell ſeruitude, in all order as had befalne them. Where the yonger of them beginning, told him, that now almoſt two yeres ago, at ſuch time as the Chriſtians were ouerthrown D by the Turks vnder Agria, and euery man in that confuſion then ſeeking the beſt and neereſt way to ſaue themſelues; they hauing by flight now eſcaped the greateſt danger of the enemy, and ſo trauelling ouer the country towards Vienna, were to their great misfortune (by an hundred Turks come out of Rab to ſcoure the country, and to ſeeke after prey) taken priſoners, and as ſlaues committed to the chaine, where they had almoſt two yeres, vntill now, with great patience ſerued. Theſe two fugitiues by their outward appearance ſeemed to be men of good ſpirit and valor, which cauſed the Gouernor the more deſirous to know of them the meanes they had vſed for their eſcape. So the yonger proceeding in his tale, gaue him to vnderſtand of the whole matter, telling him, That they had bin three months before ſtill carefully deuiſing how to recouer their loſt liberty, which now ſeemed to make ſome offer of it ſelfe vnto them: for E that ſince the time that the Emperors army riſe the laſt yere from before the towne, they were not kept ſo ſtreit or looked vnto as before, but lay as men by the Turks not much regarded: which cauſed them the more cheerfully to take the offer of the time, and to reſolue either the ſooner to die, or to ſet themſelues at liberty. And that ſo one day as they were carrying certain munition from the palace of Giaffer Baſſa for the ſoldiers, they ſecretly conueied three pieces of cord of ſome reaſonable bigneſſe, therwith by night to let themſelues down from the wall, and as as they might to eſcape: which ſtolne cord that it ſhould not be ſeene, and ſo their purpoſe ſuſpected, they buried in the ground. But the night being come for them to effect in, what they had ſo long deſired, and they roming vp and downe in the darke, and ſtill finding one let or other, they were enforced for that time to ſtay, and to defer it vntill the night following: F which being come, and choice made of a moſt conuenient place, they made faſt the cord aboue, and ſo thereby ſlid downe, firſt the elder, and then the younger; who not knowing how to ſwimme, was yet by the good direction and helpe of his fellow conducted ouer vnto the farther ſide of the broad and deepe ditch: and that ſo, in the night (ſo darke as that one of them could hardly ſee the other) they were come by chance to Comara, thinking to haue taken the way to Vienna. The Gouernour, thus fully inſtructed of their eſcape, demanded of them further, how the ſtrong towne of Rab was by the Turks gouerned and garded: who told G him, very euill, and with ſmall care, eſpecially ſince the departure of the Emperors campe: and alſo that foure gates of the towne were filled vp with earth, which if they were broken open, would all fal into the town ditch, and ſo further them that would attempt to enter: with diuers other particularities. Whereof the Gouernor hauing well conſidered, thought with himſelfe, that if by ſome ingenious deuice he might by night with ſome good ſtrength vpon the ſodden enter the towne, it haply might be ſo againe recouered. Vpon which ſo great a deſignement he thought good to conſult further with the Lord Palſi, whom he requeſted, in all haſt & with as much ſecrecy as was poſſible, with 1600 foot, and as many horſe as he could make, to come vnto him to Comara. Who vpon this aduertiſement ſtaid not, but preſently giuing order vnto his men, ſet forward by night, and the 26 of March before day, with 1400 foot, and 120 horſe H arriued at Comara; where they were all joyfully receiued, and the gates after they were entered again faſt ſhut, & ſo kept for feare of the enemies ſecret ſpies; of whom no man can be too wary, be he neuer ſo wiſe. Now whileſt theſe ſoldiers were refreſhing themſelues, in the meane time the Gouernor with the Lord Palſi diſcourſed to the full concerning the intended enter-priſe: which reſolued vpon, they found themſelues vpon the view of their men to haue 2600 foot of the garriſon ſoldiers, and 300 horſe all good and couragious men, and well appointed for the intended ſeruice: who there ſtaying two daies after their comming, and many of them in the meane time (after the manner of their religion) confeſſing themſelues, and receiuing the Sacrament, were become ſo couragious, as that they doubted not in the quarrel of the Chriſti- I an religion to encounter a far greater number of the Turks than themſelues. And the more to ſtir them vp, the Lord Palſi at the ſame time deliuered vnto them a notable ſpeech; not for all that telling them whither they were to go: but, That they were his Chriſtian ſoldiers and brethren, vnder his leading both of long and late time: who neuer by him deceiued of their wonted pay at ſuch time as it was due, would not now as he hoped forſake him. And albeit that he well knew them to haue deſerued at his hands a greater contentment; neuertheles being him-ſelfe depriued of his reuenue by theſe late warres, and his poſſeſſions ſubiect euery houre vnto the incurſions of the Turks, could not therfore according to his deſire, and their deſerts, ſhew vnto them the great good will he bare them: Yet now and euen preſently was come the time wherein they might not only abundantly enrich themſelues, but alſo adorne their heads with K an immortall crowne of glory, and make themſelues for euer famous, by performing the moſt happy and glorious exploit that euer was by valiant ſouldiers attempted or atchieued in that part of the World. And to the intent that they might know how dearely he accounted of the life and honor of euery one of them, he would therefore himſelfe with the Lord Swartzenburg (of whom proceeded all that faire deuice and new ſtratagem) be preſent with them in the action: and that therefore they were not to thinke that they were led forth to any priuat danger, farther than their commanders themſelues; whoſe folly were to be accounted great, if raſhly and vpon no good ground they ſhould aduenture their liues and honours together: whereof they ought not now to doubt, hauing by a thouſand proofes known, how much they had beene of them always regarded. And that therefore it behoued them ſo much the more to ſhew their L valor in this piece of ſeruice, vndertaken for the great benefit of the Chriſtian commonweale, and the honour of Chriſt Ieſu, vnto whom they were with one accord to make their praiers, with his mighty hand to ſtrengthen their hearts, and with glorious victorie to bring to happy end the intended exploit againſt his enemies, to the honour of his name, and the aduancement of the Chriſtian religion and faith. At the end of which ſpeech all the ſouldiers cried aloud, That they were moſt ready to do any their commands, and to follow them whitherſoeuer.

So order was taken, that within three houres they ſhould euery man be preaſt and ready with their armes according to their places: and ſo hauing well refreſhed themſelues, about eleuen of clocke the ſeuen and twentieth day of March they in good order began to ſet forwards toward Rab. But for that the multitude of ſouldiers oftentimes giueth the enemy warning of M that is intended againſt him; Palſi gaue order to one Iohn Stroine his Sergeant Maior, to follow faire and ſoftly after him, with 1700 horſe and foot, which he well performed. And ſo vpon the breake of the day they began to draw towards Rab, and there lay cloſe in ambuſh all that day vntill night, about ſeuen miles ſhort of the towne, refreſhing themſelues in the meane

A time with plenty of victuals, which they had brought with them from Comara. Night (the fauourer of deceit) being come, in two houres march they began to draw neere to Rab, and there ſtaied about fiue houres: from whence they ſent before them a French enginer, a man of great judgement, with thirteen others (before rewarded with 1500 duckats) hauing with them 4 petards, engines of force to blow vp into the aire any thing whereunto they be faſtened, be it neuer ſo great and weighty; where by good chance they found the draw-bridge downe, and the portculleis vp: for that the Turks then caſting no perill, expected euery houre for certain waggons with prouiſion from Alba Regalis. By which good hap the Chriſtians vnperceiued comming to the gate, and thereunto faſtning their petards, in good order gaue fire to the ſame, which preſently tooke not hold: yet were they not fargon, but that they were by a ſentinell diſcried, B who demanding what they were, was preſently anſwered by the violent engines, which in a trice tore in ſunder the gate, with ſome part of the wall & of the fortifications neere vnto it. When now the watch (but all too late) began to giue the alarme, and the Chriſtians in the foreward thruſting preſently in, tooke the gate, none of the Turks yet comming to the defence thereof, or to hinder them from entring. The firſt that appeared were 200 Turks, which with their wonted cry Alla, Alla, in ſuch hidious maner as if they would therewith haue rent the heauens, would haue ſtaied the Chriſtians for farther entring, but were themſelues ouercharged by 300 which were already entred. At which time alſo the Baſſa came on with more than a thouſand following him, and that with ſuch courage and fury as was neuer greater to be ſeene in any Turke: where after a moſt terrible fight maintained by the ſpace of two houres, the Baſſa C himſelfe being ſlaine, the Turks began a little to retire, whereby a thouſand Chriſtians moe had leiſure to enter: when ſtreitway after came Graffer the great Baſſa with aboue 1000 tall ſoldiers following him, all the inhabitants alſo of Rab running after him, and that with ſuch force, that they conſtrained the Chriſtians to retire vnto the gate whereby they entred. Who reſolued rather honorably to die within the towne, than with diſhonor to be forced out, there with incredible courage ſuſtained the greateſt impreſſion of the furious enemy: where was to be ſeene the true Chriſtian valour for the performance of ſo great an exploit well worthy of eternall memory. But this Baſſa alſo (the other being dead of a wound in his necke) encountered by the Lord Swartzenburg, after he had in that ſharpe conflict ſhewed great tokens of his valour, was there at length ſlaine alſo: both whoſe heads ſtrucke off, were for a preſent after- D wards ſent to the Emperor at Prague, with all the particularities of the whole action. But now the Turks perceiuing that all their chief commanders were ſlain, retired moſt part of them into the city: ſome 300 of them crept vnderneath one of the bulwarks, where ſtood certain barrels of gunpouder, which they deſperatly ſet on fire, and ſo together with themſelues blew vp 300 Chriſtians that were aboue vpon the bulwarke; the greateſt loſſe the Chriſtians had in all that victory, who were otherwiſe ſuppoſed not to loſe therein aboue 200 of their men. Thus the Turks diſcomfited, and altogether full of feare, loſing both their force and courage, fled in euery place before the Chriſtians, they in euery corner making of them a moſt horrible ſlaughter. The Turkiſh women all this while out of their windowes and other high places, ceaſed not to caſt downe ſtones, timber, and ſuch like things vpon the heads of the Chriſtians, whom E they thought by all means to annoy, and to helpe the Turks. The bloudy execution continued all that day vntill night, the Chriſtians ſtill finding one or other hidden in the moſt ſecret places of the city, vpon whom to exerciſe their wrath: who ranſacking alſo euery corner thereof, were by the wealth therein found greatly enriched. But comming to the palace of Graffer the great Baſſa, they found ſuch great ſtore of rich furniture, as better beſeemed ſome great Prince than a Turkiſh ſlaue. There they found alſo letters written in characters of gold from the Baſſa of Buda to this Baſſa, greeting him, and promiſing him in his behalfe to deale with the Grand Seignior agaiſt the next Spring, with the firſt that his army ſhould take the field, that he might therin haue ſome honorable place of command, to the end he might in the field ſhew his great valour, and no longer lie idle in that ſtrong towne. So found they there alſo F many things written from the great Sultan himſelfe vnto this Baſſa, with great ſtore of coine, which all fell to the ſouldiers ſhare; inſomuch that by this ſo notable an exploit ſo well performed, the publique State, together with ths ſouldiers priuat was not a little bettered. There amongſt other things were recouered threeſcore and ſix pieces of Artillery, which were knowne to haue been ſometime the Emperors, and foure and twenty others, which the Baſſa had had cauſed to be brought from Buda, with great ſtore of ſhot and pouder and other ſmall pieces, and meale ſufficient to haue ſerued foure thouſand men for a yeare and a halfe, but of wine (little vſed of the Turks) onely foure veſſels. In the Baſſaes palace was alſo found of armour and weapons of all ſorts great ſtore, with aboundance of cloath and apparell, which was all giuen in ſpoile to the ſouldiers. Thus Rab one of the ſtrongeſt fortreſſes of Chriſtendome, not full foure yeares before beſieged by Sinan Baſſa with an hundred and fifty thouſand men, by the ſpace almoſt of three monoths, and then at length by the treaſon of the gouerner to him betraied; was now in one night by the valour and policy of a few reſolute men, to their immortall glory againe reſtored to the Chriſtian commonwealth the nineteenth day of March in the yeare 1598. Of which ſo notable a victory the Chriſtians rejoyced not a little both in Hungary and elſewhere: the great Sultan with the Turks no leſſe grieuing and ſtorming, as well for the loſſe of the towne, before got with no ſmall charge, as for the death of his people there ſlaine, to the number of about ſix thouſand and moe, with the loſſe of ſcarce ſix hundred Chriſtians.

A great tumult betweene the Ianizaries and the Spahi.

Yet for all this, Mahomet the great Sultan ceaſed not to make great prouiſion for his war in Hungary, and that greater than before, and ſo with greater fury alſo to proſecute his wrathfull indignation to be reuenged vpon the Chriſtians. Whereupon order was giuen vnto Ibraim Baſſa his brother in law, and Generall of his army, with all conuenient ſpeed to take the field; which for all that fell out far otherwiſe; for that now thinking to haue had all things in good forwardneſſe, a great diſſention riſe betwixt the Ianizaries and the Spahi; the Ianizaries being the beſt footmen, and the Spahi the beſt horſemen of the Turkiſh Empire; both the faithfull keepers of the perſon of their Prince, and the greateſt ſtrength of his ſtate: whereby it commeth to paſſe, that in ſetting forward towards the wars, theſe two ſorts of valiant ſoldiers, the one ſtanding vpon their ſtrength, and the other vpon their honor, and both jealous of their reputation and credit, haue no good liking of one the other, but oftentimes, and eſpecially of late in this corruption of their martiall diſcipline vnder their degenerate Emperours, fall at odds among themſelues, as now they did, to the great hinderance of their affairs, and trouble of their General. Inſomuch that to appeaſe this tumult he was glad to put to death certaine of the inſolent Ianizaries refuſing to ſet forward as they were by their Aga commanded. But proceeding further, and thinking to haue executed ſome others of them alſo, to the further terrour of the reſt, he was by them and their adherents put in ſuch feare of his life, that to auoid the preſent danger, he was glad to excuſe himſelfe by his lieutenant, laying all the blame vpon him as the cauſe thereof: who was therefore as a ſacrifice deliuered vnto the fury of the Ianizaries, by whom he was there preſently ſlain, with ſome others of the Baſſa's followers. So theſe broiles with much ado ouerpaſt, Ibrahim hauing taken a generall review of his army at Sophia, there ſtaied, expecting order from the great Sultan where to begin his wars, in Hungary or in Tranſyluania; for as yet that was in queſtion: which could not well be before the beginning of Iuly, by reaſon of the ſcarcity of victuals euen then ariſing in the camp; for the ſupplying whereof Mahomet himſelfe had no ſmall care. But this long delay was the cauſe that a great number of the Ianizaries comming from Hadrianople, and hearing by the way, that the Generall would not as yet ſet forward; not knowing the cauſe of his ſtay, and doubting to be deceiued of their promiſed entertainment, were about to haue returned backe againe: which known at the court, commandment was preſently ſent thence vnto the General, without longer ſtay to ſet forward toward Hungary, which the more haſtened his departure with his army.

In this the Turks ſo long delay, the Chriſtians had good leiſure to prepare their new forces, being now the latter end of Summer: for well they might thinke that the enemy ſlept not, knowing what prouiſion he had made as well in Conſtantinople as in other places. Wherefore reaſonably doubting, that Summer well ſpent, and Auguſt now at hand, he would not ſo late turne his forces into the lower Hungary, they thought it beſt to prouide for the ſafety of the vpper countrey: And to the end that the enemy approching thoſe frontiers, might there finde forces ready to encounter him, the lord George Baſta a man of great experience and valor was appointed Lieutenant Generall for that countrey; to the great contentment of the ſoldiers in generall, all ſhewing themſelues moſt ready at his command. The Lord Swartzenburg in the meane time remaining in the lower Hungary at Rab, with eight thouſand good ſoldiers: and the Archduke Matthias at Vienna for the diſpatch of George Baſta, and the haſting

A of him forward: for that the vpper Hungary, to the great hurt thereof, began now to feele the incurſions of the Turks and Tartars. Beſides that, he was afterward to return himſelf to ſpeak with the Emperor his brother, ſtill expecting a Chiaus of the Turkes by the appointment of the grand Seignior, ſent by the way of Polonia for Prague, to intreat with the Emperor concerning a peace.

Buda beſieged by the Chriſtians.

They of Buda in the mean while ſeeing the delay of the Turkes, of whom not one band yet appeared in thoſe quarters; and on the other ſide perceiuing the great preparation of the Imperials, and the great garriſon at Rab ſo neer at hand; began now to doubt ſome new reſolution of the Chriſtians: wherein they were no whit deceiued; for no army of the Turks being in field in the lower Hungary, and the country plain and open, the Lord Palſi with a conuenient B power, & certain pieces of battery, ſet forward to attempt the enterpriſe, and the 16 of October with 16 pieces of artillery began to batter the city of Buda, to the great fear and diſcomfiture of them within: hauing firſt taken the fort S. Gerard, with hope to haue gained the reſt alſo. For which cauſe, the men, the women, and all that dwelt in the City, moſt inſtantly beſought the Baſſa, not to endure the deſtruction of the ſame, with the inhabitants and wealth therof altogether; but being not able to hold out againſt ſo furious a battery, in time to hearken to ſome reaſonable compoſition, that ſo they might yet euery man at leaſt with life depart. Whereunto the Baſſa for all that would not hearken, but put them ſtill in hope, that they ſhould be preſently relieued. Howbeit the batterie ſtill continuing, and they not able longer to endure the force of the Imperials, nor any relief yet comming, they were glad at C length to abandon the city with the loſſe of two thouſand of the Ianizaries, and but 300 of the Chriſtians ſlain, and 800 hurt: the reſt of the Turks at the ſame time retyring themſelues into the caſtle, where they might for a ſpace deem themſelues ſafe. So the Lord Palſi poſſeſſed of the city, with all his forces laid ſiege vnto caſtle, which although it were in ſome places ſhaken with the continuall fury of the cannon, yet were the defendants ſtil ready to make good the ſame: inſomuch that Palſi in good hope of ſucces, giuing thereunto a general aſſault, was by their valor inforced to retyre, they within in the mean time with great labor and induſtry repairing the breaches made by the artillery. So that Palſi conſidering the difficultie of the aſſault, thought it better by vndermining to ſhake the rocke whereon the caſtle ſtood, than by a new aſſault to expoſe ſo many worthy men to ſo manifeſt a danger. Which his purpoſe D by the enemy diſcouered, was by them alſo by countermining diſappointed. Yet for all that were the Chriſtians ſtill in good hope, by another mine not yet by the enemy perceiued, to attain to the full of their deſire; and the more, for that they ſaw not ſo much brauery or ſhew of courage in the defendants as before: Who now kept themſelues ſilent and quiet, as if they had bin conſulting about yeelding vp of the caſtle, as men bereft of all hope of reliefe or ſuccor. The Chriſtians hauing now poſſeſſed of a ſtrong abby and fortreſſe faſt by, and hauing broken down all the bridges ouer the riuer Danubius; in ſuch ſort as that the beſieged could receiue no relief either by land or water. But forſomuch as the time of the year began now to grow tedious, and the winter weather ſharpe, the Chriſtians thought it not beſt there long to protract the time, and therfore reſolued to preſent vnto the caſtle another general aſſault, and E at the ſame time to blow vp the mine: but in giuing this aſſault they were againe repulſed, with the loſſe of 200 men. At which time alſo a number of Turks ſallying out of the Caſtle couragiouſly incountred the Chriſtians, but not with ſucces anſwerable to their valor, being there almoſt all cut in pieces. Neither did the mine take the deſired effect, but being blown vp did little or no harm at all. So the Chriſtians weary of their long ſuffering of the extreamitie of the weather, and withall conſidering the great courage of the defendants, were euen vpon the point to haue riſen: yet willing to giue a freſh attempt vpon the mine, they began again to work in the ſame, and hoping to preuail, began to parley with the defendants about yeelding vp of the caſtle. But all to little or no purpoſe; for that the mine hauing taken no effect, the ſoldiers could hardly be drawn on through the deep and muddy ditches to giue a F new aſſault. In fine, ſeeing no hope to preuail, and hearing alſo of the comming of a great Army of the Turks for the relief of the beſieged, they raiſed the ſiege, and at their departure burnt their ſuburbs, carrying away with them a great booty; and ſo retyring towards Strigonium, expected further direction in what places to winter. Where ſhortly after order was taken, that the forces disbanded ſhould be diſperſed, ſome into garriſons, and ſome into the country therabout;to the intent they might ſo be in the more readineſſe with the firſt of G the next Spring to take the field,or as occaſion ſhould ſerue,to be otherwiſe imploied.

But Sigiſmund the Tranſylvanian prince in the mean time repenting himſelf of the vnequal change he had made with the Emperour, in diſguiſed apparel haſting in poſt out of Sileſia, came to Clauſenburg in Tranſylvania, and there was ioyfully receiued of his ſubiects; and taking of them a new oath of obedience, by meſſengers ſent of purpoſe certified Maximilian the Archduke (appointed by the Emperour for the gouernment of Tranſylvania, and now vpon his way as far as Caſſovia) of the cauſes of his return; perſuading him rather to conuert his forces againſt the Turks, for the recouery of Agria, than to trouble himſelf to come any farther for Tranſylvania, now againe by him to the great contentment of his ſubiects repoſſeſſed.
As did alſo the Princeſſe his wife (Maximilian his Couſin germane;) wiſhing him H to conſider, what hurt and diſhonour hee ſhould do vnto the Emperour his Maieſty, himſelfe, the Roman Empire, and the whole Chriſtian Commonweale in generall, if in ſo dangerous a time hee ſhould attempt any thing againſt the Prince her husband; and vnto him by her ſo neerly allyed.

Veradinum beſieged by the Turks.

Now the Turks great army being come into the vpper Hungary, lay incamped vnder the walls of the ſtrong city of Veradinum, where that worthy Captaine George Baſta was Lieutenant General for the Emperor; but not hauing ſufficient ſtrength to go againſt ſo mighty an enemy, or to relieue the beſieged city, hauing as then but a weak gariſon; he gaue knowledge therof to Maximilian the Archduke, who (as is aforeſaid) with a conuenient power was but a little before come to Caſſovia, to goe into Tranſylvania, had hee not there by the way been I ſtayed by Embaſſadors from Prince Sigiſmund, but lately before returned out of Sileſia; and hauing again taken vpon him the gouernment, by theſe his Embaſſadours requeſted him, no further to trouble himſelf in that journy; offring to giue him aid againſt the Turks whenſoeuer he ſhould require it. The beſieged neuertheles in the mean time notably defended themſelues, and with certain braue ſallies did the enemy great harm: ſtil expecting that Baſta the Lieutenant, or the Tranſylvanian prince, or Maximilian the Archduke, or they all with their vnited forces, ſhould ſend them relief. Vnto whom they gaue knowledge the 19 of October, how that the Turks with all the force and fury they had vſed, had as yet little preuailed, beeing by their valor ſtil repulſed, and with many ſharpe ſallies to their great loſſe incountered, and ſome of their great ordnance cloied; in ſuch ſort, as that they were in good hope to protract K the time vntil they might by them their friends be relieued: yet not doubting but that the Turks according to their wonted maner would do what they might to ſubdue them. According to whoſe expectation, the Tranſylvanian prince with a great power taking the field to haue relieued them, was letted ſo to do by the Tartars, to that purpoſe ſtirred vp by the Turks: ſo that he could by no means join his forces with Maximilian, for looking to the ſafety of his own people and country. Yet in token of forwardnes he ſent certain Companies of braue ſoldiers vnto the Lieutenant Baſta; who vnderſtanding that of two thouſand good ſoldiers in garriſon in the city in the beginning of the ſiege, there were ſcarce 700 left aliue, all the reſt being with continuall aſſaults either ſlain or mortally wounded; vſed a notable ſtratagem L to delude the enemy withall; for hauing put his men in good order, and comming brauely on, as if he would euen haue preſently joined battel (which the Turkes moſt deſired) whilſt they likewiſe with great ſtirre were putting themſelues in order of battell, and wholly buſied therin, he by another way of the Turks leaſt ſuſpected, cunningly thruſt into the City Veradinum relieued.

800 good ſoldiers; and that don, preſently retyred again into his trenches, wherin he ſtrongly incamped, feared not all the Turks forces: who thinking euen then to haue come to a day of battel, and ſtil in vain expecting the ſame, returned deceiued by this fineneſſe. And ſo ſhortly after, inforced by continual foul weather, raiſed their ſiege, not without great difficultie and danger (reliefe lying ſo neer at hand, and the defendants ſtrengthned with new ſupplies) to haue bin longer maintained. So paſſed the troubles of this year with no gain but great loſſe of the Turks: who at their departure inforced by the vnſeaſonablenes of the weather, & ſome M together, left behinde them in their trenches many Tents, with ſome great pieces of Artillerie, being not able to conuey the ſame by water to Buda; and withal fearing greatly to be incountred by the forces of Baſta, ſtrengthned with new ſupplies euen then ſent vnto him from the Emperor.

A The Archduke Matthias, Swartzenburg, and the other commanders of the army in the lower Hungary, being twelue thouſand ſtrong, with the garriſon ſoldiers of Rab, Strigonium, & Komara, in the mean time becauſe they would not ſtand idle, together with the Hungarian horſmen, ouer-ran all the country therabouts euen vnto the gates of Buda; in good hope alſo to haue met with eight thouſand Turks (as they were by their eſpials aduertiſed) comming toward Peſth with victuals for relief of the caſtle of Buda.

Whilſt things thus paſſed in Hungary, Mahomet to ſhew his greatnes, as alſo the more to keep the Chriſtian princes in ſuſpence, ſent Cicala Baſſa (or as the Turks call him Cigala) his Admiral with a great fleet to ſea: wherwith being come vpon the coaſt of Sicilia, he requeſted the Viceroy of that kingdom, to ſend him aboord his fleet the Lady Lucretia his mother, B who dwelt in Meſſana, for that he greatly deſired to ſee her, and to do her honor; promiſing ſo quietly to depart without any harm doing. And the Viceroy again conſidering, how that the angry renegat for the like curteſie to him at another time before denied, had in his rage done great harm all alongſt the ſea coaſt; couenanting with him to ſend her in ſafety back againe, ſent her honorably accompanied aboord the Admiral gally: whom Cicala her ſonne receiued with great ioy and triumph, and hauing kept her with him one day with all the honour that might be, according to his promiſe ſent her backe againe to Meſſana, and ſo without any harme done for her ſake to any part of Chriſtendom, peaceably returned back again with his Fleet.

Now in the mean time Michael the Vayuod of Valachia with good forces of his owne, bee-C cauſe he would be doing ſomthing alſo, reſolued to giue an attempt vpon Nicopolis, a City of the Turks in Bulgaria: and ſo giuing order to his people, cauſed a bridge to be made ouer Danubius, to paſſe that great riuer by. Wherof the Baſſa's of Siliſtria and Badoua vnderſtanding, thought it good with al their power to diſturb him in that work: & ſo comming as the ſaid bridge was by the Vayuods ſoldiers layd ouer the riuer vpon boats; without further ſtay attempted to haue broken the ſame, to the intent that the Vayuod ſhould not that way paſſe. Who haſting thither with his army, reſcued his work, and inforced the Baſſa's to forſake the exploit by them begun: where betwixt them for a ſpace was fought a moſt hard conflict, till at length the Turks were with a great ſlaughter ouerthrown, & ſo glad, ſome here, ſome there, by flight as they might to ſaue their liues. After which victorie, he without let paſſing ouer D the riuer with his whole forces, came and incamped vnder the wals of Nicopolis; where they of the city vnderſtanding of the late ſlaughter of the Turkes, and finding themſelues vnable to hold it out againſt the force and valor of the Valachies, and now out of hope of any help or relief to come in time from the Turkes, without further reſiſtance yeelded themſelues into the power of the Vayuod, who hauing ſacked the city and ſet it on fire, carried thence a great ſpoil and booty, with a number of the Bulgarians, chuſing out the beſt and moſt able bodies among them to ſerue him in his wars, and appointing the reſt to inhabit and manure the waſted places of Valachia. The report of this ouerthrow giuen vnto the Turks by the Valachian, with the ſacking of Nicopolis, running abroad, brought a general feare vpon the Turkes euen in the Imperial city of Conſtantinople. For the ſtaying wherof, Mahomet commaunded E the chief of his Baſſaes, with a great power of tumultuary ſoldiers taken vp in haſt, to go forthwith againſt the Vayuod, to ſtay the courſe of his further proceedings, to the diſmaying of his people, himſelf thundering out moſt horrible threats againſt him. Who incouraged with his late victorie, and wel acquainted with the Turks maners, litle regarded the ſame, as knowing that he was not with words but with arms to be vanquiſhed.

Nicopolis ſackt and burnt by the Vayuod.

Now Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperor oppreſſed with melancholy, to ſee himſelf at once aſſailed with the plague then raging at Conſtantinople, the bloudy Wars in Hungary, and the horrible mortalitie and loſſe of his people in both places, and withal not ignorant of the euil ſucceſſe of his Army at Veradinum, and of the great harm don at Nicopolis by the Valachian, yet for all that ceaſed not in what he might to prouide for ſo many euills, but gaue order F to Tuic Baſſa with all ſpeed to ſet forwards (as wee haue ſaid) from Conſtantinople towards Valachia, as from whence he feared the greateſt danger. Who without delay to make the Vayuod to vnderſtand how highly the great Sultan was diſpleaſed with him, put himſelf vpon the way with ſix hundred Ianizaries towards Hadrianople, with purpoſe there to Winter vntil the next Spring, and ſo to expect the comming of the reſt of the Army, that ſo with the ſame, vnited to the forces of Mehemet Satergi (who the laſt year beſieged Veradinum) he might appear the more terrible vnto his enemies. The Chriſtian Emperor alſo at the ſame time reſted much diſcontented, that his people in ſo fair a way for the winning of the caſtle of Buda, had yet failed therof. The Wallons laying the fault vpon the Lords Swartzenburg, Palfi, & the reſt of the commanders, that it was not won; for that when they as valiant men offred to haue don therin the vtmoſt of their deuoir, their leaders had made choice by the ſpade & mattock, rather than by the ſword, to perform the ſame.

The Turkes again ſpoiled by the Vayuod.

But Michael the Vayuod ſeeing the Turks not a little diſmaied with the ſacking of Nicopolis, began afreſh to their greater terror and hurt to make new inrodes vpon them, in ſuch ſort, as that he was entred an hundred miles into their territory; againſt whom Mehemet Satergi (as yet the Turks General in Hungary) comming with his forces, he again retyred, carying away with him the ſpoil of the country by him waſted.

They of Buda in the mean time fearing ſome ſudden aſſault to be giuen vpon them, & ſuffering within great want of victuals, expected long to be relieued both with victuals & other neceſſaries: vnderſtanding yet withall, That the grand Seignior had cauſed it to be giuen out at Conſtantinople, That he was raiſing a great power of his beſt and moſt expert ſoldiers, and had therfore ſent for vnto the court all his old men of war, ſuch as had ſerued in the Wars of Perſia, to be now again imploied in Hungary. Where the Turks in the mean time prouiding to relieue the diſtreſſed city of Buda both with men and many other neceſſaries, certain reſolute Hungarians vnderſtanding by their eſpials, that one of the Turks Baſſa's with 3000 ſoldiers was comming thither to increaſe the garriſon, laid themſelues cloſe in ambuſh in a place wherby the Turks were to paſſe. Where they had not long ſtaied, but that the Turkes without fear diſorderedly paſſing by, were by them with ſuch force and fury aſſailed, that in a moment, when they leaſt thought, they were ouerthrowne and put to flight, with the loſſe of many of their horſes, much mony & jewels, and many captiues there taken priſoners: the Baſſa himſelf with much ado hardly eſcaping into the City. But ſhortly after, 400 Chriſtians ſcouring the country about Buda, and hauing taken a good booty of cattel and other pillage, returning loded with the prey, were by the way aſſaulted by the Turkes, and inforced to forſake the ſame, and to fight for their liues: whom for all that they notably repulſed, with the ſlaughter of diuers of them, and ſo again recouering their booty, returned with victory. And about this time or not long after in the vpper Hungary, a great power of the Turks and Tartars hauing forraged a great part of that country, and don the Chriſtians much harme, came before Caſſovia, making ſhew as if they would euen preſently haue beſieged that city. Which put the inhabitants in ſuch a fear, that many of them without further deliberation fled forthwith as faſt as they could into the mountaines, thinking themſelues more ſafe there, than in the city. Neuertheleſſe by the perſuaſion of George Baſta the Emperours lieutenant in thoſe parts, 2000 valiant and expert ſoldiers ſtaid there with him, expecting what the Turks would do: who approching the walls, demanded of them in the city a great ſum of money by way of contribution, threatning otherwiſe the vtter ruin and deſtruction therof. Which their proud demand was by Baſta ſtoutly rejected, and they with the loſſe of a great many of their liues inforced to get them farther off. Wherfore ſeeing themſelues not able to preuaile againſt a city ſo wel furniſhed, they for feare by night riſe, and departed quite another way than that wherby they came, doing great harm ſtil as they went. The free Haiducks of Valachia alſo, a warlike kind of people liuing for moſt part vpon prey, & willing to ſhew ſome token of their hatred toward the Turks, by certain bridges paſſing ouer the Danubius, encountred with the Baſſa of Natolia with a great power, whome they ouerthrew with much ſlaughter of his people, and the loſſe of his brother there ſlain alſo; and ſo afterwards ouer-running the country, did there exceeding great harm, and took the ſon of the ſame Baſſa priſoner. Thus paſſed the Winter, with many light ſkirmiſhes and incurſions in diuers parts of Hungary and other the frontier countries; which had don great harm, had it not beene before hand well prouided for by the Imperials; who in moſt places ſtrengthned with new ſupplies, ſtayd the fury of their barbarous enemies. Maximilian the Archduke in the mean time comming from Prague vnto Vienna, found himſelfe there to haue in his Campe but foure and twenty thouſand Foot and ten thouſand horſe ready againſt the next Spring (diuers of the German Princes this year not ſending thither any aid at all, by reaſon of their troubles neerer home with the Spaniards

A the Spaniards in the lower ſide of Germany) which made him the more to dread the enemies comming, who he knew after his accuſtomed manner would the next ſummer appeare in the field with a far greater number. But to his further hinderance, the great Duke of Muſcouie about this time, by his Embaſſador amongſt other things requeſted leaue of the Polonian, for forty thouſand horſemen to paſſe thorow his country, which horſemen he determined (as he ſaid) to ſend in aid of the Emperor againſt the Turke. Which his requeſt the Polonian would by no means grant, as dangerous to his eſtate. Wherefore the Muſcouit offended with the Polonian, ſent other his Embaſſadors to the Emperor by ſea, who embarqued in an Engliſh ſhip in the port S. Nicolas, and ſailing about the kingdoms of Sweden, Norway and Denmark, after long trouble at ſea, at length arriued at Stoad, and ſo from thence by land trauelled to B Hamborow, Lubeck and Maidenborow, & in euery place honorably entertained, came at laſt to the Emperour into Bohemia, then lying at Pilſen, for that the plague was very hot at Prague: where they hauing with great ſtate deliuered their Preſents and letters of credence vnto the Emperor, had audience, and were by him moſt honorably vſed. Yet the Polonian hauing thus denied the Muſcovit paſſage, ſuffered the Turks Embaſſador (who called himſelfe Gabriel) a Iew, to paſſe through his countrey vnto the Emperour, to intreat with him of a peace to bee made betwixt him and the Turk. Which Gabriel comming to Prague as Embaſſadour from the Great Turke, and hauing no Letters of Credence to ſhew for his Negotiation (for that they were, as he ſaid, vpon the way taken from him by the Polonian Coſſacks, and certaine of his retinue ſlaine) was there taken for a Spie, and ſo ſent to Vienna: where at his firſt arriuall C he was well vſed in a common Inne; but the night following, beeing taken in his chamber by the Marſhal, was ſo clapt faſt in priſon, with as many irons vpon him as he could beare; and all his followers with gyves vpon their legs compelled as Slaues daily to worke in the Towne-Ditch.

About this time alſo Sigiſmund the Tranſyluanian Prince (whom hitherto all men admired, as a man euen ſent from heauen, for the benefit of his countrey and of the Chriſtian Commonweal) by a wonderfull change gaue a moſt manifeſt token of a diuers and vnconſtant nature, to the great wonder of the world; for hauing broken the agreement made with the Emperor the laſt yeare, and being ſecretly in poſt returned out of Sileſia into Tranſylvania, and again taken vpon him the gouernment (as is before declared) and hauing withall requeſted D himſelf & the Tranſylvanians his countrymen to be diſcharged of the oath of obedience and loyaltie by them before giuen vnto the Emperor; and the city of Varadinum with the Country therabout, to be again reſtored vnto him; and the Emperor pauſing therupon; did now, (doubting of his own abilitie for the keeping of that country) in the beginning of this yeare 1599, by his Embaſſadors, the Biſhop of Alba-Iulia and Stephen Paſchas his Chancellor, ſent of purpoſe vnto the Emperour, requeſt him to haue the firſt agreements again renewed, and the Principalitie of Trebnits in Morauia to be added to the two dukedoms of Oppel and Ratibor in Sileſia, with fifteen thouſand ducats to be yearly paid vnto him out of the Chamber of the Empire; and a generall pardon giuen vnto all the Tranſylvanians, that following him, had of late reuolted from the Emperour, and their antient Liberties to be vnto euery one of E them again confirmed. With all which Conditions obtained at the Emperours hands (as of him who ſaw how needfull it was for him by any meanes to keepe that ſtrong Countrey in his power) the ſame Embaſſadours with their diſpatch returned from Prague the nineteenth of April.

But Sigiſmund in the mean time at home, was entred into new conceits with certaine of the Polonian Nobility, far differing from the former agreement with the Emperour: and hauing ſent for one of the Turkes Chiaus from Conſtantinople, and for his Couſin Andrew Bathor the proud Cardinall out of Boruſia, and ſo meeting with them in an obſcure Village in the Confines of Tranſylvania towards Polonia, accompanied with certaine of the chiefeſt of the States of his Countrey: there in the preſence of the Polonians and of the Turkiſh Embaſſa- F dour, reſigned all the right and title he had in the Countrey of Tranſylvania, vnto the Cardinal his couſin, commanding all the States there preſent, to ſweare vnto him their obedience and fidelity: who ſhortly after together with the Polonian Embaſſadour, ſent one of his eſpeciall Fauourits to Conſtantinople, to deſire ſafe conduct for his Embaſſadours to be ſent thither to conclude of all matters with the Turke. Which meſſenger ſo ſent, together with the Polonian Embaſſador, were both curteouſly intertained in the Turks court, and in token of ſpecial fauor rewarded with ſumptuous garments, and charge giuen them, That the Cardinall within three months next ſhould ſend thither a ſolemne Embaſſador, with the old accuſtomed tribute by the Turk demanded. Thus through the inconſtancie of the Prince, the ambition of the proud Cardinal, and the foule colluſion of the Polonian, the Countrey of Tranſylvania (one of the ſtrongeſt fortreſſes of that ſide of Chriſtendome) falling from the Emperors obedience, and ſo in a ſort cut off from the Chriſtian commonweal, became again tributary vnto the Turk: moſt good men deteſting the lightnes of the one, the ambition of the other, and the ſlines of the third.

Now the Turks of Buda not able longer to endure the great famine therein, had moſt earneſtly intreated relief from the other Turks their friends in Hungary; who on all hands ran to haue relieued them: but comming neere thereunto, could not put in ſuch prouiſion as they had brought for relief of the ſame, being letted ſo to do by the Imperials, who about a league off diligently attended euery motion of the enemy: from whence the Lord Swartzenburg in the night ſecretly approching one of the gates with his followers, thought with a petard to haue broken it open, and ſo to haue entred. Which his deuice taking not effect, as did that at Rab (the gate being within ſtrongly fortified by the enemy) he was inforced to depart, being alſo diſcouered by the Turkes from the wall. Now ſhortly after, the Baſſa of Buda with ſix hundred horſe iſſuing out of the city, to haue met with victuals that were comming thither, fel into the hands of the Haiducks, who after their maner fiercely incountering him, put him to flight, and took him priſoner, his horſe in the chaſe falling vnder him: whom his ſouldiers ſeeking to reſcue, there began a new skirmiſh, which increaſed their former ouerthrow, with the loſſe of the greateſt part of them that were left; amongſt whom the Baſſa's ſon, with the Aga of the Ianizaries, there loſt their liues alſo. Which conflict thus ended, the Baſſa was in ſafety brought to the camp, and there with great threats inforced to reueal the ſtate of his city, with other the ſecret deſignes of the Turks. Whereupon the Haiduckes returned back toward Buda, ſeeking by all means to ſtop the comming of victuals thither, ſo in hope at length to haue gained the diſtreſſed city. But whilſt they thus lay vpon the paſſages, behold, news was brought them, That the Baſſa of Boſna, with the Sanzacks of Sigeth, Quinque Eccleſiæ, and Coppan, with 10000 Turks were comming to oppreſſe them, and to open the paſſages by them holden. But they knowing their own ſtrength, and nothing fearing ſo ſmal forces, ſtaid not for their comming, but went to meet them; and in a place of good aduantage waiting for them, vpon their firſt appearance, with great aſſurance and courage charged them, brake their array, and ſlew the moſt part of them, together with the Baſſa himſelf; yet with ſo much ado, as had not the Lord Palfi in good time ſent in vnto their aid certain companies of freſh men, it was not without cauſe doubted, but that the Haiducks had bin put to the worſe, about 300 of them hauing there already loſt their liues. The Tartars yet neuertheles in good number held on their way towards Buda, with purpoſe to haue ouerrun the country, and ſo haue withdrawn the Imperials from the city: but foraſmuch as that baſe nation was known to be good for nothing but to rob and ſpoil, the Lord Swartzenburgs Regiment onely going againſt them, and incountering them ouerthrew them, in ſuch ſort that part of them beeing there ſlaine in fight, and part for fear driuen into Danubie, the greater number of them there moſt miſerably periſhed.

The Baſſa of Boſna ſlain.

Baſta the Emperors lieutenant in the vpper Hungary, at the ſame time lay at Caſſovia with eighteen thouſand men, doubting leſt the enemies army, which he heard to be at hand, ſhould come to beſiege that City. In the meane time Ibrahim Baſſa Generall of the Turkes forces came to Solnoc, with an army of fifty thouſand ſtrong, amongſt whom were ten thouſand Ianizaries. But for all that, vnderſtanding that Baſta nothing diſmaied, awaited his comming at Caſſovia, not thinking it good to go any farther (his ſouldiers being already wearyed with long trauell) neither yet ſafe there to ſtay ſo neer vnto his ſtrong enemy, retyred backe againe vnto Belgrade, a place of more ſtrength and ſecurity, expecting a great fleet of ſhips, which charged vpon the Danubius were to bring victuals for the army, as alſo for the relief of Buda, Alba-Regalis, and other ſuch diſtreſſed places, with diuers great pieces for battery, and other leſſe artillery vpon cariages, with a number of wagons and other inſtruments of Warre, declaring their purpoſe for the performance of ſome notable exployt; all guarded with fiue thouſand

The Turks receiue a great ouerthrow by the Chriſtians.

A ſand Turkes which conducted it vp the riuer. Of all which the Imperials vnderſtanding, the Lord Palſi diſpatched his Lieutenant with a conuenient power, and the Captain of the Huſſars with his followers being good and valiant ſoldiers, to cut off this Conuoy: who ſuddenly aſſailing them, and ſo comming to a hand fight, cut them in pieces, & rifled the ſhips, of whom the greater part were there ſunk in the deep riuer, and ſo took an exceeding great booty, deemed to be worth a million of gold: where among other things of great value, there was found aboord 100000 Dollars, which were all diuided among the ſoldiers as a reward of their trauell. This great ouerthrow once known at Buda, Alba-Regalis, and the Cities thereabouts, brought vpon them a generall feare, yea, the army of Ibrahim grew therby much diſcontented, as being at once diſappointed both of their victuals and their pay. Beſides that, the Imperi- B als ouerran all the country thereabout, ranſacking, ſacking, and deſtroying all the country villages and caſtles without mercy, although the poor inhabitants offered them a large Contribution to haue ſtayd their fury, which would not be accepted. Vpon this notable ouerthrow alſo, the Lord Swartzenburg was determined with all his forces to come again to the ſiege of Buda, in hope in ſo great a diſcomfiture and want of victuals to haue had it deliuered to him; and for that purpoſe ſent for certaine great pieces of Artillery to Vienna. But whileſt things went thus wel in the lower Hungary, Colonel Rodoler of S. Andrews in the vpper country, took occaſion alſo vpon this ouerthrow of the Turkes, with 500 horſe and 600 foot to ſhew himſelf with this ſmall company before Agria, hauing yet left the greateſt part of his forces a little off in ſecret ambuſh. Which ſmall company the Baſſa of Agria beholding, preſently put C himſelf in arms, and ſo ſallying out, began a hot and braue skirmiſh, when ſuddenly the other ſoldiers left in ambuſh, ſtarting out, and couragiouſly aſſailing their enemies, brake their order & put them to flight, purſuing them at the heels euen to the gates of the city: & had there bin a greater force of footmen, it was verily thought that the Turks, diſmaid with the flight, and altogether confounded, had abandoned the defence of the place, and the Chriſtians had become maſters of the city, which had bin the cauſe of their notable ouerthrow in the yeare 1596. Neuertheleſſe they with great brauery and ſmal loſſe retyred, hauing ſlain a great number of the Turks, and carying away with them 100 priſoners, with a booty of 500 horſe, and much other cattel.

The free Haiducks alſo ſtrengthned with new ſupplies, had don great harm in the country D about Buda, ſcouring freely all ouer it without any reſiſtance: for which cauſe the poor Chriſtians which yet dwelt in that Country, riſe vp againſt the Turkes, promiſing their obedience vnto the Emperor: and moreouer, to the intent they might be no more moleſted by the Imperials, offered to take vp arms themſelues againſt the enemy, & to the vtmoſt of their power to hinder his paſſage both by land and water. Theſe ſame Haiducks alſo had broken down all the bridges which the Turks had made betwixt Buda & Alba-regalis, to the end they ſhould not that way commodiouſly bring either victuals or munition from the one place vnto the other. And the Lord Palſi and Nadaſti vnderſtanding by their eſpials, that the Tartars diuided into three companies, had ouerran a great part of the country, and with a great booty were retyring toward Buda; preſently went out againſt them, and inforced them to fight: which E barbarous people better inured to filching, there loſt all their liues, together with that they had before ſtoln. After which victory, theſe valiant men turning their forces againſt certaine other places of the Turks there by, took two of their caſtles, with much rich ſpoil, which Caſtles they ſacked and burnt, together with the great towne of Zolna, breaking downe alſo the bridge vpon the riuer Trava.

Now at this time the Turkes of Buda held themſelues male-content within the City, hauing no Gouernor, their Baſſa being before taken by the Haiduckes, and they themſelues pinched alſo with great want of victuals. Wherfore doubting ſome ſudden attempt of the Chriſtians, as men diſmaied, for their better ſafety retired themſelues into the Caſtle, a place of great ſtrength, leauing the city to the Imperials, who ready to beſiege it, but doubting of the F Turks great Army, which as they heard was marching thitherwards, the auauntgard thereof being come to Mohatſch, where Sartes Baſſa was alſo looked for, (the report being giuen out, That the Turks hauing relieued Buda, would go to beſiege Caniſia or elſe Strigonium) they ſtayed to goe any farther, as men in doubt what to reſolue vpon. So certaine Colonels and other Captaines were ſent with their ſouldiers, to fortifie certaine paſſages whereby the Turks army was to paſſe. The reſt in the meane time retyring, for that the puiſſant enemy began G now to approch, as alſo for that they knew the great deſire that Ibrahim Baſſa had to recouer again Strigonium, and had therfore ſent a great number of Tartars to forrage and waſt the country, and ſo ſuddenly hauing relieued Buda and Agria, there to reſolue whither to turn his forces. The Imperials in the meane time incamping betwixt Hatuan and Zolnoc, to hinder the Turks from victualling of Buda, as they deſired, cut off fiue hundred of them at their first arriual, who to that purpoſe were going toward Buda, and tooke alſo one of the Turks Chiaus priſoner; who ſent from Ibrahim the Generall was going to Agria, to put them in hope of their ſpeedy relief. They alſo at the ſame time attempted to haue ſurpriſed Zolnoc, where a good number of them with certain petards approching the gates, in hope ſo to haue broken them open, being diſcouered by the watch were inforced to retyre, leauing forty behind them ſlain, H and carrying away with them many moe of their fellowes wounded: In reuenge whereof the reſt ſhewed their fury vpon the country therabout, deſtroying the villages, & intercepting a great deal of munition, which together with other victuals, they met by the way as it was going toward Buda and Agria.

Turkes

Summer now almoſt ſpent, Ibrahim the great Baſſa in the beginning of September came to Buda, with an Army of an hundred and thirty thouſand ſtrong; and from thence in the name of his great lord and Maſter gaue the Emperour to vnderſtand, That for the ſauing of further effuſion of innocent bloud, and not for any fear or diſtruſt of his own ſtrength and power, hee could be content to hearken to ſome reaſonable conditions or treaty of peace: Whereunto both theſe great princes (hauing wel wearied themſelues with theſe long wars, and exhauſted I their Treaſures) ſeemed not now vnwilling; expecting, as was thought, nothing more, than for the honour to be firſt entreated. And the rather, for that the old Sultanneſſe Mahomet his mother (who by the weakenes of her ſonnes gouernment, ſuch as neuer was in any the Othoman Kings or Emperours before, did beare the greateſt ſway in his affaires) did what ſhee might to further the ſame. Wherefore in the later end of September a place was agreed vpon for a parley for peace, which was in an Iſland in the riuer of Danubius, beneath Strigonium. Whither the Lords Swartzenburg, Nadaſti, Palfi, and the Biſhop of Vacia being come for the Emperour; and Amurath Baſſa of Buda, with the Lieutenant Generall of the Tartars, and ſome others, for the grand Seigniour; The Turkes at the firſt, after their vnreaſonable manner, demaunded to haue Rab, Strigonium, Fileck, Setchin, and all the reſt of the Townes K and Caſtles in fiue years before taken from them by the Christians, to be now againe ſurrendred vnto them, with a certaine yearly tribute by the Emperor to be payd vnto the great Sultan at Conſtantinople; as alſo there to haue his Embaſſadour Lieger continually attending vpon the Turks Court: for which they offered to deliuer vnto the Emperour the city of Agria onely. All which their proud and vnreaſonable demands being by the aforeſaid Commiſſioners on the Emperors behalfe rejected, they were contented to come to ſome more reaſonable talke, offering to leaue vnto the Emperour Rab and Agria (whereof Rab was his own already) onely for Strigonium, exchanging as it were Strigonium for Agria. Which when it could neither be obtained, the parly was ſo broken off and nothing concluded; and ſo the wars again continued, without any memorable thing more this year betwixt them don, either L on the one ſide or on the other; the Chriſtians contenting themſelues to haue diſtreſſed the chief Cities the Turkes held in Hungary; and the Turkes no leſſe apayed to haue relieued the ſame.

A parly for Peace.

Michael the Vayuod inuadeth Tranſilvania.

But whilſt things thus paſſed betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks in Hungary, Michael the Vayuod of Valachia, yet the Emperors friend and Confederat, and vnder his protection; certainly informed his life to be ſought after in the Turks Court, by the ambitious Cardinal Bathor his enuious neighbour, but lately become the Prince of Tranſylvania, as is before declared; by commandement from the Emperor, and to be reuenged of ſo great a wrong, as alſo betimes to prouide for his owne ſafety, with an army of threeſcore thouſand ſtrong ſuddenly entred into Tranſylvania, in moſt horrible manner burning the countrey, and killing the people M before him as he went. Where whileſt the Cardinall (who was thought to haue purpoſed to haue ſerued him in like ſort, had hee not beene by him preuented) was making head againſt him: he in the meane time had the city of Corona (commonly called Braſſo) with the ſtrong caſtle of Fogaras yeelded vnto him: from whence hee marching towards Alba Iulia, A the 26 of October, with all his Army, before diuided into three parts, but now againe vnited, came into the plains neer Temiſon, about 3 leagues from Hermenſtat; where vnderſtanding that his lieutenant, corrupted by Ibrahim Baſſa, had promiſed to kil him, and now well aſſured therof, to rid himſelfe of that danger, with his owne hands preſently cut his throat, and ſo diſpatched him. When by and by after came vnto him the Popes Nuntio, ſent by a fineneſſe from the Cardinal, accompanied with another embaſſador, the better to countenance out the matter, telling him, That the ſame Embaſſador had commiſſion from the Emperour, to will him forthwith to deſiſt from armes, and without further delay to depart out of Tranſyluania. Which thing ſeeming vnto the Vayuod very ſtrange and almoſt impoſſible, he deſired to ſee the Commiſſion. Wherunto the Nuntio, before inſtructed, anſwered, that he had left it with B the Cardinal. But I (ſaid the Vayuod) haue another here preſent from the Emperor, of another purport, which I purpoſe fully to put in execution: Yet was he for that day intreated by the Nuntio to ſtay his army. And ſo in the mean time lying both ſtill and in great ſuſpence, the Vayuod deſired to know of the Nuntio, the cauſe why the Cardinal forgetting himſelf, ſo troubled that country by intruding himſelf therinto, to the great prejudice of them to whom it of better right belonged, not attending the gouernment of the Church, better beſeeming his calling than the mannaging of arms, to the diſturbance of the Chriſtian peace. Wherunto he receiued no anſwer. So the 28 of October, a day dedicated to the commemoration of the Apoſtles Simon and Iude, theſe meſſengers were ſent back again vnto the Cardinall: Who preſently returned them back vnto the Vayuod with new inſtructions (being then buſie with C his yong ſon, in ſetting his men in order of battell, preſently to go againſt the Cardinall) of whom they could get no other anſwer, but that he was reſolued forthwith to come vnto the triall of a battell with him. So the two Armies lying incamped not paſt a quarter of a league the one from the other, and the ſame day meeting together, joined a moſt terrible and cruell battell, which for the ſpace of fiue houres was with much deſperat reſolution fought, as if they had euery man vowed to haue caried away the victory ouer his enemy, or there to haue left themſelues dead vpon the ground; vntil the Cardinals people at length ouercome in a long and bloudy fight, were there vtterly ouerthrown: amongſt whom were 30000 Turks & Tartars, ſent vnto him from Ibrahim Baſſa the Turks General. The Cardinall himſelfe ſeeing the diſcomfiture of his army, was by ſome reported to haue ſaued himſelf by flight, but by others D was ſaid to haue bin drowned in paſſing a riuer, as hee fled from the Valachians that had him in chace. But the truth was, That the Vayuod now maſter of the field, ſent out certain troups of horſmen diuers waies fit to purſue him, and himſelf with the reſt of his Army proſecuting the victorie, came to the Cardinals camp, now by the Tranſyluanians & Turks forſaken, wherin he found 45 pieces of artillery, with great ſtore of coin & wealth, beſide a number of tents and horſes, all which became vnto him a prey. From thence he marched to Alba-Iulia, where he was with great ioy receiued of his friends and confederats there: for although the greater part of the Tranſyluanians, eſpecially the Nobilitie, had together with the Cardinal, ſubmitted themſelues to the Turks protection, & followed his enſignes; yet were there diuers others alſo who ſtil fauored the Emperour, and therfore rejoiced not a little at this victory. The Vai-

The Cardinall ouerthrown by the Vayuod, & his head ſent to the Emperor.

E uod after that ſent his Lieutenant to Claudiopolis, to ſee if they would yeeld alſo. Which they willingly did, with many other Cities and Caſtles in diuers parts of that Countrey, which hauing none to reſt vpon, now yeelded alſo; in ſuch ſort that ſhortly after, all Tranſyluania ſubmitted it ſelf againe vnto the Emperours obeyſance and ſwore vnto him obedience; moſt of the Nobility of the Countrey being either ſlaine in that battell, or afterwards put to death by the Vayuod: amongſt whom were fiue, which corrupted by the Cardinall, had before vndertaken to kill him. Now the fourteenth of Nouember, after diuers reports of the Cardinals eſcape, his vngracious head was for all that preſented vnto the Vayuod. Which to the terror of others being for a while ſet vp in Alba-Iulia, (where hee had but a little before commanded as a Prince) it was afterwards taken downe, and ſent as a Preſent from F the Vayuod vnto the Emperour and the Archdukes his brethren. His headleſſe body being afterwards by the commandement of the Vayuod honourably buried in a Monaſterie at Alba-Iulia, in the ſame Tombe which he had before made for his brother, beheaded by his couſin Prince Sigiſmund Bathor. The Cardinalls treaſure alſo fell into his hands, which was ſaid to haue bin valued at three millions of gold. Thus the Countrey of Tranſyluania, lately before by the Cardinal yeelded vnto the obeiſance of the Turke; was againe by this worthy Vayuod recouered and reſtored to the Chriſtian commonweal, the proud Cardinall caſt out and brought to confuſion, hauing not yet poſſeſſed theſe his new honours full eight months. His couſin Sigiſmund the late Tranſylvanian Prince, who almoſt all this while had ſtaied at Boruſia, and in diſguiſed apparel ſeen Dansk and diuers other the free cities therabouts, now hearing news of the Cardinals ouerthrow, ſecretly got him away into Polonia, to ſeek againe his new fortunes. The Lord Swartzenburg at the ſame time vniting his forces in the lower Hungary with them of Stiria, and now 20000 ſtrong, ſought by all means to reduce ſo many places vpon thoſe frontiers as he could, vnto the Emperours obeiſance, and ſo tooke in aboue 200 villages: but afterwards thinking to haue ſurpriſed the ſtrong caſtle of Capiſuar, and by night ſecretly approching one of the gates with a petard, which took not the expected effect, he was diſcouered by the watch, and ſo by the garriſon ſoldiers (now raiſed with the alarme) repulſed, and inforced to retyre with the loſſe of about a hundred men, & diuers others wounded, all men of good account. In reuenge whereof Swartzenburg afterwards ſent out diuers troups of horſmen, which ſcouring all ouer the country as far as Sigeth, did great harme, and ſo returning, caried away with them a great booty.

H

Ibrahim Baſſa hearing of this ouerthrow of the cardinal, with all the forces he had ſent him, much troubled therwith, ſent poſt news therof to Conſtantinople: the brute wherof brought a general fear vpon the whole city alſo; inſomuch that Commiſſion was forthwith ſent vnto him from the great Sultan, giuing him power (if it might bee) to come to ſome honourable peace with the Emperor, and to bring it with him to Conſtantinople, whither he was ſhortly to return, being now no longer time to keep the field with his army, which beſide the cold ſeaſon of the year, ſuffered great want of bread, the plague alſo raging therein, with the death of many his beſt ſoldiers both horſe and foot, beſides the wonderfull mortalitie of their Cattell alſo: in ſuch ſort that the ſoldiers not able longer to endure the famin and wants increaſing, fel to robbing one of another, and ſo at length into mutiny, wherin diuers of them being ſlain and cut in pieces by their fellows, the reſt for the moſt part brake in pieces of themſelues, and ſo by diuers waies returned home, not wel truſting one another. So that nothing more was now done with the preparation of the Turks, their Army being diſcomfited with wants and the euil ſucces of their affairs as wel in Hungary as in Tranſylvania. Neither did Ibrahim the great Baſſa, for relief of thoſe euils, at his return bring any concluſion of peace vnto his great Lord and Maſter, as was commonly expected.

The Baſſa of Caramania rebelleth againſt the Sultan.

Now beſide theſe troubles of Tranſylvania and the other reuolted countries, Cuſabin (or as ſome call him Caſſan) the ſon of one of the Sultaneſſes, brought vp in the Seraglio according to the maner therof, and hauing long ſerued in the wars of Perſia and Hungary, and at length made Baſſa of Caramania, a man of great ſpirit, and not able to endure the imperfections he daily ſaw in the Othoman empire, and the cowardiſe of the grand Seigniour, vpon the report of the euill ſucces of the affairs of Hungary on the one ſide, and the deſire hee ſaw in the Perſians to recouer their loſt fortreſſes, on the other, and grieued alſo with more particular wrongs concerning himſelf; as a man altogether diſcontented, reſolued to take vp arms; and calling vnto him his ſoldiers, and (as he was a wel ſpoken man) laying before them the deformities of the preſent ſtate, gallantly perſuaded them, with the promiſe of honor, ſoueraigntie, and rich rewards, what an eaſie thing it were to chaſe the grand Seignior out of Aſia, and to ſet themſelues with all that part of the empire at liberty. And ſo euen at the firſt hauing won vnto him three thouſand harquebuſiers, and 2000 horſmen, took the field, to the great hurt of the Turks, and trouble of their ſtate; a ſtrange matter in that tyrannicall gouernment. The news wherof comming poſt to the Court, commiſſion was forthwith directed vnto foure of the Sanzackes of Aſia neereſt vnto him, for the ſpeedy ſuppreſſion of that rebellion, but euen then ariſing. Whereof Cuſabin vnderſtanding, and that they with ten thouſand horſe and foot were comming to oppreſſe him; without further ſtay went couragiouſly to meet them, and ſo incountering of them, ouerthrew them with a great ſlaughter, and tooke from them their baggage, with ſix pieces of ordnance: and after with his people ſeiſed vpon all the caſtles therabouts, giuing whatſoeuer he found therin for a prey to his ſoldiers: who alſo much inriched themſelues with the ſpoil of the Iewes, as the people whom they moſt hated, and neuer reſted vntill he had made almoſt all the country of Caramania his owne. After that, hee

A laid ſiege to Cogna a city in the confines of Natolia, which was forthwith yeelded vnto him.
And yet not ſo contented, gaue it out by open proclamation, That for the reformation of the diſordered ſtate, he would ere long go to beſiege the Imperiall city of Conſtantinople: And therfore all ſuch as would follow him ſhould be intreated as his friends and companions; threatning vnto the reſt moſt cruel death and deſtruction. Of which his proceeding Mahomet (as then diſporting himſelfe in his gardens of pleaſure in the countrey all alongſt the ſide of Propontis) vnderſtanding, and fearing to be there ſurpriſed, or that ſome ſudden innouation might be raiſed in the city, haſted with all ſpeed to Conſtantinople, and from thence in haſte diſpatched Mehemet one of the Viſier Baſſa's the ſon of Sinan, with al the forces he could raiſe to go againſt him. Who paſſing ouer into Aſia with a great power, and yet fearing to come B to the trial of a battel with him,, whom he knew to be a man of himſelf deſperatly ſet, & not a little fauored of his own ſoldiers; ſo ſecretly wrought by large promiſes, that Cuſabins footmen were euen vpon the point to haue forſaken him. Which hee quickely perceiuing, fled forthwith thorow Syria into the countrey of Arabia with his horſemen and the horſemen of Simon the Georgian; purpoſing the next Spring by the help of the Arabians and Perſians, to appear in field with greater forces than before. After whom Mehemet the great Baſſa following, came with his army to Aleppo, there to winter, and to expect the return of the Rebell together with the Spring. This ſo dangerous a rebellion, with the troubles of Tranſylvania and Valachia, were the cauſe, that the grand Seignior, ſeeing himſelfe in ſo many places forſaken of his ſubiects, was the readier to encline vnto peace with the Emperour. Whereunto for all C that, the Emperor was not haſty to hearken but vpon honorable conditions; as knowing that the Turke required the ſame, not for that hee had any deſire to liue in quiet, but for that his troubled affairs both at home and elſwhere abroad ſo required, his Ianizaries and other men of war in this his ſo weak gouernment being grown ſo inſolent, as that they were hardly to be by him commanded; openly threatning in their diſcontented humors, not only to depoſe the chief officers about him, but himſelf alſo, and the baniſhment of the Sultaneſſe his mother; ſaying, That ſhe had bewitched him, to the end ſhe might her ſelfe rule, as indeed ſhe did in all his chiefeſt affairs. But the rebel Cuſabin the next year grown again very ſtrong, was now come into the field, and euen ready to haue giuen the Baſſa battell: Who as he was a man of great wiſedome and experience, well conſidering with what a deſperate enemy he had to doe, D thought it beſt again to proue, if his rebellious followers might by fair means be drawn from him: and ſo comming neer vnto him, by open proclamation promiſed a free and general pardon to all ſuch as had followed the rebel in thoſe Wars, if forſaking him they ſhould forthwith returne home to their dwellings, and ſo to the obedience of their iuſt and lawfull Prince and Soueraign. Which general pardon ſo proclaimed was the ruine of Cuſabin; for that the greateſt part of his followers, now inriched with the great booties they had gotten, and now alſo hauing free pardon offered them, returned home into their own Countries, there at eaſe to liue of their euil gotten goods; leauing their Captaine with ſome few others that ſtayed with him, with little hope to be ſaued. So that within a few daies after, Cuſabin thus forſaken of his followers, was himſelf taken and brought to Conſtantinople, where ſhortly after he E was with moſt exquiſit torments tortured to death.

Cuſabin taken and tortured to death at Conſtantinople.

1600.

The Emperor prepares againſt the Turks.

The troubles of this year thus paſt, Rodolph the Chriſtian Emperor with the beginning of the next (whilſt the ground yet couered with ſnow, and the vnſeaſonableneſſe of the weather would not ſuffer the ſoldiers to keep the field) cauſed a Diet of the princes of the Empire to be called, to conſider with him of ſuch helpes as were by them to bee giuen againſt the next Spring for the maintenance of the wars he yet had againſt the Turk. Who all promiſed to ſend their ſoldiers, with their pay and ſuch further contribution as might ſerue for the maintenance of that defenſiue war againſt the common enemy. Whereto alſo Clement now biſhop of Rome (this year of Iubilie) put to his helping hand, as he had often before, by ſending thither ſuch aid both of men & mony as he had before promiſed: ſo that by this means great preparation F was made by the Chriſtians for the taking of the field with the firſt of the Spring.
At which time the Turks alſo began to ſtir: who although Ibrahim Baſſa their Generall, by his great lords appointment, was then in ſome ſpeech with the Emperour about a peace; yet ceaſed not they in the meane time that this treaty was from day to day prolonged, with their troups diſperſed here and there, to do what harm they could vpon the frontiers of the Emperours rors territories, the cauſe why he with more ſpeed called vpon his friends for their promiſed G aid. And for the better mannaging of this yeares wars againſt the Turk, hee appointed Duke Mercury (who had drawn a great number of Frenchmen both horſe & foot out of France) General of all his forces, ſending Ferant GonZaga, ſyrnamed the Lame (whom for his approoued valour and experience in martiall affairs, he had ſent for to Mantua) gouernor into the vpper Hungary. So the ſouldiers now day by day by Companies reſorting from diuers parts into Auſtria, were from thence ſent to ſuch places as were by the Turks moſt moleſted, ſo to repres their often incurſions, as in many places they did. For eight thouſand of the Turks going out vpon the ſudden to haue ſurpriſed Pappa, were by the garriſon ſoldiers of the place incountered and ouerthrown. And on the other ſide, Whilſt Ferdinand the Archduke was aſſembling his people in Croatia, for the defence of that Country againſt the incurſions of the enemie, H ſix thouſand Turks without reſiſtance entering the ſame as far as Buccari, and burning the country villages as they went, had taken many priſoners, with a great booty of cattell: and ſo merry and out of feare, being about to return, were ſuddenly ſet vpon by County Berinus in certain ſtreit and troubleſome paſſages, where they leaſt feared any ſuch matter, & ouercharged with their prey, were (I ſay) eaſily by him for the moſt part ouerthrown, and the reſt put to flight, and ſo the priſoners with all the reſt of the booty again recouered. At the ſame time alſo one of the Imperial colonels with fifteen hundred horſe making an inrode into the country about Alba Regalis, and meeting with the Turks and Tartars therabouts, ſlew ſix hundred of them, and took diuers of their captains priſoners. Six thouſand other Tartars alſo, at this time returning out of Hungary home towards their own country, were by the Coſſacks neere I vnto the Black ſea ſet vpon with ſuch force, that many of them being ſlaine, the reſt for feare ran into the ſea, leauing all the prey they had got in Hungary, vnto their enemies. In the heat of theſe broiles, the noble Lord Palſi gouernor of Strigonium, a man that all his life long had don great ſeruice for his prince & country, and whom we haue ſo often in this hiſtory remembred,

The death of the lord Palſi.

died the three and twentieth day of May, in his Caſtle of Biberſpurg, to the great grief of many, but eſpecially the Hungarians his Countreymen. And for that Strigonium (ſo neer vnto the enemy) required in his ſtead to haue a right valiant and couragious Gouernour, the Emperour appointed the Lord Swartzenburg vnto that charge; the fame ſtill running, That Ibrahim Baſſa would come thither with the great army he was in prouiding, if the peace went not forward; which was now ſtill leſſe and leſſe hoped for, by reaſon of his proud and inſolent K demands.

A dangerous mutiny of the garriſon ſoldiers in Pappa.

But whileſt theſe troubles, with others too long to rehearſe, thus paſſed in diuers parts of this miſerable country of Hungary, 1200 Frenchmen and Wallons in garriſon at Pappa (a ſtrong frontier town of the Emperors in the lower Hungary) for want of pay began to mutine.
Wherfore it was thought good by the chief commanders, to haue them thence remoued and others placed in their roome. Which they perceiuing, and knowing themſelues too ſtrong for the reſt of the garriſon, all Hungarians and Almaines, not partakers of their conſpiracy; they firſt reſolued to thruſt their own captains out of the town, as leſs vnto their deſires; and then laying hands vpon Michael Marotti the pay-maſter, with other the Hungarian and Dutch L commanders with their ſoldiers, took from them their weapons, & caſt the ſaid Marotti, with the other captains, and ſome of the better ſort of the ſoldiers into irons, exacting of the reſt, as well Hungarians as Dutch, in number about a thouſand perſons, a thouſand ducats; threatning otherwiſe to deliuer them into the hands of the Turks. And albeit that Marotti offered for his liberty eighteen hundred ducats, yet would they not bee ſo contented, but ſpoiling both him and the reſt of all they had, with their apparell and weapons furniſhed ſuch Turkes as were there priſoners, and ſo ſent them away to Alba Regalis: and afterwards rifling euery mans houſe as if they had bin enemies, took from them whatſoeuer pleaſed themſelues: and that which was worſe, to encreaſe theſe outrages, compaſſed with the Turkes of Alba Regalis and Buda, for the pay which they ſaid the Emperour ought them, to deliuer vp the towne vnto them. Certifying them withall, how that the Lord Swartzenburg within two daies was M comming with money to giue them full contentment: promiſing, if he came into the town, to deliuer him with the ſame into their hands. Or to be the more ſure of him, they might if they ſo pleaſed, intercept him at the paſſage Zeſnegkh, whereby hee muſt needs come. For the more aſſurance of which their wicked purpoſe, they ſent an enſigne of the Emperors, as A token vnto the Turks at Alba-Regalis; who for all that altogether beleeued them not, yet willing further to try them, ſent them for hoſtages two Chiaus; for whom the rebels ſent alſo two other of the better ſort of them to Alba-Regalis; with concluſion, that the fiue and twentieth of Iune at the fartheſt the mony ſhould be paid, and the town deliuered. For the re-ceiuing whereof, and for feare of ſome hidden treaſon, the Turks and Tartars began to make themſelues ſtrong: the Imperials alſo doing what they might for the appeaſing of ſo dangerous a tumult. So the tenth of Iune the Sord Swartzenburg with two thouſand horſe and foot came within two miles of the towne, and from thence ſent 24 horſemen to diſſuade the rebels from yeelding the towne vnto the Turks, & to tell them that they ſhould ſhortly receiue their pay: who ſhamefully deriding them, ſent them backe againe as wiſe as they came: ſo that B SwartZenburg perceiuing himſelfe with ſo ſmall forces to be able to do nothing againſt them, neither yet by faire means to perſuade them, retired again to Rab, vntill ſome greater ſtrength were come vnto him. Immediatly after, D^{r} Petzen Counſellor for the wars, a man of great authority, grauity, and wiſedome, was by Matthias the Archduke with foure hundred horſe conducted to Pappa, to ſee if he by his diſcretion could haue diſſuaded them from their ſo vngod-ly a purpoſe, for the yeelding of the towne vnto the enemy: whom they not only refuſed to heare, although he ſpake vnto them moſt kindly, but alſo bent their muskets and harquebuſies vpon him, threatning to kill him if he did not forthwith depart. When ſhortly after, twenty of the Hungarians impriſoned in a cellar in the town, brake out, and comming to Rab, brought newes thither, That the Frenchmen and Wallons in Pappa were at variance amongſt them-C ſelues about the yeelding vp of the towne vnto the Turks (ſome better minded than the reſt, not willing to conſent thereunto) inſomuch that they in the caſtle ſhot at them in the towne, and they again at them in the caſtle: and that they had already receiued from the Turks twenty thouſand duckats, with ſome prouiſion of victuals, and were ſhortly after to receiue from them the reſt of the mony promiſed them, and ſo deliuer the towne. For preuenting whereof, the Lold Swartzenburg the 22 of Iune ſent the Lord Sharpſenſtein a French Colonell, with 3000 ſouldiers, certaine Petards, and a number of ſcaling ladders towards Pappa; whom the falſe rebels ſuffered peaceably to enter the towne the foure and twentieth of Iune, ſtill encouraging them to come on, calling them their countrymen and brethren, and in token of friendſhip ſhaking them by the hands, telling them that hauing aſſurance of their pay, they deſired no more: D But hauing now receiued in ſo many of them as they thought good, and as they knew they were well able to deale with, ſhutting the reſt out, they cut them all in pieces, and afterwards in deriſion called vpon the high Dutches to come on in like manner. Three hundred of theſe rebels at the ſame time had laied themſelues in ambuſh by a mill faſt without the town, who by the Wallons & Haiducks without diſcouered, were alſo by them charged: vpon whom for all that, by reaſon of the ſhot out of the towne, they could do no good; but hauing loſt three hundred men, and amongſt them Hannibal Kralzs the Lord Sharpſenſtein his Lieutenant Generall, and one Del la Margoſe the chiefe enginier, they retired: which loſſe the deſperat rebels (if it had bin in their choice) had wiſhed rather to haue happened vnto the Dutches than to the Wallons or Hungarians. About three daies after, three of theſe rebels being by chance taken E priſoners by the Imperials, and brought to Rab, were not only apparelled but alſo trimmed after the Turkiſh faſhion, as men not deſiring longer to be accounted Chriſtians, the reſt of their fellows in the town alſo imitating the Turks faſhions, as well in their apparell as in their manner of ſeruice: yet for all that, would not theſe metamorphoſed monſters yeeld the towne vnto the Turks, before they had the full ſumme by them agreed vpon, the Baſſa of Boſna being commanded from the grand Seignior in all haſte to prouide it for them, and ſo to receiue of them the towne. Neuertheleſſe, for their more ſtrength and their more credit with the Turks, they receiued into the town one enſigne of the Turks, with certain wagons of victuals, brought thither with ſo ſtrong a conuoy as that the Imperials durſt not meddle therewith: in which wagons (being diſcharged) they ſent in bonds 600 Hungarians and Dutch, men, women, and chil-F dren, priſoners to Alba-Regalis; being all of them glad to be ſo ſent away, in hope to find more fauor and curteſie at the hands of their enemies, than they had found with theſe renegat Chriſtians. So ſhortly after, theſe rebels ſent out certaine meſſengers vnto the Gouernor of Alba-Regalis, to know his full reſolution: which meſſengers (conducted by certain Turks of great account) were vpon the way by the free Haiduckes all intercepted, and the meſſengers taken,

A moſt wicked fact.

with 100 Turks mo. In the meane while Michael Marotti, before impriſoned by the rebels in Pappa, by letters ſecretly aduertiſed the Lord Swartzenburg of a certaine place, whereby he G might (as he ſaid) eaſily enter the towne, and the rather, for that the rebels were at variance amongſt themſelues. Who thereupon the 12 of Iuly came to Pappa with nine thouſand horſe and foot; but diſappointed of his purpoſe for entering the towne, hardly neuertheleſſe belaied the ſame: vpon whom the mutiniers many times deſperatly ſallied out, and right valiantly encountered them, albeit that they were ſtill, without any notable loſſe, by their enemies (too ſtrong for them) beaten backe againe into the towne. In one of which ſallies it fortuned one of their captains to be taken, who to the terror of the reſt was preſently ſlaine quicke, and his head and skin vpon a pike ſet vp before the towne, for his fellowes to behold. But the Lord Swartzenburg ſtill more & more preuailing vpon them, they ſent ſecretly for aid to the Turks: H whereof he for all that getting intelligence, ſent alſo for three regiments of ſouldiers moe to come vnto him to the ſiege: by whoſe comming he well ſtrengthened, and bringing his approches neerer the towne, tooke from the rebels the mill, a ſtrength which they very vnwillingly loſt, as in hope therby to haue the more eaſily receiued aid from the Turks; who hauing made preparation to haue relieued them, were letted ſo to do by the riſing of the water, which had ſpoiled all the prouiſion for their reliefe at the bridge of Eſſeg, as alſo hindred them from marching forward. At length the Imperials were come with their trenches euen to the towne ditches, out of which they had let all the water: where ſome of the townſmen eſcaping out of the towne, declared, how that the mutinous ſoldiers within labored both day and night to fortifie the towne, but to be in their worke much letted by the continuall aſſaults of the Imperi- I als: as alſo that they now had neither bread nor wine, nor other victuals left, more than a little ſalt, and threeſcore horſe, of which they had already begun to eat: and that although they were not altogether ſo valiant, yet that they had reſolued to die by the hands of the ſouldiers, as men expecting no other mercy. Yet ſhortly after, viz. the nine and twentieth of Iuly, they de-ſperatly fell out vpon the trenches of Marſpurgiſch, a Dutch captaine; of whoſe ſouldiers they ſlew many, being drunke, and driuing the reſt out of their trenches, raiſed a great alarme.
Which the Lord Swartzenburg hearing, haſted thither to the reſcue; where with an vnlucky musket ſhot he was ſtrucke in the head and ſlain. Wherof the rebels got knowledge the ſame euening, and Del la Mota their Generall in reward of that ſeruice gaue vnto them that had made that ſally a thouſand dollars to be diuided among them. The dead body of that ſo wor- K thy a man, as had done great ſeruice for the Chriſtian common-weale, was afterwards with great ſolemnity brought to Rab, and there honourably enterred. The like deſperat ſally they made againe the next day, and ſlew of the Imperials an hundred and thirty, and tooke certain priſoners: and in retiring backe againe into the towne, cryed aloud, That when they lacked meat, rather than they would yeeld the towne, they would eat Chriſtians, whereof Marotti ſhould be the firſt.

The Lord Swartzenburg ſlaine.

The Lord Swartzenburg thus ſlaine, the gouernment of the army was by Matthias the Archduke committed to the Lord Redern, a noble man both valiant and learned; who although he were very ſickly, came vnto the camp before Pappa the 8 of Auguſt; where vnderſtanding that that the rebels now brought vnto extremity, had a purpoſe by night to fly away and ſo be gon, L he cauſed a more vigilant and ſtrong watch to be kept; when lo, according to his expectation, the next night after, about two houres before day they began to iſſue out: whereof the watch giuing knowledge to the Generall, they were indeed ſuffered to goe out as vnperceiued, but preſently after at their heels were ſent out the Lord Nadaſti and the Earle of Thurn, with 200 Huſſars, and after them the chiefe Colonell and County Solms, with part of their horſmen alſo, who in three diuers places ouertaking them neer vnto a great wood called Packem, ſlew moſt part of them: Del la Mota their chiefe captain or ringleader being ſlain by the chief Colonell, becauſe he would not yeeld, and his head by him afterwards preſented vnto the Generall in the campe: 200 Wallons the Huſſars vnder the leading of the Lord Nadaſti, County Solmes, and County Thurn, found out in the wood; who albeit that they for a ſpace made great M reſiſtance, yet in the end were enforced to yeeld, and ſo with their two enſignes were brought into the campe. The Huſſars alſo vpon another paſſage light vpon other 200 moe of theſe rebellious Wallons, who becauſe the ſtood ſtrongly vpon their guard, and were more deſperatly ſet than the reſt, the Generall ſent out other 200 of the Colonels horſemen vpon them, by whom

Pappa abandoned by the mutiniers.

A whom and the Huſſars they were almoſt all ſlaine: diuers others of them alſo were ſlaine in comming out of the towne, and in the mariſhes thereabouts. Their Generals Lieutenant with ſuch other of their principall commanders as were taken, were by the Lord Rederns commandement deliuered vnto the Prouoſt Martiall; the reſt of the rebellious traitors he at the requeſt of the ſouldiers diuided into diuers parts of the army, there to the terror of others to be executed, from whom the ſouldiers could hardly be perſuaded euen for the preſent to hold their hands. But afterwards hauing brought them to Rab, & leaue giuen them to do with them their pleaſure, they as farre exceeded in the cruell manner of their execution, as they had before in their outragious dealings, eſpecially the Hungarians and Wallons, notwithſtanding moſt of them were of the Wallon countries. Some of them they impailed, ſome they brake vpon the B wheele; ſome of their skins they cut off their bodies as it were into thongs, and ſo poured into the wounds vineger, ſalt, and pepper; from ſome others they cut off their priuities, ſome they roſted, and ſome they put into the Tenalia; vpon ſome they dropped molten pitch, and then caſting gunpouder vpon them, ſo burnt them to death; otherſome they hanged vpon yron hookes; and ſome they put in the ground vp to the chin, and for their deſport with yron bullets bouled at their heads. In all which torments no ſigne of compaſſion was to be ſeene, the tormentors to make their pain the greater, doing nothing but deride them: the miſerable wretches in the meane time confeſſing the hainouſneſſe of their offence, and crauing for death as a fauor. A moſt horrible thing it was to ſee, how whileſt ſome were thus tortured, others were brought to ſee the ſame miſery they themſelues were by and by to endure. Amongſt the reſt C of theſe exquiſite torments, one Peter Orſy cauſed one of the mutiners to be ſowed vp in the belly of a mare, with his head hanging out, and ſo to be roſted, in which miſerable torment he liued three houres, and then died: after which he cauſed the loathſome body ſo roſted, to be giuen to them that lay ſtaruing vpon the wheele to eat. Thus was the dangerous mutiny at Pappa with much ado ended, and that ſtrong towne like to haue bin loſt, preſerued: the rebels themſelues being become a dreadfull example to all poſterity, for all them to looke vpon that ſhall attempt the like villany.

Now at this ſame time alſo, though neither the Chriſtians nor the Turks had as then any great army in the field, yet many a hot and bloudy skirmiſh paſſed daily betwixt them in one place or other of Hungary: all which to recount, as it would be much tedious, ſo in ſilence to D paſſe them all ouer, were greatly to wrong thoſe worthy perſonages by whom they were not without their great aduenture done. Amongſt the reſt, one Nicholas Horbath County Serinus his Lieutenant, with 150 ſouldiers, and Andrew Thuſi another great Commander, going forth to ſeeke for booty; Thuſi hearing that the Turks were abroad for the ſurpriſing of certaine Haiducks then gone out, ſtaied faſt in a ſecret place vntill he might heare further newes, Horbath another way ſtill going on. Now it happened that the Baſſa of Sigeth hauing bin abroad, in returning home by chance met with Horbath, and encountering with him ouerthrew him, and ſlew moſt of his men, Horbath himſelfe by flight hardly eſcaping. But Thuſi hearing this skir-miſh, as lying cloſe not far off, and now haſting thither to haue bin partaker thereof, found the Baſſa yet in the field on foot, viewing the bodies of the ſlaine: vpon whom he came ſo ſudden-E ly and with ſuch force, as that the Baſſa with his diſordered men had much ado to take horſe, and ſo without any great reſiſtance to betake himſelfe to flight: after whom the Hungarians fiercely following, ſlew many of the Turks, and amongſt the reſt the Baſſa himſelfe, whoſe head preſently cut off, Horbath ſent to the County Serinus, who ſhortly after by Thuſi him-ſelfe ſent it to Matthias the Archduke. This Baſſa was a man of great ſtrength and courage, a moſt expert and aduenturous captaine, about 38 yeares old, and for his valour of a common ſouldier created a Baſſa by the great Sultan. His head being brought to Vienna, and there ſhewed to the Baſſa of Buda then there priſoner, and he demanded, whether he knew it or not, ſighing anſwered, that he knew it well, and that it was the head of the Baſſa of Sigeth, a brauer man than whom the Sultan had none in all his Empire, earneſtly withal deſiring to know how F he was ſlaine. And not long after, the aduenturers out of Comara, Strigonium, and other places therabout hauing made a great party, and taken a great booty from the Turks at a faire at Gombat, and by Tra and [illegible], thinking to haue paſſed Danubius in hope of a greater booty, ſeuen hundred of them being paſſed the riuer, were by the new Baſſa of Sigeth and others, with fiue thouſand Turks in an hot skirmiſh ouerthrowne; yet not without their great loſſe alſo;

Iula ſurpriſed and burnt by the free Haiduckes.

alſo: the Baſſa himſelfe with two other Sanzackes and fiue hundred Turks being there ſlaine, and but fifty of the Chriſtian aduenturers left dead in the place, the reſt diſorderedly retiring G to their boats, being for moſt part drowned in the Danubie. The free Haiducks alſo ſurpriſed Iula and ſet it on fire, in which confuſion the Turks flying into the caſtle, for haſte thruſt one another from the bridge into the caſtle ditch; wherein ſo many of them were drowned, that a man might haue gone dry foot ouer vpon the bodies of the dead. They took there alſo ſix hundred priſoners, with much other booty, and deliuered two hundred Chriſtians which were there captiues. And albeit that theſe Haiducks after this exploit done were hardly purſued by the Turks from other places, yet they in ſafety retired with ſuch boty as they had already gotten.

But now to leaue theſe the troubles of Hungary for a while, as the forerunners of greater ere long to enſue, let vs againe looke backe into Tranſyluania and Valachia, to ſee how Michael H the Vayuod now in the meane time behaued himſelfe there. The Cardinall Bathor ouerthrowne and ſlaine, and the country of Tranſyluania againe brought vnder the Emperors obedience: the Vayuod by his Embaſſadors gaue him forthwith to vnderſtand of all his proceedings, with the whole ſucceſſe thereof, as alſo of a purpoſe hee had to inuade Moldauia: for that it was commonly reported and alſo beleeued, That Sigiſmund the late Prince (not a little moued with the death of the Cardinall his couſin, and the reuolt of his country) aided by the Turks, the Tartars, the Polonians, and Moldauians, would now attempt ſome great matter for the recouery of Tranſyluania: All which was ſhortly after the rather thought to be true, for that diuers of his ſpies being taken, ſome at Clauſenburg, ſome at Neſſen, beſide the Letters I that were found about them from him vnto the Nobility and States of Tranſyluania (perſuading them to reuolt from the Vayuod vnto him, and that his meaning was ſhortly to come with a great army out of Polonia for the repulſing of him) they alſo of themſelues confeſſed, How that Sigiſmund in diſguiſed apparell had himſelfe been in Tranſyluania, to conferre with diuers his ſecret friends concerning that matter. Which his Embaſſadours the Emperour honourably entertained, and by them confirmed vnto the Vayuod the gouernment of Tranſyluania, ſending alſo vnto him diuers honourable Preſents; forbidding him neuertheleſſe to inuade Moldauia, for feare of raiſing a new and dangerous war againſt the Polonians alſo, vnder whoſe protection and the Turks the Palatine thereof then reſted. According vnto which command the Vayuod ſtaied his intended expedition; yet ſending ſome good part of his K forces vnto the frontiers of Moldauia, for feare of Sigiſmund whom he heard to be hatching ſome miſchiefe in Polonia, and euen then to lie vpon the frontiers of that country. Some few moneths thus paſſing, Huſraim Aga (a graue reuerend old man and much employed by the Turkiſh Sultan) with fiue other Turks of good account, Embaſſadours from the great Sultan, and a great retinue following him, came to Cronſtat in Tranſyluania where the Vayuod then lay. Of whoſe comming the Vayuod hearing, with foure thouſand horſemen moſt brauely mounted, went halfe a mile out of the city to meet them: the footmen in the meane time on both ſides of the ſtreets ſtanding in good order, from the gate of the city whereby they were to enter, euen vnto the Vayuods lodging, where ſtood alſo his guard all in red and white ſilke.
So meeting in the field, they both alighted from their horſes, with great reuerence ſaluting L the one the other: when preſently the Embaſſadour embracing the Vayuod, vngirt his ſcimitar, and in the name of the great Sultan put another about him, ſo richly garniſhed with gold and pretious ſtones, as that no part of the ſcaberd was therefore to be ſeene: beſides this, he preſented him with a faire plume of blacke Hearnes feathers mixed with ſome white (a right goodly ornament, in forme of a great buſh) which the Vayuod would not in the field put vpon his head, although hee was thereunto by the Embaſſadour moſt earneſtly requeſted, but cauſed it to be carried before him: he alſo preſented him with two very faire red enſignes, in token of the Turks fauour and protection, the one for himſelfe, and the other for his ſonne Petraſco: moreouer, he gaue vnto him two exceeding faire horſes richly furniſhed, with foure others, and a moſt faire Faulcon. The Vayuod himſelfe was moſt brauely mounted, and (after M the manner of his country) had ten very faire ſpare horſes led before him. At whoſe entrance into the towne all the great ordnance was diſcharged, with great vollies of ſmall ſhot: and ſo the Embaſſadour ſtill riding on the left hand of the Vayuod, being brought to his lodging, had ſix of his chiefe followers euery one of them preſented with a rich robe of cloth of gold: in

The gouernment of Tranſyluania by the Emperor confirmed vnto Michael the Vayuod.

A requitall whereof the Embaſſadour rewarded an hundred of the Vayuod his followers euery one of them with a good ſuit of apparell: with this Embaſſador of the Turks was alſo the Polonian Embaſſador, whom the Vayuod in like manner honourably entertained. Theſe Embaſſadors (as was thought) did what they might to haue drawne this worthy and renowned man, together with the countries of Tranſyluania and Valachia, from the Emperor vnto the Turks obeiſance: howbeit he ſeldome or neuer ſpake with them, but that either before or after he had conference with the Lords Vngnad and Zechel (the Emperors Commiſſioners) concerning their requeſts; alwaies proteſting vnto them, not to yeeld to any thing without the Emperors conſent and good liking. Whereof Mahomet aduertiſed, and that he was not by any thing yet ſaid or done, to be remoued from the Emperour, gaue him by the ſame Embaſſadors to vnderſtand, B How that he was with ſome ſpeech with the emperor concerning peace (as indeed he then was by meſſengers from the Baſſaes at Presburg) which if it ſorted to effect, that then it ſhould be well; but if not, that then it ſhould be good for him whileſt yet he had time, wiſely to conſider of his owne eſtate, and to ſubmit himſelfe vnto his protection who was able to defend him, rather than for the vain praiſe of a certain fooliſh conſtancy, to aduenture himſelf with al that he had vnto moſt certain danger and deſtruction: promiſing him in recompence of that his loyalty, to giue vnto him for euer, the countries of Tranſyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, and at his need to furniſh him both with men and mony; offering moreouer to make him a great Commander in his army in Hungary, and the Baſſa of Temeſware as his friend to be at all times ready with fifty thouſand horſe and foot (as need ſhould be) to aſſiſt him againſt the C Emperor, reſeruing to himſelfe whatſoeuer he ſhould more win from him: for all which bounty and kindneſſe, requiring only to haue him vnto him loyall. All which his large offers the Vayuod little regarding, declared the ſame vnto the Emperors Commiſſioners: yet ſtill proteſting neuer to ſtart, but to ſtand faſt for the Chriſtian Emperor. Notwithſtanding as a man deſirous to better his eſtate, he tooke hereupon occaſion to requeſt of the Emperour the country of Tranſyluania, by him ſo lately taken in, vnto him and his ſonne in inheritance for euer, with ſuch frontier towns as in former time belonged vnto Tranſyluania: and that whatſoeuer he ſhould win from the Turks, might be his and his ſonnes: he alſo requeſted, that all the preferments and dignities in former time granted by his Imperiall Majeſty vnto Sigiſmund the late Prince, might now be beſtowed vpon himſelfe; and for his ſeruice done, to be furniſhed D with mony for the payment of his ſouldiers: And that the Emperor with the other Princes of the Empire ſhould aſſure him, That if he were taken by the Turke, they ſhould ranſome him: but in caſe he were by the great power of the Turke driuen out of thoſe countries, then by the Emperors appointment to haue ſome conuenient place allotted vnto him in the vpper Hungary ro liue in, with the yerely penſion of an hundred thouſand dollars. All which his requeſts if it would pleaſe him to grant, he promiſed this yere to do ſo much againſt the Turke, as had not in an hundred yeares been done before: with vaunt, That if he had had the imploiment of the money which was ſpent in the time of this warre, he would not haue doubted but to haue brought all the countries from the Euxine (or blacke ſea) to Buda, Alba Regalis, and Solnock, vnder the Emperors obeiſance. A large promiſe indeed, but hardly to haue bin performed by E a far greater Prince than he.

Thus whileſt things ſtood in diſcourſe after the Cardinals death, Sigiſmund the late Prince in the meane time ſupported by the Polonians, with the aid of the Turks, the Tartars, and the Moldauians, was ready to haue inuaded Tranſyluania: yea, the Tartars (as the forerunners of his greater power) were already entred the country, and had out of the frontiers thereof carried away ſome booty. Whereof the Vayuod vnderſtanding, in great haſt aſſembled his forces out of all places, which in ſhort time was growne to ſome good head, the country people together with the free Haiducks (an aduenturous and reſolute kind of ſoldiers) in great number daily reſorting vnto him. So being now eight thouſand ſtrong, and moſt of them braue and luſty men, he with them and 20 pieces of artillery remoued to Cronſtat the foure and twen-F tieth day of Aprill, ſending part of his army (which euery day more and more encreaſed) before him to Neſſen: where all his forces being aſſembled to the number of almoſt fifty thouſand horſe and foot, he with great celerity paſſed the rough and high mountaines into Moldauia without reſiſtance, but yet not without ſome trouble, his ſouldiers by the way being glad ſometimes to eat the leaues of trees, the enemy hauing of purpoſe before carried away

whatſoeuer he could that might haue yeelded him reliefe. Of whoſe ſpeedy comming and great ſtrength, Sigiſmund and Ieremias the Vayuod of Moldauia hearing, and vpon the reaſonable eſtate of their owne forces finding themſelues too weake to encounter him, retired themſelues out of Moldauia into the frontiers of Polonia, there to gather greater ſtrength, and ſo to meet him: for as yet Ieremias the Vayuod had not receiued from the Turke ſuch forces as were vnto him promiſed, and as he ſtill expected. Michael the Vayuod in the meane time (his enemies thus fled) with fire and ſword entering into Moldauia, tooke in the greateſt part thereof, the feareful country people ſtill yeelding vnto him as he went: and the rather, for that Ieremias their Vayuod (placed by the Polonian, but tributary vnto the Tnrke) had laid vpon them a moſt grieuous impoſition, as vpon euery man a duckat a month, for which they exceedingly hated him. But here in Moldauia, Michael the Vayuod (hauing ſtill in his company one of the Emperors Commiſſioners in Tranſyluania, moſt truſty ſeruants, who might faithfully report vnto them the whole manner of his proceedings) after the departure of Sigiſmund and Ieremias his enemies, ſtaied not long; but hearing that they were retired toward the confines of Polonia, without longer delay made towards them, and the eighteenth of May found them by the caſtle Othune neere vnto the riuer Neſter, being thirty thouſand ſtrong; Polonians, Moldauians, Turks, and Tartars: with whom he joyned a moſt fierce and cruell battell, which begun about ten a clocke before noone, was with great courage, but greater obſtinacy on both ſides maintained vntill the enening. At which time the fortune of the Valachian preuailing, his enemies at laſt betooke themſelues to flight, of whom were there ſlaine eight thouſand, beſide many others of them drowned in the riuer Neſter: where of the Valachians were loſt two thouſand only. Concerning Sigiſmund and Ieremias, diuers reports were after this ouerthrow giuen out; ſome ſaying that they were ſlaine, and ſome that they were in flying drowned: howbeit the truth was, that they both by flight eſcaped, to the greater trouble of themſelues, as of their afflicted countries alſo. Michael after this ſo notable a victory, taking in the reſt of Moldauia, cauſed the people to ſweare their obedience vnto the Emperor, himſelfe, and his ſon, to the great offence of the Polonians, not a little (as they tooke it) wronged therin; but eſpecially of the great Chancellor, an old enemy vnto the houſe of Auſtria. Wherof enſued greater troubles in thoſe frontier countries than before, to the further effuſion of more Chriſtian bloud, much better to haue been imploied againſt the fatall enemy, in defence of the Chriſtian commonweale. Yet thus the three warlike and frontier countries of Tranſyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, the ſureſt bulwarkes of that ſide of Chriſtendome, and moſt expoſed vnto the fury of the common enemy, were now once againe vnited vnder the obeiſance of the Emperour, to the great benefit (no doubt) of the Chriſtian commonweale, and hurt of the Turks; if they might haue ſo continued, as God wot they did not long.

Sigiſmund and the Moldauian ouerthrown by Michael the Vayuod.

Moldauia ſubdued by Michael.

Now the Vayuod notwithſtanding this ſo great a victory, well conſidering that he of himſelfe could hardly keep this new gained prouince of Moldauia againſt the power of the Turk, (pretended that to him it belonged as his own to giue to whom he pleaſed:) as alſo againſt the Polonians (not more deſirous to reſtore Ieremias againe into Moldauia, than the Prince Sigiſmund into Tranſyluania) without the helpe of ſome other more mighty Prince whom he might reſt vpon; by his Embaſſadors (ſent for that purpoſe) offered the ſoueraignty of al thoſe three countries vnto the Emperor, with condition, that he ſhould appoint him perpetuall Gouernor of the ſame vnder him. The Emperour alſo vnderſtood, how that Mahomet the great Turke had not long before againe ſent vnto him another of his Chiaus, commanding him without delay to reſtore the country of Tranſyluania vnto the Prince Sigiſmund (vnto whom he was by the mediation of the king of Polonia now before reconciled) threatning otherwiſe with fire and ſword to deſtroy Valachia, and by force of armes to depriue him both of Tranſyluania and his life together. Wherefore the Emperour doubting leſt the Vayuod either for feare or for the better aſſuring of his own eſtate, ſhould to his prejudice fal to ſome agreement with the Turke, yeelding to all that his Embaſſadors had of him requeſted; with condition that he ſhould be bound as need ſhould require to ſerue with his people againſt the Vurke; and that in Tranſyluania neere vnto his owne perſon ſhould be alwaies reſident one of the Emperors counſellors, as ſuperintendent ouer the whole country. Wherewith the Vayuod being contented, The Emperour ſent thither Doctor Petzen with ſix thouſand ſouldiers, and a great ſumme of money to pay the Vayuods ſouldiers, as he had before requeſted; and ſo to take of them an oath, That they ſhould from thenceforth become his Majeſties faithful ſeruants. Which ſuperintendent ſo by the Emperor ſent, the Vayuod receiued with great honor, as vnto him of all others moſt welcome. Neuertheleſſe being againe returned into Tranſyluania, it was not long but that (without regard of him) he began with new exactions to oppreſſe the people of the country, and in ſome ſort to tyranniſe ouer them; vſing great ſeuerity againſt diuers of the nobility alſo, eſpecially ſuch as he knew to haue taken part before with the Cardinal, or now of late with Sigiſmund his couſin, or any way to haue fauored his quarrel, All which he did without the conſent or good liking of Petzen, contrary to his promiſe made, No more to imbrue his hands in the bloud of the nobility of Tranſyluania, without the knowledge or conſent of his imperiall Majeſty or the Superintendent by him appointed: which for all that, if he had not don, he could not poſſibly haue kept them (diſdaining to be gouerned by him) vnder his obeiſance. Neuertheleſſe the Tranſyluanians taking it in euill part to be ſo oppreſſed, and the nobility almoſt extinguiſhed, yea, and indeed to be at all ruled by him; by general conſent as if it had bin but one man, riſe all vp in arms againſt him: inſomuch that he finding himſelfe with his Valachians and other his fauorits too weake for them, retired with all ſuch as would follow him, into the mountains; and from thence ſent preſently for aid vnto the lord George Baſta (a worthy captaine, and then the Emperors lieutenant in the vpper Hungary) for the ſubduing of theſe rebellious people, and the reducing of them vnto their former obedience. Who by letters from Matthias the Archduke, at the inſtance of the Vayuod commanded ſo to do, with about 6000 horſe and foot and 8 field pieces remoued from Caſſouia in the vpper Hungary the 4 of September. Where by the way came vnto him Embaſſadors alſo from the people of Tranſyluania now vp in armes, and confederat alſo againſt the Vayuod: who in like manner alſo requeſted his aid, pretending themſelues to be the Emperors moſt loyal ſubjects, but not vnder the gouernment of ſuch a tyrant as was the Vayuod: alledging and exaggerating many his moſt cruell actions, and cleerely proteſting, That for the preſent want of a good Gouernor, they were enforced for the ſafegard of their liues to band themſelues together: which if haply it might be in any thing prejudiciall vnto the Emperors claime and intereſt, which he with ſo great toile and coſt had procured in that prouince, it was againſt their wills, as enforced by neceſſity to do that they did in defence of themſelues. Which Embaſſadors ſo ſent from the people, Baſta with all ſpeed diſpatched away backe againe, comforting them without further ſtir to expect his arriual in Tranſyluania: yet couenanting withall, That they ſhould before conceiue into writing the oath of their fidelity & allegiance vnto his Imperial Majeſty. Now might many and important conſiderations trouble the mind of Baſta in ſo doubtfull a caſe. To giue vnto the Vayuod againſt the people, was the expreſſe order from Matthias the Archduke the Emperors Lieutenant Generall: but to aid the people confederat againſt him, as they had requeſted, ſeemed now both more profitable and honeſt, eſpecially hauing moſt certaine tokens of the ſmall and doubtfull faith of the Vayuod; who only by diſpenſation intereſſed in that prouince, was not ſo carefull of another mans, neither ſeeming to haue regard of Petzen, or of his owne word giuen for not further embruing his hands in the bloud of the Nobility of Tranſyluania, without the Emperours knowledge and leaue: vpon which promiſe was likewiſe grounded the archdukes order for giuing of them aid: ſo that ſuch breach of his faith, & contempt of Petzen, had haſtned the conſpiracy of the people againſt him, deſpairing of all other health than that which by force of arms they could procure vnto themſelues. To ſtand doubtfull himſelfe, or to hold others in ſuſpence, vntill that by currors in this new caſe he might receiue new inſtructions from the Emperor or the Archduke, had in it too much danger, as giuing leiſure to each party to make ſides, & to increaſe the ſlander of the laſt yeare, That he might ſo eaſily (and eſpecially from the Valachian) haue aſſured that prouince to his Majeſty, had he not bin an heartleſſe man of no reſolution, euen ſuch a one as durſt not looke vpon a cat (as ſome had ſaid) all which might not a little pricke an honourable mind. To take part with the people confederat againſt the Vayuod, if it ſhould not haply fall out at the firſt encounter, might betwixt the two contendants giue an entrance vnto the third, either the Turke or the Polonian in fauour of Bathor: but if it ſhould ſort to the quite contrary, and ſo himſelfe to loſe the day; then he ſaw himſelfe void of all defence againſt the malitious, eſpecially in that the World commonly meaſureth the wiſedome vſed in any action, according to the ſucceſſe thereof, than which nothing can be more vnreaſonable, but aboue all others, in matters of war. In this ſo troubled a tempeſt of contrary winds, of power to haue driuen a G right good mariner out of his courſe, Baſta laid hand vpon the helme of good meaning, and ſpread the ſailes of ſuch diſcretion, as taught him in matters of war to be lawfull for a General to depart euen from the inſtructions of his Prince, not concerning the end, but the means leading to that end; eſpecially when the preſent occaſion ſo requireth, which the Prince could not with reaſon before comprehend, as depending of the moſt mighty fortune of war, which ſuffereth not ſo much delay as to expect counſel from far. So in this ambiguity Baſta reſolued to joyn himſelſe vnto the confederats, moſt in his judgment concerning his Imperial Majeſty, as being the vttermoſt ſcope of his ſo great coſt and charge, to keep the country of Tranſyluania at his deuotion, which conſiſted in the people, and not in the woods or mountains: the matter being not great by what means ſoeuer it were done, ſo that it were honourable and honeſt. H Baſta taketh part with the Tranſyluanians, against the Vayuod in whoſe aid he was ſent.

Vpon this deſire Baſta ſet forward, and the 14 day arriued at Torda, and there joyned himſelſe vnto the confederats, to the great wonder of the Vayuod, in whoſe helpe hee was ſent: where repoſing himſelſe one day, conſulting and conſidering of their forces, about 12000 ſtrong, with foure field pieces, beſides eight of his owne, with the ſix thouſand ſouldiers he brought with him, in all about eighteene thouſand, he determined not to giue leiſure vnto the Vayuod to call vnto him further helpe, hauing now with him about twenty thouſand foot and twelue thouſand horſe, with ſeuen and twenty field pieces: amongſt whom was diuers of the Siculi, in hope of their antient liberty, men of good account and ſort, with a mixture of the Coſſackes, Valachians, Raſcians, and Seruians, people of prey ſeruing only to ſpoile: whom Baſta knew to be far inferiour in courage to his twelue thouſand foot and ſix thouſand horſe; I not onely for the valour of his owne men accuſtomed vnto the frontier ſeruice, but alſo for the confederates, who engaged with their goods, liues, and honour, and deſirous to be reuenged of the Vayuod, were like enough to ſtand well by it. Wherefore hee ſet forward the ſixteenth day, and in two daies march came within ſight of the Vayuod: who hauing ſent out certaine great troups of horſemen to take view of the enemy, and ſeeing them repulſed, ſet fire on Miriſlo a village faſt by, out of which they had before drawne certaine ſmall field pieces into the campe.

Miriſlo is a village two leagues on this ſide of Alba-Iulia, directly vpon the high way ſtretching from the ſide of Maracz a nauigable riuer, vnto the foot of an hil, alongſt which the riuer running, ſomtimes neerer, and ſomtimes farther off, together with the riſing of the hill, maketh K an vnequal liſt of ground, in ſome places half a mile broad and more, and in ſome other ſhut vp as it were into a narrow throat, as in the ſelfe ſame place where the aforeſaid village ſtandeth, & where the Vayuod lay incamped in a place of great aduantage, behind a great trench drawn from the riuer, croſſe that little ſpace of ground betwixt the mountaine and the riuer. On this ſide, which from Miriſlo the farther a man gooth the farther the plaine enlargeth, Baſta encamping cloſe vnto the village, oppoſed againſt the comming of the enemy 3 great corps du gard, two of them Hungarians, towards the hill fauored with a Church, and the third toward the riuer, of the Almane footmen, vnder the charge of County Tomaſo Caurioli of Breſcia, Sergeant Major of the field, with all the artillery: who as in a place neere and very open vnto the enemy, there intrenched himſelf, ſtil approching neerer and neerer both on the one ſide and the other. L Towards the euening of the ſelfe ſame 17 day came to Baſta one Peter Armenio with Letters from the Vayuod, containing, That hauing vnderſtood of his arriuall in the camp of the Conſpirators, he now further deſired to know whether it were by the conſent and commandement of the Emperor, or not: and how it came to paſſe that he would ſo doe, conſidering the diuers chances of war, the ſword hanging as it were euen ouer his head if he ſhould chance to loſe the battell? Whereunto Baſta anſwered, That the morrow following he would ſhew him the authority he had from the Emperor (alluding to the Imperiall Standard he carried with him:) and that as concerning the fortune and danger to enſue, he referred that wholly vnto the will and pleaſure of the Almighty, the juſt Iudge of all controuerſies. But in the meane time he exhorted him to leaue that prouince he had ſo euill gouerned, vnto his Imperiall Majeſty, as he M was in duty bound; promiſing him free paſſage into Valachia, and giuing him time to conſider thereupon vntill 8 a clocke the next morning, after which time it ſhould be free for euery man to do for himſelſe what he could. Which anſwer the Vayuod hauing read, inflamed with diſdaine, with many proud words full of threats and diſgrace, although it was then night, preſently cauſed by the ſound of the drum and trumpet the battell to be proclaimed againſt the next day.

On the other ſide Baſta after he had aſſured his campe, hauing not only ſent, but gone himſelfe to haue the counſell of his own eies, for his better vnderſtanding how the enemy lay; and finding no reaſonable means for him there to attempt any exploit by, as well for the ſtrength of the trench before the front, & in part along the ſide of the enemies camp, as alſo for the danger of a riſing ground on the left hand, whereunto all the plain betwixt the enemies camp and the village was ſubject, thought it beſt to remoue, and to make a ſhort retreat about the ſpace of an Italian mile, according to the commodiouſnes of the place; thinking it no hard matter, of ſo proud an enemy, and not altogether ſo well acquainted with martial ſtratagems, to gain a notable victory. This his purpoſe propounded in counſel, was greatly diſliked of the captains of the confederats: vnto whom it ſeemed more ſafety to aſſault the Vayuod, yet lying in his ſtrength, than to retire before the face of an enemy ſo ſtrong and aduenturous: for that ſuch a retreat according to the maner of that country, would be deemed no other than a plain flight; and to breake his order & ariſe, was (as they ſaid) but to diſcourage his own people, and to encourage his enemies. But Baſta the better to perſuade them, promiſed therin to ſhew to them a more cunning kind of fight than was yet vnto them knowne, and declared the aſſurance that he in his own perſon, with the Almains in the rereward would giue them in that retreat, in ſuch ſort, as that they ſhould not loſe ſo much as a man, much leſſe they needed to feare to fall into any diſorder in ſo ſhort a ſpace, his purpoſe being onely to giue the plaine vnto the enemy, wherein to ſhew himſelfe into the open field. So the retreat being agreed vpon, the morning following beeing the 28 of September, the three Corps du guard (before ſpoken of) were betimes called backe, and the baggage ſent away: after which followed the Tranſyluanians and Hungarians, the Almaines in the rereward encloſing the great ordnance.

The battell of Miriſlo betwixt Michael the Vayuod & Baſta the emperors lieutenant.

The Vayuod aware of their departure, ſent forthwith a great troup of horſemen, eſpecially of the Coſſackes, to take view of them, and to skirmiſh with them; which were ſo far kept off by a company of muſketiers in the rereward, as that they could not come ſo nigh as to do any harme, although that all the way they went they were by them ſtill charged, to the great contentment of Baſta, to ſee ſo good a beginning of his deſignes as might bring them on to their wiſhed effect. But when he ſaw the great artillery vpon the carriages to come out of the village, a certain ſigne that the enemy ſet forward with al his forces, he marched faire & ſoftly to giue him hope to ouertake him: and ſo retired as far as he thought good from the village, hauing before thought of a conuenient place wherein his people might with roome enough vpon aduantage ſtay: when as about halfe a mile from him, and as far from the village, he might ſee the enemy march with his people in order of battell; then began he to march towards him alſo: and perceiuing the enemy to come in one only thicke front, by reaſon of the ſtreitneſſe of the place, hauing on the right hand towards the riuer placed as it were all his horſmen, and towards the mountaine his footmen alone, and 500 foot placed aloft without any artillery, as it ſeemed he would haue done, hauing planted ſome below at the foot of the hill in the way, and in the midſt, euen before the front of the battell, where the horſemen came after the footmen; he alſo placed his ſquadron in one front onely, to the intent not to be incloſed by the enemy on the flanke of his army. The body of his maine battell conſiſted of one great ſquadron of about 3000 Almaine footmen, flanked on each ſide with 150 Rutters of Sileſia: before the ſquadron toward the right hand he had ſet a looſe wing of three hundred muſketiers: in the right wing toward the hill he placed a company of launces, with two ſquadrons of the country footmen: and in the left wing toward the riuer one ſquadron of Tranſyluanian footmen, & two of launces, for that the enemy was at that time very ſtrong in horſemen: the Coſſackes, archers and harquebuſiers he placed in the rereward: of his great artillery he would make no vſe, for that hauing not much, he would not ſtand vpon the defence thereof, but deſired rather with all ſpeed to come to the ſword with the enemy, vnacquainted with ſuch cloſe fight, foot to foot, and well the leſſe fit, by reaſon of their light armor. And therefore he thought it beſt firſt to ſet forward his ſquadron of Almaines to giue the charge, bending towards the right hand, amongſt the thickeſt of his footmen towards the artillery at the foot of the hill, as there whereas was the ſtrength of the enemies infantery. And doubting in the performance hereof, to be charged on the left ſide with a great ſquadron of about 3000 launces, which ſeemed to ſtand vpon that wing to giue the firſt charge; he gaue order vnto Sodeviz his Lieutenant, G and Colonell of the Rutters, which had the leading of the left wing, that he ſhould at a certaine ſigne giuen, ſet forward towards the left hand, for the charging of that great ſquadron. So his people being ſet in order, and the manner of proceeding ſet downe, he putting on his helmet, with cheerefull countenance ſaid, That at that time he truſted he ſhould ſhew vnto the Vayuod, that his Truncheon could do more than his Scimitar: And himſelfe ſetting forward betwixt the ſquadron of the Almaine footmen and the wing of the musketiers, about two houres after noone, marched faire and ſoftly towards the enemy: who without mouing expected the diſcharging of their artillery; whereunto the neerer that the enemy came vnto it, the leſſe harme it did him, by ſhooting either ouer or ſhort in the field, which eaſily aſcended. The wing of musketiers went directly to giue a charge vnto the artillery; and the ſquadron toward the foot of the hill, where Baſta deſired forcibly to charge, that thereby they H might be enforced to ſpend their firſt vollies, and with ſome diſcouragement or diſorder to retire, preſently came in, all afront, juſt vpon the ſigne giuen; and ſo with his Almaine footmen and the Rutters on the right hand, encloſed and compaſſed in behind the greateſt part of the enemies footmen. At which very inſtant, the Rutters on the left hand alſo ſo couragiouſly charged vpon the three thouſand launces, that better could not haue beene deſired of any band of moſt old and expert ſouldiers. The lances retiring without any hurt, and the firſt volley diſcharged, forced the infantery and ſo diſordered the reſt. Whereupon the wings charging, there enſued preſently a great ſlaughter and ouerthrow, onely forty of Baſta his men being ſlaine, and as many hurt; where of the enemies were loſt in the battell ten thouſand: and I greater had the ſlaughter beene, if the village and appoch of the night had not couered many of them that fled, and ſtaied the purſuit of the victors that followed them. Which putteth me in remembrance of the great victory that Scipio Aſiaticus had againſt Antiochus, wherein were ſlaine of the Romans but three hundred (although that in the fight one of the wings ſtood for a time doubtfull) there being loſt of the enemies aboue fifty thouſand. Howbeit there were afterwards found in all (as was by the peaſants of the countrey reported) twenty thouſand ſlaine in this battell. By this victory Baſta recouered many enſignes and much armour, before ſent by the Emperour vnto the Vayuod, together with all his tents and baggage. And preſently after the ouerthrow, there were many troups of horſemen ſent out euery way with proclamation, to ſpare the liues of ſuch of the Siculi as ſhould lay downe their armes: of K whom many were ſent priſoners vnto diuers places, eſpecially to Fogaras, a ſtrong Towne towards Valachia. As for the Vayuod himſelfe, hee with certaine Coſſackes eſcaped by flight.

Michael the Vayuod ouerthrowne.

The morrow following, Baſta diſpatched away the County Caurioli, to enforme the Emperour of all the particularities of the ſucceſſe of that expedition: who ſeemed to be therewith pleaſed, yet neither gaue reward vnto the County, neither commended Baſta in that hee had done (foreſeeing perhaps what was to enſue thereof) although he had in writing before approued of his reſolution and motion made in fauour of the Confederats. Staying that day in that quarter, Baſta gaue order vnto the Chiaki, to ſend out a thouſand horſemen to purſue the flying Vayuod; who in ſtead of ſo doing, joyning themſelues with other their conſorts, L ſetled themſelues to ranſacke Alba Iulia, vnder the colour, that there was the Vayuods wealth and ſubſtance; yet (as the manner of ſuch men is) ſparing neither Merchant nor Citiſen: which worthily ſeemed vnto Baſta a great wrong, for, to ſee the innocent puniſhed, and the guilty to eſcape free. And albeit that he made what haſte he might thitherwards with all his campe, and ſo ſtaied one day not far from thence, to haue giuen ſome redreſſe vnto the ſpoils that had happened; yet was all that his labour loſt, for that ſo many of the greater ſort and chiefeſt amongſt them had their hands therein, with whom he thought it more wiſedome as then to diſſemble, than to fall into any tearmes of ſeuerity, without hope of doing any good. So he reſolued in all haſte to march towards Fogaras (whither he heard ſay the Vayuod was come with new forces out of Valachia and Moldauia) and in ſix daies march came to Cibi- M nium, where he receiued certaine newes, That the great Chancellor of Polonia, and Sigiſmund (ſometime the Tranſyluanian Prince) were with a ſtrong army vpon the frontiers of Moldauia; hauing ſent before them Moyſes the Siculian, with about eight thouſand of the Siculi (his ſouldiers) to what purpoſe was eaſie to be ſeene. Which aduertiſement interrupted the

This Chiaki was the chiefe man and as it were the ring-leader of the Tranſyluaniãs into rebellion.

courſe

A course of Baſta his victory; for that it ſeemed not reaſonable to purſue the enemy, and to leaue behind him a doubt of ſo great importance: and eſpecially, for that he thought he could not aſſure himſelfe of the aid of the countrey people, in caſe that Sigiſmund their old Prince were once ſeene in Tranſyluania. Wherefore he thought good to ſtay where he was, to prouide for all euents as need ſhould be, and ſo reſolued to ſend the Chiaki, and one Ladiſlaus Pithi, to parley with Moſes, who made a ſhew of no great moment of his good will towards the confederats.
In the meane time came two meſſengers from the Vayuod, offering in his name, that he ſhould doe whatſoeuer were in the behalfe of the Emperour to be impoſed vpon him. Vnto whom theſe conditions were by Baſta and the reſt of the Commanders propounded; Firſt, That he ſhould for euer reſigne all the claime he had or might haue in the countrey of Tranſyluania:
B then, That he altogether with his army, ſhould giue his oath of fidelity vnto his Imperiall Majeſty: alſo, That he ſhould forthwith through Valachia go with his army vnto the frontiers of Moldauia, to ſtay the Polonians from farther entrance: and moreouer, to giue his wife and little ſonne in hoſtage for the performance of theſe things. With which meſſengers was ſent one Sebaſtian Techelli, to receiue the oath and promiſed hoſtages: vnto whom was appointed for the place of their ſafe keeping, the Biſhops caſtle in Alba-Iulia, the Vayuod hauing before requeſted, That they might be ſo kept in Tranſyluania: although Baſta thought it much better to haue had them kept in the vpper Hungary. This agreement being made, Baſta kept on his way towards Fogaras, which he found already poſſeſſed by the Chiaki, & ſo from thence to Corona. After which, the Vayuod diſtruſting of the articles agreed vpon, C went directly into Valachia, but not at all into Moldauia; not ſo much diſcomfited with the forces of the Polonians whom he went againſt (not doubting to giue them a great ouerthrow) as for the diſtruſt he had of Moſes the Siculian, who in the battell might ſhew himſelfe his enemy behind him. Now whether it were for the diſtruſt he had in his own followers, or only for feare of treaſon by the Polonians plotted, being not likely that they with ſo ſmall forces were come to fight, without ſome greater ſecret deceit; he not knowing whom to truſt or to feare, of his owne accord tooke his flight into the ſtrength of the mountaines, without any great loſſe of his people, hauing left his baggage behind him, which was aſſailed and taken by the Haiducks and ſuch other ſharkers enured to prey, who alwaies ready in like occaſion, help to ſpoile and chaſe them that are already running: although that afterwards in diuers skirmiſhes D with the Turks (who to cauſe him the rather to turne his backe vnto the Polonians, had preſumptuouſly ſcoured vp and downe the country) he loſt many. In fine, giuing Moldauia loſt, he was now out of hope how to be able to hold onely Valachia his old gouernment.
Euen he which but a little before commanded aboue an hundred thouſand ſouldiers in field; he, which in deſpight of who ſaid nay, was able to command Valachia and Moldauia, and happily the other countries alſo neere vnto him, as hauing receiued the command of Tranſyluania as Gouernour for the Emperour; he that made Conſtantinople to tremble, and found no Empire equall to his deſignes. But it fareth oftentimes with the Great, as with birds of prey, who greedily ſeeking to prey vpon others, become themſelues a prey vnto others greater than themſelues: for they neuer contented, and attributing onely vnto their owne valour and wiſedome, E their owne proſperous proceedings, are the true ſhewers of the vnſtable wheele of Fortune: or what ſay I of Fortune? being rather the very children of Folly. So commonly falleth it out with Princes (eſpecially the new) which in the garboiles of war betwixt their mighty neighbours, not gouerned by their owne wiſedome, reſt themſelues onely vpon the aduice of their Counſellours, are by them led they wot not whither, for the greateſt intereſt they haue in them. For had the Vayuod had but the leaſt inſight into politicall gouernment, he might well haue vnderſtood, that amongſt ſo many mighty Princes he could not much grow, or yet well root himſelfe, without the aſſured ſtay of ſome one or other of them. He ſhould alſo haue knowne within what compaſſe a new Prince ought to haue vſed ſeuerity and rigour; and that he ought to obſtaine from all offence in good or otherwiſe, which might any way F procure vnto him the diſpleaſure or hatred of his ſubjects. Whereas his Counſellors not ſo much reſpecting his profit as their owne, had not the power or not the will to perſuade him ſo by good meanes to plant himſelfe ſure in Tranſyluania; but ſo both caſt him headlong from his high eſtate, and at the ſame time furthered the loſſe of Caniſia, a matter of important conſequence.

A reconciliation made betwixt Michael the Vayuod & Baſta.

Michael for feare of being betraied vnto the Polonians, taketh his flight into the mountaines.

Now lay Baſta encamped in the field in Tranſyluania, when a meſſenger came vnto him from the great Chancellour of Polonia, to declare vnto him, That it was not his purpoſe to G trouble Tranſyluania, hauing no ſuch order from the King: albeit that he would adviſe the Tranſyluanians, if they wiſhed to liue in quiet, to make choice of a Prince of their owne nation, and ſuch a one as the Turke ſhould well like of, whereas otherwiſe they ſhould but ſeeke their owne deſtruction, together with their neighbors. Which his counſell was well marked of them all, albeit it was thought by many of the wiſer ſort, not ſo much to proceed of any good meaning he had towards the Tranſyluanians, as of an old grudge and inueterate hatred he had alwaies borne againſt the houſe of Auſtria, as alſo, that he euen then countenanced the Prince Sigiſmund with his army to no other end, but by him to raiſe vp new ſtirs in that Prouince, and ſo to draw it from the Emperors obeiſance, although thereby it became againe tri- H butary vnto the Turke, who in all theſe matters had a great hand. Yea, ſome ſticked not to ſay, That he couertly aimed at that principality for his ſonne, howſoeuer he masked the ſame vnder the ſhew of Sigiſmund the late Prince. But vnto him anſwer was giuen by the Tranſyluanians, (with thanks for his good will) That in all their conſultations they would haue a principall regard of their owne welfare, together with the common. Which anſwer he hauing receiued, forthwith placed one Simon (the brother of Hieremias the Moldauian) Vayuod of Valachia in ſtead of Michael by him driuen out, and ſo leauing a conuenient number of ſouldiers with him, returned himſelfe towards Polonia. Vnto which election ſo made by the Polonians, the Turks craftily gaue place, knowing well to play the foxes where they could not play the lyons; wiſely for a time comporting the injury: and the old Chancellor as crafty as they, I hauing a ſecret purpoſe by occaſion of theſe preſent troubles, to prefer at length his ſon vnto the principality of Tranſyluania, and thereunto alſo to ioyne the countries of Moldauia and Valachia, had therin of purpoſe placed the aforeſaid Simon, a man of no valour, and of a ſmall apprehenſion, whom he might againe at his pleaſure diſplace, and ioyne thoſe prouinces vnto his new purchaſe; which he could not ſo well do if he ſhould haue there placed a man of greater reach and courage. So worke the heads of the Great, and ſo trauell the braines of the ambitious aſpiring.

The Chancellour placeth a new Vayuod in Valachia in ſtead of Michael, by him driuen out.

Baſta vnderſtanding of the retiring of the Polonians, entered into conſultation with the Chiaki and other the principall men of that Prouince (which lodged with the army in the country villages thereabout) for calling together the States and people, to make choice of K ſome ſuch men as they thought meeteſt to be ſent vnto the Emperor, to know his pleaſure for the gouernment of that Prouince. But now in the meane time, whileſt there was no ſuſpicion of the forreine enemy, began to worke certaine malecontents, which thinking with greater liberty to liue vnder a weake Prince, than vnder one of greater power, with one voice cried out, That Sigiſmund with a great power was entred into the confines of Tranſyluania, one while towards Valachia, another while by the way of Moldauia, and that the ſtrength of the country and others there by ſtill reſorted vnto him: with other ſuch like inuentions, of purpoſe deuiſed to haue made Baſta ſuddenly depart, or at leaſtwiſe to haue troubled the Dyet or aſſembly called, and the conſultation alſo. But he well aduiſed of their purpoſe, moued not out of his quarter, but there lay very priuatly, to declare thereby the great confidence he had L in the thankfulneſſe of the nobility of that country, as by him deliuered from the oppreſſion of the Vayuod: as alſo to make them to vnderſtand, That the gouernment to be appointed was not to be ſetled in the ſole power of a tyrant, but in the fidelity of the ſubjects, protected vnder a moſt gentle, royall, and moſt fatherlike gouernment, not ambitiouſly ſought after, but voluntarily of themſelues offered, and for the common good, by the Emperor accepted. Beſide that, he knew right well, how that Caſtaldo (in like caſe before in the yeare 1551, ſent into Tranſyluania with 8000 Almaines) left behind him his army, and without any precedent courteſie went priuatly to Alba Iulia, where Queene Iſabel had for her defence aſſembled a Dyet of all the States, and there by well handling of the matter, got to Ferdinand the Emperor that kingdome, which he could not by the feare of his forces haue gained: for which doing, Writers M attribute vnto him the name of great wiſedome, notwithſtanding that the yeare following he was forced to abandon his conqueſts, but yet not though any default in himſelfe.

Falſe rumours raiſed to haue terrified Baſta,

But it is truly ſaid, That men pleaſured, according to the occaſion change their manners, as doth the camelion his color according to the place: nothing being by nature ſo ſhort, nothing

A of leſſe life than the remembrance of a benefit with the vnthankful, which the greater it is, the more it is repayd with ingratitude, either by making it to haue bin of little worth, or to haue proceeded not of curteſie, but from ſome other more priuat and proper conſiderations of the giuer. The Diet aforeſaid being aſſembled, diuers broiles were there raiſed by the male-Contents; as vſually it commeth to paſſe where the people haue to do with the gouernment, apt to be moued with euery humor, alwaies ready to change their opinion, as ſtraight glutted ther-with, headſtrong, faithleſſe, all in words to no end: ſome of them in that aſſembly cried out, That the Almaines might be payd, diſcharged, and thanked for the paines they had taken for them as their neighbors, with offering to do them the like pleaſure as their occaſions ſhould require; others cried to haue them put all to the ſword, ſo much they were deuoid of reaſon: B others cried out as faſt, That they were not by any means to indure the gouernment of Maximilian the Archduke, but by ſome nominated vnto them, would needs haue a prince of their own country, and ſuch a one as the Turk ſhould wel like of, as the Chancellor had perſuaded them. Baſta for all that not diſmaied with ſo vnexpected an incounter (albeit he began to ſuſpect that he had loſt all his labor, if he were not in ſhort time with greater forces relieued) at ſuch time as the Chiaki, with other chief men amongſt the people, came as their manner was, euery other day to viſit him; with couragious ſpeech and vnapalled countenance told them plainly, That he wel perceiued their drift and purpoſe; and yet doubted not either of their oth of obedience giuen vnto his Imperiall Majeſty, either of the freſh remembrance of the great benefit they had from him ſo lately receiued; and in caſe it might happen them, little to e-C ſteem of thoſe things (greater than which could not happen among men) that yet they ſhould wel know, that he was not a man to be feared with words, but fully reſolued not to ſtir one foot thence with his forces, but rather to loſe his life, which he would for all that ſel as dear as he could. Wherunto auſwer was giuen with much curteous ſpeech, That he ſhould not giue eare vnto any the ſpeeches of the light vulgar people, but rather to content himſelfe that the Nobility, in whoſe hands the chief power of that prouince was, had not don any thing not beſeeming themſelues. So after much diſpute, were appointed three perſons according to the three Eſtates (the Nobility, Commons, and State in generall) to go vnto the Emperour, to re-queſt of him Maximilian the Archduke for their gouernor: with ſpecial requeſt alſo, That it would pleaſe him not to ouercharge with forrein ſoldiers that prouince already ſore impoue-D riſhed, eſpecially hauing in it ſelf people ſufficient for the defence thereof, and more nimble to incounter with the Turks, than the heauy & ſlow Almains, and they alſo of double charge.
Theſe difficulties with much ado thus appeaſed by ſuch as ſtood faſt for the Emperour, Baſta thought it not good againe to call any ſuch aſſembly; hoping that time, and the Emperours great wiſdom, would for al theſe matters find conuenient remedy. Yet ſaw he plainly, the peoples mind was, to reſolue to remain for euer free, if they ſhould haue come to a ſecond Conſultation; and rather a princely deſire to command, than to be commanded: yea, in that ſelfe ſame Diet the Chiaki was declared gouernor on the behalf of the people, with authoritie of himſelf in many things to determine, without calling together of any aſſembly of the reſt of the States; which they ſaid they did only, vntil they were by his Imperiall Maieſty prouided E of a Gouernor. Neuertheles Baſta well perceiued more than a Tribunitiall power to be now ioined by the people vnto the Emperors Commiſſioners; knowing that this Chiaki well hoped to haue bin proclaimed Prince of the Confederats, in caſe they had not bin preſently re-lieued againſt the Vayuod: and hauing in him yet noted ſtil his great ambition, for that marching from Torda toward the Vaiuod, he cauſed to be caried before him a ſpear, with an Hungarian cap, and a plume of feathers vpon a lance, in token of his chiefe command; albeit that afterward at the complaint of Baſta, pretending therin a wrong to be done vnto his regiment, marching vnder the Imperial ſtandard, he took it down: neither was he then a little ſuſpected to haue ſuffered his ſoldiers to ſack Alba-Iulia, as alſo to haue ſurpriſed Fogaras, and to haue vſed diuers other means all tending to popularitie and ambitious aſpiring. Wherin he dee-F med it better to diſſemble, than to proceed further, and then to do it indeed when hee had ſuf-ficient power.

Baſta his ſtout ſpeech to the Tranſiluanians

The next day following came al the Counſel of that prouince, with the Deputies appointed to haue gon vnto the Emperour, and the people, to the houſe of Baſta, requeſting him (although ſuch their manner of comming might ſeem to exceed the bounds of requeſt) that he would ſend his Germans out of the country,and ſo after ſo many troubles to giue it leaue to breath a little:as for himſelfe, he might ſtay at Alba-Iulia vntill the men deputed to that purpoſe might go vnto his Majeſty with their requeſts. Baſta not a little troubled with ſuch an imperious requeſt,and now,but not before, perceiuing the occaſion of this great diſcontentment,ſaw himſelf much deceiued in a moſt material point,and the ground of all this action, by truſting too much to his owne too ſmall forces, too weake for the defence of his perſon, much leſſe to keepe vnder ſo populous a prouince,ſuch as before in the yeare 1552, vnder the leading of Caſtaldo,had of it ſelf ſent out 70000 fighting men for the beſieging of Lippa, and now vpon the ſudden 12000 with a few noblemen in the face of a mighty and armed Enemy, where they now held an armed conſultation with him, the Nobility meeting together with their great retinues,& ſo much the greater, by how much the ſuſpition was the more by them feared,for them to be inforced to reſolue vpon any thing contrary to their good liking:whereas he contenting himſelf only with their oath,without any other hoſtages, and ſo giuing ayd vnto the Confederats,had put himſelfe vpon their faith,together with all his people,into the midſt of Tranſylvania;a matter of far greater importance than any pledge they were able to haue giuen him. Beſides that, of the 6000 men which hee had brought with him into that Country,three thouſand fiue hundred of Sileſia now brought to 2000,could not be perſuaded longer to ſtay without their pay before hand,the pay of their Country being ſpent already: and the reſt drawn out of the gariſons in the vpper Hungary,or els there preſſed,were at a certain time to return home. Yet neuertheleſſe he attempted in ſome ſort to ſatisfie their requeſt,for not grieuing of the Countrey,by requeſting them to deliuer vnto him ſome ſtrong place,wherinto he putting his men into gariſon,they might ſo lie without any further charge or trouble to the Countrey,liuing vpon their owne wages. Which when hee could not obtain,and withall conſidering, that if thoſe few of his people which yet remained could bee contented to ſtay with him, the retaining of them might giue occaſion vnto the deſirous of new ſtirs,vpon euery the leaſt diſorder of the ſoldiers to alter the matter at their pleaſure (as had hapned vnto the eight thouſand Almains of Caſtaldo, driuen ſomtimes out of that Country vnder the colour of ſome inſolencie by them committed; although others had beene the chief doers therof,namely about ſome twenty Polonians) hee reſolued of all theſe things to giue notice to the Court,and ſo fair and ſoftly to march with his ſouldiers vnto the frontiers of that country,and to ſaue his eight pieces of artillery with other munition in Samos Vivar caſtle,a ſtrong fortres a good way within the confines, which together with the ſtrong caſtle of Kuivar, Aga Leche an Albanoiſe,and Generall of the Vayuods horſmen, deliuered to Zakel Captain of Zaccomar,one of his Majeſties Commiſſioners,who there prouided for the Gouernor Baſta his familiar fauourit: although that the Tranſylvanians had with great promiſes ſought to haue croſſed ſuch deliuery of the aforeſaid Caſtles, and to haue had them in their own power.

Wherfore Baſta not deceiued, but by neceſſity inforced, yeelded that hee could not hold; and gaue that he could not ſel,making a vertue of neceſſity; deceiued in the euent of the matter which he had propounded vnto himſelf from the beginning, for aſſuring that Country to the Emperor:by an excuſable error,if it be true that ſome wiſe men ſay,Nothing to bee more vnreaſonable,than by the euent of matters to iudge of their wiſdome by whom they were managed; which conſiſteth not in diuining before of the certainty of the euent,but in the reaſonable coniecture therof by the means leading therunto, than which nothing is more deceitfull,as not depending from their own actions only,but from other mens alſo more groſſe and vnreaſonable:none knowing better how much the wiſdom of man deceiueth it ſelf,than thoſe which are vnto themſelues true witneſſes of the euent of their own conſultations. Neuertheleſſe the matter was afterward ſo wel handled by Baſta,PetZen, and others the Emperors great fauorits in Tranſylvania, that in a Diet holden among the Tranſylvanians, he was with a conuenient gard again by them receiued as the Emperors lieutenant, vntil further order were by him taken for the gouernment and aſſurance of that countrey:the Chiaki and his Complices faintly conſenting therunto,as not greatly pleaſed therwith. Neither had Baſta much cauſe to be proud of ſuch his gouernment, hauing thereof no longer aſſurance than pleaſed that fickle people to afford him:yet ſith no better could be had,he muſt take it as he might,deeming it better in ſome ſort for the preſent to hold it for the Emperor,than not at all. With which his weak

A weake ſtate amongſt more enemies than friends we will for a while leaue him.

But whilſt things thus paſſed, as we haue ſaid, in Tranſyluania and Hungary, the treaty for peace betwixt the Emperor & the Turks being vaniſhed into ſmoke, Ibrahim Baſſa the Turkes General in Hungary, hauing all the laſt Winter made great preparation for the inuaſion of the Emperors territories, and the doing of ſome notable enterpriſe for the recouery of his reputation, ſomwhat impaired by the euil ſucces of the laſt yeares Wars; and euen in theſe his preparations of this year, not a little troubled by the mutiny of the Ianizaries and Spahi, for want of their pay at Conſtantinople, as alſo with the rebellion in Caramania; now at length in the later end of Auguſt, by order from the grand Seigniour his great Lord and maſter, began to ſet forward with his army from Belgrade, ſuppoſed to be aboue two hundred thouſand B men ſtrong. And comming to Babatſca, a ſtrong fortreſſe of the Chriſtians in the neather Hungary, ſate down before it, and hauing planted his artillery furiouſly battered it, with purpoſe to haue the next day aſſaulted it: but the captaine of the caſtle conſidering the weaknes of his garriſon to withſtand ſo puiſſant an enemy, and that the walls were already ſore ſhaken with the fury of the great ordnance, came to a reaſonable Compoſition with the great Baſſa, and ſo deliuered vnto him the place. Which exploit don, and the Caſtle to him ſurrendred, he marched from thence to Caniſia, a ſtrong town in the frontiers of Stiria, of moſt men before ſuppoſed a place impregnable; for that it was ſcituat in a very deepe mariſh, and furniſhed with a ſtrong garriſon of valiant ſoldiers, part Hungarians, and part Almains. After this ſtrong town Ibrahim the great Baſſa eſpecially longed, ſo to free thoſe frontiers of the Turkes C from the often incurſions that the garriſon ſoldiers of that place made therein; as alſo by the taking of that ſo ſtrong a fortreſſe from the Chriſtians, to open a more free and ſafe paſſage to the Turkes for Auſtria, to the indangering of thoſe places of the Empire alſo farther off.
Wherefore incamping his great army on the ſide of the mariſh which compaſſed the Iſland round wheron the town ſtood, he began with fagots and earth to fil vp the mariſh, ſo to paſſe ouer his army; they in the town in the mean time not ceaſing with their thundring ſhot to diſturb them, and to do them what harm they might: who for all that proceeding in their work had brought it now almoſt cloſe to the Iſland; where while they were about to haue landed, they were by the garriſon ſouldiers ſo incountred, that hauing loſt a number of their men, as wel Ianizaries as others, with two of their beſt captains alſo, they were by plain valor inforced D to retyre. But preparing themſelues againſt the next day, with greater force to haue againe returned vnto the aſſault of the Iſle, they ſaw the Imperial army now at their backs, and come ſo neer them, that with their artillery they did them great harm; which put them in no ſmall fear, ſeeing themſelues incloſed betwixt the town and the camp, and both out of the one and the other to receiue no ſmall hurt, as wel with the ſmall ſhot as the great: beſides that out of the camp diuers whole bands ſometimes ſallied, diſcharging great vollies of ſhot euen into their trenches. In the Imperial army were but two and forty thouſand horſe and foot, men of diuers nations, vnder the leading of Duke Mercury, now Generall of the Emperours forces in Hungary, with whom were the Lords Nadaſti, Eſdrin, Bacchian, and the gouernour of Croatia, with diuers other famous Captains come thither for the relief of Caniſia (a place of ſo great E importance for the defence of that ſide of the Country) and to helpe that it fell not into the power of the barbarous enemy. But Ibrahim Baſſa vnderſtanding by his eſpials the ſmal number of the Chriſtians, and wel knowing how much he was too ſtrong for them, by reaſon of his great multitude, went out againſt them, and finding them as ready as himſelfe, joined battell with them, with great ſlaughter of men both on the one ſide and on the other. Which blou-dy fight (the victory yet ſtanding doubtfull, but in mens iudgements more inclining to the Chriſtians than to the Turks) was at length by the comming on of the night broken off. At which time the Chriſtians retyring themſelues into their trenches, the Turkes ſtood all that night in the camp, with their weapons in their hands, as fearing to haue bin again in the night by their enemies aſſailed. Mean while the Chriſtian Captaines at variance amongſt them-F ſelues, and ſo not now to be commanded by Duke Mercury their General; at ſuch time as the Turks preſuming on their multitude, dared them to battell the next day, could by no means be perſwaded to goe forth againſt them, or once to ſtirre out of their trenches. Inſomuch that the General of the Tartars thereupon beeing incouraged, made an inrode into the Countrey thereby, and meeting with two hundred Waggons laded with victuals going vnto the Chri-ſtian camp, ſlew the conuoy that garded them, and ſo caried them quite away. Wherby ſuch want aroſe in the Chriſtian Camp, that hauing not what to eat, and out of hope of any new ſupply of relief in time to come, they were glad by night to diſlodge & retyre. Which could not ſo ſecretly be don, but that it was of the Turks perceiued: who preſently following after them, in the tail of the army cut off about 3000 of them, with certain pieces of great ordnance and moſt part of the baggage; the reſt of the army in the mean time retyring farther off into places of more ſafety. From this victory the Turkes returned again to the ſiege of Caniſia, where after a few daies, the garriſon ſoldiers now out of hope to be in good time relieued, ſuddenly fel into mutiny, refuſing any longer to defend the towne, now hardly layd vnto by the Turks; and the rather, for that diuers of the Hungarians were already fled out of the Towne vnto the Baſſa, hauing, as it was thought, reuealed vnto him the whole eſtate of the beſieged. So that now there was no remedy, but that the Towne muſt be deliuered vnto the enemy: although Paradiſer with ſome other of the captains did what they might, as they ſaid afterward, to haue perſuaded the contrary. Wherupon they came to parly with the Baſſa, and couenanting with him, That they might with bag and baggage depart, and with a ſafe Conuoy bee brought ouer the riuer Mur, promiſed to yeeld the town vnto him. All which the Baſſa granted, fearing how to haue bin able to haue kept the field, if they ſhould any long time haue holden out, Winter now ſo faſt approching. So the 22 of October the town was vnto the Baſſa right cowardly deliuered, and the garriſon ſoldiers with their baggage, in 100 waggons lent them by the Turks, ſafely conducted ouer the Mur, as was vnto them promiſed. After the agreement made for the yeelding vp of the towne, the Baſſa in courteſie ſent vnto Paradiſer the gouernor a very rich gown of cloath of gold: which albeit hee refuſed, yet was it afterwards layd to his charge, as a preſumption of ſome treacherous colluſion betwixt him and the Baſſa for the betraying of the town, which it was thought he might much longer haue kept. Ibrahim now thus poſſeſſed of the town he had ſo much deſired, fortified it more ſtrongly than euer it was before; and for the more aſſurance thereof, put into it a ſtrong garriſon of 4000 foot and 500 horſe, all old expert ſoldiers: and immediatly after without reſiſtance forraged the country round about Caniſia, burning all before him as he went; the poore Chriſtian inhabitants flying as faſt as they could for ſafegard of their liues. But hauing thus with the ſpoile of the country wel pleaſed his ſoldiers; he deſirous to haue the ſame againe in time repeopled, as therby to yeeld vnto the Turks the more profit, ſtaied their further outrage, vpon great paine forbidding the ſame; by open proclamations in euery place ſet vp, inuiting the Chriſtians without fear of farther harm, to return again into the country, where ſubmitting themſelues vnto the great Sultans obedience, they ſhould vnder his protection ſafely dwell, without any tribute to be of them exacted for three years ſpace next following. Which proclamations were in his name thus publiſhed.

Ibrahim Baſſa, to the Inhabitants of the Country about Caniſia, Greeting.

Ibrahims proclamation.

WE Ibrahim Baſſa, by the grace of God Viſier, and Couſin vnto the moſt puiſſant and inuincible Sultan Mahomet, Emperor of the Turks: Vnto all the inhabitants of the marches about Caniſia, and the reſt of the country of Steirmarck, from the greateſt vnto the leaſt, Greeting. Wheras we haue willingly heard, that ſome of you willing to ſubmit your ſelues vnto the great Sultan, and to ſweare vnto him fealty, are again returned vnto your old dwellings: We promiſe and aſſure you vpon the faith of the ſaid Emperor, that whoſoeuer ſhall be found neere the fortreſſe of Caniſia, now belonging to the great Sultan, with all reuerence ſubmitting himſelf as his ſubiect vnder his gouernment, acknowledging him for his Soueraign, ſhall enioy more priuiledges than he did before, and alſo be protected in the ſame. And for that we know that your houſes are for the moſt part deſtroyed, as alſo your poſterity; you ſhall therfore for theſe three years next following be exempted and free from all tributes and charges whatſoeuer, to the end you may the better recouer your ſelues. Of which grace if you ſhall willingly accept, we promiſe you, that neither you, your wiues, or children ſhall be in any thing wronged, or your goods in any part impaired, but ſo much as in vs poſſibly is, to be defended: ſo that ſo many of you as pleaſe, may in ſafety return into your old dwellings, giuing before knowledge therof vnto the Gouernor of this our fortreſſe.

Many

A Many of theſe poor countrey people before fled for feare of the Turks, and not knowing where to beſtow themſelues, now vpon this proclamation returned to their antient dwelling places, there to begin the world again vnder the Turkiſh obeiſance. But for that County Serinus was the man whom of all others in that Countrey the great Baſſa ſought after, as him whom he moſt feared after his departure to trouble this his new conqueſt, and to ſeek to be reuenged (hauing in this calamity of Stiria his country loſt twenty villages of his owne, quite burnt by the Turks, and the people moſt ſlain or els taken priſoners) hee many times before hauing ſought to perſuade him to yeeld his obedience vnto the Turkiſh Sultan, and now in hope after ſo great a loſſe to bring him in, before all his fortunes were vtterly ruined (by the loſſe of Caniſia, and the entrance of the Turks into Stiria, not a little indangered) writ to him B as followeth:

Ibrahim Baſſa his letters vnto Count Serinus.

WE Ibrahim Baſſa, chiefe of the Viſier Baſſaes, and couſin to the moſt puiſſant Sultan Mahomet, to the County Serinus ſendeth greeting. We haue oftentimes heretofore written vnto thee concerning the matter thou knoweſt of, but what the cauſe is we receiued no anſwer, we know not. Yet could I not but write vnto thee again, That if thou canſt be content to begin the matter aright, and to ſubmit thy ſelf vnto our protection, we will be ready to receiue thee. Thou ſeeſt, that what we foretold thee is now more than fulfilled both vpon thee and thine, which thou wouldſt neuer beleeue. Neuertheles, for the ſtaying of the further effuſion of the bloud, as well of thy ſubiects as ours, and to come to ſome good attonement, it is high time for thee to lay thine hand vpon thyne heart, and to conſider how much more it concerneth thee C than vs, and that the benefit thereof redoundeth more vnto thine than ours: What our affection is toward thee, Hieroni the Vayuod can tell thee. Farewell.

From our Camp, after the conqueſt of Caniſia, the 7 of Nouember, 1600.

But theſe letters being alſo as the reſt, anſwered with ſilence, the great Baſſa hauing diſpoſed of all as he thought beſt at Caniſia and in the country thereabout, returned with his army to Belgrade, there to winter: hauing before fully certified the great Sultan of all his proceedings, and the ſucces of this war, vaunting after his vain maner, the next year to beſiege Vienna alſo, if he ſo commanded. Of all which Mahomet vnderſtanding, ſo not a little pleaſed therwith, D caused great triumphs to be made four daies together at Conſtantinople, and in token of his loue and fauor, ſent a rich robe of cloath of gold, with a leading ſtaffe all ſet with pearl and pretious ſtones, vnto the Baſſa yet lying at Belgrade.

This loſſe of Caniſia much troubled all that ſide of Chriſtendom, eſpecially them of the territories belonging to the houſe of Auſtria, in a ſort diſmaied, to ſee the Turkes ſo eaſily poſſeſſed of a town, before thought almoſt inpregnable, and the ſtrongeſt defence of all that country againſt the furious impreſſions of the Turkes, to whom it was now become a moſt ſafe and ſure receptacle: all men with one voice blaming the diſcord of the captains in the Imperial army, for ſo retyring without any good doing; but aboue all deteſting the cowardiſe of Paradiſer, who known to haue in the town a ſtrong garriſon, with good ſtore of munition and E victuals (as was ſuppoſed) had ſo baſely deliuered the ſame vnto the enemy, not doing his vtmoſt deuoir for the defence therof: wheras if he had ſo don, haply in the meane time the cold and vnſeaſonablenes of the weather (though no other relief had bin) winter being now come, might haue inforced the Turks to raiſe their ſiege. Whereupon he was for this ſo foule a fact by the Emperors commandement apprehended and caſt in priſon at Vienna; where after he had long lien, and his cauſe oftentimes examined, he was the next year after condemned of felony and cowardiſe, and ſo the fifteenth day of October executed; hauing firſt his hand at four ſtrokes of the Executioner ſtruck off, and after that his head. With him alſo was in like maner executed his Enſigne-bearer: and after them his lieutenant with the Maior of the ſaid town; who both bound faſt to a ſtake, had firſt their tongues cut out, and afterward their heads F chopt off.

Paradiſer executed for yeelding Caniſia.

Now the rebellion before raiſed in Caramania by Cuſſabin Baſſa (as is before ſaid) was not with his death altogether appeaſed; Orfa Alſo a great city of that country (which hauing taſted the ſweetnes of liberty in the time of Cuſſabin) yet ſtil holding out againſt Mahomet the great Baſſa the Sultans lieutenant General there. At which time alſo a companion of Cuſſabin the late rebel, called the Scriuano, and one of his chiefe fauorites, ſeeing how hardly not only Caſabin himſelfe, but the reſt of his followers had bin handled by the Turks, began to make head, and to call vnto him all ſuch as loued their libertie: vnto the ſweet name whereof ſo many in ſhort time were come about him, that out of them he formed ſuch an army as made him now dreadful vnto the Turks his enemies. Againſt whom Mahomet Baſſa going with all his power to haue oppreſſed him, found him with thoſe his rebellious followers ſo couragious (for the deſire they all had to break out of the Othoman ſlauerie, and to liue in ſuch liberty as was promiſed them by their Captain and Generall) that ioyning battell with them he receiued a notable ouerthrow, inſomuch that fearing to haue loſt his whole army, he was glad to retire, and to ſend out commiſſions for the raiſing of greater forces. Sultan Mahomet in the meane time, whether it was for fear of this new rebellion, or for that hee vnderſtood of the Embaſſadours ſent from the Perſian vnto the Chriſtian princes, began to ſuſpect leſt that king ſhould break the league he had made with him, and ſo to his further trouble take vp armes alſo againſt him. Wherfore vpon a Turkiſh pride, he ſent an Embaſſador into Perſia, to certifie the king, That for the more aſſurance of the league betwixt them, he demanded to haue one of his ſons ſent vnto him in hoſtage, as a pledge of his fathers faith. Which his ſo proud demand the Perſian King took ſo diſdainfully, that in his rage he commanded the Embaſſadour to be ſlaine: but that his fury being by his graue Counſellors ſomwhat appeaſed, he remitted the ſeueritie of that his rigorous command, and ſparing his life, was contented, that in deſpight of him that ſent him he ſhould endure the baſtinado onely, and ſo grieuouſly threatned ſent backe againe to his maſter. Who hauing receiued this ſhamefull anſwer, and doubting ſome further matter from that angry King, commanded new and ſtrong garriſons to be put in all his ſtrong Holds confining vpon the Perſian kingdom.

The Turks embaſſadour euill intreated in Perſia.

1601. This troubleſome year of Iubilie thus paſt, the Emperour much troubled with the loſſe of Caniſia, and in doubt of worſe to come (albeit that Ibrahim Baſſa, whom for all that he truſted not, did afreſh deale as yet with him concerning peace) and ſeeing alſo the great need hee had of greater aid to withſtand the mighty power of the Turke, with great inſtancie requeſted aid of the Pope, and of other the princes of Italy. Who conſidering alſo how much it concerned the reſt of the Chriſtian common weale to haue the frontiers of Hungary defended, condeſcended vnto the Emperours requeſt, and ſo the Pope with the beginning of the Spring ſent him eight thouſand ſouldiers in pay, vnder the leading of Io. Franciſco Aldobrandino his Nephew, their Generall, who in the like charge had ſerued there the yeare 1599. King Philip alſo at the inſtance of the Emperour gaue order vnto the Countie Fuentes to ſend him certaine [illegible] Millan. The Great Duke of Florence alſo ſent vnto him [illegible] ſouldiers vnder the leading of Franciſco de Medices [illegible] Iohn de Medices, whom Ferdinand the Archduke [illegible] requeſted to be Marſhall of his Campe. Thither came alſo the Duke of Mantua with a braue company both of horſe and foot, being for that by the Archduke made his Lieutenant Generall. And ſo whileſt theſe people aſſembled together into one, the Emperour ſent a great and good Army into Hungary, drawne for moſt part out of Germany, which vnder the leading of the Archduke Matthias his brother, and the Duke Mercury his Lieutenant Generall, went into thoſe parts to withſtand the Turk. A third Army he alſo made [illegible] which ſtrengthned with the forces of Don Ferrant Gonzaga Gouernour of the vpper Hungary, ioyned themſelues with Baſta for the recouery of the country of Tranſyluania, out of which he had bin of late driuen, as ſhall be hereafter declared.

And ſo whilſt theſe armies were in preparing, many hot ſkirmiſhes paſſed in Hungary betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, the loſſe falling ſometime to the one ſide, and ſometime to the other. But the time being now come that ſouldiers might well take the field, Ibrahim Baſſa being before dead at Belgrade, whilſt he was yet intreating of a diſſembled peace, and Haſſan one of the Viſier Baſſa's by Mahomet appointed Generall in Hungary in his place, yet delaying his comming: the parly for peace layd aſide (as neuer indeed by the Turks intended, but only by them entertained to delay the time to their own more aduantage) Duke Mercury General of the Emperours forces taking the offer of ſo fit an opportunitie, came with his army from Comara (where he had lien expecting the euent of the parley) and layd ſiege to Alba

The death of Ibrahim Baſſa

Alba-Regalis beſieged by the Chriſtians.

A Regalis, one of the chiefeſt & ſtrongeſt cities in Hungary, which ſeated in the midſt of a mariſh, was thought almoſt impregnable: beeing hardly to bee approached but by the ſuburbs, which ſtrongly fortified and defended by the mariſh, ſerued the City in ſtead of 3 moſt ſure bulwarks; within which ſtood alſo the city it ſelf, wel defended with a good wall and a ditch. This city the Duke for certain dayes continually battered, as if he had purpoſed at length to haue taken it by aſſault: but in the mean time certainly informed by a fugitiue lately fled out of the city, That the broad lake on the other ſide of the City, ouer againſt the place where he lay, was not ſo deep but that it was to be paſſed (contrary to the opinion both of the Turkes captiues, and of the natural inhabitants, whom he had vpon that point examined) and that the Turks preſuming vpon the ſtrength therof, & thinking themſelues on that ſide ſafe, had bent B almoſt all their care and forces to that ſide of the City now by him battered, not regarding any great peril to be from the other ſide feared; he appointed the Lord Ruſworm with his ſoldiers to make prooſe if the Sigeth ſuburbs (for ſo they were called) on the aforeſaid ſide of the city, ſo little regarded by the Turks, were not to be ſurpriſed; for that theſe ſuburbs being taken, the City would not long hold out. For the vndertaking of which enterpriſe Ruſſworm was by the captiue Turks and country people thereby dwelling, much diſcouraged; they all with one conſent affirming, That albeit he ſhould find no other difficulties in attempting of it, yet the lake it ſelf was not poſſible to be paſſed. Who neuertheles not altogether truſting them, ſent certain of his owne men ſecretly to try the matter: who hauing ſo done, brought him word, That the lake was vndoubtedly (though with much difficulty) to be paſſed. Wher- C fore he with 1000 ſelect ſoldiers, with euery one a good fagot at his back beſide his Arms, to fil vp the deepeſt of the mariſh, by night entred the ſame: wherin he had not gon far, but that almoſt with the danger of his life, hee found it much deeper and more troubleſome than the Spies had vnto him before reported. But carried with an inuincible courage himſelf, and his ſoldiers mooued by his example, he ſtil went on, they alſo following of him. It is a thing almoſt incredible to tel what theſe aduenturous men endured, plunged in the deep mud among the flags and bulruſhes, going ſtil vp euen to the waſt where the mariſh was the ſhalloweſt; where alſo if one miſſed but a ſtep, he was by and by ouer head and ears, and in danger to bee drowned, if he were not by his fellowes preſently holpen. Yet at length by Gods helpe, hauing but with the loſſe of ſix or ſeuen men a little before day got ouer; the Duke by an ap- D pointed ſigne aduertiſed therof, with greater ſtir and tumult than at any time before, aſſailed that ſide of the city were he lay, as if euen then and there he had only meant to haue ingaged his whole forces for the winning therof. When in the mean time the Lord Ruſſworm on the other ſide with his reſolute ſoldiers, with ſcaling ladders prouided for the purpoſe, ſcaled the wals of the ſuburbs, and almoſt vnperceiued recouered the top therof (the Turks being at the ſame time wholly bent for the defence of the other ſide of the city, where moſt ſtir and apparant danger was) and ſo beeing got into the ſuburbs, with a great and terrible cry aſſailed the Turks, who ſurpriſed with much feare, and not well knowing which way to turne themſelues, without any great reſiſtance fled into the city, the Chriſtians following them at the heels, and making of them a great ſlaughter. In which ſo great a confuſion, euen where leaſt was feared, E the Duke by other his ſoldiers took the reſt of the ſuburbs, as he had before determined; the Turks there alſo for fear forſaking them, retyring with all the haſt they could to their fellows in the city, there to liue and die together. The Chriſtians in in theſe ſuburbs, beſides other rich prey, tooke alſo 24 great pieces of artillery, with good ſtore of ſhot and pouder. The ſuburbs, the greateſt ſtrength of the city, thus happily taken, the Duke again ſummoned the city, requiring to haue it deliuered vnto him. Whereunto the Turks gaue no other anſwer but by their pieces, which they diſcharged vpon the Chriſtians ſo perſwading them to yeeld. Wherwith the Duke much diſpleaſed, ſent them word, That hee would ſend them other manner of meſſengers tomorrow, and by Gods help ſup with them in the city, although he were not vnto them welcome. Neither failed he of that his promiſe, for the next day out of the ſuburbs F hauing with the fury of his artillery made two great breaches in the city, he by the ruins therof with great ſlaughter of the enemy entred the City; albeit that the Turkes did what they might to haue defended the ſame, by caſting downe vpon the Chriſtians as they entered, darts, wild-fire, and ſuch other things, vſually prouided for ſuch purpoſes. But ſeeing now no remedy, but that they muſt needs giue place to the fortune of their enemies, they fled amain in their houſes, there to defend themſelues, or els to die: many of which houſes they had before of purpoſe ſo vndermined, as that they could eaſily ouerthrow them, and ſo ouerwhelme as many as ſhould come within the danger of them. Which ſo ſtrange a reſolution was by many of them as deſperatly performed, inſomuch that the goodly Church, the palace, with many other ſumptuous buildings, were left to the Chriſtians all rent & torn, not much better than rude heaps of rubbiſh and ſtones: howbeit the Baſſa vpon promiſe of life, yeelded himſelf, and was by the Duke preſently ſent vnto the camp; the reſt of the ſoldies beeing (as in ſuch caſe it commonly hapneth) all or moſt of them put to the ſword: the greateſt part of the prey fel vnto the Wallons; who by heaps breaking into the richeſt houſes, not only took what themſelues light vpon, but ſtript the Germans alſo of ſuch things as they had by chance gotten, to their great heart-burning and grief: yea theſe rauenous and irreligious men not ſo contented, opened the tombs of the Hungarian Kings, there long before buried, to ſpoil euen the dead of ſuch things as had for honors ſake bin interred with them. Shewing themſelues therin more barbarous than the Turks, who by the ſpace of ſixty yeares hauing had the City in their poſſeſſion, had yet ſpared thoſe reuerend monuments, and ſuffered the Reliques of thoſe worthy princes to reſt in peace. Of this taking of Alba-Regalis, the Baſſa of Buda (not long before taken priſoner, and as then lying at Vienna) hearing, abſtained from meat with his two ſeruants a whole day, proſtrat vpon his face, praying vnto his prophet Mahomet, who had (as he ſaid) all this year bin angry with the Turks. Which had the ſiege of Caniſia taken the like effect, had then vndoubtedly bin vnto them moſt vnfortunat: but God in his wiſdom ſtil tempereth the ſweet with the ſour.

Now in the mean while was Aſſan the Viſier Baſſa, and General of the Turks Armie, with ſuch ſoldiers as were already aſſembled at Belgrade, comming to haue relieued Alba-regalis, and albeit that he vnderſtood by the way as he marched, that the City was by the Chriſtians won: yet held he on his intended journy, and ſo taking with him the Baſſa of Buda, with the other Sanzacks and commanders of the towns and caſtles therabout, had formed an Army of about threeſcore thouſand ſtrong, but for moſt part raw and vnexpert ſoldiers; with the which power he ſtil held on his way toward Alba-Regalis, as wel thereby to giue ſome contentment to the angry Sultan his maſter, as in hope alſo to ouerthrow the Chriſtian Army, or at leaſtwiſe to find the city as yet vnrepaired, and ſo to regain it. But vain was that his deſignment, eſpecially for the recouery of the city; for that the Duke had no ſooner taken it, but that he forthwith cauſed the breaches to be repaired, and for the more aſſurance of it, put into it a ſtrong garriſon of old expert ſoldiers; and being himſelf about twenty thouſand ſtrong and hearing of the Baſſa's comming, ſet forward to meet him; and being come neer vnto him, began an hot and bloudy skirmiſh with him. Yet the Baſſa to proſecute his intended purpoſe for the recouery of Alba-Regalis, the next day ſent away part of his Army, to make proofe if haply the city might yet be again recouered, and himſelfe in the mean time with the reſt of his army offered battel vnto the Chriſtians; ſo to buſie them, that they ſhould not be able to trouble them whom they ſent to Alba-Regalis, or to relieue the city, if it ſhould chance to be by them oppreſſed. When as the Duke before informed of the baſeneſſe of the ſouldiers in the Baſſa's army, and that although he were for number of men far aboue him, yet for old hardy and expert ſoldiers he was ſtrong enough for him, valiantly went out and encountered him; and ſo euen at the firſt onſet by plaine valour diſordering the formoſt ſquadrons of the Turks battel, inforced them to retyre with the loſſe of ſix thouſand men; among whom were the Baſſa of Buda, ſix Sanzacks, with diuers other Captains and Commaunders of good place and mark. At which time he alſo took from them diuers pieces of great Artillery, and had vndoubtedly with a notable ſlaughter ouerthrown all the reſt of the Baſſa's Army, had not a great ſquadron of the Tartars euen at that inſtant ſhewed themſelues at the backes of the Chriſtians, and ſo ſtaying them, giuen leiſure to the Baſſa to reſtore his diſordered battell. Wherupon the Duke contenting himſelfe with the victory he had already gotten, in good order retyred again into his trenches, hauing in this conflict not loſt aboue three hundred of his people. But whileſt both Armies thus lay, and new ſupplies repaired vnto them, expecting but when they ſhould come vnto a generall day of battel; the Ianizaries ſtill muttering, That it was now no fit time of the yeare any longer to keepe the field, by their importunitie inforced the Baſſa to retyre to Buda, and there to his diſ-band his Army. In which his

A retreat many were by the Chriſtians cut off in the tail of his army, and a number of priſoners taken; and among the reſt fifty of the French mutiniers of Pappa, whom the Archduke Matthias at the inſtance of Duke Mercury afterwards pardoned. Neither ſped they much better, who were ſent by the Baſſa to haue attempted the taking of Alba Regalis; for beeing come neer therunto, they were ſo welcommed with great ſhot out of the city, and charged with often ſallies by the ſtrong garriſon, that ſeeing no hope to preuaile, they were glad to riſe, and to return again to the Baſſa that ſent them.

Caniſia beſieged by the Chriſtians.

About the ſame time that the Duke began to beſiege Alba-Regalis, Ferdinand the Archduke hauing receiued great aid from the Pope, with the other Princes of Italy, and the King of Spain, and ſo now 30000 ſtrong, by the aduice of the Duke of Mantua his Lieutenant B general reſolued to beſiege Caniſia: which to haue againe recouered out of the Turkes hands, concerned much not them of Stiria and Auſtria only, but the other prouinces adjoining, yea and Italy it ſelf alſo. Wherupon he with his army in good order came the tenth of September and incamped before it; the Duke of Mantua and Don Iohn de Medices, with 2000 Harquebuſiers and two Cornets of horſe being come the day before to take view of the towne, at whom the Turks made diuers ſhot, but without any harm doing. And albeit that the Turkes there in garriſon (in number not paſt a thouſand, accounting likewiſe 300 of the Wallons ſomtime of the garriſon of Pappa) with their often and gallant ſallies greatly troubled the Chriſtians, and that great bands of the other Turks came out of the ſtrong towns and fortreſſes therby, to skirmiſh with them, and to ſee if they could put any moe ſouldiers into the town C for the more aſſurance therof; yet ſuch was the carefulneſſe of the Chriſtian Commanders, and valour of their ſouldiers, that the Turkes both in the one place and in the other were ſtill repulſed and put to flight, with the loſſe alſo of ſome of their ſmall Caſtles and forts thereabout. To approch this ſtrong towne, and to plant a battery againſt it, ſeemed to be a matter of great difficulty, for that it was (as we haue elſwhere ſaid) inuironed round with a mariſh; yet means was found to dry it a little, and to fill it vp on the one ſide, and to come ſo neere the Town, that hauing planted three tyre of artillery againſt it, the Chriſtians began furiouſly to batter it, beating downe both the walls, the houſes, and other buildings therin; yea at length they had brought their approches ſo neer, that they were come with their trenches euen cloſe vnto the Towne ditch, perſuading the Turks, now whileſt they might vpon good conditions, D to ſurrender the Towne, and ſo to ſaue their liues. Whereunto their fierce and inraged mindes were ſo far from hearkening, that brauing the Chriſtians, they ſaid, That they would in deſpight of all their forces keepe the place for their Sultan, do what they could. Whereupon the Archduke and the Duke of Mantua, by the aduice of Medices and the reſt of the principall Captaines and Commanders in the Army, reſolued to giue a general aſſault vnto the towne. In the mean time newes was brought into the Campe, of the winning of Alba-Regalis, which there made great rejoicing; in ſigne wherof the Chriſtians (as their manner is) in triumph many times diſcharged their great Ordnance; and by fit men perſuaded the garriſon ſoldiers in Caniſia to yeeld, and not to caſt themſelues into ſuch danger as had their fellows in Alba Regalis; for that in ſo doing they ſhould not only ſaue their liues, but eaſily E alſo obtain ſuch other conditions as they could reaſonably deſire: whereas otherwiſe they ſhould to their coſt find the Chriſtians ſtrong enough to conſtraine them, which muſt needs bring with it their vtter ruine and deſtruction. Whereunto the garriſon ſouldiers (amongſt whom the renegat Wallons were the chiefe) contemptuouſly anſwered, That they little feared ſuch weake aſſailants: and with great cry and ſcorn commaunding the meſſengers to depart, in token of their confidence, as alſo not to ſeeme inferiour vnto the Chriſtians, oftentimes to ſmall purpoſe diſcharged their great Ordnance, as had the Chriſtians the day before. Now although the walls of the towne with continuall battery were ſore ſhaken, and the breaches almoſt laid open; yet was the intended aſſault for a while deferred, vntil the bridges might be made that were to be laid ouer the towne Ditch for the Chriſtians to paſſe F ouer vpon. But all things, as was thought, now in a readineſſe, and the Florentines with ſome other Italians (whoſe lot it was to giue the firſt aſſault) beeing come forward, the bridge by which they were to paſſe the town ditch, was found both too ſhort and too weak for them to get ouer vnto the other ſide by; ſo that ſinking vnder them, not the ſoldiers only, but euen the Commanders themſelues (and namely Herbenſtein) were in great danger to haue bin loſt. By which means they hindred, and the enemies murthering pieces continually flanking them, and their musketiers ſtil playing vpon them afront, they were inforced to retyre, leauing behind them 300 of their men ſlain. Yet were not the Chriſtian commanders any thing therwith diſcouraged, but being generally reſolued not to giue ouer that they had taken in hand, vntil they had brought it to effect, began to make ſuch prouiſion as they knew to be needfull to preſerue their army vnder, againſt the violence of the winter weather, as alſo to hinder that no victual might be brought vnto the towne, ſo by famin at length to inforce the Turkes and Wallons to yeeld: who although they were already pinched with wants, inſomuch that horſfleſh was dainty cheer with them; yet for all that, they nothing abated of their wonted fierceneſs, but being again required to yeeld, vouchſafed not to anſwer one word, but in ſtead therof ſhook their naked ſwords afar off at them, in token of their vndaunted courage. But yet for al this reſolution of the commanders for the continuance of the ſiege, Aldobrandino Generall of the Italians, being now a little before dead of an old infirmitie that he had, the Italians began at the firſt ſome few of them ſecretly to withdraw themſelues out of their quarter; but afterwards in great number to depart, and ſo to return again into their country: alledging for their excuſe want both of pay and victuals. But the reſt better minded, vnderſtanding the Turkes were riſen from before Alba-Regalis, and the reſt of the army diſbanded, began to enter into new hope, by ſome deuice or other to paſſe the ditch, and ſo by force to take the town; & the rather, for that they were by a French fugitiue informed both of the weakneſſe and wants of the beſieged. Whereupon they began afreſh to make new engins for the approching of the walls, without danger of the enemies ordnance any more to flank them. At which time alſo, viz. the fourth of November, the Lord Ruſſworm came vnto the camp, ſent thither from Duke Mercury with 8000 ſouldiers, after that Haſſan Baſſa had diſſolued his army. By whoſe comming they were alſo the more incouraged to proſecute that they had vndertaken. Neither failed the Turkes in the meane while with often ſallies to trouble the Chriſtians, attempting aboue all things to haue fired their tents, for that lying open in that ſo cold a ſeaſon of the year, they muſt of neceſſity be inforced to raiſe their ſiege and be gon. But the ſucces of theſe their ſo great deſignes was not anſwerable to their hopes, being ſtil beaten back with loſſe into the city by the Chriſtians: whom it behooued to look well about them, for that the beſieged deſperatly ſet, and all reſolued rather to die than to yeeld, aduentured themſelues to all dangers, neuer ceaſing to do what they might to put the Chriſtians out of hope for winning the town. But whilſt the Turks with doubtful & as it were deſperat hope ſo defend the place, and the Chriſtians grown ſtronger by the comming of their friends, lay in hope to winne the ſame; lo, in the later end of Nouember, a North wind accompanied with a deep ſnow ſo furiouſly raged, that it ouerthrew the greateſt part of the tents and pauilions of the Chriſtians, and as it were buried the whole army in froſt and ice; in ſuch wiſe, as that in the Arch-Duke Ferdinands camp (being reaſonable wel prouided for) was 1500 men with 300 horſes ſtarued and frozen to death. At which time the ſtate of them that came with the Lord Ruſſworm was moſt miſerable; who wearied with the ſiege of Alba-Regalis, and as it were ſpent with the dirty trauell of the deep way, had not brought with them their tents or other prouiſion, and were therfore inforced to lie abroad in ſo cold and vnſeaſonable a time: with whoſe miſeries although their good Generall was much grieued, yet to do the Chriſtian Commonweal ſeruice, he with them right patiently endured. In which ſo great an extreamity, the Archduke with the reſt of the Commanders vpon view taken, well conſidering what ſmall hope there was in good time to take the towne, the vnſeaſonableneſſe of the Winter weather ſtill more and more increaſing, thought it better betimes to riſe, than longer to expoſe their army vnto the moſt certain deſtruction either of the enemy or the cold. Which was don with ſuch haſt and confuſed tumult, as that their riſing rather ſeemed an haſty flight, than honorable departure; leauing behind them for haſt their great ordnance, with their tents and baggage, a common voice ſtill running, That they were well if they might but ſaue themſelues: ſo that the ſoldiers euery man mindful of himſelf, and in feare to be purſued by the enemy (no man chaſing them) fled, but ſtill accompanied with ſuch furious windes, ſnow, and extream cold, that with all the labour they could take, they could get them no heat, but fell down to the earth, many of them frozen, and ſo once falling neuer roſe more, being vnable for want of heate to help themſelues: in which caſe they were not to expect for helpe from others, euery man hauing

The Chriſtians inforced by vnſeaſonable weather to forſake the ſiege of Alba-Regalis.

A uing enough to do to look vnto himſelf: ſo that vpon the way wherby the army went thus diſperſed with the weather, lay aboue 500 dead of cold, beſide 400 others left ſick in the forſaken trenches, who forthwith after the departure of the army, were thought to haue bin al ſlain by the gariſon of Caniſia.

But hauing thus paſſed through the troubles of Hungary, it is time now alſo to look back again into the frontier countries of Tranſylvania and Valachia; which to haue kept in the Emperors obedience, and ſo preſerued as a liuely member of the Chriſtian commonweal, no leſſe concerned him, than the keeping of any other his frontier territories, which are many. Michael the Vayuod of Valachia, the laſt yeare for his cruelty firſt driuen out of Tranſylvania by Baſta, and afterwards out of Valachia by the great Chancellor of Polonia (as is aforeſayd) B and another placed in his ſtead; as a man forſaken euen of his own better fortunes, and not wel knowing which way to turn himſelf, thought it beſt now at laſt to ſubmit himſelf to the Emperour, if ſo happily by his means hee might in ſome ſort repaire his broken eſtate, and ſo at leaſtwiſe recouer his gouernment in Valachia. So reſolued, he ſet forward, and in the beginning of this year, viz. the three and twentieth of Ianuary, with fiue and thirty of his followers, and ſix Coaches, arriued at Prague, where he was by the Emperours appointment honourably receiued, and his coſt at the Emperors charge defraied. To whom he excuſed himſelf of the ſeueritie by him vſed in Tranſylvania (the cauſe of thoſe late troubles in that country) as inforced therunto by the ſtubbornneſſe of the Tranſylvanians themſelues, whom he found ſtil inclined to rebellion, and not willing to be commanded by any but themſelues. Which C his excuſe (as true) was wel admitted, and he with all kindnes vſed. Now at this ſame time Baſta lying alſo in Tranſylvania, as gouernour for the Emperour, right ſlenderly accompanied (as is before alſo declared) the parliament at Clauſenburg being ended, and all controuerſies as was thought, wel compoſed, now without fear one night, the Watch being ſet, went to bed to take his reſt, where he had not long lien, but that certaine of the Tranſilvanian Lords (among whom the Chiaki was chiefe) came with their followers, and ſurpriſing the watch and entring the palace, brake into the chamber where he lay, took him out of his bed, and ſo kept him priſoner all that night. And the next morning going forth, about twelue miles off met with Sigiſmund Bathor their late prince, before ſecretly by them called in, whom they honourably conducted vnto Clauſenburg, and there deliuered Baſta vnto him (the late Gouernour D for the Emperour) whom he commaunded to be caſt into irons: and ſo going to the Palace, gaue like order for the apprehending and ſafe keeping of the reſt of the Nobility alſo, ſuch as had taken part with Baſta in the behalf of the Emperor. For now the Tranſylvanians were diuided into three parts; wherof the one ſtood for the Emperour, the ſecond for Iſtuan Bathor, pretending that vnto him belonged the ſoueraignty of that prouince; but the third, & far the greateſt, for Sigiſmund their antient Lord and leader, who now by means of the King of Polonia reconciled vnto the Turke, and in this troubleſome time by his fauourits called again into his country, was of them ioyfully receiued at Alba Iulia, Clauſenburg, and the reſt of the chief cities of Tranſylvania. Who now therof again poſſeſſed, for the better aſſuring of his eſtate, forthwith writ vnto the Emperour of all that had happened, requeſting him to content E himſelf, that he was deſirous of his loue and fauour, promiſing to be alwaies his good friend and neighbor, and for euer to keep good amity with him. Giuing Baſta alſo (whom hee had now at the interceſſion of certaine great friends inlarged) to vnderſtand, That hee was forthwith to depart from all the places belonging to his principalitie, as alſo to ceaſe from further moleſting of his people, that were now voluntarily againe returned vnto his obedience. Which his requeſt was neither of the one nor the other much regarded or hearkened vnto. For the Emperour vpon the firſt aduertiſement of this ſo great an alteration in Tranſylvania, calling vnto him Michael the Vayuod (not ſo much troubled with the ſtrangeneſſe of the matter, as for that his wife and ſonne, whom hee had left as hoſtages with Baſta, were now fallen into the hands of the Tranſylvanians his mortall enemies) and ſatiſfying him in many F things that he had before requeſted, tooke order with him, That with all conuenient ſpeed returning home againe into Valachia, where he was now of many much longed for (the people generally diſliking the ſimple Vayuod which the great Chancellor had ſet ouer them) and gathering together ſuch power as hee could, he ſhould ioine himſelfe with Baſta his Lieutenant General, vnto whom he had already ſent great companies both of horſe and foot, Michael reconciled to the emperor.

Baſta impriſoned by the Tranſiluanians.

Sigiſmund recouers Tranſiluania.

for the repulſing of Sigiſmund out of Tranſylvania, and the reducing againe of that prouince vnder his obeiſance. Whereupon the Vayuod forthwith returning into Valachia, and aſſembling G about ren thouſand of his friends, all good and expert ſoldiers, went to ſeek for Baſta, as he had with the Emperor agreed; whom he found ready in the field with about twenty thouſand foot, and eight thouſand horſe, but newly departed from Veradinum: Where muſtering their army, they with their vnited forces entred into Tranſylvania, there to put in execution what the Emperor had commanded. Where the Vayuod in diſdain of the people that loued him not, with fire and ſword waſted all the Country before him as he went; not without the great diſcontment of Baſta, to whom it ſeemed not good to make deſolat that country, which he was in good hope ſhould in ſhort time be his Lord and Maſter the Emperors. But Sigiſmund vnderſtanding both of the comming of his enemies, and the harm they did in his country, H riſe from Solnock where he lay incamped with his army, and ſo to hinder their further proceeding went to meet them: howbeit being come ſo neer vnto them as that he might wel diſcouer them, he would not come to the trial of a battell with them, as was by them offered; but fortified himſelf in his trenches, ſo ſeeking but to delay the time vntill the comming of the Tartars, which were to haue come vnto him from the Chancellor of Polonia, as alſo of ſix thouſand Turks to haue bin ſent him from the Baſſa of Belgrade. Where hauing afterwards vnderſtood, That the paſſage of the Tartars to haue been ſent him, was ſtayed by Don Ferrant Gonzaga the Emperors Lieutenant in the vpper Hungary; and that the Turks ſtaying at Giula, would come no farther, except they had their pay before hand; finding himſelfe too weake with his owne power to incounter with his enemies, he riſe with his Army, with a purpoſe to I haue retyred a little back, and to haue taken certain ſtreight paſſages wherby the enemy muſt needs paſſe, ſo by the aduantage of the place to haue holpen his weak ſtrength. But Baſta and the Vayuod perceiuing his riſing (whereunto they were ſtill attentiue) followed him with ſuch ſpeed, that they ouertooke him before he could get thither, and ſo hardly preſſed him, that needs he muſt turn his face and join battel, or elſe ſuffer his people altogether like beaſts to be ſlaine. In which doing, albeit that neither he nor his failed to doe what was by men to be done for the obtaining of a notable victory; yet ſuch was the valour of the ſouldiers of Baſta and the Vayuod, that in a great battel hauing diſordered his footmen, they put them to flight, and ſo cut them all in pieces. Which the prince beholding, and not able to preuent, betime fled with his horſmen from the fury of the enemy, and ſo retyred to the vtmoſt confines K of Tranſylvania, hauing in this conflict loſt ten thouſand of his faithfull ſoldiers. Wherupon Claudiopolis, with diuers other cities and towns of that country, returned again vnto the Emperors obeiſance.

Sigiſmund ouerthrown by Baſta and the Vayuod.

In the proſecuting of this victory, the Vayuod to ſatisfie the hatred he had of long borne againſt the Tranſylvanians, did what ſpoil he could, vtterly waſting all the places wherby hee paſſed. Which Baſta not liking, requeſted him to vſe his victory with more modeſty, and to haue more reſpect to what he did, eſpecially vnto ſuch places or perſons as of themſelues returned vnto the Emperors obeiſance. Wherunto he proudly anſwered, That hee would doe what he thought good, without his appointment or the Emperours either, eſpecially in that country which he had now with his own ſword twice conquered: & that therfore Baſta might L command them that were by him to be commanded; as for himſelfe, he acknowledged no ſoueraignty that either Baſta or the Emperour had ouer him. Vnto which ſo preſumptuous a ſpeech Baſta replied not; but yet much diſcontented therewith, began to enter into a great ſuſpition, from what ground thoſe his hauty conceits (eaſily by his words to be gathred) might grow; and ſo from that time better obſeruing his proceedings, perceiued him to haue intelligence with the Turks, with purpoſe to join hands with them, that ſo by their helpe chacing the Imperials out of Tranſylvania, he might hold it to himſelfe as tributary vnto the Othoman Emperour, of all others beſt able to defend him. Which to bee true (beſides diuers other ſtrong preſumptions) he certainely vnderſtood by certaine letters of his written to that purpoſe, intercepted by his ſoldiers and brought vnto him. Wherupon he became very penſiue M and heauy, for the great power the Vayuod was of in thoſe Countries, as alſo for the great ſtrength he had euen then preſent about him, and wherwith he was as it were then garded. So conſulting with certain of his Colonels and chief commanders of his army, what were beſt to be don in that ſo dangerous a caſe whereof ſo much depended? A Wallon Captaine offered himſelfe

A himſelfe to go into the Vayuod his campe,and there in his owne tent to kill him as a traitor. Which his offer well liked of, and he as ready to performe as he was to promiſe, going into the Vayuods camp accompanied with ſome threeſcore men,and finding him in his tent,boldly ſtepping to him, willed him to yeeld himſelfe the Emperours priſoner: whereat he being about to lay his hand vpon his ſcimitar, the Wallon captaine with an halbert thruſt him into the breaſt, at which very inſtant another with a ſword at one blow claue his head down to the ſhoulders. An vnworthy death for ſo worthy a captain,had not ambition (the torment of great ſpirits)caried him too high with the wings of immoderat deſire,beyond the bounds of loyalty and reaſon. But there he lyeth now dead among his friends,whom the great Turke ſomtime more feared euen in his palace at Conſtantinople, than he did all the reſt of the Emperours B commamders. Preſently vpon his death a great tumult and hurly burly was raiſed by the ſoldiers in his camp:but Baſta forthwith ſhewing himſelfe with all his ſoldiers in arms,and withall producing the letters declaring the treaſon by the Vayuod contriued with the Baſſa of Temeſware againſt the Emperour, all was againe appeaſed: but eſpecially for that his ſouldiers now ſaw themſelues without an head, and too weake alſo for the Imperials there preſent and already in armes. In the Vayuods tent were alſo other letters found, ſo plainely declaring his ſecret colluſion with the Turke,and treaſon againſt the Emperor, that the Valachians who at the firſt were wonderfully moued with his death, and hearing the ſame read, reſted not now only contented, but ſaid moreouer, that he was worthily ſlaine, and that if they had knowne him to haue any ſuch traiterous purpoſe, they would of themſelues long before haue taken of C him deſerued puniſhed. Now vnto his ſouldiers Baſta offered, at their choice, either to depart whither they would without danger; or elſe taking the oath of obedience vnto the Emperour, to enter into his pay; which moſt part of them did. The tumult appeaſed, the dead body of the Vayuod was laied out a whole day for the ſouldiers to gaze vpon,and ſo afterward buried. So lieth he, that but of late, and many times before, had ſo fortunatly ouerthrowne his enemies; vnhappy man himſelfe now ouerthrowne by his owne ambition and vnconſtancy.

Michael the Vayuod ſlaine.

Baſta now deliuered of the great feare he had before of the Vayuod, what by force, what by agreement,in ſhort time tooke in moſt part of the country: for that the Tranſyluanians ſeeing the ſmall power of Sigiſmund, and well comforted with the death of Michael the Vayuod ſo D much of them hated;as alſo to auoid the dangers euen preſently hanging ouer their heads from the Imperials,if they ſhould in any thing ſhew themſelues obſtinate againſt them;ſubmitted themſelues wholly to the courteſie of Baſta, ſo that the places were but few that yet held out for the Prince Sigiſmund: who in the meane time was doing what he might for the raiſing of a new army(hauing not altogether with this late ouerthrow forthwith alſo loſt his hope)by the help of the Turks, Tartars, and Polonians, to recouer againe the poſſeſſion of his ſtate, and by force of armes to chaſe out the Imperials. But he being brought to ſo low an ebbe,and almoſt all the country of Tranſyluania poſſeſſed by Baſta;who would not haue thought but that now after ſo long trauell it would haue remained wholly at the Emperors deuotion? and ſo many, that thought themſelues to ſee much, ſaid aſſuredly it would. But ſee the change, and what E ſmall aſſurance euen the greateſt haue of the conſtancy of the vain multitude:neuer more like themſelues,than in diſliking to morrow what they beſt liked to day,fooliſh, ſenceleſſe, improuident,raſh,headſtrong,violent,and aboue all things mutable, and vnconſtant. So now for all that Baſta had done for the aſſurance of this country vnto the Emperor(being ſo much as moſt men thought to haue bin ſufficient,and indeed as much as was poſſible for him to do) euen in the winding vp of this yeare 1601, the Tranſyluanians vnderſtanding that Sigiſmund with a great army of Polonians, Turks,& Tartars,was now comming againſt the Imperials,moſt part of them preſently tooke vp armes in his fauour;ſaying,That their firſt oath voluntarily giuen vnto him as their naturall Prince & Gouernor, was more to be reſpected than any other afterwards by force extorted from them by a forrein Prince. Inſomuch that Baſta perceiuing with F what a tempeſt he was like euen preſently to be ouerwhelmed,to ſaue himſelfe and his people from the rage thereof, withdrew himſelfe and his followers vnto a ſtrong towne in a corner of that country: from whence he with all ſpeed ſent vnto the Emperor for greater aid,as well for the defence of the place he yet held,as for the ſubduing again of that rebellious people. After

The Tranſyluanians ſubmit themſelues vnto Baſta.

Baſta flyeth.

whoſe departure Sigiſmund without reſiſtance entring the country, was of the people in generall joyfully receiued as their moſt lawfull Prince and ſoueraigne, and all the honor done vnto him that was by them poſſible: in which his ſo Princely, but dangerous eſtate, now twice in leſſe than the ſpace of one yeare by him regained, and yet thereof no whit aſſured, we will for a while leaue him to joy therein with his ſubjects.

The Baſſa of Agria ouerthrown by Ferrant Gonzaga.

But whileſt the ſtate thus turneth vpſide downe in Tranſyluania, the Baſſa of Agria going out with ten thouſand Turks in hope to haue ſurpriſed Toccaie (a ſtrong hold of the Chriſtians in the vpper Hungary) was encountered by Ferrat Gonzaga the Emperours Lieutenant there, and by him ouerthrowne, and with great ſlaughter of his Turks chaſed to the gates of Agria.

Now was Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperor this yeare alſo no leſſe troubled with the proceedings of the Scriuano in Caramania and Natolia, than with the euill ſucceſſe of his affaires in Tranſyluania and Hungary. For the Scriuano by his laſt yeares victory growne into great credit with the common people, and ſtill by them more and more ſollowed; to maintaine the reputation of his credit, came now again this yere with a great power into the field, to meet with Mahomet the great Baſſa and Generall of the Turks army; who with fifty thouſand good ſouldiers (a power thought ſufficient to haue repreſſed him) was ready to encounter him. With whom the Scriuano joyning battell, in a great fight cut in ſunder a great part of the Baſſaes army, and ſo become maſter of the field, forraged all the countries adjoyning almoſt as farre as Aleppo; ſtill calling the people vnto liberty, and cauſing himſelfe to be proclaimed the true defender of the Mahometane Faith, and of the liberty of thoſe countries with him combined: in ſuch ſort, as that it now ſtood the great Turke vpon to ſend another great army to the aid of Mahomet the diſcomfited Baſſa. With whom alſo the Scriuano (preſuming of his former fortune) comming to a day of battell, and ouercharged with the multitude of his enemies, was at the firſt encounter with his people put to the worſe: but forthwith by his good direction hauing repaired his diſordered battell, and thereby giuen as it were new courage to his fainting ſouldiers, he with a great ſlaughter diſordered alſo the Baſſaes army. Yet hauing not any other firme ſtate or ſtay to reſt vpon, more than the fauour and reputation he held with theſe his rebellious followers, of whom he had now loſt a great many, he thought it not beſt to aduenture too far (not knowing how preſently to repaire his loſſes) but contenting himſelfe with what he had already done, retired with his army into the ſtrength of the mountains, there that Winter to liue vpon the ſpoile of the countries adjoyning, and the next yeare to do more harme than euer he had done before.

Beſide all which former troubles, the plague alſo this yeare ſore raged both in Conſtantinople and many other places of the Turkiſh Empire. At which time alſo the Ianizaries in Conſtantinople hauing receiued ſome diſgrace by ſome of the Great Sultans fauorits, and with great inſolency requiring to haue their heads, cauſed their Aga well accompanied preſumptuouſly to enter into the Seraglio to prefer this their requeſt: whom Mahomet to the terror of the reſt, cauſed for his preſumption to be taken into the midſt of the Spahi, and ſo by them to be cut in pieces; which was not done without the great ſlaughter of the Spahi themſelues alſo, ſlaine by the Ianizaries. Whereupon the other Ianizaries ariſing vp in arms alſo, and euen now ready to haue reuenged the death of their captaine, were yet by the wiſedome of Cicala Baſſa, beſtowing amongſt them a great ſum of money, againe appeaſed without further harmedoing. Which their ſo great inſolency Mahomet imputing vnto their exceſſiue drinking of Wine, contrary to the law of their great Prophet; by the perſuaſion of the Mufti, commanded all ſuch as had any Wine in their houſes in the city of Conſtantinople and Pera, vpon paine of death to bring it out and to ſtaue it, except the Embaſſadors of the Queenes Majeſty of England, the French King, and of the State of Venice: ſo that as ſome report, Wine for a ſpace ran downe the channels of the ſtreets in Conſtantinople, as if it had bin water after a great ſhower of raine.

1602 Sigiſmund the Tranſyluanian Prince now of late againe poſſeſſed of Tranſyluania (as is before declared) could not yet well aſſure himſelfe of the keeping thereof: for that he with the Tranſyluanians of his faction alone, was not able to withſtand the force of Baſta; who ſtill ſtrengthened with new ſupplies both of men and all things elſe neceſſary for the wars from the Emperour, was now with a great power already entred into Tranſyluania: the Polonians buſied in the warres of Sueuia, and the Turks with their other greater affaires, neither of them ſending him their promiſed aid, the greateſt hope and ſtay of himſelfe in that newneſſe of his eſtate. Wherefore ſeeing himſelfe euery day to loſe one place or other, and fearing alſo leſt his ſoldiers for want of pay ſhould in ſhort time quite forſake him and goe ouer to Baſta; he thought it beſt betimes and whileſt he had yet ſomething left, and was not yet altogether become deſperat, otherwiſe to prouide for his eſtate, eſpecially hauing ſmall truſt in the Turks, to whom he had been before ſo great an enemy. Wherfore he dealt with Baſta for a truce or ceſſation from arms, vntill Embaſſadors might be ſent vnto the Emperor, to entreat with him for ſome good attonement. Wherefore Baſta being content, and the Embaſſadors ſent, the matter was ſo handled with the Emperor, that Sigiſmund to make an end of all theſe troubles, was contented to the behoofe of his Imperiall Majeſty, to reſigne vnto Baſta his Lieutenant all ſuch places as he yet held in Tranſyluania, vpon much like conditions he had about three yeares before made with him: and ſo in all, and for all, to ſubmit himſelfe vnto his Majeſty. Which intended ſurrender of the Princes being bruted in Tranſyluania, Zathel Moyſes his Lieutenant (& now in field with the Princes forces) not able to endure or to heare, that that noble Prouince ſhould again fall into the hands of the Germans; encouraging his ſoldiers, went vpon the ſudden to aſſaile Baſta, in hope to haue found him vnprouided, & ſo diſcomfiting his army, to haue driuen the Imperials quite out of Tranſyluania: but he an old and expert Commander, perceiuing euen the firſt mouing of the Tranſyluanians, with great celerity put his army in good order, and ſo joyned battell with them: wherein he with the loſſe of ſome fiue hundred men ouerthrew Moyſes, with his army of Tranſyluanians, Turks, and Tartars hauing ſlaine about three thouſand of them, and put the reſt to flight: Moyſes himſelfe with ſome few others being now glad to take their refuge into the frontiers of the Turks territories towards Temeſwar. But when Sigiſmund vnderſtood what his Lieutenant had without his knowledge done, he in token of his owne innocency went himſelfe vnto the Imperiall camp, accompanied onely with certain of his gentlemen, and there vnto Baſta excuſed himſelfe of that which was by his Lieutenant againſt his will, and without his priuity done; frankly offering to performe whatſoeuer was on his part to be performed, according to the agreement made betwixt the Emperor and him. And ſo preſently calling his garriſons out of all ſuch ſtrong places as were yet for him holden, he ſurrendred them to Baſta; and ſo forthwith honorably accompanied, put himſelfe vpon his way towards the Emperor. After whoſe departure out of Tranſyluania, all that Prouince voluntarily and without more adoe yeelded to Baſta as to the Emperors Lieutenant: who preſently called an aſſembly of all the Nobility of the country, taking of them an oath for their obedience and loyalty vnto the Emperor. Thus by the wiſedome and prowesse of this worthy commander, is the country of Tranſyluania once againe brought vnder the Emperors obeiſance; a matter of far greater importance, than to haue woon the ſtrongeſt city the Turke holdeth in Hungary.

Zachel Moyſes ouerthrowen by Baſta.

But whileſt theſe things thus paſſed in Tranſyluania, great troubles ariſe in Valachia (the country next adjoyning) for that the people of that Prouince not able longer to endure the great inſolency of the Turks (who after the death of Michael had by their power made one Ieremias Vayuod there) by a generall conſent tooke vp armes, and proclaiming one Radoll (a fauorit of the Emperors) Vayuod, chaſed Ieremias (before placed by the Turks) quite out of the country: who flying vnto Simon Palatine of Moldauia, his friend, by his meanes, and the helpe of the Turks, returning into Valachia, draue out thence Radoll againe: who being now at this preſent with Baſta, with about ten thouſand Valachians his followers, earneſtly requeſted of him (now that hee was ſo quietly poſſeſſed of Tranſylunia) to helpe him with his forces for the recouery of Valachia. And Baſta well conſidering how much it concerned the quiet and ſure keeping of the poſſeſſion of Tranſyluania for the Emperour, to haue that ſo neere a Prouince to friend, eaſily yeelded to his requeſt; and gaue him a great Regiment of his old approued ſouldiers, and ſo ſent him away to recouer his eſtate: with whom (at his enterance into Valachia) the Moldauian meeting with a great power both of his owne and of the Turks, come thither in the fauour of Ieremias, there was fought betwixt them a moſt terrible and bloody battell, the glory whereof fell vnto Radoll, hee carrying away the victory.

Great troubles in Valachia.

victory. In which battell two of the Turks Baſſaes were there ſlaine, with a great number of others both of the Moldauians and Turkes. After which victory Radoll recouered againe the Soueraignty of Valachia, for which hee was beholden to Baſta: and ſhortly after with the ſame aid cut in pieces a great power of the Tartars, that were comming to haue aided the Moldauian.

Troubles in Hungary.

Now in the meane time in Hungary alſo paſſed many an hot skirmiſh betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks, whoſe garriſons at Buda and in other places in the lower Hungary, attempting to haue ſurpriſed Alba-Regalis, and diſcouered by the Chriſtians, were with great ſlaughter enforced to retire. At which time alſo, County Serinus vnderſtanding by his eſpials, that the Turks with two hundred waggons with munition and victuals were going to Caniſia; vpon the ſudden ſet vpon them, and hauing ſlaine and put to flight the conuoy that garded them, carried the waggons with all that was in them away with him. And ſhortly after, the free Haiducks of Comata in a great party going out towards Buda to ſeek after booty, & hauing taken threeſcore Turks priſoners, and ſo with them about to haue returned home; vnderſtanding by the way, that Ali ſometime the Baſſa of Buda, and now Gouernour of Peſth, was with a ſmall retinue about to come downe the riuer Danubius from Buda towards Belgrade, there to meet the Viſier Baſſa, but then comming into Hungary; they ſlew all the priſoners, and hauing got two ſmall boats, about fifteene miles beneath Buda lay in wait for the Baſſa: who according to their expectation comming downe the riuer, was by theſe adventurers fiercely aſſailed, and of his thirty followers hauing foureteene ſlaine, being himſelfe alſo ſhot in two places of his body, was there with a great booty taken, and ſo brought to Comata, and ſhortly after preſented vnto Matthias the Archduke at Vienna: who amongſt other things, certainely enformed, that Haſſan Baſſa was with a great army by the commandement of the great Sultan Mahomet comming to beſiege Alba-Regalis, and that hee was now vpon his way as farre as Belgrade; preſently ſent thither the County Tſolan Gouernour thereof, who with much adoe got into the city, the Turks hauing already taken all the paſſages, to haue hindered the Chriſtians from putting in either men or munition, more than was therein already. Howbeit the County now got in there, and being no leſſe good enginier than a valiant Commander, cauſed all them in the city to labour vpon the rampiers: ſo that beſide the naturall ſcituation thereof, which was very ſtrong, he had in ſhort time ſo fortified it, as that in moſt mens judgment it ſeemed a place almoſt impregnable. This Ali Baſſa was ſometime the great Turks butler, but after the taking of Agria made Baſſa of Buda; which great place he held but three moneths, being by the enuy and ambition of ſome, but eſpecially of Amurath Baſſa, remooued thence, and made Gouernor of Peſth: from whence now going downe the riuer to Belgrade, it was his fortune to be thus taken by the Haiduckes, vnto whom he offered for his ranſome three hundred thouſand Sultanines; and had with him when he was taken ſeuenty thouſand duckats.

Ali Baſſa taken priſoner.

A great ranſome offered by Ali Baſſa.

Mahomet the great Sultan not a little troubled with the loſſe of Alba-Regalis (taken from him by the Chriſtians the laſt yeare) and now reſolued for the recouery of the ſame, to ingage if need ſhould be a great part of his forces; had cauſed an army of 150000 ſtrong, to meet at Hadrianople for that purpoſe, vnder the leading of Haſſan Baſſa one of the chiefe Viſiers, to be ſent into Hungary. Who by the way of Belgrade comming to Buda, and from thence to Alba-Regalis, there the twelfth of Auguſt incamped (as hee had oftentimes before threatned) with the multitude of his tents couering all the country round about, as if it had been a white ſnow: where hauing well intrenched himſelf, and planted his artillery, he began a moſt terrible and furious battery, in ſuch ſort as if he had not meant to haue made a breach only, but to haue beaten the city euen from the face of the earth, which ſeemed now to tremble vnder his feet, and the clouds to rend with the thundring of the great ordnance: and for that the mariſh and deep ditches were a great let vnto his men for to come vnto the aſſault, he cauſed them with the number of his pioners to be filled vp (a worke thought almoſt impoſſible) and ſo brought on his men to aſſault the counterſcarfe, which the Gouernor had cauſed to be made before the city for the better defence thereof: which aſſault coſt him much bloud, by reaſon of the wonderfull valor of the defendants: yet in the end the great number of the Turks preuailing, the Chriſtians were inforced to forſake it & retire into the city: but ſhortly after ſallying out again

Alba Regalis beſieged by the Turks.

A they with ſuch forces aſſailed the Turks now got within the counterſcarfe, that hauing ſlaine moſt part of them that were entred, they forced the other out againe: at the bruite whereof, an alarm being raiſed throughout the camp, infinite numbers of the barbarous enemies came running thither with ſuch ſauage fury, that without regard of their liues they as deſperate men preſſing ſtill on, fell twice as many as before: inſomuch that the Chriſtians weary of that long and bloudy fight, & on euery ſide charged or rather ouerwhelmed with the enemies ſhot, were glad againe, but not without great loſſe, to abandon the place. With which skirmiſhes and di-uers others that they had, the number of the defendants were greatly diminiſhed, to keepe a weake city, ſhewing as yet the ruines of the late ſiege, when it was by the Chriſtians won; the breaches thereof being but euill repaired, and the mines yet gaping, requiring great and ſtrong B fortifications to hold out and endure any long ſiege againſt ſo puiſſant an enemy. Yet was not the courage of the valiant County Yſolan the Italian Gouernor, any whit therewith abated, but by his letters gaue the Archduke Matthias to vnderſtand in what caſe things ſtood with them in the city, requeſting him with all ſpeed to ſend him reliefe, for that otherwiſe the city, ſo weakly both manned and fortified, would be in danger to be loſt; many of the garriſon ſol-diers being already ſlaine in the defence thereof, and diuers of the Hungarians forſaking the wals, daily flying vnto the Turks camp; promiſing yet neuertheleſſe himſelfe to do the vtter-moſt of his deuoir. Vpon the receit of which letters, the Archduke gaue order to the lord Ruſworm (maſter of the camp) to to go forthwith to Comara, and there with ſuch forces as were from diuers places come thither, to go forth and to proue if by any meanes the weake garriſon C of Alba Regalis might ſo be relieued, by putting in ſome good ſupply of freſh ſoldiers. According to which command, Ruſſworm comming thither, without delay tooke the field with 32000 men which he found there, to ſee if he might with them, put into the city the deſired re-liefe. But whileſt the matter was in the performance thereof too long delaid, by diſcord ariſing betwixt him and the other colonels, about the maner of relieuing the town, the Baſſa had time to effect his purpoſe; who the 28 of the ſame moneth of Auguſt, after a long and terrible battery, caused a generall aſſault to be giuen vnto the city: which the Turks from time to time renuing, continued all that day and the next night, with ſome part of the day following alſo, without ceaſing: ſo that the defendants now much weakned, and they alſo that were left, ſo wearied or wounded, as that they were not well able to make any longer reſiſtance (and the D County himſelfe, who gaue as it were life vnto them all, being now alſo carried away dangerouſly hurt in the thigh with a musket ſhot) there was a ſigne of parly giuen vnto the enemy: which the Baſſa granting, and the fury of the aſſault ſtaid, certaine of the chiefe captaines and commanders in the city, going vnto the Gouernour, put him in mind of the weakeneſſe of the place, of the force of the enemy, of the number of his moſt valiant men ſlain, of the want of the defendants. They had (as they ſaid) done enough for their honor, hauing endured ſo many and ſo great aſſaults, in a place not defencible: and enough to diſcharge their fidelity, hauing holden it out to the vttermoſt of their power. That they could do no more than they had done, being not relieued; and that the ſame bond which bound them to defend the place, bound the Emperor alſo to relieue them, ſeeing that otherwiſe it was not in their power to maintaine it.
E That they had, with the loſſe of their liues and bloud, ſhewed their fidelity vnto the Emperor, no ſufficient army appearing from him (according to his promiſe) for their ſuccor. That to fight any longer was but to encreaſe the glory of their enemies, and their own loſſes: ſeeing that after they had done what they poſſibly could, expoſed to a thouſand dangers, they ſhould neuertheleſſe be vanquiſhed, and the city taken. That the ſame conſideration which carried valiant minds vnto the effects of honour when they are relieued with hope, diſſuaded them being out of all hope of an happy end of theſe troubles: and to loſe themſelues to no purpoſe, was as great a ſigne of folly, as to let ſlip a faire opportunity, was a ſigne of cowardiſe. That they were to expect nothing but extreame miſery, if the enemy ſhould againe force them, the breaches being ſo broad, as whereby they might eaſily enter: and their owne beſt men ſlaine, F that ſhould keep them out. And that therefore he ſhould do well, to come to ſome good compoſition with the enemy, whileſt they had yet ſomething to yeeld vp vnto him, and that hee ſtood in ſome feare of them; and not to expect, whilſt they were ſpoiled of all means, either to reſiſt him by force, or to bind him by courteſie: nothing remaining for them in the place, but death, if they ſhould obſtinatly ſtand to the defence thereof; nor no way left to ſaue their liues, G but by yeelding.

The capitulation betwixt the Baſſa and the County, for the yeelding vp of the city of Alba Regalis.

Alba Regalis taken by the Turks.

The Chriſtians cruelly murdered in Alba Regalis.

With theſe perſuaſions the Gouernor moued, came to a parly with the Baſſa, being right glad thereof, as well knowing that a towne beſieged comming to a parley, is commonly more than halfe won: and glad by any means to gaine it, for that thereof depended the aſſurance both of his head and honour: where after ſome ſhort talke it was agreed, That the County ſhould yeeld the towne into the hands of the Baſſa, with all the great ordnance, and other warlike munition therein: and that the County with his gariſon, ſhould with bag & baggage in ſafety depart with their arms, by the ſuburbs leading toward Rab, and with a good conuoy in ſafety to be brought halfe way thither: This capitulation agreed vpon, and by the Baſſa and the County ſigned, euery man aſſured himſelfe of the Baſſaes faith, and thereon reſted. But what faith is to be expected from a faithleſſe man? Vpon the firſt bruit of this compoſition, yea, and before it H was altogether well concluded; whileſt the merchants in the towne were ſeeking for wagons to carry their merchandiſe, and the ſouldiers for horſes to carry their baggage, the ſcarceneſſe thereof bred a great confuſion and ſtir among the people, as commonly it falleth out in things done in haſte, but eſpecially where men for ſafegard of their liues, in their flight for haſt fall into a thouſand errors: ſo whileſt ſome in this hurly burly were quarrelling about their horſes and carriages, and otherſome were opening the gates to be gone; others were buſie in robbing and pilfering the baggages of their captains and companions, miſerable men, who all appointed for a prey vnto the greedy & mercileſſe Turks, yet fel to preying one vpon another. Which diſorders encouraged all the reſt of the ſouldiers to fall to pillage alſo, ſome loading themſelues I with ſuch goods as the merchants had for lacke of carriages left behind them, and otherſome euen with the goods of their owne captaines: which the ſoldiers appointed for defence of the breaches ſeeing, left their charge, and came thronging into the towne, and thruſt themſelues in amongſt the pilferers, as if the pillage of the towne had bin vnto them by triumphant victory aſſured, and that they themſelues had bin victors, and not men vanquiſhed. The Tartars lodged at the foot of the breach, ſeeing it forſaken, and without any great ſtrength to defend it, let not this opportunity ſlip, but preſſing in without any great reſiſtance, entred the ſame; and ſo in a trice full 30000 of them thruſt into the towne, and there ſurpriſed the vanquiſhed Chriſtians, at once loaded with prey, feare, and deſpaire. After whom, euen by the ſame breach, the Turks entred alſo, to be partakers of the ſpoile: ſo that in a moment the town K was full of enemies both of Turks and Tartars. The Turks beſide the booty they tooke themſelues, fell to quarrelling with the Tartars, for ſome part of theirs; and ſo long as there was any thing that might pleaſe their eies, or fill their hands, they abſtained from ſlaughter and bloudſhed, buſying themſelues with that which for the preſent was more for their profit: but the pillaging ceaſing, by reaſon there was no more to be had, then the perfidious wretches fell to maſſacring of the miſerable Chriſtians, the ſword deuouring all that they could light vpon, ſo that all the city flowed with bloud. Neither was there any end thereof, vntill that by the comming in of the Baſſa the ſlaughter was ſtaied; by which meanes County Yſolan the late Gouernor with ſome other captains and ſoldiers were ſaued, hauing eſcaped the enemies fury.

County Yſolan carried away priſoner to Conſtantinople.

In this maſſacre were ſlaine 3000 Criſtian ſouldiers, beſide others of the citiſens, in number L not few. The captains that were ſpared, were led priſoners to Conſtantinople, there to be fed with the bread of tribulation: and with them the County Yſolan, for his valor and noble courage vnworthy of ſo hard a fortune. Howbeit, that he by liuely and pregnant reaſons ſhewed, both himſelfe & the reſt to be vniuſtly detained, as taken priſoners contrary to the publike faith vnto him before giuen; within the aſſurance of the capitulations agreed vpon with the Baſſa, and out of the actions of war. Whereunto it was againe anſwered him, That the towne when it was taken, was yet ſtill in his power, and he at choice whether he would deliuer it or no. That if he would by the yeelding vp of the towne challenge his liberty, according to the articles of the capitulation, he ought then to haue deliuered it as was agreed, and not to haue ſuffred it to haue bin taken by force, according to the ordinary proceding of war: the lawes M whereof do iuſtly condemne to death, or to captiuity, ſuch as are by force of arms vanquiſhed.
That euery towne which during the treaty of capitulation, is by force taken, followeth the courſe of the later condition & ſtate, and not of the former, ſeeing that it is conquered and not deliuered

A deliuered. That this is the reaſon that they are puniſhed by the rigor of armes, which haue not bin carefull to preſerue themſelues by the ſweetneſſe of peace: for that a man is not to expect of his mortall enemy any other courteſie, than that which neceſſity cauſed him to promiſe, which hee may for his owne good againe violate, as hee for the good of his enemy againſt his will hath granted. With which quirkes and quillets the County deluded, ſay what he could, was carried away priſoner to Conſtantinople, where we muſt for a while leaue him.
And ſo the Baſſa hauing in eighteene daies taken Alba Regalis, (now being eleuen moneths poſſeſſed by the Chriſtians) cauſed the breaches he had made, to be againe repaired, and the city well prouided for, both of victuals and munition, leauing therein a ſtrong garriſon of ſix thouſand ſoldiers; and with his people hauing ouerrun all the country as far as Strigonium, B roſe with his army and retired again to Buda: whereas he was making a bridge of boats ouer the Danubius betwixt Buda and Peſth, for the more eaſie tranſporting of victuall, and better relieuing of the one the other as need ſhould require, and hauing brought that worke to paſſe, and about to haue gone to the ſiege of Strigonium; commandement came from the Great Sultan, That he ſhould with all ſpeed returne to Conſtantinople, for that Mahomet accounting of him as of a moſt valiant man, was now minded to imploy him in his wars againſt his Rebels in Natolia, where things now went not well, as ſhall be hereafter declared. Vpon which commandement, the Baſſa gaue leaue to all ſuch in his army as had charge of any place, forthwith to returne to their ſeuerall places of gouernment: appointing ſome others with thirty thouſand ſoldiers, in the company of Zachel Moſes (but of late Prince Sigiſmund his Lieutenant) to C go with him into Tranſyluania: who after the ouerthrow he had there receiued by Baſta, was come vnto this great Baſſa, offering vnto him, with ſuch an aid as was now appointed for him, and the helpe of ſuch other his friends as he had in Tranſyluania, to chaſe Baſta with his Germans out from thence, and to reduce that Prouince againe vnto the deuotion of the Othoman Emperors, as it had in former time beene. And ſo by the way of Belgrade Haſſan Baſſa himſelfe with the reſt of his army haſted towards Conſtantinople. Which he was thought the more willingly to do, for that the Great Sultan before his ſetting forth had put him in good hope to marry one of his Aunts (a woman of great wealth and honour) if by the winning again of Alba Regalis he ſhould make himſelfe worthy ſo honourable a match, after which he now longed.

D But long it was not after his departure, but that the Imperials now at laſt aſſembled together at Comara, to the number of about 30000 men, with twelue * Naſſadies and two gallies, ſome by water, ſome by land, marched downe alongſt the riuer to Strigonium; where were alſo 20 other ſhips ready to receiue them, and ſo all embarked, were by the Lord Ruſſworm and other the Imperiall captaines conducted to Buda, there with ſome notable enterpriſe to redeeme the diſgrace by them before receiued in not relieuing of Alba Regalis. Whoſe comming was ſo ſudden and ſo vnlooked for of the Turks there, as that they had not any time to take in any greater helpe or prouiſion than was already in the city. And for as much as the Chriſtians knew the good ſucceſſe of this their enterpriſe taken in hand, not ſo much to depend of their ſtrength, as of their politique proceeding and ſpeedy diſpatch of the matter begun, they E thought it not good to vſe any long delay, or to ſpare for any labor, but ſo ſoone as they might, by taking the Water-city (or as ſome call it, the Iewes ſuburbs) ſo to cut off the paſſage of them of Buda to Peſth, as alſo from thence to trouble them in the caſtle and the vpper city of Buda. Which their intended exploit they happily attempted & brought to paſſe in this ſort:
The city of Peſth ſtanding right ouer againſt Buda, is (as we haue oftentimes before ſaid) diuided from the ſame with the great and ſwift riuer of Danubius; ouer which the Turks vpon boats had with great labor and coſt of late built a moſt eaſie and commodious bridge for paſſage or carriage of things from the one city to the other. This bridge the Imperials thought neceſſary firſt to break, the more eaſily to beſiege either the one or the other city; and for that purpoſe had by a ſtrange deuice built a ſhip, which by the force of the ſtreame carried downe F the riuer, and reſting vpon the bridge, ſhould by a wonderfull power breake the ſame. Which ſhip the Turks ſeeing comming downe the riuer with the reſt of the Fleet after her, they ran by heapes, eſpecially out of the Water City, to the bridge for the defence thereof: where whilſt they were thus buſied, County Sultze on the other ſide by land with a petard blew vp one

one of the gates of the city, and ſo entering and killing all ſuch as he light vpon, came vnlooked for vpon the backs of the Turks at the bridge, of whom ſome he ſlew, ſome he draue into the riuer, who there periſhed; the reſt, in number not many, by ſpeedy flight retiring themſelues into the city: whereupon he had now brought ſuch a generall feare, that they all as well the ſouldiers as the citiſens, with the Chriſtians at their heeles, with as much haſte as they could tooke their refuge into the vpper city of Buda, much ſtronger and better fortified than was the lower city. At which time the bridge was by them vpon the riuer broken alſo, ſo that now the one city could no more relieue the other as before. G

The Water-city thus woon, and the bridge broken, the next was for the Imperials to beſiege either the one or the other city. But for that they of Peſth might with their great Ordnance much anoy them in the beſieging of the caſtle and the vpper city of Buda, they thought beſt to begin with it firſt: which they did in much like ſort as they had before don at the lower city of Buda, the ſame deuice againe well proſpering in their hand. For the Lord Ruſſworm with the fleet vpon the riuer making a great ſhew as if he would euen preſently on that ſide haue entered, had with the ſtirre by him raiſed, drawne downe moſt part of the garriſon ſouldiers vnto that ſide of the towne, where moſt ſhew of danger was: whileſt in the meane time County Sultze with the Gouernor of Althem (before vndiſcouered) vpon the ſudden by land ſcaled the other ſide of the city, and gained the wals, the Turks yet dreaming of no ſuch matter. But hereupon began a terrible outcry, the Turks ſtanding as men aſtonied, eſpecially now feeling the Chriſtians weapons in their bodies, before they knew they were got into the city. In this ſo great an amaſement, ſuch of them as could, fled into the ſtrongeſt towers, the reſt hid themſelues in cellars and other the moſt ſecret corners they could finde, out of which they were afterwards by the Chriſtians drawne and ſlaine. They which were retired alſo into the towers and other ſtronger places of the city, ſeeing the great ordnance bent vpon them, and now out of all hope of reliefe, offered to yeeld; requeſting onely, that they might with their wiues and children with life depart; promiſing for that fauour ſo ſhewed them, to perſuade them of Buda alſo in like manner to yeeld. Vpon which promiſe, that their poore requeſt was granted, and the Lord Nadaſti with certaine other Captaines ſent with ſome of theſe citiſens to Peſth, with their wiues and children to Buda: who comming thither, according to their promiſe moſt earneſtly requeſted them of Buda to yeeld, for that they were not now to expect any further helpe, and that by their fooliſh obſtinacy they ſhould be the cauſe of the death of them, their friends, their wiues and children. Vnto whom alſo, to moue them the more, the Lord Nadaſti promiſed in the name of the Generall, That they ſhould all excepting ſome of their chiefe commanders in ſafety depart. Howbeit they of Buda would not hearken thereunto, but ſtood ſtill vpon their gard. In this city of Peſth, well inhabited with Turkiſh Merchants, the Chriſtians found great ſtore of wealth, which all became a prey vnto the ſouldiers, with a thouſand horſes for ſeruice, many great pieces of artillery, and much other warlike prouiſion. H I K

The City of Peſth taken by the Chriſtians.

The vpper city and caſtle of Buda beſieged by the Chriſtians.

Peſth thus woon, and a ſtrong garriſon left therein, they returned againe ouer the riuer to beſiege the caſtle and vpper city of Buda, which they attempted by vndermining the ſame, as alſo by battery, hauing placed ſome of their great ordnance ſo high, that they could at their pleaſure ſhoot into the middeſt of the ſtreets of the city; wherewith they much troubled the Turks, not a little before diſcouraged with the loſſe of Peſth; thundering alſo at the ſame time with their other batteries in diuers places of the walls both of the caſtle and of the city. Where vnderſtanding that the Turks garriſons of the frontier Townes and Caſtles thereabouts (hearing of the ſiege) were comming to the reliefe of their diſtreſſed friends, they ſent out their horſemen with ſome part of their footmen againſt them: who meeting with them, gaue them a great ouerthrow, and ſo with victory returned againe vnto the reſt of the Army lying at the ſiege, being ſtill in hope either by force or compoſition to become Maſters of the city. L

But whileſt they lay in this hope, and hauing the twelfth of October brought their approches neerer vnto the walls, had there planted certaine notable pieces of battery, with purpoſe the next day with all their power to haue aſſaulted the City; behold, the Viſier Baſſa hearing (by the way as he was going to Belgrade, and ſo to Conſtantinople) that the city of Peſth M

A was won, and Buda beſieged; changing his mind, returned in haſte with ſuch forces as he had yet left, and ſo vnlooked for came and ſet downe before Peſth, being not then aboue fiue and twenty thouſand ſtrong, but thoſe all for the moſt part old and expert ſouldiers. But whileſt the Baſſa thus lay at the ſiege of Peſth on the one ſide of the riuer, and the Imperials at the ſiege of Buda on the other, diuers braue attempts were in both places giuen both on the one ſide and the other. The Chriſtians in Peſth beſieged by the Turks, hauing amongſt them diuers braue captains, and deſirous of honor, one day vnder their conduct ſallied out of the city to skirmiſh with the Turks; and comming with them to the ſword, by plaine valor diſordered them, and enforced them to fly, & ſo allured with the ſweetneſſe of the victory, purſued them euen to the trenches: from whence a great ſquadron of the Turks horſemen and harquebuſiers B at the ſame inſtant iſſuing out, and with their multitude ouercharging the Imperials, conſtrained them of force to retire: in which retreat, County Maximilian Martinengo (one of theſe aduenturers) doing what he might both with his valour and direction to haue ſtaied the diſordered retreat of the Chriſtians, was with many others ſlaine: wherewith the reſt diſcouraged, tooke their refuge towards the city. Which they of the garriſon beholding, ſent out certaine companies to relieue them; by whoſe comming out, the fury of the Turks was not onely repreſſed, but they alſo euen vnto their trenches againe repulſed. Shortly after which hot skirmiſhes, the Lord Ruſſworm with the other Chriſtian Captaines on the other ſide of the riuer, hauing with continual battery made ſuch a breach into the caſtle, as that the ſame ſeemed to be now ſaultable, in good order came on with certaine companies of their footmen appointed C for that ſeruice, and ſo couragiouſly aſſailed the breach: where the Turks, who before had expected this aſſault, hauing in beſt ſort they could repaired the breach, and on both ſides thereof placed diuers murthering pieces, with great ſtore of dangerous fire-workes; at ſuch time as the firſt companies of the Chriſtians ſought couragiouſly to haue entred the breach, ouerwhelmed them with that deadly fire, and ſo rent them with their murthering ſhot, that they no faſter entered, but that they were forthwith cut off and ſlaine: with the ſight whereof, they which were appointed to ſecond them, nothing diſcouraged, but ſeeking deſperatly to haue entered, and with the taking of the caſtle, and ſlaughter of the Turks, to haue requited the death of their fellowes, were themſelues in like ſort welcommed. So that now a thouſand of them being loſt, the Captaines conſidering how much the loſſe of ſo many braue ſouldiers D concerned the whole enterpriſe taken in hand, and that the breach could not be gained without the loſſe of the greateſt part of them, they cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and ſo the aſſault for that time to be giuen ouer.

A notable skirmiſh betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks.

But long is was not that the Viſier Baſſa (thus retired as aforeſaid) had lien before Peſth, but that by reaſon of his ſudden returne, great wants began to ariſe in his camp; his ſouldiers for want of food being glad to eat their dead horſes, a pound of bread being ſold for two Hungarian Duckats, and a buſhel of oates for fiue, and yet hardly ſo to be gotten: which wants in that ſo waſted a country ſtill more and more encreaſing, and many of his ſoldiers ſecretly ſtealing away from him, hee had much adoe by all the meanes he could vſe, to perſuade them there to ſtay eight daies longer. Which time expired, and nothing more done, than ſome few weake E attempts giuen, and ſome light skirmiſhes made, rather for faſhions ſake than for any hope of preuailing; and the want of all things ſtill encreaſing: he with the reſt of the Commanders fearing ſome ſudden miſchiefe to be done them by the hungry and diſcontented ſouldiers, the ſecond of Nouember, cauſing his baggage to be truſſed vp in the dead time of the darke and ſilent night, riſe with his army, and ſo in haſte retired directly to Belgrade, leauing behind him in his camp three hundred dead horſes, not yet eaten by his hunger ſtarued ſouldiers. Immediatly after whoſe departure, the Lord Nadaſti and ſome other of the commanders in the army, with fiue thouſand ſouldiers and certaine great pieces of artillery, ſome by land, ſome by water, went downe alongſt the riuer to Adom, a faire well built towne vpon the banke of Danubius, about foure Hungarian miles from Buda, and ſeruing as it were for a F ſtorehouſe for the garriſon there: Which towne Nadaſti ſummoned by his Huſſars ſent before, requiring to haue it deliuered vnto him. Which they of the towne at firſt refuſed to do: but afterwards ſeeing a far greater power come, prouided of great ordnance and all things elſe requiſite for a ſiege, they with the ſight thereof diſcouraged, without more adoe offered to yeeld the towne, ſo that they might with bag and baggage in ſafety depart: which they did, the Chriſtians conducting them as far as Feldwar, which caſtle was alſo at the firſt ſummons, by the perſuaſion of them of Adom deliuered vnto them: for they of the caſtle, by them enformed of the great ſtrength of the Chriſtians, and of the ſtore of great ordnance they had brought with them, and that they ſtaied therewith but faſt by, were eaſily perſuaded to hearken to their friends, and ſo yeelded. Which done, the free Haiducks the ſame night ſurpriſed alſo the caſtle of Pax: from whence the Chriſtians ſtill marching on alongſt the riuer, tooke in alſo the city of Tolna.

But whileſt Nadaſti with the reſt were thus buſied in taking theſe caſtles and towns alongſt the South ſide of Danubius, they in the camp at Buda were aduertiſed of the new deſignes of the Turks Lieutenants and Captaines thereabout, for the reliefe of the beſieged: as that the Baſſa of Boſna, with the Gouernours of Caniſia, Sigeth, and others, had aſſembled an army of thirty thouſand for the raiſing of the ſiege. Wherefore the Chriſtians doubting as they lay at the ſiege diſperſed, to be by them oppreſſed; leauing their tents in their trenches, gathered themſelues together into the Water city: which the Turks out of the vpper city quickly perceiuing, as feeling themſelues now at ſome more liberty, preſently ſallying out, took both the trenches and the tents ſo left, with no ſmall ſlaughter of ſuch as were left for the keeping of them: and ſo poſſeſſed of the trenches and the tents, held them by the ſpace of two houres, vntill they were by ſtrong hand by the Chriſtians beaten out, and ſo with ſome loſſe inforced againe to retire into the city. The Lord Nadaſti alſo, with the reſt that had taken the aforeſaid caſtles and towns vpon the ſide of Danubius, making a rode towards Alba-Regalis, in their return within a mile of Buda light vpon a thouſand Turks there gathered together, moſt part of whom they ſlew, and hauing put the reſt to flight, took ſome fifty of them priſoners. At which time alſo another of the Imperiall Colonels meeting with certaine other companies of the Turks comming to the reliefe of the beſieged, not far from Buda, ſlew moſt part of them, took an hundred and threeſcore of them priſoners, with a number of horſes and much other rich booty, all which he brought into the campe. Neither were they at the ſiege in the meane time idle, their great artillery ſtill thundering againſt the walls both of the caſtle and the city: ſo that by the fury of the cannon hauing beaten downe a ſtrong tower next vnto the Danubius, not far from the kings ſtable, they were a little before night about to haue there entered, when ſuddenly ſuch a tempeſt of winde and raine ariſe, as that they could not poſſibly vſe their pieces, or well any other weapon: ſo that the heauens as it were then fighting for the enemy, they were enforced for that time to giue ouer the aſſault begun. Which ſtorme was no ſooner ended, but that two thouſand of the Turks both horſe and foot, to keepe the Chriſtians otherwiſe buſied, ſuddenly iſſuing out of the city, charged vpon the Stirian horſemen; who preſently relieued by the men at armes, ſo welcommed them, that hauing loſt an hundred and threeſcore of their men, they were glad with more ſpeed to retire, than they came out. But ſeeing ſome of the Chriſtians that ſo hardly purſued them, ſome ſlaine, and ſome hurt from the wals; taking heart againe, the next day (being the eleuenth of Nouember) they ſallied out againe; where albeit that a great number of them were ſlaine, yet fell they out againe the third day alſo, and were againe by the County Thurne with great loſſe of their men beaten backe into the city: where in purſuing of them, the Chriſtians were by certaine Ianizaries (laid cloſe for that purpoſe) ſuddenly aſſailed and dangerouſly gauled, the County himſelfe being hurt in his left arme, and ſome other Captaines ſlaine. In all which ſallies, although the Turks were ſtill put to the worſe, yet thereby they gained time in ſome good ſort to repaire againe their breaches.

Shortly after, the Imperials thus lying at the ſiege, certainly enformed that a world of the fierce and rude Tartars by the incitement of the Turke (hauing made themſelues way through Valachia) were comming as far as Temeſwar to relieue Buda; thought it not beſt (eſpecially now that Winter was come) to abide the comming of that ſo great a Northerne tempeſt, but betimes whileſt they had yet ſpace, to raiſe their ſiege and be gone: Which they did the fifteenth of Nouember, leauing the Water city, with all that they had got about Buda, againe vnto the enemy: onely Peſth they furniſhed with victuals and all things elſe neceſſary, leauing therin almoſt ten thouſand ſoldiers in garriſon, for the defence therof againſt the barbarous

The ſiege of Buda for feare of the Tartars giuen ouer by the Chriſtians.

A rous enemy. As for Adom it was ſtrengthened with a garriſon of Hungarians only, with their wages offred to be paid before hand, which for all that, they refuſed to accept; alledging that for the great danger this place was expoſed vnto aboue others, they could not ſafely take their oath for the defence thereof: yet offering withall to vndertake the charge, and to do what beſeemed valiant ſoldiers, in ſuch ſort as that all men ſhould well vnderſtand, that nothing euill ſhould happen thereunto through their default or negligence.

The ſiege of Buda for feare of the Tartars thus giuen ouer, and the Imperials departed and gone, the Turks forthwith came downe out of the higher city into the lower, declaring their joy for the recouery thereof, by the often thundring of their great ordnance, with diuers other ſignes of triumph. But whileſt in their jolity they ſpared not by the mouth of the cannon to B ſend commendation to them of Peſth, they from them againe receiued the like; but in ſuch rude manner, that the Turks wearied with ſuch greetings, requeſted them to ſpare their ſhot and pouder, and quietly to liue by them as became neighbors for that Winter, vntill the next Spring, at which time it was to be thought that this ſtrife ſhould be ended by their Emperors, the weaker yeelding vnto the ſtronger either the one or the other city. Yet for all this their great joy, their cheere in Buda was not great, victuals by this ſiege being become ſo ſcarce, that it was by the Turks feared, That if the Chriſtians had there longer lien, they ſhould for very want haue been enforced to haue yeelded the city. Of which their need their friends not ignorant, and hauing made what prouiſion they were able for their reliefe, were with a great conuoy bringing the ſame towards Buda: whereof the garriſons of Comara and Strigonium C hauing intelligence, went preſently out, and meeting with the Turks in the mid way betwixt Alba Regalis and Buda, ouerthrew the conuoy, and carried away all that prouiſion of victuals; like vnbidden gueſts making themſelues merry with that which was neuer prouided for them.

Theſe doubtfull wars of Hungary, with the general reuolt of Tranſyluania much troubled Mahomet the great Sultan; but nothing like vnto the wars he had in Aſia againſt the Scriuano and the rebels his followers; the euill ſucceſſe whereof (as moſt dangerous to his State) ſo much tormented his haughty minde, as that it would ſcarce ſuffer him to thinke of any thing els. For the Rebel encouraged with the ſucceſſe of the laſt yeares wars, and ſtil growing ſtronger and ſtronger, (by reaſon of the great number which, allured with the ſweet name of liberty, D hope of prey, or the good entertainment by him giuen, dayly more and more reſorted vnto his campe) had this yeare ouerrun a great part of the Turks dominions in Aſia, putting all to fire and ſword that ſtood in his way, ranſacking alſo diuers walled and fenced cities by the way as he went. Which he might the more eaſily do, for that the Ianizaries of Aleppo and Damaſco, with many other their partakers and fauorits, which might greatly haue hindred his proceedings, were at the ſame time alſo vp in arms, and together by the ears amongſt themſelues, to the great benefit of the Scriuano: who in the midſt of the courſe of theſe his deſired fortunes fell ſicke of a natural diſeaſe, and ſo died. By whoſe death the rebellion was no whit appeaſed, (as commonly in like caſe it falleth out, and as was then of many expected) but in ſhort time grew to be both far greater and more dangerous than before: for the Scriuano was no ſooner E dead, but that a yonger brother of his, no leſſe warlike & couragious than himſelf (to the great contentment of the rebellious) ſtept vp in his place, fiercely proſecuting the wars his brother had before him taken in hand. Againſt whom Haſſan Baſſa by commandement from the grand Seignior with a great army ſetting forward, with hope in that newneſſe of his command to haue oppreſſed him, and ſo to haue quenched that ſo ſpreading a fire; at length met with him, that was eaſie enough to be found, and joyning battell with him, was by him in a great and bloudy fight ouerthrowne and ſlaine together with his whole army, except ſuch as by ſpeedy flight ſaued themſelues from the fury of their fierce enemies. So that Mahomet the great Sultan now enforced to employ his beſt commanders and ſoldiers into thoſe parts for the ſubduing of him, for that cauſe called Mahomet the Viſier Baſſa out of Hungary to ſerue againſt F this new Rebell: who in the meane time following the courſe of his victory, made hauocke of all as he went, taking vnto his owne vſe all ſuch tribute as was in thoſe Countries and others alſo farther off, due vnto the great Sultan, hauing of late exacted onely of the city of Ancyra
and

and the country thereabout, three hundred thouſand duckats: ſo by exacting of great ſummes G of mony from the country people (ſuch as be his enemies) heaping vp great treaſures for the maintenance of his wars, Diuers incurſions of the Tartars into the frontiers of the Emperours territories, and much harme by them there don.

Now that Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperor had called home Mahomet the Viſier Baſſa out of Hungary, to go againſt the Rebels in Aſia, (as is aforeſaid) yet had he before prouided, that for the better aſſurance of his townes and territories in Hungary, the Tartar Han with a great power of his Crim Tartars ſhould euen againſt that time come downe into that countrey. Which rough and needy people dwelling neere vnto the fennes of Mœtis, for pay or prey alwaies ready to do the Othoman Emperors ſeruice, ſetting forward vnder the leading of their great Han himſelfe, and of his two ſonnes, and by plaine force breaking through Valachia, though not without great loſſe of their men (being fought with by the Valachians and free H Haiducks a whole day) were now in the later end of December with their huge companies come into Hungary; the Han himſelfe with forty thouſand to Quinque Eccleſiæ, and his ſons with twenty thouſand moe into Poſſega (a fertile Countrey lying betweene the great riuers Sauus and Drauus) where they ſpoiled all as well the Turks as the other poore Chriſtians, pretending all that frontier country with the whole command thereof to be giuen vnto them by Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperor in reward of their good ſeruice. But long they lay not there quiet, but that to ſhew for what they came, they enforced the Chriſtians thereabout to victual Caniſia for the Turks: and ſo breaking into Stiria, not far from Caramant (the neereſt Fortreſſe of the Chriſtians towards Caniſia) carried away aboue two thouſand Chriſtians captiues: and ſhortly after ſurpriſing Keſchemet a great and populous towne, ſlew moſt part of I the inhabitants, and carried away the reſt priſoners. Other ſome of them alſo at the ſame time making an inrode to Sharuar, and hauing burnt twenty villages downe to the ground, carried away thence about a thouſand ſoules into moſt miſerably captiuity and thraldome. They alſo at their firſt comming relieued them of Buda, the Lord Nadaſti with his Huſſars, who before kept them from victuals, not being able for the great number of them, now longer ſo to do. By them alſo the Turks encouraged, tooke and burnt certaine places poſſeſſed by the Chriſtians neere vnto Buda, putting them all to the ſword that they found therin. So that the poore country of Hungary (neuer to be ſufficiently pittied) with the reſt of the countries and prouinces belonging vnto the houſe of Auſtria, and confining vpon the Turke, were not ſo much eaſed by the calling home of the Viſier Baſſa with his army, as they were now annoyed by the com- K ming of theſe roguiſh Tartars, a people wholly euen from their infancy giuen to the ſpoyle. Againſt whom for all that, the Chriſtians beſide their ordinary garriſons, began now euen in the depth of Winter to oppoſe ſome other of their forces alſo: the Palatine of Rhine ſending ten companies of horſemen to Poſſonium, from thence to be ſent to Sharuar for the defence of Stiria: and Collonitz (but lately knighted by the Emperour) for his part raiſing foure hundred horſe, a thouſand Huſſars, and three thouſand of the free Hiaducks for the repreſſing of thoſe Tartars: the Duke of Brunſewicke alſo at that time for the ſame ſeruice ſending thither a thouſand horſe with two thouſand foot, againſt thoſe ſworne Enemies of the Chriſtian Religion.

THe troubles of this year thus ouerpaſt, Alba Regalis being by the Chriſtians loſt, Peſth with ſome other places won, Tranſylvania recouered, Buda beſieged, the Viſier Baſſa returned, and the Tartars come into Hungary; Ianuary with a ſharp froſt began to open the next yeare, by force wherof the riuers in many places, but eſpecially in thoſe more Eaſterly countries, were not only frozen ouer, but ſeemed rather euen wholly turned into Ice: Danubius that great riuer, for all his ſwift courſe, being then alſo, as it is often, ſo hard frozen, that men and carts might ſafely paſſe to and fro thereupon. Which ſo hard a ſeaſon for all that, did no whit freeſe but rather increaſe the hot deſires of the greedy Turks, ſtill breathing after the vtter ſpoil and ruin of the Chriſtians dwelling neer vnto them. For which purpoſe they euen in this dead time of the year, and extremity of weather (which commonly affordeth vnto moſt mortal enemies a ceſſation from arms) out of their garriſons of Sigeth, Buda, Caniſia, Alba-Regalis, Babotz, and ſuch other places, raiſed an army of eighteen thouſand ſtrong, to haue forraged and ouer-runne the Chriſtians, with their territories confining vpon them; Quermanie with the Countrey therabout being the places by them aſſigned to haue felt the firſt force of their ſudden rage and fury.

The Turkes in arms againſt the Chriſtians.

Of theſe their deſignes Collonitz Gouernor for the Emperor in thoſe parts vnderſtanding, to preuent the ſame, & to meet with their forces, with al ſpeed put into the ſuburbs of Quermanie a thouſand Reiſters, and two thouſand Lanſquenets; and in the burroughs thereabouts laded the regiment of the County Reingraue with ſix companies of Coſſacks, four thouſand Haiducks, four hundred Carabins, French, and Wallons, two hundred horſe of the Regiment of Collonitz; with whom was Collonitz himſelf, commanding ouer all theſe troups: a man for his worth euery way anſwerable vnto his charge. Who for the more aſſurance of this Countrey, ouer which the enemy now houered, commanded all the inhabitants therabout to take vp arms; and withall, with good and ſtrong barricado's to ſtrengthen the waies, and to ſtop vp the paſſages into their country: which they right cheerfully performed, with their weapons in the one hand, and their ſpades and ſhouels in the other. Of which their ſo great reſolution the Turkes vnderſtanding, changed their purpoſe. For they conſidering the aſſured danger they were to vndergo in forcing of theſe troups, ſtanding vpon the walls of their defence, and ſtrong in their reſolution, changed their former deſigne for the inuading of Quermany, where they by the ſpace of fiue weeks together had bin by the Chriſtians expected; and vpon a new reſolution marched along by Roquesbourg, with purpoſe to haue loded themſelues with the ſpoil of the country therabout.

Colonitz prepareth againſt the Turks.

This their new deſigne cauſed Collonitz to gather his forces together, to croſſe and fruſtrat them therin. Which he did by fauor of the riuer, which both ſtrengthned him againſt their incurſions, and was wel to be defended. But the Turkes, whoſe purpoſe was not to fight, but to haue robbed and ſpoiled the country at their pleaſure; finding now contrary to their expectation ſuch ſtrong reſiſtance, and their deſignes diſturbed, in fine gaue ouer their enterpriſe and ſo again retyred; contenting themſelues to haue gathered a conuoy of victuals to put into Caniſia, which then lay in great extremity for want therof. Which victuals they drew out of the villages therabout, and ſo came to Babotz to march to Caniſia, a town moſt commodious for ſuch an aſſembly, and for the relieuing of Caniſia. Of this their purpoſe Collonitz (who ſpared for no coſt) by his eſpials aduertiſed, euen hee which before was appointed as a prey vnto his enemies, began now to plot with himſelfe, that they ſhould become a prey vnto him: their cowardiſe, by many precedent effects declared, had giuen him the mean to aduenture vpon them, and the hope to ouerthrow them. A neceſſary conſideration in martiall affairs, for Commanders to put in execution their deſignes, at what price ſoeuer: for that it is better to loſe in the performance of them, with preſeruation of their reputation, than otherwiſe to gain with the loſſe therof; for that it preſerued, ſtil ſtriketh a fear of their valour into the minds of their enemies, oftentimes ouercome euen with this their apprehenſion thereof: whereas otherwiſe they might haply ouercome, in the aſſurance by them conceiued of their enemies cowardiſe.

Vpon which reſolution this braue Colonell the four and twentieth day of March with his Troupes marched towards the little Comara, being about two leagues from Caniſia, and lay with them cloſe in ambuſh in the woods neer vnto two mariſhes,ouer which the Turkes had made two bridges to paſſe the great artillery and Waggons vpon; the Turks being well neer 20000 ſtrong,and our men but 2200 horſmen,& 6000 foot, a ſmal number in compariſon of their enemies. But whilſt that theſe men lie thus cloſe in ambuſh,with a purpoſe to do ſome notable exploit,let vs for a while return to Peſth, to ſee what things there paſſed in the mean time.

The Turks after the loſſe of Peſth,much grieued to haue this impoſtume ſo neer vnto their hearts,ſought to break it to our hurt,imploying all their treachery to gain our gariſon ſouldiers , and with their forces to diſtreſſe them of victuals. And the Chriſtian Army was no ſooner riſen from before Buda, but that the Turkes came downe again into their baſe towne, which they found much ruinated and in euill eſtate: but the joy of their conqueſt buried in it all the obiect of their ſorrow,and the feeling of their grief;the leſſer paſſions alwaies giuing place vnto the greater,and ſorrow finding no place at all in the midſt of their immoderat joy. Wherof they gaue a number of teſtimonies, by the thundering of their great ordnance, by fires of joy,and vollies of ſmall ſhot; all which in their fury they diſcharged vpon them of Peſth: who with the like curteſie requited them,ſending them back again bullets for bullets. Which now became a common exerciſe among the canoniers,paſſing the time in theſe actions,more vpon a brauery than to any purpoſe, ſmall harm being don therby either on the one ſide or on the other: in ſuch ſort,that in the end the Turks better aduiſed, requeſted our men to ceaſe from ſuch ſhooting, as they on their part would do likewiſe,and to expect the end of the negotiation of peace,of a certain begun(as they ſaid)betwixt their two princes. But purpoſing indeed by this means to ſpare their pouder,ſhot,& pains, and to reſerue them to their better vſes.

Buda diſtreſſed for want of victuals.

The Turks ouerthrown by the Chriſtians.

And yet for all this triumphant ioy, the Turks in Buda were in great want of victuals, the late ſiege hauing deuoured all their prouiſions, and no new ſupply thereof as yet come vnto them: inſomuch that their greateſt care was now how to come by victuals, without which they muſt needs forſake the city. Of which their ſo great neceſſities the other garriſons in the places therabout aduertiſed, aſſembled themſelues to take order therfore; and hauing prouided 200 wagons loden with all maner of neceſſary prouiſions at Alba-Regalis, with a conuoy of ſix thouſand ſoldiers put themſelues vpon the way toward Buda. Of all which their proceedings the garriſon of Strigonium hauing got vnderſtanding, and joining vnto them the garriſon of Comara, met with them vpon the way betwixt Alba-Regalis, and charged them; and ſo with great confidence came on both ſides to handy blowes, the Turkes beeing in number ſtronger, and our men in valour and reſolution; the Waggons in the meane time ſtanding ſtill as the motiue of the charge,and appointed for a prey vnto the Victors. But our horſmen being for moſt part Huſſars, wel acquainted with ſuch charges, with their diuers courſes greatly troubled the enemy; our footmen in the mean time charging them alſo with a number of harquebuſiers. Againſt whom the Turkes with the ſame arms and like courage defending themſelues, but many of them being ſlaine,and their Wagons gained from them, they were forced to giue place,and ſo were almoſt all cut in pieces. The Waggons thus ſurpriſed,were diuided as a rich booty among the Victors; forty wherof were ſent to the gariſon at Peſth,who were wel content that the enemies trauell and wealth had bin gathered for their good,and without any pains of their own,to ſolace themſelues with the fruit of their enemies labours.

But what ſhould we ſay? the moſt ſure reſolutions are ſomtimes by chances croſſed , and tempeſts otherwhiles ouertake vs euen in the very entrance of the deſired port. The Turks of Buda vnderſtanding of the brute of this medley,and that it was for their bread, poſted in all haſte to haue ſuccoured their Troupes,and arriued at the ſame time that our men victoriouſly led alongſt by the riuer of Danubius the Waggons which they had before gained. At the ſight of which obiect they animated with hunger after the victuals, and with deſire to be reuenged vpon them, fiercely charged them. So that our men,who thought of nothing more, but that they were victorious and poſſeſſed of their enemies booty, ſeeing theſe new come Enemies ſo furiouſly to charge them,daunted with the preſent peril, and with the conſideration thereof only poſſeſſed, bethought themſelues of nothing elſe but how to ſaue themſelues,

A and to leaue their honour, booty, and the field, all as ſpoiles vnto their enemies. The furious countenance of the Turkes, and their number ſurmounting ours by 1500, ſo bereft them of their reſoluton for to fight for their liues and waggons, as that they without more adoe quite forſook them, accounting themſelues happy enough if they might but ſaue themſelues. And the Turks without farther purſuing of them, contented to haue recouered their victuals, left them, and ſo returned homeward, driuing their waggons along the banke of Danubius. But ſee, the winde which by and by changed, and hauing as it were with a ſudden tempeſt vnderta-ken euen at the entrance of the port to ſwallow vp both the one and the other, ſent the garriſon of Peſth vpon them of Buda to ſtay them. Great changes of fortune in one moment of time, which mocketh men with ſhewes, bringing forth effects quite contrary to their ex-B pectation. Theſe Turks ſtaid vpon their retreat by the comming of theſe new come aduerſa-ries, did euen as ours had done before. For not willing to prefer their goods before their life, and more greedy of victuall than of battel, they quitted their prize, and retyred. For our men in number two thouſand, were ſeized of a forreſt about the midſt of the way whereby the Turks were to paſſe, & which they could by no means ſhun, and diuided into two companies, kept themſelues cloſe there in ambuſh, reſolutely attending for the comming of their enemies. Of which their purpoſe the Turks not aware, and ſtil preſſing on forward, found themſelues hardly charged before they could ſee them by whom they were ſo charged; one of our companies charging them afront, and the other behind. So that the Turks incloſed betwixt them, and in ſo great and ſudden a fear not knowing againſt whom to defend themſelues with-C out any great reſiſtance betooke themſelues to flight, leauing their wagons, and caſting away their armes: yet ſo, that a number of them were left dead vpon the place, ſome others of them taken priſoners, and the reſt chaſed euen vnto the gates of the City. But our men being victors, with the waggons, and a number of priſoners returned home, and by the mouth of their great artillerie gaue a thouſand teſtimonies of their victory vnto the ſorrowfull cowards, who themſelues alſo carried the heauy newes thereof vnto the reſt of their fellowes ſhut vp within the City of Buda.

But ſee againe the change of Fortune, conſtant only in vnconſtancie, as the ſequell ſhortly after ſhewed. Danubius that great riuer was then alſo (as it is often) ſo hard frozen, that men and carts might now ſafely paſſe too and fro thereupon. In which ſo hard ſeaſon, the Turks D in garriſon at Buda hauing once vpon the frozen riuer braued the Chriſtians in Peſth, and the two and twentieth of Ianuary in like brauery comming out the ſecond time, were by the gar-riſon ſoldiers of Peſth put to flight, and by two hundred of the moſt forward and valiant ſol-diers hardly purſued, vpon whom, not only they which fled, but others of the Turks alſo out of Buda in greater number returning, chaſed them likewiſe back againe euen to the bridge, wher-by they were to haue paſſed into the City: which now drawne vp for feare of greater harme from ſuch a number of Turks as were now come out, and were ready to haue entred at the heeles of the flying ſoldiers, the poore ſoules ſo ſhut out, and too weake for ſuch a multitude as then had them in chaſe, were there euen in their friends ſight euery man ſlaine, the Turks themſelues with little harme returning to Buda.

The garriſon ſoldiers of Peſth ouerthrowne.

E Neither long laſted the ioy of this victory: for within a few days after, one Lethner a Captaine of the Chriſtian garriſon in Peſth, more grieued than the reſt with the loſſe of ſo many valiant men, and ſome of them his friends and companions alſo, certainly vnderſtanding that certaine of the chiefe of the Turks of Buda, with two of their greateſt Commanders, and a great traine of gallant Gentlewomen, were for their pleaſure the next day about to goe vnto the hot Bathes neere vnto Buda; and taking with him threeſcore musketiers, the night before ſecretly vpon the yce paſſed ouer the River, and ſo not farre from the Bathes lay cloſe in ambuſh, expecting the comming of their deſired prey. In which ex-pectance they lay not long, but that theſe Turks fearing no perill, came accordingly as they could haue wiſhed, and in thoſe pleaſant Bathes merrily bathed and ſolaced themſelues: F Fooles to ſeeke after the pleaſures of peace amidſt the gulfe of the miſeries of warre, and euill aduiſed, to aſſure themſelues of faire weather in a ſtorme ſo neere at hand. For in the midſt of all their delights theſe reſolute men came ſuddenly vpon them, not fearing any

The Turks in bathing themſelues at Buda, by them of Peſth ſurpriſed and ſlaine.

ſuch danger, and ſlew all the men, ſparing none but one boy and the Gentlewomen: who in the G time of the conflict, naked as they were, ran as faſt as they could into the city; fear hauing in them ouercome as then the modeſty of their ſex. Which exployt done, the Captain leauing the Turks ſlain in the bath (now become red with their blood) returned with his ſouldiers laded with the rich booty, and merrily ſporting at the naked gentlewomen. With whoſe fearfull cry they of Buda ſtirred vp, ſent out certaine of their garriſon after them, but to no purpoſe, for why, they were in ſafety before got home. By continuance of this froſt (by reaſon wherof victuals could not be ſent down the riuer) the garriſon ſouldiers of Peſth were driuen to ſuch wants, as that dogs and cats were accounted good meat among them; the Turks their enemies ſtill roaming about the fields, to keep them from victuals, and to increaſe their neceſſitie.

Great want of victuals in Peſth.

Of theſe neceſſities the Turks of Buda were partakers alſo, hunger-ſtarued like the other, H but yet euery day in the field to ſeek relief. They knew right wel that hunger was hard to be deceiued, being ſtil in action and vigilant; and therfore they ſought ſome means how to deceiue our men ſtil attending vpon them, & ſo to aſſure themſelues of victuals. To which end they gaue it out, and made ſhew as if they would haue beſieged the fort of Adom, diſtant about two leagues from Buda: vnder colour wherof they receiued into their city a Conuoy of fifty wagons laded with victuals and munition; which our men hindred not, as hauing no ſuſpition of any ſuch purpoſe of theirs. With which reliefe the Turks incouraged, gaue knowledge therof vnto their ouerthwart neighbors in Peſth by a thouſand great ſhot, which they in thundering manner ſent ouer the riuer vnto them, as men of courage, and deuoid of feare. I Howbeit that this action was more vain than profitable vnto the Turks, who for the diſpence of their ſhot and pouder gained not ſo much as the life of one ſouldier, nor one ſtone out of the walls of Peſth. Vpon this jolitie theſe ſame garriſon ſouldiers of Buda ſhortly after thought vpon the ſudden to haue ſurpriſed Palotta, a ſmall caſtle of the Chriſtians by night. But being in good time diſcouered, they were deceiued of their hope, and with the loſſe of an hundred and twenty of their men inforced to retyre: vnto whom Gaſpar Herwad captain of the caſtle, by a country peaſant before ſworn to do the errand, ſent a little pot ful of ſalt, & a bottle of wine; willing them in deriſion, with that ſalt to ſeaſon the Veniſon they had taken in their late hunting, and with that bottle to quench their thirſt, and to cheer them vp after their late conqueſt.

Buda victualled.

This jeaſt did more prouoke theſe Enemies, galled ſo to heare of their ſhame and loſſe; in K ſuch ſort, that in reuenge thereof they diſcharged a thundring ſhoure of great ſhot and ſmall bullets vpon the garriſon of Peſth, which in great aboundance fell out of the cloud of their rage. But all to ſmall purpoſe, for that their Cannons being euill leuelled, ouerſhot the Towne, carrying with their thundering bullets more feare than they did hurt; yea, that which worſe was, the ruine made by their great battery fell vpon their owne City. For whileſt they were thus thundering, fire by the negligence of the Cannoniers fell into one of their barrels of pouder, which taking hold of another, and ſo running along as if it had beene by a traine made of purpoſe, burſt out with ſuch force, that it ouerthrew a long piece in the walls of Buda, which in the fall thereof ouerwhelmed a great number of the ſouldiers that were neere L vnto it. The noiſe of this thunder-clap was great, and the force thereof terrible, ſo that it reuiued them of Peſth with ſome good hope, by this breach to force the place, the Turkes being from thence retyred. Vpon which occaſion the Gouernour of Peſth reſolued to giue an aſſault vnto the place, and to make vſe of the mean that Fortune, without his paine or trauell had put into his hand. Whereupon taking with him a thouſand Almaines and three hundred Hungarians, he forthwith in hope of good ſucceſſe marched toward the breach, and happily had preuailed, but that by the way they by chance met with a company of Turkes, who gaue an alarm vnto them of the vpper town, who vpon the newes of their approach, manned their walls, and with great ſpeed repaired the breach. Now all that they of Peſth could do, was to reuenge themſelues vpon thoſe Turks they had met withall, who were there all ſlaine except M ſome few, whom they ſaued and caried priſoners to Peſth, to be by them inſtructed of the enemies affairs.

About

A About this time Radul Vayuod of Valachia, aduertiſed that the Turks in garriſon at Siliſtria were gon abroad into the country to ſeek after booty and victuals, with his ſoldiers paſ-ſed forthwith ouer the riuer Danubius vpon the ice, to ſurpriſe the town bared of the garriſon: whoſe men for the deſire of the riches of the place, & for fear leſt the garriſon ſoldiers ſhould return before they had gained the place, with redoubled force & courage ſo aſſailed the town, that the Turks diſmaied, and deeming the number of the Chriſtians that ſo furiouſly aſſailed them to be greater than indeed it was, by reaſon of the greatnes of the enterpriſe by them taken in hand; after ſome ſmall reſiſtance, left the way open for them to enter: Who forthwith ouer the dead bodies of their enemies thruſt into the town, took the whole ſpoil therof, which was both great & rich, as being a town well peopled; and ſo ſet fire on it, to the intent it ſhould B no more ſerue as a place for the enemy to retyre vnto. The Vayuod thus victorious and rich, returned with his ſoldiers laded with ſpoiles of their enemies, before the Turks could gather themſelues together to hinder their retreit. And vnto George Baſta (who was then in Tranſyl-vania in arms againſt the Turks) for his part of the booty he ſent him thirteen of the enemies Enſignes.

Siliſtria ſpoild and burnt.

But our troupes are now too long in their ambuſh, where the valiant Collonitz holds them cloſe, attending the comming of the Turkes and of their Conuoy to Caniſia; now we muſt draw them out of their Sentinels, and ſee what effects their deſignes ſhall bring forth. Theſe braue ſouldiers had now lien three daies in their ambuſhes without diſcouering of any Enemy; vntill that the ſixth day of March three Spies fel into their hands, whom the Turks had C ſent forth before, to diſcouer what enemies were then abroad in the field. But theſe faithful Infidels ſo taken, would not by any meanes diſcouer any thing hurtfull vnto their friends, or profitable for ours. So that in fine, the General mooued with their obſtinacy, commaunded one of their heads to be ſtrook off, to terrifie the other two, and by force to draw from them what by faire intreaty and perſuaſion they could not. The other two that were yet aliue, diſmayed with this ſpectacle, and well beaten to tell the truth, were at laſt conſtrained to confeſſe, That they were the enemies Spies, ſent forth to view the Countrey, to ſee if the Chriſtians had any forces there, able to hinder their Cannons and Wagons for entring into Caniſia. Which not appearing, and they reporting vnto their Companies that the Country was clear, that then within two daies after, the Conuoy was to paſſe euen by the ſame place where D they then lay, to be put into Caniſia, ſetting forth from Babotz two houres before day. Our men thus reſolued of the enemies deſignes, forced their hope to defeat them, and again retired themſelues into their ambuſcado's, attending for their hoped prey, in ſuch ſort, that our men in their conceits held the victory now as good as already gained, howbeit that it was yet but in hope and expectation. And that which more confirmed the matter, was, that within two hours after the taking of theſe ſpies, the Haiducks, layd without the principal ambuſcado, and hidden within the thickets and buſhes, diſcouered a Cornet of horſemen, with fiue enſignes of the Turks come out of Caniſia, marching to meet with the Conuoy, in ſafety to conduct the ſame into the towne. At which ouerture the Hungarians awaked, gaue knowledge vnto their Generall of the arriuall of the enemy, to the end he might reſolue what was beſt in that E caſe to be done. Which opportunity Colonitz embracing, and making much of time, put his horſmen in good order, to incloſe the Turks betwixt the mariſh & the wood, and to cut them ſo incloſed, in pieces. The Turks hauing diſcouered nothing but the marſhes & the woods, held on their way, and ſo as men hauing their hands and feet bound, fell into the power of their enemies. For being come into the danger, the Chriſtian Carabins charged them in the head of their companies as they marched, & diſordered them; the Hungarians fel vpon their flanks, which they opened; and the horſmen preſſed them at their backs. Theſe poor miſera-ble men ſo incloſed, not knowing againſt whom firſt to defend themſelues, and ſeeing death vpon euery ſide of them, became as beaſts to bee ſacrificed vnto the fury of the Chriſtians.
The ſmall reſiſtance that they made deſerued not the name of a fight, being all ſlaine, and ha-F uing themſelues not ſlain one man; layd by heapes one vpon another, not hauing ouerthrown ſo much as one of their enemies. In ſuch ſort, that of ſix hundred men that were there together, there were not foure of them ſaued. Their horſemen which followed them, ſeeing they were ſurpriſed, in ſtead of relieuing them, ſhameſully fled; and thinking by flight to ſaue them-

themſelues while that their companions were in maſſacting, preferred their liues before their honour; for if it be a ſhame for ſoldiers in fight to fly with the ſafety of their friends, it muſt G needs be an irrepairable diſhonour to fly away and leaue them vnto the ſlaughter. But our Carabins taking the occaſion for their aduantage, no more ſpared their horſes in the purſuit of theſe Infidels, than they had don their hands in defeating their fellows: but haſtily purſuing theſe fugitiues, ſlew a number of ſuch of them as were worſt mounted, and followed the reſt euen to the gates of Caniſia. Thoſe of the town at this tumult raiſed an alarm, ſhot off their great artillery, and diſcharged many vollies of ſmall ſhot againſt our men, as wel to ſtay their purſuit & to ſaue their own, as to giue them warning that were to bring the conuoy, that our men were ready in the field to ſurpriſe them. But during this fight, three of the Turkes ſtout horſmen paſſing well mounted, aduentured to paſſe by our troups, and vpon the ſpur to meet with them that were bringing the conuoy, and to giue them warning of the ouerthrow, H that ſo they might again return to Babotz. Which their ſo braue an attempt fortune fauoured, as not willing to fruſtrat the deſert of ſo worthy valour. Wherfore vpon this aduertiſement they returned, and retyred themſelues againe into the Caſtle of Babotz from whence they came.

Babotz in vain beſieged by Colonitz.

But our men aduertiſed of this their retreit, and as it were deceiued of their hope for intercepting of the conuoy, vndertook an exploit much more haughty, braue and dangerous: for forthwith they made head toward Babotz, with a reſolution to carry the place; and although they were almoſt ſixteen miles from it, yet they reſolued to goe thither, and to make themſelues maſters therof. And ſo marching cheerfully on, therin vſed ſuch diligence, that about I nine a clock at night they arriued at the place: whither they were no ſooner come, but that they did what they might to daunt their enemies, to make their conqueſt the more eaſie. The greatnes of the attempt it ſelf ſerued well to that purpoſe, but yet the beleef more, if they could driue into the enemies mind the ſufficiencie of their forces, for the performance of ſo great an exploit; which cauſed them to ſound their trumpets, to ſtrike vp their drummes, to remoue their artillery, to ruffle with their arms, to keep a ſtir with their ſoldiers, and to make the noiſe not of a ſmall, but of a puiſſant and great army. But the Turks in number twice ſo many as were our men, and within a good and ſtrong place, were not with ſuch a bruit to bee carried away, but ſtanding faſt vpon their gard and reſolution, prepared themſelues for fight, and how to receiue our men if they ſhould attempt to aſſail them. Now whileſt the alarmes K thus ſounded, our companies aduanced, repeating oftentimes the name of Ieſus, and making themſelues ready for to fight. This skirmiſh began with a thouſand cannon ſhot, which the Turks out of the caſtle deliuered vpon the troups of the Chriſtians, and their muskets ſtill playing from the curtain of their walls, ſo that the caſtle ſeemed as if it had bin a mountain of fire. All which terrors no whit ſtaied the hope of our reſolute footmen, who thwarting theſe flaming ſhowrs, marched along the counterſcarpe of the ditch towards the gate of the towne, to haue broken open and forced the ſame. The Turkes at the ſame time were come forth out of the towne, making ſhew as if they would haue ſallied forth vpon our men and haue fought with them. But at the ſame inſtant that they charged the front of our footmen, they were by them ſo encountred and beaten backe, that hauing loſt ſome of their men, they L were glad again to retyre into the town. Where they indeauored to defend themſelues, not daring afterwards to fight without the fauor of their walls: within which it ſtood them vpon to haue both courage and power, being ſtill furiouſly aſſailed by our men, who planted vpon the town ditch, with their muskets and harquebuſes ſo plied the Turkes vpon their walls and in their holds, as that they durſt not ſhew themſelues or looke out, for the ſhowres of lead which they thundred vpon them. And aſſuredly, if our men had then had inſtruments wherewith to haue opened the gates or the wals, as wel as their muskets and harquebuſes had made a breach into the reſolution of the Turks, the town had vndoubtedly bin ours. But this deſigne being not before foreſeen, neither intended, wanted the means to put it in execution, ſo that for want of petards and ſcaling ladders the place remained ſtil the Turkes, and ſaued it ſelfe M out of our hands. In fine, our men hauing been four houres in fight before it, both doing and receiuing harm, and finding no means to enter the place, were inforced to ſound a retreit, and to leaue it.

A In this retreat the Chriſtians burnt certain villages of the enemies, rather to ſhew they had bin there, than for any other valor therin; ſeeing that things inſencible, which follow the order of their nature, are without offence, and they which hurt them, without reaſon. This done, they of purpoſe returned to little Comara; for the long time that they had kept the field, the diuers exploits of them don againſt the enemies, and the common report of the Vanquiſhed, had ſtirred vp the enemies, ſo that they began now on euery ſide by heaps to flock together, to ſwallow them vp, and euen now preſſed vp their retreit. So Collonitz in deſpight of the enemy, in ſafety brought back his ſoldiers, and being entred into Comara, cauſed the heads of the chief of the ſlain Turkes to be ſet vpon the pikes of the paliſado's, and vpon a great Pine tree ſtanding before the gate, which for this purpoſe had almoſt all the branches lopped off. B An action learned from the cruelty of the Turkes, and now don by the Chriſtians, more to aſtoniſh and deter them from this their cruel cuſtom, than for any glory or profit inſuing therby; ſeeing that to tyranniſe vpon a dead body, is but a ſigne of cowardiſe, and an action altogether vnprofitable.

This done, our men departed from this Caſtle, as men worne and almoſt ſpent with trauel and wearineſſe, but yet more with famine. For why, they thinking to haue executed but that deſigne which had put them in armes, and that in ſo ſhort a time alſo, had taken no prouiſion of victuals with them; ſo that they were all pined with hunger, ouercome with watching, and halfe dead with labour. Their horſes alſo in like ſort languiſhed, the Countrey beeing alike cruell both to the one and to the other. For beſides that it was vnfruitfull vnto ſuch as kept C the field (all the fruits therof being gathered together and carried into the towns by the men of War) it was not poſſible for our men to forrage, or to ſeeke for victuals there, and to come to an happy end of their deſigne; for that they had raiſed an alarm abroad in the Countrey, and ſo perhaps might themſelues haue become a prey vnto them whom they thought to prey vpon. Which was the cauſe that our ſouldiers had for the ſpace of three days eaten nothing but Crabbes and Acornes which they found in the Woods which couered their ambuſhes; ſo that being now come into this Caſtle, they deuoured a world of victuals, and requeſted euery one of them to returne vnto their owne garriſons; their bodies weakened with hunger, being ſcarce able to beare their Armes. But that was not all; for departing from little Comara, they were aduertiſed, That the Turkes had ſhut vp all the wayes whereby they were to D make their retreit home; in hope eaſily to ouercome men already with hunger brought low, and to kill the bodies which trauell had already ſpent. Howbeit the great courage of our men fruſtrated this the enemies deſigne, and ſaued themſelues. And ſo farre off was it that this aduertiſement diſmayed Collonitz, that euen to the contrary it the more increaſed his courage, as appointed for his glory; being glad to haue ſuch an occaſion offered vnto him for the ſhewing of his valour, although it were thorow the middeſt of danger, death, and ſlaughter. So that in ſtead of ſhunning the combat, whereas it was reported, That the Turks with great aſſurance marched neere vnto a Caſtle of the Chriſtians, to make head vpon a paſſage whereby our men were to retyre; he ſuddenly turned head toward the ſame place, with a firm reſolution, with true valour vnexpectedly to encounter the enemy, which had thought to E haue ſurpriſed him by cowardiſe. And the ſouldiers weakened with hunger, although they well apprehended the danger of this deſigne; yet reſting vpon the great reſolution of their worthy Generall, and conſidering the neceſſity they had to go farther for their ſafety, vpon a good courage were content to follow whitherſoeuer their Generall would: who led them directly to the aforeſaid Caſtle, where it was expected that the Turkes ſhould haue charged them. But being come thither there was no body to be ſeene, and yet our men, as hungry as they were, ſtayd there one day in ambuſh, expecting the comming of their enemies; who for all that, hauing no mind to meet them, appeared not, but gaue them time and liberty in ſafety to retyre themſelues euery man into his owne garriſon, to refreſh themſelues, and to recouer their ſtrength.

F But now whileſt our men of Warre after theſe troubles in Tranſylvania and Hungary, repoſe themſelues; let vs in the mean time take our journey to Conſtantinople, and goe to the marriage of Haſſan Baſſa one of the Viſiers of the grand Seignior, and the laſt year General of his army in Hungary.

A dangerous mutiny of the Janizaries & Spahi in Conſtantinople.

At ſuch time as he departed from this great city, to go vnto the conqueſt of Alba-Regalis, G Mahomet the Turkiſh Emperour, reſolued to ſet all vpon the regaining of this city, cauſed to be preſented vnto him a Crowne and a Sword; the one in reward of his valour, if he returned with victory from this exploit; and the other in reuenge of his cowardiſe if he failed in the performance of it: promiſing him indeed his ſiſter in marriage, amongſt other the glorious rewards and trophies of his victory; and threatning death as a puniſhment among the griefs of his diſhonour. But it came to paſſe, that by the cowardiſe of our men he came vnto the effects of his deſire (as is aforeſaid) and tooke the City which promiſed vnto him the glorious triumph in Conſtantinople. And vnder the ſweet influence of this planet he returned vnto Conſtantinople, where he found all things in readineſſe for the ſatisfying of his expectation, and aduancement of his glory. He is magnificently receiued of his Prince, curteouſly ſaluted by all the Nobility, and with greateſt reuerence poſſible honoured of the people. And as H he had happily diſcharged his charge, he found in like manner all things prepared and in readineſſe for the performance of the promiſe of the grand Seignior his Lord and maſter: Who had cauſed them to be in moſt ſumptuous manner prouided for the ſolemniſing of the mariage, and the contentment of the Baſſa. But nothing now wanting that he could haue deſired or wiſhed, more than the very ſolemniſing of the marriage it ſelfe, and that alſo euery day of all men expected; the Ianizaries and Spahi, with the other ſoldiers of the Court, to the number of about fiue and twenty thouſand, euen vpon the ſudden when as no ſuch thing was feared, came in armes, and ſo preſented themſelues before the Divano or high Tribunall, holden for the chiefe adminiſtration of juſtice in the great Turks palace, the firſt foure dayes in euery weeke: and hauing ſet guards at the Court gates, the more ſafely to execute what they I were reſolued vpon, proudly demanded to haue audience for certaine of the Spahi and Ianizaries, of whom they had made choice, in the names of them all to deliuer vnto the great Baſſa's their grieuances, and the cauſes of that their aſſembly. Who as ſoone as they were entred into the Divano before the Baſſa's (of whom the moſt couragious of them was not without feare, as looking for nothing but preſent death) they at the firſt demaunded to haue Haſſan Baſſa deliuered vnto them. Who thinking that his head ſhould haue ſerued as a ſacrifice to pacifie this their fury; as a man altogether diſmayed, wan and pale, paſſed thorow this mutinous multitude, to haue gone vnto the great Sultan; proteſting of his owne innocencie, and calling vpon his Prophet Mahomet to diſcouer vnto them the truth of all things. But K they, after a thouſand injuries and reproches by them heaped vpon him, rudely demaunded of him, Whence it proceeded, that whileſt he with a great part of the forces of the Empire was buſied in Hungary for recouery of the City of Alba-Regalis, there was in the mean time no order taken for the repreſſing of the dangerous rebellion in Aſia; which Rebell (as they ſaid) was now grown ſo proud, as with Enſignes diſplaied to come within three or foure dayes journey of Conſtantinople, the Imperiall City of the Othoman Emperours. Whereunto hee in no ſmall feare anſwered, That hee for his part had done his duty, as well whilſt he had the charge of the Army in Aſia, as now of late whileſt he had the like charge againſt the Chriſtians in Hungary, as euen his very enemies themſelues could witneſſe. But ſeeing himſelfe L in great danger of death, he inſtantly requeſted them, That his guiltleſſe death might be vnto the State in generall profitable, and that in diſcharging of his conſcience hee might declare vnto them the cauſes of this contempt and neglect for the ſuppreſſing of the Rebell in Aſia, which they were ſo deſirous to know: It proceedeth (ſaith he) onely from the euill gouernment of the grand Sultans mother (who then all commaunded) and from the negligent careleſneſſe of the Capi-Aga. Which his ſpeech although they with much impatience and ſtorming gaue eare vnto; yet hearing him ſo well to excuſe himſelfe, and to lay the blame there where they were well contented it ſhould reſt, they gaue him leaue to goe to the great Sultan, to requeſt him that they might ſpeake with him; and further to deale with him, that they might haue the heads of them who had been the cauſe of this diſhonourable ſeruice, or otherwiſe cowardly behaued themſelues in the mannaging of the wars againſt the Rebels in M Aſia. Threatning him withall, That if he failed to performe this his Charge, hee ſhould not fail to feel the heauy effects of their juſt fury. An heauy charge, yet glad was the Baſſa to vndergo the ſame, to be freed out their hands, where he ſaw himſelfe in great danger; amongſt

A them, moſt of whom had ſomtime ſerued vnder him, than amongſt ſo many his moſt mortall enemies. But what remedy? he muſt now ſo do or die therfore; for which he was the more to be excuſed. So in great fear comming vnto the great Sultan, almoſt as fearefull as himſelfe; he ſhewed vnto him the great danger like euen preſently to inſue by the mutiny of his beſt ſoldiers, and garders of his perſon: perſuading him betime to appeaſe their fury, before they had imbrued themſelues in bloud, for fear of further danger like enough to inſue, as wel vnto his own perſon, as vnto the reſt of his moſt faithfull and truſty Counſellors, from ſuch furious headſtrong men, vp in tumult with their armes in their hands. And although that a Prince ought not for the greatneſſe of his ſtate to doe any thing as thereunto forced by his ſubiects, leſt in ſo doing he might breed in them a contempt of himſelfe, and increaſe their inſolency; B that yet neuertheleſſe in this action being altogether extraordinary, hee was not to reſt vpon that point, for that theſe mutinous ſouldiers turned not their weapons (as they pretended) againſt his Imperial power and ſoueraignty, but rather to the contrary, againſt the contemners therof, ſeeking to be reuenged vpon them that had don him ſuch euill ſeruice for the maintenance of his honor and majeſty, and for the puniſhment of the inſolent and diſloyall. Wherfore the juſtice of the cauſe requiring and couering the malice of the fact, he was of opinion, that it were beſt for him to yeeld a little vnto the zeal of theſe his beſt ſoldiers, and to ſatisfie their iuſt deſires, although they had by very euill and vnlawful meanes ſought the ſame. And therfore aduiſed his Majeſtie, in ſome ſort to ſatisfie the iuſt complaints of theſe men, armed for reuenge of his honor, and to chaſtiſe the chief commanders of his Aſian forces, ſuch as by C whoſe treachery or cowardiſe his ſeruice being neglected, had armed theſe men againſt them: with the ſame hand puniſhing ſuch as had wronged his Majeſty in honor, and appeaſing the diſcontented for the good of his ſeruice. Mahomet thus by the Baſſa perſuaded, as alſo to ſhew himſelf in majeſty vnto theſe his diſcontented ſubiects (one part of their deſire) the neceſſity of the cauſe ſo requiring, in his Imperial ſeat preſented himſelfe vnto them, accompanied by the Mufti (the great Mahometan prieſt) & ſome few others of the reuerend Doctors of their Law, who by the Sultan commanded to ſit down, and the Baſſa's ſtanding vp (ſo great the reſpect is to men of that ſort, euen in a barbarous nation of ſo ſmall reſpect) the chiefe of the ſeditious ſtepping forth, demanded leaue to ſpeak both for himſelf and the reſt. Which being granted, he boldly thus began.

Mahomet ſheweth himſelfe to the mutinous ſoldiers.

Moſt happy and mighty Emperor, we the Spahies and Ianizaries thy obedient ſlaues, full of grief and diſcontentment to ſee a great part of thine Empire in danger to be loſt, deſire to know of thee the cauſe why thy Greatneſſe doth not remedie it, and imploy the means which God hath giuen thee. They ſuppoſe the Rebels courſes in Aſia are vnto thee vnknown, ſeeing they haue bin ſo hardy to come in arms ſo neer vnto thy Imperial city, the place of thyne abode, and that without any let or reſiſtance. They deſire to know if all this haue bin made known vnto thee, and whether thou wilt take vpon thy ſelfe the care of the gouernment of thy great monarchy, or no; which through the negligent careleſnes and euill gouernment of ſome by thee put in truſt, is like vnto a body with great & wel proportioned members, but of little or no ſtrength or power. Or elſe, that thou void of care, canſt be content that all ſhould be diſmembred, and ſo E euery man to take vnto himſelf what he can lay hand of, as the Rebels do in Aſia.

A proud ſpeech of a ſeditious ſoldier to Sultan Mahomet.

Now let no man maruel at this preſumptuous rude ſpeech of a proud Ianizary to his Soueraign; for why, they are the men which may moſt boldly ſpeak in Turky, they are the ſtay of the Turkiſh Empire, the great Sultans children acknowledging no other father but them: nay rather the great Turke himſelfe is their Creature, for they raiſe him vp and confirm him in the Empire, they are his greateſt ſtrength, and to them he is moſt beholden. If Mahomet were with ſo inſolent a ſpeech much moued, he was not iuſtly therfore to be blamed: howbeit being beſet with ſuch a furious multitude with weapons in their hands, and hauing no meanes F to withſtand their fury, he wiſely diſſembled his inward choler, and with a faire countenance and a majeſty full of mildeneſſe, with the beſt and calmeſt words that he could deuiſe, ſought to appeaſe them; imputing the great diſorder and euill ſucceſſe of his affaires vnto the vnfaithfulneſſe of his miniſters, and the concealing of the truth therof from him. Saying more-ouer, That before this their complaint he had reſolued to reforme theſe matters, and to take from them all occaſions of diſcontentment, or for them to vſe any ſuch ſpeech as was not beſeeming G them; whoſe obedience and reſpect of loyall duty vnto him their Soueraign, ſhould haue been an example vnto the reſt of his ſubiects. Vpon which ſpeech, they fiercely demanded of Haſſan Baſſa, Why hee had not giuen an account vnto his Maieſtie of the Rebels proceeding in Aſia. Who anſwered, That he had neuer failed of his duty therein, but that he had been alwaies hindred ſo to do by the Capi-Aga, ſaying, That it was not needfull to trouble him their Soueraigne therewith, (hauing committed theſe matters to others) but to reform and amend them as well as they might otherwiſe, without giuing of him any ſuch diſtaſte concerning theſe matters. And further, That the cauſe of all theſe diſorders proceeded from the Empreſſe his mother, the Capi-Aga, and ſome few others, vnto whom he had commended the mannaging of thoſe his affairs. With which his anſwer the mutiniers more moued, H furiouſly ſaid, That they were come thither to demand the heads of ſuch offenders, being reſolued to take another courſe if he ſhould refuſe to grant it them: [meaning therby to make a new Emperor.] Wherunto for all that, the great Sultan anſwered, That it was no reaſon, neither that he would for their humors put ſuch as they demanded innocently to death; but willed them to reſt themſelues contented, vntil it might by order of iuſtice be tried whether they had deſerued death or no, and that then he would giue them euen his own ſon, if he were found culpable. But the mutiners conſtant in their reſolution, again replied, that he had not by iuſtice put his brethren to death, but for the preſeruation of the ſtate: and that thoſe whom they ſo demanded, were ſo guilty of that wherwith they were charged, as that they deſerued I not to haue an orderly trial: That the lawes, how iuſt ſoeuer, ſhould be vnprofitable, and iuſtice iniury, if they were not by them to be puniſhed, and that therefore it muſt needs be ſo, or elſe that they would take therein a courſe themſelues. As for the Empreſſe his mother, they were contented that ſhe ſhould be confined vnto ſome place farther off, and no more to meddle in matters of State. A ſtrange thing it was, to ſee ſo great a Prince ſo to be forced by the ſedition and mutiny of his ſubiects, to deliuer ſo great an Officer of his Court as was the Capi-Aga, with ſuch others as they required, to be vſed at their diſcretion. But the violent reſolution of theſe moſt inſolent men ſo vp in mutiny, made the Sultan Mahomet wiſely to yeeld to what they demanded, cauſing the Capi-Aga and the others to be brought forth, who preſented themſelues vnto their fury as men already halfe dead. Mahomet did what he might K to haue ſaued them, but the mutiners with a great and dreadfull clamor ſtill cried out to haue them diſpatched; neither could they be appeaſed vntill they ſaw their heads ſtruck from their bodies. For the loſſe of whom ſo deer vnto him, Mahomet inwardly grieued, to be in ſome part reuenged, commanded the executioner to proceed, and to do vnto ſome other of the chiefe Baſſaes (whom he knew to be much loued and reſpected of the Ianizaries, and whom he could haue been content to haue been rid of) as he had done vnto the Capi-Agi and the reſt: but then the murmuring and mutiny of the Ianizaries was in ſuch ſort increaſed, and as it were redoubled, as that Mahomet was for feare forced with patience to temper his choler, and by giuing way, ſo to appeaſe them. The Empreſſe the Sultans mother for all that was not then confined, but reſerued to the further troubling of the State. L

Other bruelties of Sultan Mahomet.

With like tyrannie, and no leſſe injuſtice, Mahomet but a few dayes before had cauſed Capin one of his great Baſſaes to be beheaded; but whether it were for the deſire hee had of his wealth and riches, or for the enuy of his honour and valour, was vncertaine: howbeit the former cauſe ſeemed vnto many to be more probable, for that Mahomet immediatly after his death tooke the whole ſpoile of his wealth, and ſeiſed vpon all his goods except 400000 duckets, which Caly Baſſa father of the dead Baſſa had detained for himſelfe. Which his purloining Mahomet hauing diſcouered (as the eie of the couetous man is fixed alwayes vpon his prey) demanded one day of the Baſſa, If it were true that he had retained to himſelfe thoſe 400000 duckets. Which fact the Baſſa, partly for feare, and partly for couetouſneſſe conſtantly denied, and ſwore himſelfe to be guiltleſſe from any ſuch crime. Whereupon he was forthwith M taken, and thinking by lying to haue ſaued his life, was for the truth put to death, without any further examination of the matter, hauing his head ſtruck off. Such is the final aſſurance euen of the greateſt that liue in tyrants courts. Neither reſted his greedy mind ſo contented with

A the Baſſa's bloud; for why, that ſerued but for a ſhew, it was his wealth muſt work that cure, which was all forthwith ſeiſed vpon, rifled, and carried away, to ſatisfie in effect the greedy appetite of the hungry tyrant, who changed the dowry and ſucceſſion of the wife & children of the dead Baſſa, into bonds, chains, priſons, and ſlaueries.

Mahomet another Baſſa with theſe cruelties diſmaied, and perceiuing the like euill hap and danger to hang ouer his own head, that had ouerwhelmed Calil and his ſon; reſolued to haue prouided for himſelf againſt this miſchiefe, by flying vnto the Rebels in Aſia. But this his purpoſe diſcouered by certain ſpies (which ſerue as means to open a way vnto the Turks cruelty) and he with one of the chief followers of Capin Baſſa taken by the Ianizaries, were both by them cut in pieces.

The ſucces of the Rebels in Aſia.

B But whileſt theſe things thus paſſed at Conſtantinople, the Rebels with all diligence proſecuted their rebellion in Aſia, and bent their forces againſt the great towns there. Their army was exceeding great, euery man joining himſelfe vnto the firſt forces which were in good eſtate, being not as yet with any greater power oppreſſed, and rich with the ſpoiles that they had taken. Theſe men had beſieged Angore a great and ſtrong town in Aſia, and ſeemed reſolutely ſet down for the carrying therof. Wherof the citiſens being afraid, and out of hope of relief, came to parly, offering them a ſum of money to redeem themſelues and their city; and ſo in fine agreed to giue them 200000 ducats, vpon the ready payment wherof the rebels preſently departed.

Shortly after, the new Captaines of Sultan Mahomet arriued there alſo, whom he had placed C in the places of them whom he had before executed for the appeaſing of the ſouldiers of the Court, who would needs make it treaſon, and put to death the Citiſens for hauing giuen ſuch mony as is aforeſaid, vnto the rebels, though it were done for the preſeruation of their liues: as if lawes were to be reſpected in the horrors of neceſſity, or that life were to become a ſlaue vnto riches, and riches not made for the vſe of mans life. Well, needs they would for this ſuppoſed treaſon, as they pretended, haue put them to death, and ſacked their City. But indeed all was in their greedy fury to haue carried away that which the Rebels in their mercy had left them. Theſe poor citiſens with this ſo cruel a reſolution diſmaied, and out of all hope of finding fauour at ſuch mercileſſe mens hands, reſolued now to haſard all, and ſo vpon the ſudden taking vp arms, ſtood vpon their own defence. Herupon aroſe a great and cruel D fight betwixt theſe ſoldiers and the citiſens, both the ſubiects of one Prince, and all of them of one and the ſelf ſame ſuperſtition, but the one ſide armed with pride and couetouſneſſe, and the other with neceſſity and deſpair: howbeit at laſt the iuſter cauſe preuailing, the Citiſens ouercame theſe new come ſouldiers, and hauing ſlaine a great number of them, chaſed the reſt out of the City. This euil incounter of theſe few Captaines euen at the firſt entrance into their Charges, giuen them by the ſubiects themſelues, increaſed the Rebels courage, ſo that they being in number forty thouſand, vnder the leading of one of the Tartar Han his brethren, beſieged Butze a great and rich city, being the ſtorehouſe for the warlike prouiſions of Aſia, and the place whereunto the Turkes Cuſtomes, Taxes, and Subſidies of Aſia were brought, and there kept. Theſe men after certaine dayes beſtowed in the ſiege, and great re- E ſiſtance made by the beſieged, at length by force carried the place, ſlew the inhabitants, and ſacked the City. Which exploit gracing their fortune with honour and booty, increaſed alſo their power and reputation; ſo that redoubled on all ſides, and increaſed with courage and ſpoiles, Mahomet diſmaied, reſolued by fair means to appeaſe them, and to intreat with them of peace. This good fortune had drawne vnto their part the Gouernour of Babylon, either weary of the ſeruice of the Turke, or deſirous by the ruine of the State in general to increaſe his own power: whoſe reuolt greatly increaſed the Rebels power, and diminiſhed the Grand Seigniors. Beſides theſe miſhaps alſo, the great Shaugh of Perſia (commonly called the Sophy) thruſting himſelf into theſe diſorders, to make his gain, and to fiſh (as they ſay) in a troubled water, had now taken Corbery, a ſtrong towne vpon the borders of the Turkes Em- F pire, and was making himſelf ready for new conqueſts. All which tempeſts ariſing as it were in one together, cauſed Mahomet to ſtrike ſail, and mauger his Imperial dignity and honor, to ſeek for peace: which indeed could not be great in ſuch weakneſſe of his nature, neither braue in ſuch his great want of courage. For great dignities and honours without valour to maintaine them, are but like rich garments which couer bodies almoſt rotten, but heale them not.

Mahomet deſirous to come to ſome good agreement with his rebellious ſubiects; at length G (but not without his great diſhonor) obtained the ſame, granting all their demands, diſarming them by yeelding vnto them, and not by true valor: and giuing vnto Zellaly one of their chieftains the honorable place of Baſſa of Boſna, to content his ambition, and to binde him therewith to do his ſeruice. The ready way by ſufferance to increaſe the diſloyal ſubiects courage, in ſtead of ſtopping their proceedings by the ſeueritie of iuſtice: for to grace a rebel with offices of authoritie, is but to arm him with lawfull power, the better to vndertake whatſoeuer ſhall beſt fit his appetite and deſire, vpon the hope of his own priuat and certaine profit or aduancement.

Mahomet in danger to be depoſed.

Mahomet his other Captaines and men of War ſeeing this diſhonourable peace of their Prince, and preferment of the Rebels, rewarded with honours and dignities, in ſtead of paines H and puniſhments, which they ſhould of right haue for their rebellion endured; began to enter into great murmuring and diſcontentment againſt their great Sultan. They conſidered his vniuſt dealing and baſe fear, in aduancing the rebels vnto ſuch honors and preferments, as of right belonged vnto his moſt faithfull and loyall Officers and ſeruants; by ſuch vnworthy dignities making them ſlaues vnto his enemies, and vaſſals vnto the rebels: they, to their diſhonor and loſſe, by their inſolencie and treachery injoying the honours and preferments of right due vnto their faithfull and loyal ſeruices. Which dangerous perſuaſions tranſported them ſo far from their allegiance and duty, as to vndertake a greater and more perillous matter againſt his crown and dignity, than had the rebels before by taking vp of arms in the field againſt him; whereunto the aſſured knowledge they had of his cowardiſe incouraged them I alſo. So that their reſolution was to thruſt him out of his Imperiall ſtate, and to ſet vp his eldeſt ſonne called alſo Mahomet, in his place. Theſe are the inordinate effects of injuſtice and cowardiſe, the ouerthrow of Princes; their injuſtice through cruelty arming all creatures againſt them; and their cowardiſe through contempt diſpenſing with euery man for his duty: ſo that he muſt be juſt that will keepe his ſubjects in order; and valiant, that muſt hold them in awe.

Vnto theſe diſcontentments thoſe mutiniers joined alſo (as I ſaid) the ſloathfulneſſe, effeminacie, and inſufficiencie of Mahomet, vnfit to deal in matters of eſtate, and altogether vnable to manage wars. He was too cowardly (as they thought) to repreſſe their valour by force, and too weak to croſſe their deſignes by wiſdom: which not a little incouraged them in that their K ſo deſperate and dangerous a reſolution. They drew alſo into this their plot the Sultaneſſe Mahomets chief wife and the yong princes mother; who blinded with ambition (the bane of great ſpirits) had not the hap to reject their perſuaſions, as dangerous vnto her and her ſon, but ſhutting her eies againſt the due conſideration of loyaltie and duty, caſt both her ſelf and her ſon headlong into the midſt of moſt deſperat dangers.

This project (of no leſſe importance than of the depoſing of one of the greateſt monarchs of the world) reſolued vpon, ſome of theſe men, according to the maner of the Turks, joining ſuperſtition vnto their deſignes, conſulted with an Aſtrologer concerning the ſucceſſe of the actions of the young Prince, whom they were about to inſtall in his fathers Imperiall throne. This man to be excuſed in his trumperies, ſeeing that to deceiue is the chiefe point of his L Art, erected the figure of the Princes natiuity, conſulted with his ſpirits, conſidered the celeſtial bodies, and in fine arriued at the point of his iudgement, for the good and welfare of the Prince: And thereupon diſpatched an Eunuch towards the Sultanneſſe with theſe pleaſing ſpeeches, That ſhe ſhould be of good courage, and in aſſured hope that the yong Prince her ſonne within a few daies ſhould haue the Imperiall Crown ſet vpon his head, and the Royall Scepter put into his hand: his art (as he ſaid) promiſing vnto him theſe honors, by the fauor of the cœleſtial bodies, of whom he had learned theſe news; and by the conference with ſpirits, from whom he had this aſſurance. But ô the vaine and fooliſh knowledge of man againſt God! attributing vnto the ſecond cauſes that which altogether belongeth vnto his owne power; robbing him of his owne prouidence, which extendeth ouer all, to giue it vnto M Creatures, which neither haue their owne beeing, neither are able of themſelues to bring forth or to worke any effects at all without it! and that more is, to giue certaine credit vnto the enemy of all faith and beleefe, euen to the father of leaſing, who taketh as much glory in falſhood, as God himſelf doth in truth, as being the proper mark of his power. For it chanced Mahomet cauſeth his eldeſt ſon, with diuers others to be ſtrangled.

A ced that theſe letters ſent by the Eunuch to the Sultaneſſe, were intercepted and brought vnto Mahomet the great Sultan, whom they moſt concerned: whereupon it ſo fell out, that he which tooke vpon him to foretell the long-life and Empire to befall to another man, could not foreſee the end of his owne life, which followed him faſt, euen at the heeles, being himſelfe by the commandement of the great Sultan, with the yong Prince, the Eunuch, and fifty others of the conſpirators, and ſuch as were conſenting vnto the conſpiracy, moſt cruelly ſtrangled, and the Sultaneſſe her ſelfe drowned. Howbeit ſome report this yong Prince to haue bin ſtrangled vpon ſuſpition of conſpiring againſt his father, with the rebels of Aſia: which after his death being found not to be ſo, the Baſſa which put that ſuſpition in Mahomets head, to haue bin therefore worthily hanged. But with theſe contentments taken from B the croſſes of our enemies, let vs againe returne vnto Hungary.

The Polonian denies the Tartars paſſage through his country, into Hungary.

The laſt yeare ended with the great bruit of the comming of the Tartar Han, with a great army into Hungary; and now he had diſpatched his Embaſſadors towards the King of Polonia, to demand of him, tribute, and paſſage through his country. Great and proud demands to be, both at once required. But the King of Polonia requited him againe with the like, denying him both the one and the other, roughly anſwering of his threats. Which ſo reſolute and blunt a refuſall, cauſed the proud tyrant to change his intended courſe, and for feare of being defeated by the Polonians in paſſing through their country (as the Tartars had often beene) before he could come into Hungary, tooke another way, and turned with his Army toward Valachia. Of whoſe comming Radul the Vayuod vnderſtanding, and that beſide C the forraging of his country, they had a purpoſe to diſplace him, and to ſet vp another Vayuod in his ſtead; with great diligence gathered together the greateſt power that he could, and ſo marched vnto the borders of his country, there to attend the comming of theſe Tartars, and to ſtay them from entring. Which in effect fell out according to his deſire, for the barbarous people being arriued, and attempting with all their force to haue entred, were by this little army encountered; which commanding the country, tooke all the aduantages of the ſtreit paſſages, and there notably repulſed the fierce enemy. Two of the firſt encounters fell out fortunately vnto the Valachians, who therein ſlew about 3000 of the Tartars; whoſe auauntgard for all that ſtill came on, and at the third encounter ſo long maintained the fight, that their whole Army was now come in, and hardly charged the Valachians; whoſe forD tune ſurcharged, began then to change, the hardy being conſtrained to bow vnder the multitude, and valour forced to yeeld vnto number. Which was not done without a long and cruell fight, both armies encountering with great courage and fury, the one for the defence of their countrey, and the other for an entrance vnto their conqueſts. Howbeit the ſtrong enemy at length preuailed, and entring into Valachia, brought in with it ruine, death, and deſtruction.

Diuers hard cōflicts betwixt the Tartars, & The Valachians in their paſſage through Valachia.

The Tartars in Hungary.

The Tartars hauing by force thus opened themſelues a way through Valachia, and grieuouſly ſpoyled the countrey, were come with their army to Quinque Eccleſiæ, a towne in Hungary, to ioyne their forces with Haſſan Baſſa, now after his marriage returned into this country with a great army to continue his charge: who cauſed the Tartars to be muſtred in E his preſence, and found them to be forty thouſand ſtrong. Men of great courage againſt the weake, but meere cowards before the couragious: who in ſtead of aſſaulting the walls of any ſtrong towne, fell vpon the cottages of poore countrey villages, ranſacking and pilling the poore inhabitants, as well in the villages of the territories ſubiect vnto the Turks, as in the territories of the Chriſtians; conſtraining the poore people, contrary to their conſcience, and the prejudice of their faith, to ſweare to ſerue the Turke: beſides that, they enforced them to furniſh them with all warlike prouiſion and munition, which they put into Caniſia, but a while after that our men had defeated the Garriſon there. Neither were they ſo contented, all the neighbours being thereabouts ſubiect to this tempeſt: for they paſſed into Stiria with their families, and ouerrun a part of that Prouince, ſpoyling it of men, cattell, F and goods; leauing in ſtead of them, deſtruction, miſery, and death; and carried away with them two thouſand poore Chriſtians for ſlaues, whom they ſold vnto the Turks, and made great profit of them. From whence they went into the country of Shauery, embruing themſelues with the bloud of the Chriſtians, rifling their Villages, and after that burning them; carrying away with them a thouſand Chriſtian captiues into moſt miſerable bondage and ſlauery. Which cruell outrages afterward thruſt the valiant Colonell Collonits into the field, G againſt theſe barbarous people, to ſtay their incurſions, and to defeat them if he could.

This worthy Commander had but a few daies before, beene much troubled in appeaſing the French light horſemen in garriſon in the villages about Roqueſburg, riſen vp in mutiny for their pay: whoſe hot and moued ſpirits he by his wiſedome ſo calmed, as that they were content againe to be ſworne to the Emperor, and ſo joyned themſelues vnto the army of Collonitz, which was then 10000 good men ſtrong.

In the meane time, the Tartars greedy of prey, and ſtill ſeeking after booty, ranſackt and ſpoiled fiue and twenty countrey villages about Veradin; all which they afterward burned alſo, carrying away with them a great booty both of men and cattell, no man reſiſting them. H At which time other companies of them alſo inuading the County Serin his Iland as far as Rackenſpurge, made in it great ſpoile, as had their fellowes elſewhere, and beſide other booty, carried away with them two thouſand Chriſtian captiues. Theſe outrages of the Tartars armed the County on the one ſide, and Collonits on the other; who couragiouſly oppoſing themſelues againſt theſe barbarians, for a time ſtaied their incurſions, they not daring to abide the force of this little Army, ſufficient enough for the valour thereof, to haue ouerthrowne that of their enemies, for number dreadful. This made them to turne their courſe another way into Sclauonia, being in number fiue and thirty thouſand men, leauing nothing behind them there but death and deſolation, for the number of priſoners, and great booties which they carried from thence. Amongſt other their ſpoiles, it was their fortune by the way to meet I with ſix hundred of the Chriſtian ſouldiers, of whom not one eſcaped their hands, but were ſlaine euery mothers ſon. At length it ſo fortuned, that certaine of their troups in roaming abroad, fell into the danger of the County Serin, who with his followers ſtill houered aloofe off, for feare to be of their great multitude ouerwhelmed: a part whereof now falling into his hands, were by his ſoldiers ouerthrowne and all cut in pieces, and a number of Chriſtian captiues by them taken, deliuered out of chaines and ſet at liberty. Which exploit was greater for the feare it brought vpon the enemy, than for the ſlaughter there made. For the Tartars, ſtill in doubt to meet againe with the Chriſtian troups (who left not one of them aliue that they could light on) were glad now to keepe themſelues cloſer together, and ſo did a great deale the leſſe harme than when they without feare roamed vp and downe at their pleaſure: K ſo that euen by this little victory the Country receiued ſome comfort, and the Earle greater honour; Small helps being infinite treaſures in time of neceſſity, which out of it would not be to be reckoned of.

The Tartars oppreſſed by county Serin.

The garriſon ſouldiers of Caniſia, of late defeated by Collonitz in going to meet the Conuoy comming towards them with victuals, (as is before declared) the reſt of the garriſon deſirous to be reuenged, were conſulting of the meanes how to bring the ſame to paſſe. It fortuned that at the ſame time there was a fugitiue Chriſtian ſouldier in the towne, who made ſhew of a man male-content, deſirous to turne Turke: of whom the Turks made much reckoning, for that he ſeemed to know much of the deſignes of the Chriſtians, and the meanes how to croſſe them. Whereof he ſo aſſured them, as if the matter had beene now already L done; promiſing to bring them euen into the middeſt of the Chriſtian campe, and to deliuer it into their hands and power. Howbeit his meaning was nothing leſſe; for ſeeing the Turks much buſied with carrying in of victuals into the Caſtle, brought into the Towne after the ouerthrow of their fellowes before ſent forth for the bringing in thereof, and wholly intentiue to that buſineſſe; knowing the place in the Caſtle where the pouder and munition lay, he at the ſame time by a traine layd fire thereunto, and afterward, amiddeſt the tumult and the ſtirre, by a loope hole in the wall, got himſelfe out of the Towne, and came vnto Collonitz, who with his troups lay neere there by in ambuſh, expecting the opportunity to performe ſome notable exploit vpon the ſucceſſe of ſo dangerous an aduenture, whereunto he had before beene made priuy. Neither fayled the fire any thing of the accuſtomed violence M thereof, but ſeemed rather to redouble the ſame, it had ſo ſuddenly conſumed the Buildings, Munitions, and Perſons. All the place felt the fury thereof; the Cannons, Cannoniers, Souldiers, and whatſoeuer elſe, was ſubject vnto this dreadfull blaſt: all was ſhaken

and

A and turned vpſide downe, yea, the fire burſt out of the caſtle, and burnt the greateſt part of the towne alſo. There was a confuſion of feare, miſhap and miſery together, the terror whereof cauſed many of the Turks to caſt themſelues ouer the walls, in hope ſo to ſaue their liues: but whileſt they thought ſo to haue eſcaped the danger of the fire, they preſently fell vpon the edge of the ſword: for meeting with the ſouldiers of Collonitz (who lying in ambuſh neere thereby, awaited the opportunity in that ſo confuſed a tumult, to haue ſeiſed vpon the place) they were all either taken priſoners or ſlaine. But ſee the hap, how one croſſe chance of fortune ouerthrew this ſo notable a deſigne, as had it beene well followed, might in one moment haue recouered that ſtrong place, which had before for the ſpace of many daies endured the greateſt forces of the Othoman Emperour, neither yet was then ſo loſt, but through B the infamous treachery of our men.

A faire opportunity for the recouery of Caniſa ouerſlipped through the diſloyalty of the French & Wallons.

You haue heard before, how that Collonitz had by faire perſuaſions, rather than by true effects, appeaſed the French men and Wallons, vp in mutiny for their pay; ſo that by him perſuaded, they had againe giuen their oath of fidelity vnto the Emperour, and to follow his Army. But now when occaſion ſerued, and held out as it were both her armes vnto the Chriſtians, for the regaining and conqueſt of Caniſa, theſe French men and Wallons, the greateſt part of Collonitz his ſtrength, iniuriouſly refuſed her ſo faire an offer; and at ſuch time as they ſhould rather haue fought naked, than haue failed in their duty, (it being to haue gained a moſt great and rich conqueſt) for want of pay (as they pretended) turned their backes, and beeing by no entreaty or perſwaſions to be mooued, to the diſcouragement of C the reſt, who were better minded, and their owne eternall infamy, withdrew themſelues from the Army. So that Collonitz rather by the wicked vnfaithfulneſſe of his owne diſloyall ſoldiers, than by the valour of his enemies, diſappointed of his purpoſe, was to his great diſcontentment, contrary to that hee hoped, enforced to retyre without any thing more doing.

While this exploit, ſo well begun, but euill performed, was in hand, the Turks and Tartars aſſembled together, made a cruell ſpoile in the country about Rab, euen almoſt vnto the gates of the Towne, carrying away with them a great number both of men and beaſts. In fine, it chanced that the Huſſars of the Lord Nadaſti came that way, who vnderſtanding what had happened, with all ſpeed made after theſe Robbers, ouertooke them in their retreat neer vnto D Alba Regalis, ſlew a great number of them, and inforced the reſt to leaue a great part of their prey behinde them. With which booty recouered euen out of the Lyons mouth, they returned to Rab; of whom the poore inhabitants and country people, with teares ſtanding in their eies, requeſted to haue againe their owne goods. But War, the enemy of Charity, and nurſe of barbarous Cruelty, had ſo hardened the hearts of theſe men of War, as that they were not to be moued to reſtore them their cattell againe, but that they muſt redeeme them for preſent mony, which they did, and ſo receiued them.

Now the noble Collonitz ſeeing himſelfe ſo ſhamefully forſaken of his owne Souldiers, and diſappointed of his purpoſe, and the Turks and Tartars in great numbers comming to the reliefe and repairing of this ſo ſore ſhaken towne; and out of hope to do any good there- E on, full of griefe and indignation returned towards Comara. And howbeit that euill hap had cruelly fruſtrated the glory of his enterpriſe, yet the Heauens, in deſpight of Fortunes frowne, left not this noble and valiant Captaine altogether without honour, but as amorous of his vertues and valour, preſented vnto him in this Winter of Fortunes diſpleaſure, ſome trophies of glory. For vpon the way as he was returning home he met with 2000 Turkes, whom after ſome ſmall reſiſtance he cut all in pieces; miſerable ſacrifices, appointed vnto the fury of his wrath. In this fight their enſignes were all taken, and a number of priſoners, the chiefe of whom, together with the Enſignes, he ſent to Prague, as a Preſent for the Emperor, and a token of his good ſeruice.

2000 Turks defeated by Collonitz.

The report then was, That the Turks and Tartars with their vnited forces had forraged F Sclauonia, taken diuers ſtrong holds, burnt a number of villages, and carried away eight thouſand Chriſtian priſoners, beſide a great number more ſlaine with the ſword, or conſumed with fire, and all the Cattell of the Country driuen away: and that being with this booty to come to Quinque Eccleſiæ, they had there receiued command with Mahomet Baſſa, to beſiege Comara, and that all the Commanders of the Turks army were thereupon reſolued. All which reports no whit diſmaied the valiant Collonitz, or any thing altered his deſignes; but hauing fortified Comara againſt the intended ſiege of the Turks, and taken from thence foure culuerins, according to a former purpoſe by himſelfe intended, reſolued now to take from the Turks the Caſtles of Loqua and Boulonmenia, the garriſons whereof greatly annoyed the territories of the Chriſtians, and hindered the deſignes of this great Captaine. Theſe two Caſtles are ſcituate vpon a great mariſh which ſeparateth Hungary from Raſcia, and are therefore as bounders of Hungary, and ſtrong enough to be defended againſt a ſmall army. G

The Caſtle of Loqua beſieged by Collonitz.

Vpon which reſolution he ſet forward with his ſmall and valiant power, and the fourth day arriued within the ſight of Loqua, a Caſtle well manned: and furniſhed with all things neceſſary for the defence thereof. The army lodged, Collonitz with a drum ſummoned the beſieged to yeeld vp the place, with promiſes of courteſie if they ſhould now accept of the ſame whileſt it was offered them: Which they ſtoutly refuſed to do, ſwearing to the contrary, That they would die and liue within thoſe their walls. Collonitz ſeeing them ſo reſolued, firſt cauſed a mill to be aſſaulted, which placed ouer againſt the caſtle, and well fortified, ſerued in ſtead of a bulwarke, and ſeemed hard to bee taken: howbeit his men, loth to haue their good fortune euen in the beginning checked, gaue thereunto ſo braue an aſſault, that after the enemy had done what he could for the defence thereof, they became maſters of the place, carried it, and therein lodged: but finding it dangerous to be kept, and to ſtand them in ſmall ſtead, they ſet it on fire, and afterward planted foure Culuerins in battery before the Caſtle. But as they were thus buſied, the Turks couragiouſly ſallied out vpon them, not doubting to aduenture themſelues, for the hope they had to be in ſhort time by their great Army relieued. In this army they met afront with the Haiducks, whom they fiercely charged, and ſo gauled them, that hauing ſlaine thirty of them, they retired without any loſſe; forthwith diſcharging ſo many thundring ſhot and arrowes vpon our men, as that they well knew not how to ſaue themſelues from the danger of them, in ſuch ſort, that all the waies to approch the place being ſtopped, they began to deuiſe how to ſet the caſtle on fire: Which they by certain fire workes attempted, but to ſmall purpoſe, the fire being no ſooner kindled, but that it was forthwith by the Turks quenched. This done and our men diſappointed of their hope, they deuiſed to ſet fire vpon the timber which joyned the paliſado to the Caſtle ſtretching toward the port. Which their attempt ſorted but to ſmall effect alſo, the fire burning but ſlowly to do the enemies any great harme. All which deuiſes failing, they reſolued by plaine force to aſſault the Caſtle, and to ſcale the ſame: which enterpriſe reſolued vpon, the Haiduckes carrying before them certaine ſtrong and thicke plankes of wood, in ſtead of targuets, to defend them from the ſmall ſhot and arrowes of their enemies; by this deuice gained the paliſado placed vpon the ditch: and being there in ſome ſafety, with their muskets and harquebuſies ſo applied the beſieged, that they draue them from their curtaines, and made that they durſt no more ſhew themſelues vpon the walls. And immediately after, two companies of the Haiduckes placed ten ladders againſt one of the towers of the Caſtle, and ſo with their Enſignes in their hands couragiouſly mounted the ladders, in hope to haue gained the place: but the Turks as men reſolued to liue and die in their Caſtle, valiantly repulſed thoſe Haiduckes, and by force drew in vnto them from off the ladders, the two Enſignebearers of the Haiducks, whoſe heads they cut off, and caſt them downe vnto their fellowes, which were yet comming vp the ladders; and the two Enſignes ſo gained vpon the walls, they placed in the middeſt of their owne, as the trophies of the ſpoyles of them who would haue ſpoyled them. With which ſo great courage of the enemies, and death of their fellowes, our men not a little diſmaied, kept themſelues cloſe at the foot of the wall, as afraid any further to force the place, which to their loſſe they ſaw ſtored with ſuch valiant men to defend it. M

Notable reſiſtance made by the beſieged Turks.

Collonitz perceiuing this diſcomfiture of theſe men, and well aſſured that the caſtle was not but by valour to be won, immediatly drew out of euery company of the County Ringraue, certaine

A certaine of the beſt and moſt reſolute Souldiers to renew the aſſault: Which ſo honourable a charge they cheerefully vndertooke, and as men of courage, began forthwith to mount the ladders. Which the Haiduckes beholding, againe tooke courage, and partly aſhamed of themſelues, and partly to bee pertakers of the ſpoile and prey, if they ſhould preuaile, did what they might for the winning of the place, ſtriuing now who ſhould do beſt. Which aſſault was with ſuch fury and preſſe of men maintained, that the Turkes not able longer to withſtand ſo great forces, were conſtrained to yeeld both themſelues and their Caſtle vnto the fury of their angry enemies. Which caſtle indeed coſt much Chriſtian bloud, but yet more of the Turks: for the Haiduckes armed with rage and reuenge, ſlew almoſt all in the caſtle, as well Raſcians as Turkes, and tooke the reſt priſoners. Amongſt others there was an B Hungarian renegate there taken, whom for haſte they beheaded, beeing not at leiſure to empaile him, the ordinary puniſhment of ſuch faithleſſe miſcreants. But during this ſpoile made by men chafed with fury, the winde and fire were on their part exerciſing of their rage alſo. For the fire which they had caſt vpon the paliſado, and which they had before neglected, as of little or no force, now increaſed with the wind, by little and little getting hold of one thing after another, hauing burnt the paliſado, got hold of the caſtle alſo; whereunto the Souldiers (loaded with prey and booty, the things they moſt deſired) had no regard at all: ſo that the fire vtterly conſumed the Caſtle, with whatſoeuer elſe had eſcaped their greedy hands.

The Caſtle of Loqua by the Chriſtians, taken and ſacked.

The Turks in garriſon at Boulouuenar (a fortreſſe but a league diſtant from this burnt Caſtle) C ſeeing theſe flames of fire, and doubting what might betide themſelues, began to conſult what courſe were beſt for them to take, as either to attend the comming of the enemy, and ſo to abide the chance of warre, or elſe betimes to prouide for themſelues by flight: the conſideration of their honour and duty perſuaded them to ſtay, but the ruine of their neighbours as ſtrong and valiant as themſelues, perſuaded them otherwiſe. In fine, the care of the preſeruation of their liues preuailed, and the reſolution was, That they ſhould fly. And ſo putting all their houſhold-ſtuffe and goods into certaine boats there ready vpon the Lake, they by the middeſt thereof fled: fooliſhly perſuading themſelues, That our men comming thither, and finding nothing more, would not long there ſtay, but be gone; after whoſe departure they might as they thought returne againe vnto their old dwellings, and in the meane D time hide themſelues in the mariſh, vntill that the enemy were paſt. But our men comming thither, and finding no man in the Caſtle, neither yet any thing elſe that could well be carried away, wondered to ſee that there were any men ſo cowardly; as for feare to abandon ſuch a place, as for the ſtrength thereof might haue beene an example for others to ſtand vpon their guard and defence, they ſought out euery corner thereabout, to finde out whither the Turks were fled. At laſt after much diligent ſearch, they found certaine boats which the Turks had ſunke in the channell neere vnto the Caſtle gate, which cauſed them to thinke that they were fled by water, and happely were in ſome place not far off. Theſe boats were forthwith drawne vp out of the water, and found furniſhed with oares and ſuch other things as belonged vnto them. Which done, Collonitz choſe out certaine of the moſt valiant and reſolute of the Haiduckes, E whom he commanded in thoſe boats to follow after the Turks in the Lake. Who accuſtomed to ſuch exploits, and not ignorant of the places and ſecrets of their Countrey, went aboord, and did as they were commanded. Neither had they gone paſt two leagues vpon the Lake, but that they diſcouered a party of theſe fugitiues hid in a little Iſland, awaiting the end of this tempeſt, to recouer againe that which they had forſaken. The Turks diſmaied with the ſight of theſe men, and forced by neceſſity to ſtand vpon their guard, welcommed them with certaine little faulcon ſhot which they brought with them in their boats, thinking to haue hindered them from landing. But they were too well acquainted with ſuch muſicke, to be moued therewith: beſides that, the deſire of the booty, which was by the Turks brought out of the Caſtle into the Iſle, exceedingly animated them for the gaining thereof; ſo that F all feare of danger ſet apart, they landed in the Iſle. Whom ſo landing, the Turks with great courage receiued; ſo that betwixt them was fought a greater fight than is for ſo ſmall a number on both ſides to bee beleeued, onely valour and not number holding the ballance of the victory. But in the end, the chiefe of the Turks, and he which was their Gouernour in Boulouener, ſlaine, the reſt diſcouraged came to parley, yeelding themſelues with their wiues and children, and all that they had, as a prey vnto the victors. The priſoners were brought backe againe vnto the Caſtle, vntill the next day, that our men hauing put a good and ſtrong garriſon of foure hundred Haiduckes, and two hundred Huſſars into Boulowenar, with their priſoners, and their booty, returned toward Comara: where they, notwithſtanding diuers reports of the aſſembly of the Turkes garriſons for the ſuppreſſing of them vpon the way, in ſafety arriued, with a rich booty, and a number of waggons loaded with the ſpoiles of their enemies. The Emperor had for his part thirteene enſignes, beſide the places won; which being nigh vnto Caniſia, much bridled the ſpoilings and incurſions of that garriſon.

Moyſes by Baſta ouerthrown flyeth vnto his ſtrong caſtle of Solomoſe.

But leauing theſe endleſſe troubles of Hungary for a while, let vs now againe looke into Tranſyluania, to ſee what they there do. Moyſes the Rebell by Baſta the Emperors Lieutenant (as we haue before ſaid) ouerthrowne, and diſappointed of his hope, betooke himſelfe vnto a ſtrong caſtle of his owne, called Solomoſe, there in feare attending the finall ſucceſſe of his affaires. Baſta in the meane time being as wiſe to make vſe of his victory, as he was valiant to obtaine the ſame, ſubdued the reſt of the country, repreſſed the Rebels, ſtopped the way of ſedition, and put Moyſes in diſpaire of all ſafety. Who ſeeing himſelfe brought vnto ſuch extremity offered to yeeld his Caſtle vnto the Turks, and ſo without farther acquainting of any man with his purpoſe, thruſt himſelfe with his wife and family, and all the reſt of his ſubſtance into Temeſware, a ſtrong City of the Turks not far off: whom the Baſſa in ſhew moſt courteouſly receiued, and the rather, for that he was in good hope to make a prey of the great wealth of this new-come fugitiue: who had not there long ſtaied, but that he had perſuaded the captaine of Givaſger, a ſtrong frontier Caſtle there by, to deliuer the ſame to the Turks, and that without the priuity of the garriſon ſouldiers, for that hee doubted that they would hardly be thereunto drawne: who yet getting knowledge thereof, put their captain in remembrance of his duty, beſeeching him not to draw ſuch an infamy both vpon himſelfe and them, by committing ſo foule a fact. But afterward finding him reſolutely ſet downe for the betraying of the Caſtle, they ſuddenly laid hands vpon him, and ſtrucke off his head; and ſo with the bloud of their traiterous captaine, hauing auerted the eminent danger, with great honour held the place.

He with his wife and family flyeth vnto the Turks.

Moyſes now as he thought in ſafety at Temeſwar, was yet ſtill plotting how to trouble the ſtate of Tranſyluania, and raiſe new ſtirs therein; and to that end ſent a number of ſpies with letters of credence vnto the principall men of that country, aſſuring them of great and ſufficient aid from the great Turke, if they would but take vp armes for their liberty (as he termed it) and ſhew himſelfe in field againſt the Imperials. Neither was Baſta in the meane time careleſſe of him, or negligent in his ſo weighty affaires; but knowing that he as a notorious Rebell had yeelded his caſtle vnto the Turks, and was himſelfe retired vnto Temeſware, forthwith made choice of ſix thouſand of the beſt ſouldiers in his whole army, and ſo ſetting forward to beſiege it: whom at his arriuall the Turks there in garriſon derided, in hope to fruſtrate his deſignes. For why? They thought that their Caſtle ſeated vpon a ſteepe high hill, fortified with good and ſtrong wals, enuironed with a broad and deepe ditch, and not ſubject vnto battery, could not but with much labor, great danger, and long time, be gained out of their hands, it being impoſſible (as they ſuppoſed) for their enemies to make a breach, or finde an entrance thereinto. And indeed our men ſeeing the ſtrength of the place, and the difficulty to force it, ſtood at the firſt as men diſmaied at the foot of the hill where the Caſtle ſtood; yet more diſcouraged with the impregnableneſſe of the place, than with the valour of the defendants. But what cannot induſtry and valor do? in ſeeking about to find ſome meanes to make ſhew of their courage and valour, they diſcouered a little ſharpe ſteepe hill ouer againſt the caſtle, from the top wherof the caſtle was to be battered, and the beſieged diſtreſſed: but to bring the cannon thither & eſpecially with horſes, was impoſſible, by reaſon of the ſteep roughneſſe of the aſcent therunto, with broken and hanging rocks, ouergrowne with trees and buſhes, as if it had bin another Alps, not but with fire and vineger to be opened; yet in fine, our men reſoluing to gaine the place, did themſelues that which their horſes ſhould haue done but could not, and by force of hand drew their cannon vp to the top of the hill, and hauing planted it ouer againſt the midſt of their enemies great ordnance, began to batter the caſtle: which done, they day and night made their approches, fortified their forts and trenches, brought on their warlike munition, and put all things in ſuch order, as if they would

A euen by plaine force haue carried the place. But the Turks more admiring the valorous reſolution of our men, than reſoluing themſelues vpon their reſiſtance, being not many in number within the place, and ſeeing themſelues to haue to do with men of inuincible courage, laying aſide both their hope and weapons, craued to come to parley. Which granted, it was at length agreed, That they ſhould deliuer vp the Caſtle, leauing behinde them their great ordnance, their munition and enſignes, and ſo with their armes and liues onely ſaued, to depart. A great and glorious conqueſt got with ſmall charge; only by reſolution gained by our men without perill: thoſe being indeed the true victories, which neither draw bloud out of the veines, nor teares out of the eies.

The caſtle of Solomoſe yeelded to Baſta.

This ſtrong place ſo gained, contrary to the common opinion conceiued thereof, led the B whole prouince as it were by the hand vnto the obeiſance of the Emperour: in ſuch ſort, that Baſta hauing called together all the principall men of Tranſyluania, declared vnto them the iuſtice of his cauſe, the right of the Emperour, with the malice and trechery of the Turks and rebels: how they might liue in aſſurance with the one, and become miſerable with the others: That the Emperour was alwaies armed for their defence and health, deſiring nothing but their welfare and preſeruation; whereas their enemies to the contrary ſought altogether their ruine and decay; That as they were not to expect light flames of fire out of the ſea, no more they were to looke for aid from thoſe their mortall enemies, whom they knew to haue before decreed to haue put them all to death, and to haue giuen their country vnto the Tartars their enemies: That this diſaſter had not now beene to fall vpon them, either euer haue beene by C them perceiued, without the aid of the Emperour; who oppoſing himſelfe againſt this fire, had quenched it and put it out; preſeruing them with his great charge, and ſauing them euen in the middeſt of their greateſt perils and dangers. That they ſhould therefore remember theſe his ſo great benefits, to the intent to make him recompence according to the publique faith, which bindeth vs to the reward of good deſerts: and that all the recompence that the Emperour deſired, was the welfare of the eſtate, as concerning their owne good: inſomuch, that hee deſired nothing of them but their obeyſance, for being bound to defend them and preſerue them to his power: whereby it ſhould come to paſſe, that he ſhould be ſatiſfied for his trauels, and they preſerued from their enemies; the Prince and the ſubiects together iointly working their mutuall health and welfare, each of them according vnto their proportion, D for that this mutuall performance of duty preſerued the ſcepter for the good gouernment of their eſtate. Whereunto their anſwer was, That they beſought him that their country might be relieued from the croud and cruelty of the men of war, and deliuered from the intollerable burthen of tributes, which ſo heauily oppreſſed it: that theſe obiects and inconueniences could not keepe them conſtant in their obedience, ſeeing that they both felt them, and receiued them from the hand of them, to whom they had yeelded their obedience, in hope to haue beene by them relieued: That the new feeling of the wound did continually renew in them the hatred, and the obiect of their armes ſtill kept both their eies and their minds occupied vpon them who were the cauſes thereof; ſo that they could not well either looke vpon them or make reckoning of them: That therefore it would pleaſe him to eaſe them of their grieuances, E in recompence whereof they would pay him 15000 Hungarian duckats yearely for to pay his men of war, and would farther furniſh them with all prouiſions neceſſary: it being a thing more honourable and profitable alſo vnto a Prince, moderately to vſe his ſubiects meanes to keepe his ſtate in perpetuity, than through couetouſneſſe to deuoure them in one day, in their loſſe to vndoe himſelfe for euer. This their offer was by Baſta accepted, and the minds of theſe people by this contentment giuen them, kept in their dutifull allegiance and loyalty vnto the Emperour.

Baſta his admonition to them of Tranſyluania

The anſwere of the Tranſyluanians vnto the admonitions of Baſta.

But whileſt Baſta thus trauelled for the quieting of Tranſyluania, Moyſes the rebell in the meane time was for his part no leſſe buſied for the diſturbing thereof againe; inſomuch, that hauing by the appointment of the Viſier Baſſa receiued ten thouſand Tartars in his aid, and F aſſiſted with a great number of Turks, he with enſignes diſplaied, entred into Tranſyluania, proteſting there to die or to be reuenged of Baſta, who had before chaſed him out thence. And the better to effect this troubleſome deſigne, he now had made choice of a moſt fit time for the performance thereof. Baſta vpon the truſt hee had of the publique faith which he came to take of the Tranſyluanians, for their allegiance vnto the Emperor, which aſſured him from G all ſtirs and tumults in that prouince, being with a ſmall power come from Claudiopolis in Hungary, and then lying at Wiſcebourg, vpon the confines of Hungary. Which his iourney, and the neceſſity of his preſence in Hungary for the defence thereof, had cauſed the Tranſyluanians to beleeue, that hee ſhould for that yeare ſtay in Hungary as Generall of the Emperours army there. Vpon which perſuaſion of his abſence many of them began againe to hold vp their heads, and to entertaine high conceits of new ſtirs, whereunto Moyſes by his eſpials had prepared them, and now by his preſence not a little diſcouraged; inſomuch that many as well of the nobility as others, joyned themſelues to him, and increaſed his army againſt the Imperials.

Moyſes with his power being come into the Prouince, firſt forced a Caſtle, about three H leagues diſtant from Wiſcebourg, and ſlew all the garriſon therein. Which exploit encouraged him farther, full of hope in the abſence of Baſta, and ſeeing himſelfe now the abſolute maſter of the field, which hee at his pleaſure without reſiſtance forraged, robbed, and ſpoiled, with his men looded with booty, beſieged Viſcebourg, a little towne of vpon the confine of Hungary and Tranſyluania, neither by art nor by nature ſtrong, but expoſed as a prey vnto him that is in the field ſtrongeſt, if ſuccours be not at hand to relieue it. Howbeit weake as it was, it held out three weekes ſiege, and hauing a breach made in the walls endured two aſſaults againſt all the forces of the Rebell. After which the beſieged thinking themſelues to haue ſufficiently diſcharged their duty, in holding out ſo long, and induring of ſo much, and out of hope to be relieued by the weake forces of Baſta, came to parley with the enemy; I and their liues and goods ſaued, yeelded vnto him the towne, and ſo departed themſelues to Varadin.

Wiſcebourg beſieged by Moyſes.

Wiſcebourg yeelded to Moyſes.

Now albeit that there were no great forces of the Emperours on foot in Tranſyluania, yet the hungry Haiduckes for all that failed not to follow theſe warres, euen amidſt the great clouds of their enemies, and were euer taking of ſome prey or booty from the enemy, the chieſeſt and almoſt the only meanes whereby they liue. In which doing, as they benefited themſelues (the chieſe Motiues of their aduentures) ſo they not a little eaſed the country, by repreſſing the excurſions and pillages of the Turks, whereof the countrey had endured the fury. Where, amongſt other priſoners by them taken, it was their fortune to light vpon a Chiaus of the Turkes come from Conſtantinople, going toward the Rebell Moyſes from the great K Sultan Mahomet. Who by them examined, confeſſed, That Moyſes was a man in great grace and reputation with his Lord and Maſter the Grand Seignior: And that he was ſent to aſſure him thereof; as alſo of all the needfull aſſiſtance of his Prince, if hee ſhould faithfully and effectually ſerue him in Tranſyluania, and bring it vnder his ſubjection and power, as he had promiſed and ſworne. In which doing, he ſhould not onely gaine the credit of a noble and faithfull ſeruant towards him, but ſhould farther obtaine thereby the honour to bee the Lieutenant Generall of his army in this Prouince; the Great Sultan (as hee ſaid) hauing meanes as eaſie as words to aduance his faithfull ſeruitours, who might draw more good fortunes in one houre out of this infinite ſource of felicity and greatneſſe, than they could in a thouſand yeares out of the pouerty of the Princes of Europe. He ſaid alſo, That the Great L Sultan had on foot an army of a hundred and fifty thouſand men ſtrong, for the conqueſt of Peſth, and Strigonium, furniſhed with all things neceſſary, which had now already turned head towards Hungary, had it not beene for the rebellion of ſome of his diſloyall ſubjects, whom for all that hee would in ſhort time chaſtiſe, and ſo turne his whole forces vpon the Emperor.

Moyſes in great fauour with Mahomet.

Moyſes proud of his late conqueſt, and hauing found a great deale of great Ordnance in Wiſcebourg, reſolued to proſecute his victory, and to beſiege Baſta in Somoſinnar, whereinto he had thruſt himſelfe, with the reſt of his ſmall forces; But Baſta better acquainted with martiall affaires than he, and knowing that a Generall departed from his charge, and brought to the mercy of a Wall for his chiefe defence, hath loſt his credit and reputation with his M friends, and they alſo in hope of ſafety from him thought it beſt firſt to take order for the ſtrengthening of the place, ſo to put Moyſes out of hope of the winning thereof, and afterward as he might to prouide for the ſafety of himſelfe and his. Wherefore he in good time

A generall beſieged, looſeth his reputation.

A aduertiſed the Gouernour of Caſſoua (who was neereſt vnto him) of Moyſes his deſignes, and of the neceſſity wherewith he was himſelfe encloſed. Who forthwith conceiuing the conſequence of ſo great an exploit, as concerned both the loſſe of the place, and of ſo great a commander as was Baſta, a loſſe irreparable; preſently commanded ſix companies of horſemen to thruſt themſelues into the place, for the better defence thereof. Theſe horſemen either afraid of the Rebels army, or elſe fauouring his proceedings, without reſpect of that they had in charge, or of their honour (things deerer vnto men of worth than their liues) without any attempt at all giuen, returned againe to Caſſoua, hauing with their pilfering and outrages by the way much offended and prouoked the minds of the country people by them ſpoyled. But being now better aduiſed, and repenting themſelues of their faults, and B crauing pardon of their gouernor, who was about with the reſt of his power to haue cut them in pieces, they offred him for ſatisfaction, ſix of the principal authors of their diſloyalty; who were all forthwith executed, and their quarters (to the terrour of others) hanged vp vpon Gibbets by the high way ſide. But Baſta by their treachery lay in the meane time without ſuccour, forſaken by his friends, and the place wherein he lay, in danger to be taken: when the Tranſyluanians dwelling neere thereby reſolued to relieue him, as well for feare of the Turks bondage, as for the tyranny of Moyſes; one of whoſe ſecretaries with letters of credence then threatned all the country with fire and ſword, and all kinde of miſeries, if the inhabitants helped not with all their power to force the place and to win it. Which threats by Moyſes publiſhed before he had any abſolute power, diſmaied euery man: for why, they could C not hope for any moderation or kindeneſſe in the proſperity of him, who in the time of his aduerſity gaue ſuch apparant teſtimonies of his cruelty. So that the people, doubting this angry man, reſolued to preuent his ſo grieuous threats by relieuing of Baſta, who only was able to ſtop him. Amongſt others, Radul Vayuod of Valachia, mindefull of the aid that Baſta had giuen him againſt the Tartars; and willing now as a friend to reach his hand in time of his ſo hard diſtreſſe, immediately raiſed a power of eight thouſand Valachians, which he preſently ſent to the reliefe of Baſta. Moyſes aduertiſed of their comming, and farther vnderſtanding that Baſta hauing well fortified the place, was departed thence, hauing before his departure aſſuredly promiſed his men there left to relieue them, and that he was now in the midſt of the field gathering together his army, changing both his reſolution and purpoſe, of himſelf D raiſed his ſiege, and ſo departed. After which, miſhaps began to fall vpon him by heaps.
The Turks forthwith forſooke him, taking their way to Temeſwar, whither they were by the Baſſa called backe, to repreſſe the Haiduckes, who were now euery day euen at the gates of the city. Theſe actiue and couragious men for their profit attending vpon all occaſions, knowing that the better part of the garriſon of Temeſwar was gone to aid Moyſes, vpon the ſudden had deſperatly aſſailed the ſuburbs of that ſtrong city, ſlaine all they found there, rifled them and burnt them: and ſo loaded with a great and rich prey both of cattell and other things, returned to Veradin, no man purſuing of them: And not ſo contented, were euery day abroad ſeeking after new booty; which was the cauſe that the Baſſa now called backe the Turks from Moyſes againe into their garriſons.

The Vayuod of Valachia ſendeth aid to the reliefe of Baſta.

Moyſes raiſeth his ſiege.

The Baſſa of Temeſwar calleth home his Turks out of Tranſyluania, for the repreſſing of the Haiduckes.

E Moyſes notwithſtanding this departure of the garriſon Turks of Temeſwar, was yet maſter of the field, Baſta with his ſmall forces not daring to oppoſe himſelfe againſt him, yet by far too ſtrong for him, the ſuccours from the Vayuod of Valachia being not yet come, which he dayly expected, howbeit that many hot skirmiſhes paſſed betweene the ſtragling ſouldiers on both ſides, as they by chance met together roaming abroad in the country ſeeking after booty. Moyſes ſeeing therefore not any ſufficient enemy to appeare in field able to ſtay him, laid ſiege to Claudinople, a great, but weake city, and not very well manned, for that it was thought a place fitter by the weakeneſſe thereof to weaken and deſtroy ſuch as ſhould vndertake the defence thereof, than ſufficient to be maintained by their valour. Neuertheleſſe, the garriſon ſouldiers and the inhabitants (more to make a ſhew of their fidelity F and allegiance toward the Emperor, than for any hope they had to maintaine the place) ſtanding vpon their gard and defence, Moyſes was conſtrained to plant his great ordnance againſt it, and to batter it: which he did, and in a very ſhort time with the fury of the cannon had beaten downe the bulwarkes and flankers thereof, and made a faire breach in the wall, ready now to haue giuen thereunto an aſſault, and to haue entred. Whereupon the beſieged not, ignorant of their owne weakeneſſe, came to parley, and agreed to giue vp the city, the citiſens hauing their liues, goods liberty, and religion ſaued, to ſtay there ſtill, and the ſouldiers with their armes and baggage to be in ſafety brought ouer the mountaines into ſome place of ſurety. The taking of this city much encouraged the rebell, reſolued there to make his reſiſtance, and the ſeat of his principality. Full eares of corne draw birds to pecke vpon them, and the good fortunes of Generals, ſouldiers to follow them: they forſake none but ſuch as are before forſaken of their better fortunes; to become ſlaues vnto gaine, and enemies vnto honour. The Turks and Tartars thirſting after theſe commodities, and allured with the ſmell of riches, repaired thither on euery ſide; in ſuch ſort, that the army of Moyſes increaſed in number, his mind with hope, and his fortune with power. Armed with theſe aſſurances, he ſent for his wife and family then at Temeſwar, to come vnto him to Claudiople, to be partakers with him of his good hap. And for that purpoſe ſent a conuoy of 400 Turks to conduct them on the way thither. Who being come to Temeſwar, and about to haue led the wife and family of Moyſes out of the city, were not ſuffered by the Ianizaries that had the garding of the towne, ſo to do: who told them, That the great Sultan had in former times found ſo many diſloialties, trecheries, and treaſons in the Hungarians, Tranſyluanians, and Valachians, to the great hurt and hinderance of his eſtate, that he could no more aſſure himſelfe of them; and that doubting of the fidelity of Moyſes, being a Tranſyluanian, he was reſolued to keepe this gage for his more aſſurance; aſſuring him withall, That his wife and family being in his power, ſhould receiue nothing from him but fauour and grace, ſo long as he receiued from him the effects of his loyalty, but that he ſhould neuer hope to inioy them but in Temeſwar, or ſome other ſuch like place aſſured for his ſeruice. Moyſes aſtoniſhed at this anſwer, was much moued againſt the great Sultan, complained in his ſoule, that hauing ruinated his faith, his honour, and the welfare of his country, to aſſure him of his fidelity towards him, he yet doubted of his conſtancy, as if all theſe crimes did not binde him to ſerue him with his perſon for euer, were it euen but for feare of puniſhment from them whom he had ſo grieuouſly offended.

The Valachians by Moyſes put to flight.

In the meane time the ſuccours ſent from the Vayuod of Valachia were vpon the borders of Tranſyluania vnder the conduct of Marſa the Vayuod his Lieutenant, and Baſta was gathering together his forces, to recouer againe his former eſtate; expecting euery houre the comming of two thouſond horſamen out of Sileſia, with which vnited power he was in good hope to diſcomfit the rebell, and to recouer his former loſſes. All which, Moyſes by his eſpials right well knew, and for the remedy thereof reſolued to march with thirty thouſand men to meet with the Valachians, and to cut them off, before they could come far into Tranſyluania, or joyne their forces with Baſta. For the furthering of which his purpoſe he had learned the place whereby they were to enter, their number, and the way they were to hold, the better to conduct his army againſt them; and being in number more than three to one, already aſſured himſelfe of the victory. All which fell out according to his deſire: for the Valachians comming on, being in number but eight thouſand, fell as it were a prey into his mouth. For needs fight they muſt, or die therefore, although the number were vnequall; for that to fly was more dangerous vnto the Valachians (hauing the Turks and Tartarian horſemen at their backes) than manfully to fight it out. Neceſſity gaue courage vnto the weaker ſide, and feare cauſed them to performe more than they would haue done, had they had liberty to haue fled: yet for all that, the greater number at length preuailed againſt the leſſe; ſo that after a great and mortall fight, wherein a great number of the Turks and Tartars were ſlaine, the Valachians in the end were enforced to leaue their dead companions, their honour, and their tents, with all their baggage in the field, and to betake themſelues to flight; but not all in rout as freſh-water ſouldiers, but with often making ſtands, as men diſdaining by true valour, but only with number oppreſſed, to be ouercome. The rebels proud of their victory, and now fearing no more harme, forthwith gaue themſelues to the riffling of the enemies campe, diuiding the ſpoyle, and filling the heauens with the noiſe of their trumpets, publiſhing thereby the trophies of their victory. Which diſorder the Valachians perceiuing, and thereof conceiuing hope of ſome good to be done, turned head, and ſerued cloſe together, couragiouſly thruſt themſelues into the middeſt of theſe proud and triumphant victors. Which vnexpected thunderclap ſo diſmaied them and troubled their wits, that

A that ſurpriſed in diſorder, with their hands full of ſpoils in ſtead of weapons, they could neither recouer their courage, nor put themſelues againe in order. Such confuſion maketh men oftentimes to feele the blowes of death, before they be aware of the arme that giueth the ſame: ſo, of theſe men ſo confounded, ſome ſtood as men amazed, otherſome ran away to ſaue themſelues, and otherſome ſtood vpon their defence, but all were alike ſlaine: ſo that in fine, this great army was for the moſt part cut in pieces, and the reſt put to flight. Moyſes himſelfe was there among the reſt ſlaine, worthy for his treaſon to haue beene reſerued to a more ſhamefull death.

Moyſes with his army by the Valachians ouerthrowne, and himſelfe ſlaine.

Of this victory the Vayuod by letters certified Baſta, to whom he ſent fiue and twenty of the enemies enſignes for an honourable preſent, with this ioyfull news of the death and B ouerthrow of the rebell; whoſe body as the Vayuod writ, was found dead amongſt the middeſt of the dead, ſlaine euen at the firſt charge, wherein his guard was ouerthrowne. And for that it was commonly beleeued, that he was not yet dead, neither preſent at that battell, as ſome had giuen it out; to manifeſt the contrary vnto the World, and by his example to terrifie others, his head was vpon a lance ſet vp at Carolſtad for all men to behold: a preferment well beſeeming ſuch an ambitious head, as had made ſo great troubles, and beene the death of ſo many Chriſtians.

This rebell ſuppreſſed, another by and by ſtart vp, called Albert Nage, who gathering together the rebels of Tranſyluania, mingled with certaine Turks, Tartars, Coſſackes, and Moldauians, all together amounting to the number of ſix thouſand, made head towards Lippa. C Againſt whom, Baſta with all ſpeed ſent forth three thouſand Haiducks well acquainted with the countrey, which ſometimes ſerued them to better purpoſe than their armes, for that the rebels ſought not ſo much to come to a ſet battell, and to try the matter by true valour, as by taking the aduantages of places, to delay the time and purchaſe gaine, the chiefe end of their rebellion. Theſe rebels the Haiducks ſurpriſed neere vnto a Caſtle called Ferre, where they meant to haue lodged, and charged them. Who ſo vpon the ſudden ouertaken, and ignorant of their enemies power, ſuppoſing them to haue beene more in number than indeed they were, made ſmall reſiſtance, but as a many of raſcals, gathered by villany, and without truſting of one another, by flight prouided euery man for himſelfe as he might. In which flight, the greateſt number of them were ſlaine, and their chiefetaine with much ado ſaued, to be at D another time for his euill deſerts iuſtly executed.

New rebels in Tranſyluania diſcomfited.

Baſta by theſe good haps, and the aid of the Vayuod of Valachia, being again become maſter of the field, in very ſhort time after had reduced all Tranſyluania vnder the Emperours obeyſance, vnto whom, he together with the Vayuod, for an honourable preſent and a teſtimony of their good ſeruice, ſent to Vienna, and from thence to Prague, an hundred enſignes gained from the rebels. All which with ſome other rich ſpoles, the maſter of the Ceremonies in great pompe and triumph led, together with Moyſes the late rebels horſe, exceeding richly furniſhed with furniture of pure gold, and was for his paines by the Emperour rewarded with a chaine of gold, ſent vnto him by the County Fuſtenberg.

An honourable preſent by the L Baſta ſent vnto the Emperour

The troubles of Tranſyluania thus once againe quieted, Baſta reſoluing againe to beſiege E Temeſwar, with his power marched towards Lippa, there to meet with the forces of the Vayuod of Valachia, the better to vndertake and performe the intended exploit. His army conſiſted of twenty thouſand men ſtrong, carrying with them fiue and twenty pieces of great ordnance, furniſhed with all things neceſſary. And of the enterpriſe it ſelfe euery man had good hope, as well for the ſufficiency of him the Generall that had vndertaken it, as for the want of reliefe that was not like any way to be brought vnto the beſieged. But while he ſo lay at the ſiege thereof, his ſouldiers too greedily and exceſſiuely feeding vpon fruit (whereof there was that yeare great ſtore) fell ſo into the bloudy flix, and thereof in ſuch number died (although he had giuen moſt ſtreit command, That none ſhould be eaten, or vpon great penalties be brought into the camp) that he was glad to riſe with his army and be gone.

F Whileſt this was in doing, the County Solmes lying in garriſon at Carolſtat, tooke vpon him to ſurpriſe Wiſcenbourg; and ſetting forth but with foure hundred ſouldiers of his garriſon, with wonderfull diligence ſurpriſed the place, and without any great reſiſtance became maſters thereof. But the citiſens ouer-grieued with the inſolent outrages of theſe men of war, opened the gates of their towne vnto the rebels of Tranſyluania, euen then fled from the late ouerthrow: who full of reuenge, tooke the place, and being too ſtrong for the G County and his ſoldiers, made ſuch ſlaughter of them in the ſtreets (they of the towne out of their windowes, and from the tops of their houſes helping them) that of all thoſe which the County brought with him, there were but ſixty left aliue; who all taken, were together with the County thruſt into a ſtrong and loathſome priſon.

A great army of the Chriſtians

Now the bruit of the comming of the Turks great army into Hungary had awaked the Chriſtian forces to aſſemble themſelues together, and to do their endeauor to withſtand the ſame; ſo that a number of companies were raiſed in Germany, who came into Hungary marching towards Strigonium, where the army was to be aſſembled. The good ſucceſſe of things paſt, the opinion men had of the Turks troubles with his rebels, and the great promiſes of the Emperour, drew many into theſe liſts of honor; in ſuch ſort, that there were come H together an army of fiue and twenty thouſand foot, and ten thouſand horſe; all good and braue companies, well appointed and well conducted. Of this braue and gallant army the Lord Ruſſworme was for this yeare appointed Generall; who therewith marched within the ſight of Strigonium, to aſſure the inhabitants of reliefe, if the enemy ſhould chance to beſiege them, as the newes then went. About three weekes this army lay there by encamped, attending the comming of the reſt of the forces, which were to ſtrengthen and make vp the ſame; during which time the Generall diſpoſed of all things neceſſary for the keeping of Strigonium, and put into the fort of S. Andrew neere vnto it three thouſand Lanſquenets for reliefe of the city: which done, hee remooued with his army toward Peſth, and encamped I within a league thereof toward the Weſt, reſoluing ſo to croſſe the deſignes of the enemy if he ſhould attempt to beſiege this place (as it was doubted he would) and in hope that the preſeruation thereof might in time be a cauſe for the winning of Buda, and a meane to impeach the enemies forces.

The Turks army of 100000 men in field.

The ſhamefull flight of certain of the garriſon ſoldiers of Peſth vnto the Turks at Buda.

Peſth victualled

The Turks army within a few daies after vpon a contrary deſigne conducted for the winning of Peſth (and reſolued to raiſe the Chriſtians campe) in number an hundred thouſand men, came, and face to face incamped within the ſight of the Chriſtian army on the other ſide of the riuer Danubius. In the meane time whileſt they ſo lay, certaine cowardly ſoldiers of Peſth, more in loue with their bellies than with their honour, by ſtealth fled out of their garriſon in Peſth, to the Turks ouer againſt them in Buda, ſhamefully crauing of them victuals; K whom the Turks being themſelues almoſt in as great want, yet bounteouſly relieued.
Beſides that, the Baſſa of Buda to corrupt the reſt of their fellowes, cauſed theſe renegate fugitiues to be entertained with double pay: who therefore gaue the Baſſa a thouſand thanks, extolling his bounty vnto the heauens, and from the wals inuiting their companions to do as they had done, and ſo to become partakers of ſuch bounty and pleaſure as they were. Howbeit theſe fugitiues nothing profited the Baſſa, either by their perſuaſion or example: for albeit that they from the mouth of the Baſſa promiſed vnto their companions plenty of victuals, good entertainment, and foure months pay more, yet was there not any of them which hearkened or gaue eare vnto their allurements; but rather the more to aſſure their commanders of their fidelity, of themſelues offered to be ſworne againe vnto their allegiance vnto the L Emperour, and to die in the place rather than to forſake it. Yet was the want of victuals then in Peſth great, and the garriſon therwith extreamely pinched, fed almoſt as much with hope, as with that little which was left them. Neither was it long after, but that according to their deſires the 15 of May a great ſhip arriued there, laded with wine and victuals ſufficient for the reliefe of their preſent neceſſities. Of the comming of which ſhip, the Turks hauing heard, attended the paſſage thereof in the Iſle, to haue intercepted it. Of which their purpoſe the garriſon ſouldiers of Peſth hauing knowledge, and armed with neceſſity, ſallied out vpon them, and killing a number of them, inforced the reſt to quit the place. This ſhip was but the forerunner of greater ſuccors; for ſhortly after followed a number of other ſhips: which arriuing at Peſth, laded with victuals and other neceſſaries, filled the place with as M great plenty, as there had beene before want. Which ſupply was conducted vnto Peſth by 500 harquebuſiers of Strigonium, the Turks from Buda looking on, but not daring or not able to ſtay the ſame.

It

A It fortuned at the ſelfe ſame time, that a captain of the Turkes, fled from Alba-Regalis to Rab, ſhewed the Chriſtians there the way and mean how they might come to the ſuburbs of Alba-Regalis, and take the ſpoil of the ſame; yea and haply as things might fal out, finde occaſion to ſurpriſe the town it ſelf alſo, offering himſelf to be their guid in the action. And albeit that this Turk might iuſtly be feared and ſuſpected, yet the Chriſtian ſoldiers, as men deſirous both of honour and prey, and induced alſo by the probability of the attempt, gaue credit vnto him and embraced the ſame. Neither failed he of his promiſe, nor the Chriſtians of their deuoir in performance of the exploit; For the two garriſons of Rab and Strigonium aſſembled together, by this Turks conduct ſurpriſed the ſuburbs of Alba-Regalis, ſlew al them that made reſiſtance, rifled them on all hands, ſet them on fire, and ſo laden with rich ſpoil returned home again in ſafety.

The ſuburbs of Alba-Regalis ſackt & burnt by the Chriſtians.

B At the ſame time alſo the Chriſtians on the other ſide Danubius gathered an head together to conduct another Conuoy of victuals into Peſth, with a reſolution to march with the ſame through the plain field at noone day, euen in the eie of the enemy, ſo to braue him. To which purpoſe the Lord Nadaſti was there preſent with a good number of Hungarians, Colonel Meüberg with a regiment of Almaines, and the County Thurn with a number of Huſſars, all good ſoldiers and men of courage, deſirous to proue the ſame vpon their enemies. This conuoy, with the Trumpets gallantly ſounding, brauely marched ouer the plaine at mid day, the Turkes from the walls of Buda beholding the ſame, but not daring to aduenture vpon it. And ſo Peſth, for want of victuals before diſtreſſed, was now plentifully relieued both by water and by land.

Peſth again victualled.

C The Chriſtians the laſt yeare hauing left the ſiege of Buda for the reaſons before written, in their return tooke the caſtle of Adom, ſeated vpon the banke of Danubius, about 2 leagues from Buda; and for the keeping therof left therin a gariſon of Haiducks. This caſtle was conuenient for the annoying of the Turks in Buda, and for the relief of the Chriſtians in Peſth; for that it impeached the bringing of victuals vnto the one, and fauoured the victualling of the other. The good and faithful defence of this place theſe Haiduckes vndertooke to their vtmoſt power, vpon their honour and credit, as they would be accounted valiant and couragious men; but yet refuſed to be bound by oath to render an account for the place, whatſoeuer might befall; a thing (as they truly ſaid) aboue their forces, and more than they were able to D perform. Theſe men now vpon the bruit of the comming of the Turks great Army, afraid of their ſhadowes, hauing before truſſed vp their baggage, ſet fire on the caſtle and ſo departed, retyring themſelues to Strigonium: where examined by the gouernor Althem, of the cauſe of their flight, and what enemies had chaſed them thence; and being not able therfore to make any excuſe, nor to yeeld any reaſon therof, more than their imaginary fear, were by his commandement impriſoned, there to remain vntil order were taken by the Generall of the Army for their further puniſhment.

Sultan Mahomet now wallowing in the midſt of his ſenſual delights in Conſtantinople, yet found not therin ſo full contentment, but that his pleaſures had alſo their griefs fully mixed with them. In Conſtantinople, the ſtrong ſeat of his mighty empire, he was amidſt the inſo-E lent mutinies of the proud Baſſa's and tumultuous Ianizaries; and abroad hee was in warres both againſt his rebellious ſubiects in Aſia, and the Chriſtians in Europe. Vnto all which troubles he ſaw not how to giue remedy at once, and therfore reſolued, if it were poſſible, firſt to appeaſe the troubles abroad with his rebellious ſubiects in Aſia; as more deſirous to be at peace with his owne ſubiects, than with ſtrangers: howbeit that the puniſhing of rebellion is more neceſſary in a Prince for the maintenance of his ſtate, than is war againſt a ſtranger for the conquering of a new country or kingdom; the one preuenting the danger hanging ouer his head, the other ſeruing but his vaine and ambitious deſire. So hee preferring peace with the Rebels his ſubiects, before peace with the Chriſtians his enemies, reſolued (as I ſaid) to pacifie the firſt, the more eaſily to ruinat the other. But whether he vpon good faith or policy F entred into this reſolution, and whether indeed he dealt plainly with theſe rebels, or but only to deceiue them, is hard to ſay. Howbeit, as the ſequell of the matter ſhewed, falſhood and treachery was the ground of all this buſineſſe, both on the one ſide & on the other. For theſe men reſpecting only the ſafety and aſſurance of their eſtate, held all other actions as indifferent, whether they were good or bad, ſo that they ſerued to that effect; and nouriſhed with G the ſame milke of infidelitie that their Prince was, trained vp in the ſame ſchoole, and foſtred with the ſame air, feared in him againſt them, that which they felt in themſelues againſt him. An hard matter it is to aſſure minds fraight with like craft, ſubtiltie, and deceit, and poſſeſſed with like diſtruſt one of another. Howbeit Mahomet ſpared no kinde of cunning to deceiue theſe crafty and ſubtil men; offering vnto them, together with his gracious pardon, great preferments, dignities, and honors, ſo that they would but yeeld to him their due obedience, lay down their arms, and no more take vp the ſame but in his ſeruice. But theſe wily foxes knew right wel, that the promiſes of faithleſſe princes coſt them nothing but words, the honor and credit therof they regarded not, ſo that therby they might attain vnto the height of their deſires, which they eſteemed aboue all other things: ſo that for them to truſt vnto a thing of ſo H ſmall value with him that was ſo prodigal therof, and for the ſame ſo eaſily to yeeld vp their liues and fortunes, which they eſteemed as their chiefeſt treaſures, they thought right worthily to deſerue all ſhame and miſhap that might betide them. So that they not only refuſed to lay down arms, and to yeeld their obedience vnto him, as he deſired, but euen to haue peace with him vpon any conditions whatſoeuer, ſeeing them dangerous vnto themſelues, and good only for him their enemy.

Mahomet finding the rebels ſo reſolutely ſet down, as not by any means but by force to bee appeaſed, thought it now beſt to turn his purpoſe vnto the Chriſtians, and to offer them that which the others had refuſed; in hope that peace made with the one, ſhould be the vtter ruin of the other. Vpon which point he being in himſelf reſolued, ſought now ſome honeſt means I not vnbeſeeming his greatnes, to effect this his purpoſe. For the eaſing him of which care, the French Embaſſador then Lieger at Conſtantinople, was very fitly then intreating with the Viſier Baſſa's for the deliuerance of the County Yſolan, taken at Alba-Regalis the laſt yeare, and againſt all law of arms detained priſoner at Conſtantinople. This noble gentleman Mahomet thought fit, as wel for the ſufficiencie of himſelf, as with inſtructions to deale with the Emperour concerning an intreaty of peace to be had. Wherupon he commanded him to bee ſet at liberty, with charge, That he ſhould both diſcreetly and faithfully deal with the Emperor concerning this matter of peace; which if he ſhould by his induſtry effect, to his good liking and content, then he ſhould remain free, otherwiſe to return againe into his former captiuity and bondage: for whom the French Embaſſadour gaue his word and became pledge. K Vpon which barbarous conditions the Earle was forthwith deliuered, who by the law of arms ſhould not at all haue bin detained.

Beſides this plot laid for the negotiation of peace, Achmet Baſſa to this purpoſe writ to Colonitz, then commander of the Emperors army in Hungary; the copy of which letters was as followeth:

Letters of Acmet Baſſa vnto Collonitz concerning peace.

To thee our friend Collonitz health and greeting. I ſuppoſe you yet remember the propoſitions concerning peace, which our Soueraign and moſt mighty Monarch not long ago cauſed to bee opened and propounded vnto you by certaine of his Baſſa's neere vnto Strigonium; which as then remained not reſolued. L But if now it ſhall ſeem vnto you good, that we ſhould aſſemble our ſelues together into ſome place of aſſurance both to the one ſide and the other, we may again confer about that buſines, as hauing on my part full power and commandment from my Prince ſo to do; yet with charge, That before all other things Strigonium ſhould be again deliuered vnto vs. Which being don, wee may eaſily afterward determin the other difficulties, and conclude a good and wholſome peace. God which onely reigneth in the heauens aboue, is witnes of our faithfull and iuſt deſire, to aſſume a quiet and firm peace betwixt vs, and that to auert theſe flouds of war from the poor people, and to giue them ſome repoſe and reſt after ſo great troubles. This is our intent and purpoſe, which God knoweth to be void of all fraud and guile; which we now declare vnto you, in hope to vnderſtand yours alſo. But if you be not reſolued to render to vs Strigonium, before we begin to intreat of other matters, it is not needfull for you to trouble your ſelf to giue any anſwer to theſe our letters. M But if you ſhall reſolue to the contrary, to deliuer the ſame, with as much ſpeed as you can, in few words let vs vnderſtand the ſame, with the time & place fit for our aſſembly & meeting to the intent fully to determin of theſe affairs. You know alſo that you haue bin of long time accuſtomed to pay tribute to our Prince; which if you ſhal continually pay for the time to come, and diſcharge the arrerages for ttime paſt, it ſhall be commodious for vs, and honourable for you, ſeeing that it is an honour vnto you to be tributaries vnto the Grand Seigniour, it hauing alwaies in times paſt bin for your good and profit. Beſides that, peace ſhall likewiſe be intreated of with the great Cham of Tartarie, who is commanded by our moſt mighty and gratious Emperor vpon iuſt and reaſonable conditions to entertain the ſame, and neuer more but in peaceable manner to come into Hungarie. Now if that you ſhall neglect or reiect this treaty for peace, it is certaine that you ſhall be the authour of the miſery and ruine of the whole countrey, it being impoſsible that the towns and villages conſumed with fire ſhould euer recouer their former beauty or felicity. God which reigneth in heauen is there witneſſe vnto me, and my dead Emperour vpon earth, that I ſpeake franckely with you, and without diſsimulation concerning this matter. Now on your part, let vs vnderſtand if you haue a deſire to attend vnto this treaty of peace, according to the purport of your Letters: for if you ſhall reſolue to the contrarie, we proteſt vnto you to write no more concerning theſe affaires.

Collonitz hauing receiued theſe letters, ſent them forthwith vnto the Emperor, requeſting his Majeſtie to conſider what anſwer he would haue giuen vnto them. Whom the Emperor, deſirous of a good peace, commanded to embrace the occaſion, and by proofe to learne whether the Turks deſire were indeed conformable to their words or not. Whereupon Collonitz taking vnto him certaine of the beſt commanders of the army, vndertooke the buſineſſe, and entred into the treaty of peace with the Turks: wherein he found the vnreaſonableneſſe of their demands to tend ſo much vnto the hurt and diſhonor of the Emperor, as that they euen at the firſt entrance ſhut vp the way to al further or reaſonable conference, it being altogether impoſsible to bring to any conformitie, minds ſet down vpon reſolutions ſo far different. For the Turks (as if the Emperour would haue been glad of peace vpon any condition) after their proud manner, vnreaſonably demanded to haue Tranſyluania, Strigonium, and Peſth reſtored vnto them; for which they offered to deliuer vnto the Emperour Agria and Caniſia, pebles for pearles. So that vpon propoſitions ſo far different, being able to conclude nothing, they departed on both ſides as they came, to try by armes that which by talke and conference they could not agree vpon. But as all the Turks treaties of peace with the Chriſtians are indeed but falſe ſhewes to abuſe the facilitie of the Chriſtians by, euen ſo now alſo it was knowne, that they in the meane time, whileſt this treaty of peace was in hand, gathered together great ſtore both of men and munition at Belgrade, wherewith to arme a great conuoy of victuals, which they had thought during this interparley for peace to haue put into Buda. But Collonitz vnderſtanding thereof, ceaſed further to intreat of peace, which with the falſe ſhew thereof did but hurt and deceiue the Chriſtians, and betooke himſelfe againe to his arms (his and their ſafeſt and ſureſt refuge) reſoluing with the other Captains & Commanders of the army to do what they might for the croſſing and hindring of the Turkes in their purpoſe for the putting of victuals into Buda: whereof there was now ſuch want, that the Turks in garriſon there hauing alreadie eaten all their horſes, and for victuals rifled the Gouernours houſe, were reſolued to abandon the city, if they ſhould not be within ſome few daies relieued.

The Turks vnreaſonable demands breake off all the treaty of peace.

Now vpon this reſolution for the keeping of the Turks from the victualling of Buda, the Chriſtians for the more aſſurance of their purpoſe, prepared therefore both by water and by land, embarking their footmen vpon the riuer, vnder the conduct of Colonell Altmeine and Sultze, the one the Gouernour of Strigonium, and the other of Peſth; whileſt that Collonitz with the horſemen ſcouting alongſt the banks of the riuer of Danubius, took the charge by land. And ſo it fortuned, that vpon the 22 day of Auguſt he with his horſemen neere vnto the village of Mohatſch (famous for the death of King Lewis) fell vpon the head of the Turks army, led by the Baſſa Murat, conſiſting of ſix thouſand Turkes, two thouſand of them being Ianizaries: who altogether lay encamped vpon an euen plaine, very commodious for our horſemen, who let ſlip neither the time nor the opportunitie of ſo great an aduantage offered them, but forthwith charged them: where after a number of notable charges both giuen and receiued, which ſtill abated both the number and courage of the Turks, they at laſt retired toward the body of their army, and that in ſuch haſt, as that their retreat little differed from a ſpeedy flight. After whom Collonitz followed with like hate as hee had charged them; but euill followed by his friends, who euill performed their charge, ſeeking after the ſpoil, in ſtead of purſuing their enemies; the Turks perceiuing the ſmall number that purſued them, turned vpon them, and ſo began again not only to make ſtrong reſiſtance, but euen right hardly to charge them. Who ſo by them preſſed with no leſſe courage than power, were now glad themſelues to retyre, in ſtead of purſuing the victory; but yet ſo, as that the retreit was made without any great loſſe therin receiued. Howbeit, the Turkes not a little incouraged with this change of fortune, and perceiuing themſelues too ſtrong for their enemies that charged them, came on ſo faſt and ſo couragiouſly, as that in fine they had defeated the Chriſtians, had not the Haiducks out of their boats from the riuer in good time come reſolutely to their relief. Which cloud the Turks perceiuing, ready to pour forth a great tempeſt vpon their heads, and not daring to abide the ſame, againe retyred, leauing the Chriſtians Victors both in the firſt and laſt charge: who not content with the retreit of the Turks, furiouſly charged and purſued them euen vnto their great campe, and ſo returned, carrying backe with them both the glory of the field, and the ſpoil of their enemies. G H

Collonitz in good time relieued by the Haiducks.

In this conflict, the red cornet of Murat Baſſa, the cogniſance of his great commaund, was taken, with two field pieces; ſeuen hundred Turks were left dead vpon the place, and ſix ſcore more taken priſoners: amongſt whom was Saxar Beg, who being a man of vnderſtanding, & by the Chriſtians examined, confeſſed, That Haſſan Baſſa the day before this conflict came into the Campe, and there honourably dined with the great Cham; with whom after their great cheer, he entring into diſcourſe of many great matters, and among the reſt, concerning his return into his country; was much againſt the ſame, vntill ſuch time as they had new victualled Buda, wherunto he was (as he ſaid) both in honour and duty bound to giue his aſſiſtance, the loſſe of this place being of ſo great importance vnto the grand Seignior. That otherwiſe his aid had been to him rather hurtfull than profitable, his people hauing deuoured ſo much victuals and performed nothing, if he ſhould now at this time faile to doe his Prince ſeruice; who could neuer thinke either valour or credit to be in him, if he ſhould fail in ſuch actions as wherin his valour and fidelitie ſhould appear; all things hauing no other credit and reputation but according vnto their effects. And that therefore hee ſhould reſolue to ſee the end of this exploit, which required euery mans helping hand for the performance therof, conſidering the forces of the enemy in readineſſe to hinder the ſame. Moreouer hee aſſured them, That the Baſſa's purpoſe was to new fortifie Haſwar, Pax, and Kaletſch, frontier Caſtles, and neceſſarie for this action, and ſo to goe to the ſiege of Peſth: and that done, to beſiege Strigonium, which for all that, he doubted to win this year, as well by reaſon of the approach of winter, as for that a great part of his forces were far off, and not eaſily in a little time to be aſſembled together. That the Tartars were yet a great way from the camp, where the Baſſa's of Aſia and Caramania were within a few daies expected, the one of them leading with him the reconciled rebels of Aſia, and the other ſix thouſand Ianizaries. Which his confeſſion although it were not altogether true, yet caried it ſhew of ſome probabilitie, as time by prooſe afterward declared. I K

The Turkes affaires reuealed to the Chriſtiãs

Some of our men were in this charge ſlaine alſo, but few in compariſon of the Turks, who there loſt ſome of their beſt men. It was noted, that tn this conflict the ſoldiers of Colonell Sultze had euil behaued themſelues, refuſing to purſue the enemy being in flight; whether it were for that they feared ſome ambuſh layd for them, or for that they diſdained to follow Generall Collonitz: the reaſons perhaps for which their Colonell ſtaied them from the purſuit of the enemy. But to euill purpoſe: for being out of order at ſuch time as the Turkes turning back renewed the fight, they had beene all ſlain and cut in pieces, had nor the Haiduckes in good time (as we ſaid) come on to their reſcue. As for Collonitz, hee moſt brauely bare himſelf in this conflict, ſo much as in him was vrging his good fortune for the obtaining of a ful victory; ſometime performing the part of a good Captaine, and ſometime of a moſt valiant ſouldier; ſometime forcing the charge, and again ſtaying his men in the retreit: inſomuch that oftentimes loſt amongſt his enemies, and again returning by the grace of God, he eſcaped death as it were by miracle, and from being taken priſoner, by chance. Into neither of which dangers hee could haue fallen without the great danger of the whole Army, which next vnto God, was for the ſafety thereof chiefely beholding vnto the valour of him their ſo braue a Leader. But God in his wiſedome createth not ſuch worthy men, but by his pro- L M

A uidence alſo to preſerue them: Wonder it were otherwiſe, that euer ſuch worthy men ſhould return from among the midſt of ſo many deſperat dangers, Death as it were enuying at their liues, and their enemies for their glory chuſing them out to triumph of their ſpoils and ouer-throw. And without doubt, had the reſt of the Chriſtians after his example proſecuted their good fortune, and don what good ſoldiers ſhould of duty haue done, their enemies had beene quite ouerthrown, and they themſelues had bin both victorious and rich: where now for lacke of good reſolution, the victory was almoſt equall; for beſides the ſpoils by them gotten, they might haue carried away with them a whole years pay due to the garriſon of Buda, which the Turks, put into a fear, and only carefull of their liues, had left in their camp, which they afterward again recouered, vpon recouery of their force and courage. This mony, with much more, B was all appointed as a prey vnto the good fortune of our men, had they bin ſo valorous as to fetch it; but failing of their indeauor in ſo glorious an action, Fortune failed them alſo of her bounty.

Now at length the Chriſtian army was met together, about the fourth of September, wherin the lord Ruſſworm commanded as General; who deſirous to vnderſtand of the Turks affairs and deſignes, ſent forth two of his moſt truſty and expert ſouldiers to performe that piece of ſeruice: who in Turks apparel being got into the Turks army, were there eight daies vndiſcouered or ſuſpected of any. Where after that they roaming vp and down had taken a full view of the Turks army, and in what they might diſcouered their deſignes, they returned back, declaring vnto their General what they had both there heard and ſeen; as, That the Turks army C was very great, but yet not ſuch as that which the laſt year beſieged Peſth: That the Turks lay incamped at large, and not all together, which cauſed their Army to ſeem the greater, taking vp half a league for the lodging therof, being wel prouided of cannon and other field pieces.
That Haſſan Baſſa commanded therin as Generall, hauing brought with him twelue thouſand Ianizaries, beſide his horſmen and the reconciled rebels of Aſia, which were daily lookt for; the leader of whom was not known, ſome thinking it to be him who had alwaies commanded them, being a moſt valiant captain and expert commandor; but others deemed him to be but one of his Captains that had forſaken him (as indeed he was) a right valiant man alſo, but not of ſo great experience as he. That the great Tartar Han, come to aid the Turks in their wars in Hungary, was to the great diſcontentment of Haſſan Baſſa, now already returned toward his D own country (with ſuch booty and priſoners as he had got from the poor Chriſtians) to appeaſe a rebellion there raiſed by a yong Tartar prince his nephew, who by his vncle the great Han giuen in hoſtage to Mahomet, and kept at Conſtantinople as in priſon, hauing got means to make an eſcape and to return into Tartary, was about to trouble his vncles affaires, in hope now in his abſence to mount vnto the throne of his eſtate: and that the Tartar being come to the banke of the riuer Danubius, and by the Turks denied boats to paſſe ouer in, and with many railing and opprobrious ſpeeches by them charged for his departure, as a Coward, had found meanes to make a floting bridge of great faggots, whereby he paſſed his footmen ouer the riuer, his horſemen ſwimming ouer the ſame; and ſo was by great journies returning toward his owne territory, boaſting by the way as he went, That hee had rejected and trodden E vnder foot all the prayers and requeſts of Haſſan Baſſa, entreating him yet to ſtay a while in Hungary for the ſeruice of the great Sultan his maſter. Beſides that, That they had ſeene ſix great Veſſels vpon the riuer of Danubius, with ten leſſer Veſſels following after them, garded with three thouſand ſouldiers well armed, and men of good ſort, three hundred of them being Ianizaries, appointed to ſafe conduct the munition to be brought vp the riuer, and to ſerue as a conuoy to the other Veſſels that went to follow them with victuals, if haply the Chriſtians ſhould attempt any thing againſt them. And in fine, That the Turks army could not poſſibly be great this year, by reaſon of many great lets wherwith the great Sultan was this year troubled: which much abated the courage and hope of his Captaines, who hanging their heads, came vnwillingly to theſe Wars, accounting themſelues happy if they might in this expedi-F tion but take Peſth, that they might not returne ſo much diſhonoured as they came daunted and diſcouraged. With which newes the Chriſtians were ſo much encouraged to incounter with the Turkes, as if they had beene aſſured to fight with men already diſcouraged and out of heart.

The Lord Ruſſworm informed of the Turks deſignes.

The Turks ouerthrowne by the garriſon of Strigonium.

The Turks defeated by Colonell Sultze.

In the mean time the Huſſars of Strigonium, alwaies ready for fight, by good fortune going forth, G met with 400 Turkes ſeeking for forrage; who incountering together, at the firſt made a moſt braue and gallant fight, euery one of them wiſhing, That their priuate ſucceſſe might be the beginning of their general victory. But the Huſſars being both more ſkilfull in that manner of ſkirmiſhing and ſudden incounter, and alſo of greater courage, at length brake the Turks rankes, of whom ſix ſcore lay dead vpon the ground, moſt of the reſt being taken priſoners, with an hundred and thirty good and ſeruiceable horſes, wherewith both the glory and the profit of their victory was increaſed. Colonel Sultze alſo with 300 men marching out from the Campe, chanced to diſcouer an hundred of thoſe braue horſemen which but newly came out of Aſia with Zellaly the Rebell; who hauing neuer ſeen the army of the Chriſtians, nor yet felt their forces, were with three hundred Ianizaries vpon a brauery come ouer the Riuer Danubius, H to take a view of the Chriſtian Camp: for the drawing on of whom, the wary Colonel had ſent forth fifty of his horſmen a great way from the reſt of his troup, as it were to diſcouer the country therabouts. Theſe fore-runners failed not to meet with the Turkes, as if it had been by chance, and were by them forthwith charged, as thinking to haue had a great hand ouer that ſo ſmall a number; when vpon the ſudden Colonell Sultze with the reſt of his company comming on, and hotly charging them, encouraged his owne men, and diſcouraged the Turks: who ſurpriſed with feare, thinking the Chriſtians to be more in number than indeed they were, hauing left ſome fifty of their men dead vpon the place, as men diſmaied and voyd of vnderſtanding fled: in which their flight, ſuch as were not by the Chriſtians ſlaine, were in the riuer of Danubius drowned, whereinto they for feare all headlong plunged them- I ſelues.

All theſe little conflicts ſerued but as ſparkes, to kindle the great fire by the Baſſa intended; his firſt purpoſe being to put a Conuoy of victuals into Buda, which the Chriſtians purpoſed by all means to hinder: which ſo contrary intentions were not but by force and policie to be decided. The Chriſtian General wiſely doubting leſt the Baſſa ſhould come and lodge his Army betwixt Vicegrade and Buda, and ſo victual the city at his pleaſure, raiſed a ſtrong fort of an old church, betwixt the ſaid two places, and therein lodged a Regiment of Lanſquenets. Beſide which fort, called the fort of Saint Andrew, hee built another at the head therof in the Iſle of Vicegrade, in ſuch order and proportion, that theſe two forts might one of them defend the other, and annoy them that ſhould attempt to force either of them. K Together with this commodiouſnes, the fort in the Iſle kept the paſſage vpon Danubius free and open for the bringing of victuals and other neceſſaries to the Campe of the Chriſtians; and was but a league and an half from Buda. Into which fort was put a Regiment of foure thouſand Italians, being all very wel armed. Which don, he made a bridge of boats vpon the Riuer, which began in the camp and ended at the Iſle, for the releiuing of the fort; & ſo from thence paſſed quite ouer the riuer to Vacia, a little town, which it was needfull for the Chriſtians to keep.

A great Ambuſh laid for the intercepting of the Turks.

Theſe Forts finiſhed according to the neceſſity of the time, it was not long after, but that the Baſſa ſent ten thouſand Turkes both horſe and foot to take the firſt of them, which they ſuppoſed to haue beene but weakely fortified. L Who comming thither, were with ſuch courage receiued by the Lanſquenets with their harquebuſes, as that the whole Fort ſeemed to haue beene on fire. Wherewith the Turkes diſmayed, as men in their expectation deceiued, and in approching of the ſame hauing ſome of their men ſlain and moe hurt, they ſoone after ſounded a retreit, and hauing done nothing but loſt a number of their men, returned to their Campe from whence they came. In which enterpriſe failing, they reſolued vpon another, and began to make a bridge ouer the Danubius, in hope thereby to paſſe ouer, and to annoy the Chriſtians on the other ſide of the Riuer. Wherof the General of the Chriſtians vnderſtanding, ſuffered them without any interruption to ſpend the time in performing of the ſame. But certainly informed by his eſpials, both of the day and houre wherein they were about to paſſe ouer, he layd an ambuſh of foure thouſand Lanſquenets and two thouſand Reiſters for M them, in ſuch place as from whence they might without danger do great harm vnto the Enemy, and aſſure the body of the Chriſtian Army. The riuer of Danubius had growing vpon the bankes thereof, and eſpecially in the deſolate and vnfrequented places, great ſtore of flags and

A and reeds,which were now thicke,& high enough to couer the footmen in,hauing with them four culuerins ready charged. Behind this ambuſh lay Colonell Collonitz with his regiment, and in the head of it the prince Ioinville with a certain number of French gentlemen,who vpon a braue courage,and a deſire they had to ſee ſeruice,had followed him into thoſe wars. There was alſo the Lord of Baſſomperre another Frenchman,with his own priuat followers,in number few,but in valor great. Vpon the flanks lay four troups of French Carabins,Loranoiſes, and Wallons,moſt expert and reſolute ſoldiers.

The Turks hauing made their bridge,began now to paſſe ouer the ſame, being charged by ſome few ſtragling and looſe fore-runners of the Chriſtians, ſent before for that purpoſe: whom the Turks not much regarding, ſtill preſſed on, in hope to ouertake them and to cut B them in pieces,not aware of the ambuſh laid for them,nor of their enemies counter-deſignes.
The footmen in the mean time lying ſtil cloſe in the reeds in ambuſh, beholding how and in what order they paſſed,and expecting but the time when they were to begin their charge. But hauing perceiued ten thouſand Turks to be now come ouer, and making head toward them; the Wallons vpon the banke of the riuer (as was before appointed) firſt diſcharged their pieces vpon them, and ſlew ſome of them. Neuertheleſſe the Turkes ſtill paſſing on by them, ſlew of them alſo about foure and twenty,and ſo keeping their way, marched directly toward the Chriſtians. But this their forwardneſſe was quickly ſtayed, and their courage abated; for in paſſing by, they were vpon the ſudden aſſailed by the Lanſquenets and Reiſters, now riſen out of ambuſh, and by them hardly layed vnto on euery ſide; as alſo by the horſemen, C who now come in,had put them into ſome diſorder before they were wel aware of them. The Wallons alſo at the firſt by the Turks ſcattered, but now again rallied,& deſirous to reuenge the death of their friends and fellows, played their parts, and on another ſide right furiouſly charged their enemies. During al which fight,the Culuerins ceaſed not to open the flanks of the Turks battell, with the loſſe of a number of their men,by the fury therof rent in pieces.
Neither did the valiant Collonitz foreſlow ſo fair an opportunitie,but afront charging this diſmaied company,by plaine force cauſed them to giue ground: the Carabins in the mean time charging them vpon their flanks,and the Wallons behinde. Who thus on euery ſide beſet and hardly layd vnto, as men diſcouraged,and out of hope to be relieued,turned their backes and fled amaine, to haue recouered the bridge whereby they came ouer. In which fight and D flight two thouſand of them being ſlaine, and the reſt not able to recouer the bridge, driuen headlong into the riuer, were therein drowned and ſlaine to the number of fiue thouſand of them, thoſe which remained aliue beeing all taken priſoners. Amongſt the reſt one of the Baſſa's,a man of great account amongſt the Turkes, was ſlain,with many other Captains and commanders of great note,and fifteen hundred Ianizaries. There were alſo foure field pieces taken,with thirty enſignes and two Cornets, beſide a very rich prey of braue and couragious horſes,with much fair armor,rich apparell,and good ſcimiters, weapons of no ſmall account and price amongſt the Turks. This ouerthrow much abated the courage and hope of the reſt of the Turkes for comming to the effect of their deſignes, and increaſed the courage and hope of the Chriſtians,reaſonably wel hereby aſſured of the good ſucces of their affaires for E this year in Hungary.

The Turks falling into the ambuſh laied for them by the Chriſtians, receiue a notable ouerthrow.

About this time Sultan Mahomet hauing put a fleet of Gallies to ſea, to haue gone againſt the king of Fez, was certainly informed,how that the ſame with tempeſt ſore beaten, to auoid ſhipwrecke, was againe returned vnto the ſame port from whence it looſed, bringing backe with it nothing for all his great charges, but ſickneſſe and great loſſes at ſea receiued. The like euil hap or worſe hauing at the ſame time alſo betided another Fleet by him ſet out into the Euxine or blacke ſea, to defend thoſe ſea coaſts from being rifled and ſpoyled by the Rebels in Aſia, who with their daily incurſions did there ſtill great harme. For albeit that Zellaly one of the Captaines of the Rebels, allured with Mahomet his faire promiſes, was by the ſtreit of the Dardanelli (called in antient time the ſtreit of Helleſpont) come with twelue F thouſand good ſouldiers out of Aſia into Europe, and ſo marching through Macedonia, was come into Hungarie, there to doe his Lord and Maſter good ſeruice; yet the chiefe Rebell held ſtill out,and both now and for diuers yeres after maintained a moſt cruel & dangerous warre, to the great trouble of the Grand Seignior, and the hindring of his affaires.
And euen now the crafty rebell hauing made ſhew as if he would haue ſubmitted himſelfe,

and come ouer into Europ as Zellaly did; and had therfore certain gallies ſent vnto him from G Mahomet, to haue tranſported him and his ſoldiers in: he now of them poſſeſſed, ſlew all that were ſent therin, and kept the gallies to himſelf. So that ſo far from was it, that the rebellion was extinguiſhed in Aſia, and the rebels ſuppreſſed, as that they were now vp in greater number than euer, and ſo did alſo more harm. Wherunto they were alſo the more incouraged by the example of Haſſan Baſſa (not him the Generall in Hungary, but another Baſſa of the ſame name) who by the great Sultan ſent againſt theſe rebels, had for a time kept them vnder, and ſomwhat repreſſed their inſolencie; but now by Mahomet diſplaced, and another being ſent to ſucceed him; he therwith diſcontented, ſo animated and inſenced his ſoldiers againſt him, as that comming to haue taken vpon him his charge, he found moſt part of the ſoldiers ready to turn their weapons vpon him: ſo that at length they fel together by the ears about the matter, H ſome taking part with the old General, and ſome with the new. In which tumultuous quarel a number of ſoldiers were ſlain, all they of the richer ſort ſpoiled, and the Sultans ſeruice and authority neglected. But the new General armed with his princes authority, and ſome of the old ſoldiers alſo taking his part, at laſt preuailing, Haſſan the old Generall with his partakers were glad to flie and ſhift for themſelues; who for all that, hauing afterward gathered together the diſperſed ſoldiers, and joining with the reſt of the rebels, held ſtil the body of a good army on foot: by his example ſtirring vp the people to rebellion, croſſing the ſeruice of his Soueraign, and doing what harm he could, ſo to ſeem vnto his followers the more valiant.

Tauris recouered by the Perſians.

The Perſian king on the other ſide taking aduantage of theſe the Turks troubles at home, as alſo of his wars with the Chriſtians, at the ſame time with a great army beſieged the great I city of Tauris, as then kept by the Turks with a moſt ſtrong gariſon. In which ſiege hee for battery vſed the help of the cannon, an engin of long time by the Perſians skorned, as not beſeeming valiant men, vntil that by the irown harms taught, he was now content to vſe it, beeing with the ſame, as alſo with skilful canoniers furniſhed by the Portugals. By which means he in ſhort time after again recouered this great City from the Turkes, being before by Sultan Amurath taken from Mahomet the Perſian King, but now againe reſtored vnto the Perſian Kingdom.

Sultan Mahomet thus on euery ſide beſet with troubles, and not wel knowing which way to turn himſelf for remedy, being much perplexed in mind, began to enter into conſideration of the vanity of theſe earthly things, and of the frailty of his eſtate; and ſo ſtruck as it were with K remorſe of conſcience, and a firm beleefe that God did thus chaſtiſe and puniſh him for his offences, conſidering that his anceſtors had neuer bin troubled with any ſuch attaints or diſgraces; he conuerted all his thoughts vnto prayers towards God, and therefore commaunded publique prayers to be continually ſaid in all the Moſchies or churches thorowout his dominions; giuing himſelf wholly alſo vnto ſuch deuout exerciſes and works of charity: & withal ſent two of his moſt reuerend prieſts bare headed and bare footed on pilgrimage to Mecha (where the chief temple of their great Prophet is, and where they vainly beleeue their ſuperſtitious prayers are of him moſt ſpeedily heard) there to pray vnto him for the health & proſperity of him their prince and Soueraign.

A great fight of a Flemiſh ſhip with the Turks gallies.

At the ſame time Amurat Rais an old pyrat the Turkes Admirall for the Weſt part of the L Mediterranian, roaming there vp and down, and doing what harme he could, chanced to light vpon a great Flemiſh ſhip, which he with his gallies forthwith incloſed, the calmneſſe of the weather then fauoring him, & hindring the Flemings, their ſhip being able to make no way. Who ſo beſet, and hauing made a great fight againſt the whole fleet, and ſlaine a number of the Turks, and ſore rent diuers of their gallies, though not without loſſe of many of their own men alſo; being not able longer to fight, and now ſeeing themſelues borded by as many Turks as could wel ſtand vpon the hatches of the ſhip, & their gallies hanging round about her; as men of inuincible courage reſolued to die, and yet to ſel their liues as dear as they could, laid all the pouder they had left in the ſhip, on an heape together, and thereunto vpon the ſudden M put fire, by force whereof the Turkes with the hatches were all blown vp, the Flemings with their ſhip rent in pieces, together with diuers of the Gallies that were faſtened vnto her, and an incredible harme done vnto ſuch other of the Gallies as were neere vnto her. Men worthy alwaies to vanquiſh, ſeeing that they feared nothing more than to be themſelues vanquiſhed: and more worthy to haue liued for the glory of men, than by their crueltie to

A haue periſhed to the diſhonor of men. The old pyrat aſtonied at ſo great and deſperat a reſolution, hauing in this exploit loſt much, and gained nothing, haſted to the ſhore to repaire his rent gallies, and ſo to put to ſea againe: Where he had not long been, but that he by chance (and that full ſore againſt his will) met with the great Duke of Florence his gallies, accounted the beſt gallies in the world, and ſuch as now at this preſent moſt troubled the Turks deſignes. At which meeting, after many a thundering connon ſhot on both ſides diſcharged, not without the apparant loſſe on the Turks behalfe, when they ſhould haue come to haue grapled together, and to haue fought hand to hand, a thing which the Florentines moſt deſired, as in hope to haue made the famous pyrat the prize of their victory; he not willing ſo to do, ſuddenly turned about and fled; after whom the Florentines followed amaine, and in the chaſe B ſunke ſome of his gallies, and took otherſome full of great riches: and ſo brake the credit of this old and renowned pyrat, as that for a great while after he was little by the Chriſtians feared vpon that coaſt. But leauing Mahomet to his deuotions, and the old pyrat to bewaile his loſſes, let vs again returne to ſee what the great armies of the Turks and of the Chriſtians did more in Hungarie.

The Turkes ouerthrowne by the Chriſtians.

While theſe armies lay encamped the one attending vpon the other, many an hot skirmiſh paſſed betwixt them, moſt wherof ſorted vnto the hurt and loſſe of the Turks. Among others it fortuned, that a troupe of aduentures going out of the Chriſtian army to ſeeke after booty, fell vpon a like troup of the Turks, come out for the like purpoſe: where after a ſharp encounter on both ſides giuen & receiued, the Turks at length put to the worſe and defeated, betook C themſelues to flight, hauing left a number of their fellows dead vpon the place, and loſt two of their enſignes, with an hundred and thirty horſes of ſeruice. In which chaſe the Chriſtians hardly purſuing them, draue a number moe of them into the Danubius, wherin they moſt miſerably periſhed; and tooke a great many moe priſoners, amongſt whom were found about fourescore Italian renegates, who brought into the camp, were as enemies vnto God, in a martiall court all condemned to be hanged, and ſo accordingly executed, ſauing the captain himſelfe, who for the regard of his place was beheaded.

Eighty Italian renegats hangd

Shortly after, the great Baſſa ariſing with his army, came in the beginning of October, and incamped neere Buda, both for the preſeruation of the place, and the ſafety of his army, now greatly diminiſhed both in number and courage. For it was certainly knowne by diuers fugitiues D from the Turks, that in theſe many conflicts they had loſt a number of their beſt ſouldiers, but eſpecially of their Ianizaries. So that the Baſſa for ſupplying of that defect, was glad to make choice of 600 of his beſt ſoldiers, whom armed with muskets and ſcimiters, the proper armes of the Ianizaries, he entertained into the rooms and pay of the Ianizaries that were dead and ſlaine: the reſt of his army for the moſt part conſiſting of bare and feeble baſe raw ſouldiers. Beſides this, that all the army was full of mourning and lamentation, the ſoldiers in all places bewailing the loſſe of their brethren, their friends, and companions: ſo that in ſtead of their wonted threats and brauery, nothing was to be heard but ſighing & complaining: and moreouer, that the generall opinion conceiued of the greatneſſe of the Chriſtian army (imagined to bee much greater and ſtronger than indeed it was) had ſtrucke ſuch a feare into the E minds of the Turks, as that they were reſolued, Buda being once victualled, to returne home, all their other proud deſignes for this yeare ſet apart: which was the cauſe that they had diſlodged with their army, and drawne neere vnto the city, the better to attend to the new victualling thereof, and ſo to be gone; accounting themſelues right happy, if they might but performe that good piece of ſeruice and ſaue themſelues.

The Chriſtians before in doubt leſt the Turks ſhould haue beſieged Peſth, as they had before giuen it forth they would, and ſeeing them now to bee riſen with their army, and incamped neere vnto Buda, reſolued to follow them, and in what they might to croſſe their deſignes: and thereupon leauing Peſth, as now out of danger, they roſe alſo, and came and incamped before the Fort in the Iſle of Vicegrade, betwixt the ſaid Fort and Vacia; where F they ſtayed foure daies, and then by a bridge which they made vpon the Danubie, whereby to paſſe from the Iſle where the Italians lay in garriſon, vnto the Fort of S. Andrew, kept by the Lanſquenets, they with the whole army paſſed the riuer, and ſo came and incamped before the Fort of S. Andrew, in the face of the enemy. Now the field betwixt the heads of the two armies was plaine and open, without woods, buſhes, or riuers, to hinder the ioining of a ſet battell. In which ſo fit a place, the Chriſtians encouraged with the feare of their enemies, and the diminiſhing of their number and courage (whereof they had got knowledge as well by their tumultuous riſing, as by other aduertiſements) were deſirous in ſo fauourable occaſions, to haue giuen them battell; and for the deſire they had thereof, were come thither to ſeeke it: which the Turks on the other ſide ſought as much to ſhun, not daring to aduenture themſelues vnto the fortune of a generall battell, for all the bragges they had made. Neuertheleſſe very ſhame arming them with ſome reſolution, they put forth into the field a battalion of fiue thouſand men, fiue daies after that the Chriſtians were incamped on that ſide of the Riuer. This battell of the Turks came marching on, within halfe a quarter of a league of the Chriſtians, which they would not haue done but vpon the confidence of a greater number following of them, hauing behind them ten thouſand men both horſe and foot layd as cloſe as they poſſibly could a little out of the way. Now the Chriſtians thinking of no other forces ready to fight, but thoſe which appeared in their ſight, ſent forth twelue hundred men againſt theſe fiue thouſand Turks, to skirmiſh with them, vntill the whole army were put into order, euen for a generall battell that day to haue been fought, if the Turks ſhould accept thereof, whereunto the Generall, the Colonels, Captaines, and ſouldiers in generall, were fully enclined, the whole army with great cheerfulneſſe marching on foot, at this loud alarme of their common deſire. Which had not failed to bring forth great change of effects, had the Turks been likewiſe diſpoſed for the producing of the ſame. But they be the extraordinarie fauours of Fortune, when fit occaſions ioyne themſelues with braue reſolutions and ſuch reſolutions with meanes to effect the ſame. This is the let of many moſt noble trophies, which moſt commonly faile, either for lacke of fit occaſion, or for lacke of good reſolution for the performance of them. But as moſt men iudge of other mens conceits by their owne inclination, ſo the Chriſtians themſelues reſolued to giue battell, thought the Turks their enemies to haue been of the ſame reſolution: and thoſe fiue thouſand men to haue been the head of the auauntguard, followed with the whole army, comming to draw them out to skirmiſh vntill the comming on of the reſt of their forces. Howbeit their deſigne was quite contrary to this the Chriſtians hope; for their purpoſe was onely to traine them out into their ambuſhes, ſo without danger to cut them in pieces. Of which their purpoſe they gaue ſufficient teſtimonie, and cauſe of ſuſpect; for that the skirmiſh hauing continued three houres, with ſome loſſe on both ſides, the Turks army appeared not: and theſe fiue thouſand Turks now in skirmiſh, by little and little retyring, ſought ſo to haue drawne the Chriſtians into the danger of their ambuſh. Which their manner of fight cauſed the Chriſtians to ſuſpect the matter: for it was not like, that fiue thouſand men ſhould giue ground to twelue hundred, if they had not had ſome ſecret meaning therein, which they ſought to effect to their more aduantage: which cauſed the Chriſtian Carabins which followed them, not to be too earneſt in purſuing of them, and more cloſely to ſerre themſelues together, the better to endure the ſhocke of their enemies, if they ſhould charge them. Neither were they in that their prouident feare deceiued: for the Turks ſeeing their purpoſe diſcouered, and themſelues now out of hope to effect the ſame, vpon the ſudden made a ſtand, and ſo preſently comming on, hardly charged the foremoſt of our Carabins, who as men halfe ſurpriſed, to ſee themſelues ſo readily and reſolutely charged, by men who but now made ſhew as if they would haue fled, were not able ſo valiantly to receiue the charge (conſidering the great number of them by whom they were charged) but that ſome few of them were ouerthrowne and ſlaine, with ſome of the Hungarians amongſt them. Howbeit they made good reſiſtance, and right valiantly repulſed their enemies, of whom they ſlew a great number alſo. The preaſe in this conflict was great, euery one deſiring to ſhew himſelfe braue and couragious in the head of his owne army. But new ſupplies ſtill comming in, the Turks in fine ſhrunke backe and retired, hauing left three hundred of their fellowes dead vpon the place, accompanied with an hundred of the Chriſtians there ſlaine likewiſe. Now vpon the retreat on both ſides, euery man in his conceit appointed the next day for the generall day of battell: the bragging ſpeeches of the Turks giuing the Chriſtians occaſion ſo to thinke; for why, they ſeldome or neuer refuſe battell being offered them by the Chriſtians, as wel for the confidence they commonly haue in their multitude, as for the fooliſh opinion they haue of the ineuitable predeſtination of men to life or death: accounting it amongſt them an eternall infamie,

A conflict betwixt the Turks and the Chriſtians.

A famy to refuſe any combat againſt the Chriſtians, which howſoeuer it fall out, ſhould ſort to their aduantage, by vanquiſhing gaining the fruits of their victory, and by loſing their liues in battell, to gain the joyes of heauen; being vainly perſuaded, no mens ſouls to go more readily to heauen, that the ſouls of ſuch as die in battell againſt the Chriſtians. Such effects old ſuperſtitious opinions are able to work in the minds of men, euen to the deſperat aduenture and ſpending of their liues. Howbeit that this effect at this time witneſſeth, that theſe men with all theſe aduantages, as much feared the danger as any other poore faint hearted men; and that a ſtrong apprehenſion of fear is able to preuail againſt all cuſtomes and perſuaſions, be they neuer ſo old, as alſo againſt all other accidents whatſoeuer. For why, the Turks contenting themſelues with their great brags and vain threats, came not forth according to their B promiſe, neither could by any means be drawn to aduenture themſelues vnto the hazard of a generall battel. The loſſe of their great and choiceſt men diſcouraged & deterred them from aduenturing all to the hazard of ſo great a peril: for (as I haue ſaid) almoſt all the Ianizaries and moſt valiant ſoldiers were dead or ſlain; and the reſt, men of ſmal ſpirit or courage, reſerued that little which was in them, for the ſafegard of themſelues, and not for the gaining of any notable victory. They had alſo in theſe often conflicts loſt all their Erasbles, which are a deſperat kind of ſoldiers fighting on horſeback without ſaddles, hauing onely a little piece of tapeſtry vpon their horſes backs, and by the readineſſe of their horſes do for a long time in one ſort maintain their fight. They carry light darts made of ſtrait and faire Canes, excellently well made, and ſtrongly armed; and their handy weapons are good ſables, or broad and C ſharp curtle-axes. Theſe men a great while fought moſt valiantly in the laſt combats, but in fine were all ſlaine, except ſome few which caſt themſelues into Danubius, and were there drowned. The loſſe of which men much diſcouraged the Turks; for why, their ſeruice ſtood them in great ſtead in receiuing the enemies charges, and with their bodies couering of the Turks ſquadrons in their greateſt perils & combats. Howbeit the Turks receiued not theſe loſſes without returning ſome part therof to vs again. For Collonitz had but a little before fallen into great danger of his perſon, & loſt ſome of his followers in an enterpriſe of great moment, had the effect anſwered vnto the project therof. While the Turks yet lodged in the Iſle of Vicegrade, he cauſed eight great field pieces to be ſo placed, as that therewith he ſo much annoyed the Turkes, that they were about to haue forſaken the place: and the more to force D them ſo to doe, the ſecond of October he imbarqued himſelfe with 600 Haiduckes vpon the Danubius, and ſo by night with great ſilence landed neer vnto the enemies, thinking ſo vpon the ſudden to haue ſurpriſed them. Which for all that could not ſo ſecretly be don, by reaſon of the appearing of the day, but that the Turks were therof aware; who therupon with great preiſe iſſued out of their trenches, and with al their force and power charged him. Againſt whom he made head, rather vpon a braue and conſtant reſolution, than any confidence he had in his own forces, not hauing men ynow to withſtand the leaſt part of his enemies. Which his ſo great reſolution ſo abated the Turks fury, as that they ſtood a good while in doubt to charge men ſo reſolued. The field pieces which he had brought ouer with him into the Iſle then ſerued him to good purpoſe, beating them backe with their murthering bullets, who E with their number thought to haue ouerwhelmed him. Which good help oppoſed againſt the number of the enemies, for a time ballanced the victory, and wrought the death of many on both ſides. This maner of fight endured the ſpace of two hours, maintained more by reſolution than by ſtrengh and power. At length for all that, the Turks with their number preuailing, the Chriſtians therwith rather oppreſſed than vanquiſhed, forſaking their field pieces, diſorderly retyred towards their boats: but the Turks eagerly purſuing them, ſlew 400 of the Haiducks; the reſt recouering their boats, carryed with them their Generall, by them hardly defended from the fury of the enemy. Which loſſe hapned not ſo vnto the Chriſtians, but that it was mingled with ſome loſſe of the Turkes alſo, of whom the moſt forward and couragious were in that fight ſlain, as was afterwards knowne by certaine priſoners of theirs which F were afterwards taken, who made report of the loſſes by them there receiued. The Turkes by this ſo deſperate and dangerous an attempt warned to preuent the like for the time to come, caſt vp great trenches in the Iſle alongſt the bank of Danubius, therin placing certain Ianizaries and other their beſt ſouldiers, who there lay vntill the Campe diſlodging went to lie before Buda.

Collonitz in ſurpriſing the Turks is himſelf ſurpriſed.

The Turks had before built a bridge of boats at Lamaſcin, which gaue them paſſage into G Stiria, where they did great harm; for the ſtrengthning wherof they had built at both ends a ſtrong fort, well furniſhed both with men and munition. This bridge ſo commodious to the Turks, and hurtful to the Chriſtians, Trantmeſtorf gouernor of Stiria, and a great commander in thoſe parts, with his Stirian troupes, and ſome good aid brought vnto him by the County Serin, vndertook to break. Vpon which reſolution he vpon the ſudden approched one of the aforeſaid forts, and ſo right furiouſly aſſailed the ſame before they were well aware of his comming. In which doing, he cauſed the greateſt noiſe and ſtir that was poſſible to be made with trumpets, drummes, and clattering of armour, as if it had bin ſome great army imploied in that action, the more to terrifie the defendants. Which ſo great and dreadful a noiſe, joined vnto ſo braue an attempt, with ſo great courage begun, ſtrook ſuch a terror into the minds of H the Turks, that they without any great reſiſtance quitted the place, and fled ouer the bridge to the other fort. Of which forſaken fort the Chriſtians became maſters, and with all ſpeed proſecuting their good fortune, preſently drew out therof two Cannons, and therewith battered the other fort: in which the Turks, hauing no other place of refuge to flie vnto, nor hope of ſafety but in their laſt valour, ſo wel behaued themſelues, as that the Chriſtians had much ado to force them; howbeit a breach being made by the fury of the cannon, and ſcaling ladders ſet vp, the fort was on euery ſide aſſaulted; which the Turks ſo valiantly endured by the ſpace of fiue hours, as that it was hard to ſay who ſhould preuail or haue the better. In this aſſault were many on both ſides ſlain; the Turks not being to be ouercome but with the loſſe both of their liues and honour; and the Chriſtians not able to retyre, without the loſſe of I that ſo great and rich an enterpriſe. So that the aſſault was with great reſolution on both ſides maintained, the Turks fighting for their liues, and the Chriſtians for their honour; vntill that at laſt the Turks with much ſlaughter ouercome, the fort was by the Chriſtians taken, and moſt of the Turks therein being ſlain, and the reſt taken priſoners, both the forts were forthwith raſed, and the bridge broken, which before had ſerued for an ordinary paſſage for the Turks to forrage and ſpoil the Chriſtian territory by. The boats wherof the bridge was made were all burnt, and ſome great Ordnance therein found, broken in pieces and caſt into the riuer.

Lugaze a ſtrōg place yeelded to Baſta.

At the ſame time Lugaze, a place of great importance for the ſeruice of the Emperour, and ſo neer vnto the Turks, as that they could hardly attempt any thing theerabouts, but that it K might from thence be diſcouered and knowne, was by the Tranſyluanians deliuered to Baſta, the Emperors Lieutenant in that countrey. From which place he ſending out certain ſcouts toward Belgrade, they brought in with them certain priſoners; who being examined, ſaid, that Haſſan Baſſa in Hungary, had writ to Giaffer Baſſa the gouernor of Temeſwar, That he ſhould only attend to the preſeruation of his own, without attempting any thing further againſt the Chriſtians, the preſent eſtate of their affairs ſo requiring. And that hauing re-victualled Buda, his purpoſe was for this year to return, in hope of ſome good peace to be ere long concluded betwixt the great Sultan and the Emperor.

The two armies of the Turks and the Chriſtians lay ſtil neer the one of them to the other, the Turkes carefull for the re-victualling of Buda, and the Chriſtians ſtill intentiue to their L doings, and deſirous in what they might to hinder and fruſtrate the ſame. Which becauſe they could no way better do than by offering of them battell, they thereupon generally reſolued, vpon a Friday being the ſeuenteenth of October, the day by them aſſigned for the battell (hauing by the ſhooting off of three great cannons giuen warning vnto the ſouldiors thorowout the camp, for the preparing of themſelues firſt towards God, and then to the ſeruice of their Prince) after they had wel refreſhed themſelues, in good order tooke the field, and ſo ſtood ready ranged there, either to giue or accept of battell. Before whom the County Rhingraue was ſent forth with his Regiment, about halfe the way betwixt the two Armies, to diſcouer the mouing of the Enemy, and to receiue his firſt charge, if occaſion ſhould ſo require. M Whoſe Scouts before ſent forth, about noone diſcouered a troupe of horſemen come out of the Turkes Camp, about ſome buſineſſe they had to do, but to them vnknowne. Whom the Scouts ſuppoſing to haue been the fore-runners of the Turks Army, and by them almoſt ſurpriſed, haſtily retyred back again, and by their haſty retreit put the whole army in an alarme; which came brauely marching on, in hope now to haue come to try the matter by true valor

A lour, and by the fortune of a generall battell to haue made that day for euer famous by their victory and the ouerthrow of their proud enemies. And in the heat of their ſo great courage like enough it was for them to haue performed the ſame, had the Turks had but ſo much courage in them as to haue met them in the field, as was well hoped they now would. But they with their former loſſes diſcouraged, and reſolued only vpon the ſafegard of themſelues, and the victualling of Buda, had no minde to enter into theſe honourable liſts, but kept themſelues cloſe within the couert of their tents and the ſtrength of their trenches. And ſo the Chriſtians with a falſe alarme moued, and hauing for the moſt part of the day in vaine expected the comming forth of their enemies, returned into their campe deceiued of their expectation.

The Turkes refuſe to accept of battell offered them by the Chriſtians.
